THE PREFACE.

AFTER the Publication of a Collection of State-Trials, which conſiſts of Six Volumes in Folio; the Reader may poſſibly be ſurpriz'd at the appearance of Two Volumes more of Collections on the ſame ſubject. For this Reaſon it may be proper to premiſe ſome Particulars prefatory to the Work, concerning the Inducements there were to it, and the Method wherein it has been purſued.

And here we would by no means be underſtood to lay any Imputation on the Gentleman who prepar'd the laſt Edition of that Work for the Preſs. The judicious Preface he prefix'd to it, plainly ſhew'd him to be entirely Maſter of the Subject; and he perform'd with eminent Sufficiency the Part he undertook, which was to prepare and methodize ſuch Tracts, Printed or Manuſcript, as were brought to him; to inſert them in their proper Places, and to make Remarks and References wherever there was Occaſion. The Buſineſs of collecting the ſeveral Pieces was by no means his Province, nor was it to be expected from one who had daily Avocations in the way of his Profeſſion.

And tho' it were admitted that the then Undertakers did every thing they poſſibly could, to render the Work entire and complete, and ſpared neither Pains nor Expence to procure Materials fit for the purpoſe; yet it is no wonder that in ſo fruitful a Field, they ſhould after all their Diligence leave ſome Gleanings to reward the Induſtry of thoſe that came after them.

They proceeded in the firſt Edition upon a very ſcanty Plan, propoſing to take in no Trials, but what were really State-Trials, and and were taken at length and entire; and to this Plan they adhered ſtrictly, except in a few Inſtances: but in preparing the ſecond Edition, by the Advice of ſeveral Gentlemen of Learning and Curioſity, a greater Latitude was taken, and as well ſeveral Caſes heard before the Court of Star-Chamber were inſerted, as other Proceedings at Law, which could not properly be called State-Trials; and Trials which were well taken, tho' not of a Criminal Nature, were inſerted, together with the dying Behaviour and Speeches of ſuch unfortunate Perſons as ſuffer'd Death upon their Convictions.

In almoſt every of theſe Particulars, theſe Supplemental Volumes will appear to have received many Additions and Improvements. The Caſes here inſerted, which were debated in the Star-Chamber, are ſuch only as were conſiderable for the Curioſity of the Fact enquired into; as the Caſe of Daviſon for ſending down the Warrant for beheading the Queen of Scots, contrary to Queen Elizabeth's Order; or for the Figure and Station of the Perſons concern'd, as Lord Chancellor Bacon and others. The Trial for a large Eſtate in Shadwell, wherein the Lady Ivy was a Party; that of Mr. Denew and others, for aſſaulting Mr. Colepeper; the Proceedings between the Duke and Dutcheſs of Norfolk, and his Grace's Trial with Mr. Germaine; and ſome others, were taken from printed Pieces, which for their Price and Scarcity were almoſt equivalent to Manuſcripts: and we can with Truth ſay, that moſt of the printed Tracts here made uſe of, coſt above Ten times the Price, that an ordinary Piece of the ſame Size is commonly ſold for.

As for the Trials in theſe Volumes which were never before printed, we are not at liberty to give the Reaſons why we believe them to be Authentick; but we conceive the intrinſick Marks they bear will be ſo evident and convincing, to every one that reads them, of their being genuine, as to make any Proofs on that head to be abſolutely unneceſſary.

We have been oblig'd in a few Places to tranſcribe here and there ſome Paſſages from larger Works: but in this Particular we have been as ſparing as poſſible, having inſerted no more than was abſolutely neceſſary to preſerve the Connexion, and to make the whole more intelligible. The greateſt Freedom taken in that kind has been in the Collection of Arguments and Debates upon the Habeas Corpus Act and Liberty of the Subject, between the Years 1627 and 1640; in which we were obliged to be ſometimes beholden (but as little as poſſible) to

Mr.

Mr. Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collections. As theſe Conteſts, between the Crown and the Subject, were one of the great Cauſes of the fatal Confuſions which afterwards followed, and of that ſurprizing Revolution which was the Aſtoniſhment of all Chriſtendom; every Proceeding in that Affair, warranted by ſufficient Authority, was thought worth preſerving; eſpecially as it related to what, next to the Life of the Subject, is deemed moſt precious in the Eye of the Law, his Liberty.

Some Gentlemen may perhaps think that Mr. Ruſhworth's Collections are ſo full on this Head, that it would be a Preſumption to add any thing to them: but it will appear that moſt of the Speeches and Proceedings here printed are not taken notice of by Mr. Ruſhworth. How they came to be omitted, we will not pretend to determine; only we cannot forbear obſerving, as a ſtrange Inſtance of Partiality in that Editor, that after inſerting the Articles againſt the Earl of Strafford at large in his Trial, he has abridg'd the Anſwer put in by him to his Articles, with this Introduction: The Anſwer held three Hours, being above 200 Sheets of Paper, too long to be here inſerted; yet take an Abſtract of the ſaid Anſwer to the Articles exhibited againſt him, which are as followeth. Which Abſtract is ſo vaſtly ſhort, as not to contain above Ten Pages.

For fear of being thought prolix, in order to ſwell the Price of the Book, we have omitted the Trial at large of the Earl of Strafford, it being to be had ſeparate at a moderate Price. We don't doubt but his Anſwer at large would have been a great Ornament to this Collection, and would have enabled the World to judge more clearly of his Caſe, than it is now likely to do. But as all the Proceedings againſt him were ſtrictly order'd to be obliterated; ſo, with the utmoſt Enquiry, we have been unable to find any Copy thereof remaining with the Deſcendants of his Family, or in any other Hands.

The Caſe of Monopolies, between the Eaſt-India Company and Mr. Sandys, does not, it muſt be confeſt, ſtrictly ſpeaking, come under the Deſcription of a State-Trial; but as the publiſhing the Proceedings between the King and the City of London, upon a Quo Warranto, in the laſt Edition of the State-Trials, met with general Approbation, we hope the like candid Conſtruction will be put upon the ſtep we have taken in this Caſe. The Queſtion of the Power of the Crown to grant an excluſive Charter, and the Diſtinction to be made between a criminal Monopoly, the regal Prerogative, and legal Property, are undoubtedly of the higheſt Importance. The Point is debated upon this Occaſion by the moſt knowing and eminent Lawyers of the time, and their Arguments are now firſt publiſhed from Manuſcripts, which have not been taken notice of in any of the Law-Books now extant, (except a very ſhort Abſtract of ſome of the Speeches, which is printed in Mr. Serjeant Skinner's Reports) to which are added the learned Arguments and Reaſons of the Lord Chief-Juſtice Jeffreys.

There are ſome Inſtances where we have not been able to procure complete Trials, and yet have obtained either Speeches made in them by Gentlemen of note at that time, or large and particular Relations, though not in ſo minute and exact a manner, as in Trials taken in Short-hand in Court. Where any thing of this kind has occur'd, which we judg'd worth notice, we have choſe to preſerve them from the Oblivion they would otherwiſe ſink under, by inſerting them in this Collection. And tho' they are not ſo valuable as entire Trials, yet they may ſerve to give a more clear Account of the Facts there tried, than is to be found in a general Hiſtory; which, as the learned Editor of the State-Trials well obſerves, is one conſiderable Benefit ariſing from Collections of this kind.

Concerning the other Pieces contained in this Collection, we need be the leſs particular in this place, as we have before moſt of the Articles, or in Notes at the Bottom, given our Reaſons for inſerting them: Only leſt it ſhould be thought that the remarkable Caſe of Aſhby and White, in the laſt Volume, contains no more than the ſmall Book, publiſh'd under that Name in Octavo in the Year 1705, it may be proper to obſerve, That the whole Proceedings and Debates of that memorable Affair are deduced in Order of Time from the firſt Complaint made in the Houſe of Commons; containing not only the Proceedings, Reports, Repreſentations, Conferences and Reſolutions, of both Houſes, as publiſh'd by their Order; but alſo the Proceedings and Arguments in the Court of King's-Bench.

In fine, as no Pains or Expence has been ſpared to make this Collection complete, uſeful and inſtructive; ſo we muſt ſubmit the whole to the Judgment of the Publick, and rely upon the Candour of the Readers, for a kind Acceptance of our Endeavours.

Proceedings in Parliament againſt Sir THOMAS SEYMOUR, Knt. Lord Sudley, for High-Treaſon, Feb. 25. 1549. 2, & 3 Edw. 6.

ABOUT the year 1547 *, Sir Thomas Seymour the Protector's brother was brought to ſuch a ſhare of his fortunes, that he was made a Baron, and Lord Admiral. But this not ſatisfying his ambition, he endeavour'd to have link'd himſelf into a nearer relation with the crown, by marrying the King's Siſter, the Lady Elizabeth. But finding he could not compaſs that, he made his addreſſes to Catherine Parr, the Queen Dowager, and they were married privately. Being by this match poſſeſs'd of great wealth, he ſtudied to engage all about the King to be his friends. His deſign was, that ſince he was the King's Uncle as well as his Brother, he ought to have a proportion'd ſhare with him in the Government. About Eaſter that year he firſt ſet about that deſign; and corrupted ſome about the King who ſhould bring him ſometimes privately through the gallery to the Queen Dowager's Lodgings, and he deſired they would let him know when the King had occaſion for Money, they ſhould not trouble the Treaſury, for he would furniſh him. Thus he gained ground with the King.

When the Protector was that year in Scotland, the Admiral began to act more openly, and was for making a party for himſelf, of which Paget charg'd him in plain terms, yet all was ineffectual; for the Admiral was reſolv'd to go on, and either get himſelf advanc'd higher, or periſh in the attempt. During the ſeſſion, the Admiral got the King to write with his own hand a meſſage to the Houſe of Commons for making him Governor of his Perſon, and he intended to have gone with it to the Houſe, and had a party there, by whoſe intereſt he was confident to have carried his buſineſs: he dealt alſo with many of the Lords and Counſellors to aſſiſt him in it. When this was known, before he had gone with it to the Houſe, ſome were ſent in his Brother's name to ſee if they could prevail with him to go no further; he refus'd to hearken to them, and ſaid, that if he were croſs'd in his attempt, he would make this the blackeſt Parliament that ever was in England. Upon that, he was ſent for by order from the Council, but refus'd to come; then they threaten'd him ſeverely, and told him, the King's writing was nothing in law, but that he who had procur'd it, was puniſhable for doing an act of ſuch a nature, &c. ſo they reſolv'd to have him ſent to the Tower. But at laſt he ſubmitted himſelf to the Protector and Council; and his Brother and he ſeem'd to be perfectly reconciled †, though it was viſible he only put off his projects till a fitter conjuncture, and was on all oc-caſions infuſing into the King a diſlike of every thing that was done, perſuading him to aſſume the Government himſelf, and bribing his ſervants.

† It's mention'd by ſome hiſtorians, that the firſt occaſion of the quarrel between the two Brothers, aroſe from the envy and malice of the Dutcheſs of Somerſet, againſt the Queen Dowager, wife to the Admiral, and that ſhe claim'd the precedency as the Protector's Lady; but this is very unlikely, that ſhe ſhould be ſo ignorant of the cuſtoms of England, as to diſpute precedency with the Queen Dowager. The whole ſtory ſeems to be forg'd by Saunders, in his Treatiſe De Schiſmat. Anglican. and copied by Hayward, &c. See the complete Hiſtory of England, vol. II. p. 301. and Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, vol. II. p. 54. Rapin in Engliſh, 8vo Edit. vol. VIII. p. 53. and Strype's Memorials, vol. II. p. 124. and 475. But Strype in the ſame volume, p. 133. ſaith, King Edward in his invaluable Journal preſerv'd in the Cotton Library, noteth, that the Protector was much offended with this marriage of his Brother to the Queen. See alſo Strype's Animadverſions on Hayward's Edw. the VIth, in his Memorials, vol. II. p. 475. and Burnet's Appendix to vol. II. p. 392. concerning ſome errors and falſhoods in Saunders's Book of the Engliſh Schiſm.

Thus he continu'd contriving and plotting for ſome time; the Protector had often been told of theſe things, and warn'd him of the danger into which he would throw himſelf. But his reſtleſs ambition ſeeming incurable, he was on the 19th of January (Stow ſayeth the 16th) ſent to the *Tower: and now many things broke out againſt him, particularly a conſpiracy of his with Sir William Sharington, Vice-Treaſurer of the Mint at Briſtol, who was to have furniſh'd him with 10000 l. and had already coin'd about 12000 l. falſe money †, and had clipt a great deal more, to the value of 40000 l. in all; for which he was attainted by a proceſs at common law, and that was confirm'd in Parliament ‡. Fowler alſo, that waited in the Privy-Chamber, with others were ſent to the Tower; many complaints being brought againſt him, the Lord Ruſſel, the Earl of Southampton and Secretary Petre were order'd to receive their examinations.

The Protector finding he could not perſuade him to ſubmit, on the 22d of February a report was made to the Council of all the informations againſt him; conſiſting not only of the particulars beforemention'd, but of many foul miſdemeanours in the diſcharge of the Admiralty, ſeveral pirates being concern'd with him, &c. The whole charge againſt him, conſiſting of 33 articles, is as followeth, viz.

Articles of High Treaſon, and other Miſdemeanours againſt the King's Majeſty and his Crown, objected to Sir Thomas Seymour, Kt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, and High Admiral of England.

Ex Libro Concilii. fol. 236. 1. WHereas the Duke of Somerſet was made Governor of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and Protector of all his Realms and Dominions, and Subjects; to the which you your ſelf did agree, and gave your conſent in writing; it is objected and laid unto your charge, That this notwithſtanding, you have attempted and gone about, by indirect means, to undo this Order, and to get into your hands the Government of the King's Majeſty, to the great danger of his Highneſs's Perſon, and the ſubverſion of the State of the Realm.

2. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That by corrupting with Gifts, and fair Promiſes, divers of the Privy Chamber, you went about to allure his Highneſs to condeſcend and agree to the ſame your moſt heinous and perilous purpoſes, to the great danger of his Highneſs's Perſon, and of the ſubverſion of the State of the Realm.

3. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you wrote a Letter with your own hand; which Letter the King's Majeſty ſhould have ſubſcribed, or written again after that Copy, to the Parliament-Houſe; and that you delivered the ſame to his Highneſs for that intent: With the which ſo written by his Highneſs, or ſubſcribed, you have determined to have come into the Commons-Houſe your ſelf; and there, with your fautors and adherents before prepared, to have made a broil, or tumult, or uproar, to the great danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and ſubverſion of the State of this Realm.

4. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you your ſelf ſpake to divers of the Council, and laboured with divers of the Nobility of the Realm, to ſtick and adhere unto you for the alteration of the State, and order of the Realm, and to attain your other purpoſes, to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, now in his tender years, and ſubverſion of the State of the Realm.

5. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you did ſay openly and plainly, you would make the blackeſt Parliament that ever was in England.

6. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That being ſent for by the authority, to anſwer to ſuch things as were thought meet to be reformed in you, you refuſed to come; to a very evil example of diſobedience, and danger thereby of the ſubverſion of the State of the Realm.

7. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That ſince the laſt Seſſions of this Parliament, notwithſtanding much clemency ſhewed unto you, you have ſtill continued in your former miſchievous purpoſes; and continually, by your ſelf and others, ſtudied and laboured to put into the King's Majeſty's head and mind, a miſliking of the Government of the Realm, and of the Lord Protector's doings, to the danger of his Perſon, and the great peril of the Realm.

8. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That the King's Majeſty being of thoſe tender years, and as yet by age unable to direct his own things, you have gone about to inſtill into his Grace's head, and as much as lieth in you, perſuaded him to take upon himſelf the Government and managing of his own affairs, to the danger of his Highneſs's Perſon, and great peril of the whole Realm.

9. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you had fully intended and appointed, to have taken the King's Majeſty's Perſon into your own hands and cuſtody, to the danger of his Subjects, and peril of the Realm.

10. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That you have corrupted, with money, certain of the Privy-Chamber, to perſuade the King's Majeſty to have a credit towards you; and ſo to inſinuate you to his Grace, that when he lacked any thing, he ſhould have it of you and none other body, to the intent he ſhould miſlike his ordering, and that you might the better, when you ſaw time, uſe the King's Highneſs for an inſtrument to this purpoſe, to the danger of his Royal Perſon, and ſubverſion of the State of the Realm.

11. It

* In Bibliotheca Harleyana, 4o. B. 29. 51. is the Duke of Somerſet's and Council's Letter to Sir Philip Hobby, declaring to him "The traitorous proceedings of the Lord High Admiral, the Duke's Brother, viz. That he attempted to take into his own hands "the moſt noble Perſon of the King's Majeſty, and intended by bandying himſelf with divers perſons, to have moved plain ſedi-"tion in the Parliament, and otherwiſe to have put the whole Realm in trouble and danger. That ſuch his practices being diſ-"cover'd, and he queſtion'd, he ſeem'd very penitent, whereupon he was forgiven, and his living advanc'd almoſt 1000 marks "per Ann. That afterwards he practis'd, and had almoſt compaſs'd a ſecret marriage between himſelf and the Lady Eliz. the "King's Siſter; and then intended to have taken into his hands, and order the Perſon of the King's Majeſty, and the Lady Mary, "and to have diſpos'd of his Majeſty's whole Council at his pleaſure: for all which he is put into the Tower of London.

11. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you promiſed the marriage of the King's Majeſty at your will and pleaſure.

12. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you have laboured, and gone about to combine and confederate your ſelf with ſome Perſons; and eſpecially moved thoſe Noblemen whom you thought not to be contented, to depart into their Countries, and make themſelves ſtrong; and otherwiſe to allure them to ſerve your purpoſe by gentle promiſes and offers, to have a party and faction in readineſs to all your purpoſes, to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and peril of the ſtate of the Realm.

13. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you have parted, as it were, in your imagination and intent, the Realm, to ſet Noblemen to countervail ſuch other Noblemen as you thought would lett your deviliſh purpoſes, and ſo laboured to be ſtrong to all your Devices; to the great danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and great peril of the ſtate of the Realm.

14. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you had adviſed certain men to entertain and win the favour and good-wills of the head yeomen and ringleaders of certain countries, to the intent that they might bring the multitude and commons, when you ſhould think meet, to the furtherance of your purpoſes.

15. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That you have not only ſtudied and imagined how to have the rule of a number of men in your hands, but that you have attempted to get, and alſo gotten, divers ſtewardſhips of Noblemen's lands, and their mannoreds, to make your party ſtronger, for your purpoſes aforeſaid; to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and great peril of the ſtate of the Realm.

16. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That you have retained young gentlemen, and hired yeomen, to a great multitude, and far above ſuch number as is permitted by the laws and ſtatutes of the Realm, or were otherwiſe neceſſary or convenient for your ſervice, place, or eſtate, to the fortifying of your ſelf towards all your evil intents and purpoſes; to the great danger of the King's Majeſty, and peril of the ſtate of the Realm.

17. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That you had ſo travailed in that matter, that you had made your ſelf able to make, of your own men, out of your lands and rules, and other your adherents, ten thouſand men, beſides your friends, to the advancement of all your intents and purpoſes; to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and the great peril of the ſtate of the Realm.

18. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you had conferred, caſt, and weighed ſo much money as would find the ſaid ten thouſand men for a month; and that you knew how and where to have the ſame Sum; and that you had given warning to have and prepare the ſaid maſs of money in a readineſs; to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and great peril to the ſtate of the Realm.

19. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you have not only, before you married the Queen, attempted and gone about to marry the King's Majeſty's Siſter, the Lady Elizabeth, ſecond Inheritor in remainder to the Crown, but alſo being then lett by the Lord Protector, and others of the Council, ſince that time, both in the life of the Queen, continued your old labour and love; and after her death, by ſecret and crafty means, practiſed to atchieve the ſaid purpoſe of marrying the ſaid Lady Elizabeth; to the danger of the King's Majeſty's Perſon, and peril of the ſtate of the ſame.

20. It is objected, and laid to your charge, That you married the late Queen ſo ſoon after the late King's death, that if ſhe had conceived ſtreight after, it ſhould have been a great doubt whether the child born ſhould have been accounted the late King's or yours; whereupon a marvellous danger and peril might, and was like to have enſued to the King's Majeſty's ſucceſſion and quiet of the Realm.

21. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you firſt married the Queen privately, and did diſſemble and keep cloſe the ſame; inſomuch, that a good ſpace after you had married her, you made labour to the King's Majeſty, and obtained a letter of his Majeſty's hand, to move and require the ſaid Queen to marry with you; and likewiſe procured the Lord Protector to ſpeak to the Queen to bear you her favour towards marriage: by the which colouring, not only your evil and diſſembling nature may be known, but alſo it is to be feared, that at this preſent you did intend to uſe the ſame practice in the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth's Grace.

22. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you not only, ſo much as lay in you, did ſtop and lett all ſuch things as, either by Parliament or otherwiſe, ſhould tend to the advancement of the King's Majeſty's affairs, but did withdraw your ſelf from the King's Majeſty's ſervice; and being moved and ſpoken unto, for your own honour, and for the ability that was in you, to ſerve and aid the King's Majeſty's affairs, and the Lord Protector's, you would always draw back, and feign excuſes, and declare plainly that you would not do it.

Wherefore, upon the diſcourſe of all theſe foreſaid things, and of divers others, it muſt needs be intended, that all theſe preparations of men and money, the attempts and ſecret practices of the ſaid marriage; the abuſing and perſuading of the King's Majeſty to miſlike the Government, State, and Order of the Realm that now is, and to take the Government into his own hands, and to credit you; was to none other end and purpoſe, but after a title gotten to the Crown, and your party made ſtrong both by ſea and land, with furniture of men and money ſufficient to have aſpired to the Dignity Royal, by ſome heinous enterprize againſt the King's Majeſty's Perſon; to the ſubverſion of the whole ſtate of the Realm.

23. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you not only had gotten into your hands the ſtrong and dangerous iſles of Scilly, bought of divers men; but that ſo much as lay in your power, you travailed alſo to have Londay, and under pretence to have victualled the ſhips therewith, not only went about, but alſo moved the Lord Protector, and whole Council, that you might, by publick authority, have that, which by private fraud and falſhood, and confederating with Sharington, you had gotten; that is, the Mint at Briſtol, to be yours wholly, and only to ſerve your purpoſes, caſting, as may appear, that if theſe traitorous purpoſes had no good ſucceſs, yet you might thither convey a good maſs of money; where being aided with ſhips, and conſpiring at all evil events with pirates, you might at all times have a ſure and ſafe refuge, if any thing for your demerits ſhould have been attempted againſt you.

24. It is alſo objected, and laid unto your charge, That having knowledge that Sir William Sharington Kt. had committed Treaſon, and otherwiſe wonderfully defrauded and deceived the King's Majeſty, nevertheleſs, you both by your ſelf, and by ſeeking council for him, and by all means you could, did aid, aſſiſt, and bear him, contrary to your allegiance and duty to the King's Majeſty, and the good laws and orders of the Realm.

25. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That where you owed to Sir William Sharington Kt. a great ſum of money, yet to abet, bear, and cloak the great falſhood of the ſaid Sharington, and to defraud the King's Majeſty, you were not afraid to ſay and affirm, before the Lord Protector and the Council, that the ſame Sharington did owe unto you a great ſum of money, viz. 2800 l. and to conſpire with him in that falſhood, and take a bill of that feigned debt into your cuſtody.

26. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you by your ſelf and Miniſters, have not only extorted and bribed great ſums of money of all ſuch ſhips as ſhould go into Iſland, but alſo as ſhould go any other where in merchandiſe, contrary to the liberty of this Realm, and to the great diſcouragement and deſtruction of the Navy of the ſame, to the great danger of the King's Majeſty and the ſtate of the Realm.

27. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That where divers merchants, as well ſtrangers as Engliſhmen, have had their goods piratouſly robbed and taken, you have had their goods in your hands and cuſtody, daily ſeen in your houſe, and diſtributed among your ſervants and friends, without any reſtitution to the parties ſo injured and ſpoiled; ſo that thereby foreign Princes have in a manner been weary of the King's Majeſty's amity, and by their Ambaſſadors divers times complained, to the great ſlander of the King's Majeſty, and danger of the ſtate of the Realm.

28. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That where certain men have taken certain Pirates, you have not only taken from the takers of the ſaid Pirates, all the goods and ſhips ſo taken, without any reward, but have caſt the ſaid takers, for their good ſervice done to the King's Majeſty, into Priſon, and there detained them a great time; ſome eight weeks, ſome more, ſome leſs, to the diſcouraging of ſuch as truly ſhould ſerve the King's Majeſty againſt his Pirates and Enemies.

29. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That divers of the head Pirates being brought unto you, you have let the ſame Pirates go again free unto the ſeas; and taking away from the takers of them, not only all their commodity and profit, but from the true owners of the ſhips and goods, all ſuch as ever came into the Pirates hands, as though you were authorized to be the chief Pirate, and to have had all the advantage they could bring unto you.

30. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That where order hath been taken, by the Lord Protector and the whole Council, that certain goods, piratically taken upon the ſeas, and otherwiſe known not to be wreck nor forfeited, ſhould be reſtored to the true owners, and Letters thereupon written by the Lord Protector and the Council; to the which Letters, you your ſelf, among the other, did ſet to your hand: Yet you, this notwithſtanding, have given commandment to your Officers, that no ſuch letters ſhould be obeyed; and written your private letters to the contrary, commanding the ſaid goods not to be reſtored, but kept to your own uſe and profit, contrary to your own hand before in the Council-Chamber written, and contrary to your duty and allegiance, and to the perilous example of others, and great ſlander and danger of the Realm.

31. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That where certain ſtrangers, which were friends and allies to the King's Majeſty, had their ſhips, with wind and weather broken, and yet came unwrecked to the ſhore; when the Lord Protector and the Council had written for the reſtitution of the ſaid goods, and to the country to aid and ſave ſo much of the goods as might, you your ſelf ſubſcribing and conſenting thereto: yet this notwithſtanding, you have not only given contrary commandment to your Officers, but as a Pirate have written letters to ſome of your friends to help, that as much of theſe goods as they could, ſhould be conveyed away ſecretly by night further off, upon hope that if the ſaid goods were aſſured, the owners would make no further labour for them, and then you might have enjoyed them, contrary to juſtice and your honour, and to the great ſlander of this Realm.

32. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, That you have not only diſcloſed the King's Majeſty's Secret Council, but alſo where you yourſelf, among the reſt, have conſented and agreed to certain things for the advancement of the King's affairs, you have ſpoken and laboured againſt the ſame.

33. It is further objected, and laid unto your charge, That your Deputy Steward, and other your Miniſters of the Holt, in the County of Denbigh, have now, againſt Chriſtmas laſt paſt, at the ſaid Holt, made ſuch proviſion of wheat, malt, beefs, and other ſuch things as be neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of a great number of men; making alſo, by all the means poſſible, a great maſs of money; inſomuch, that all the country doth greatly marvel at it, and the more, becauſe your Servants have ſpread rumours abroad, that the King's Majeſty was dead; whereupon the country is in a great maze, doubt, and expectation, looking for ſome broil, and would have been more, if at this preſent, by your apprehenſion, it had not been ſtaied.

Theſe articles (as entered in the Council-Books) were ſo manifeſtly proved, not only by witneſſes, but by letters under his own hand, that it did not ſeem poſſible to deny them; yet he had been ſent to and examined by ſome of the Council, but refuſed to make a direct anſwer to them, or to ſign thoſe anſwers that he had made. So it was ordered, that the next day, all the Privy Council, except the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir John Baker, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, who was engaged to attend in the Houſe, ſhould go to the Tower and examine him. On the 23d the Lord Chancellor, with the other Counſellors, went to him, and read the Articles of his Charge, and earneſtly deſired him to make plain anſwers to them, excuſing himſelf where he could, and ſubmitting himſelf in other things; and that he would ſhew no obſtinacy of mind. He anſwered them, That he expected an open Trial, and his accuſers to be brought face to face. All the Counſellors endeavoured to perſuade him to be more tractable, but to no purpoſe. At laſt the Lord Chancellor required him, on his allegiance, to make his anſwer. He deſired they would leave the Articles with him, and he would conſider of them, otherwiſe he would make no anſwer to them. But the Counſellors reſolved not to leave them with him on thoſe terms *. On the 24th of February it was reſolved in Council, That the whole Board ſhould after dinner acquaint the King with the ſtate of that affair, and deſire to know of him whether he would have the Law to take place; and ſince the thing had been before the Parliament, whether he would leave it to their determination? When the Counſellors waited on him, the Lord Chancellor opened the matter to the King, and delivered his opinion for leaving it to the Parliament; then every Counſellor by himſelf ſpoke his mind, all to the ſame purpoſe. Laſt of all the Protector ſpake. He proteſted this was a moſt ſorrowful buſineſs of him, that he had uſed all the means in his power to keep it from the coming to this extremity. But were it ſon or brother, he muſt prefer his Majeſty's ſafety to them, for he weighed his allegiance more than his blood; and that therefore he was not againſt the requeſt that the other Lords had made, and ſaid, if he himſelf were guilty of ſuch offences, he ſhould not think he were worthy of life, and the rather, becauſe he was of all men the moſt bound to his Majeſty; and therefore he could not refuſe juſtice †. The King anſwered them in theſe words: "We perceive that there "are great things objected and laid to my Lord "Admiral my Uncle, and they tend to Treaſon: "And we perceive that you require but juſtice to "be done. We think it reaſonable, and we will, "that you proceed according to your requeſt." However, the Lords reſolved that ſome of both Houſes ſhould be ſent to the Admiral before the bill ſhould be put in againſt him, to ſee what he could or would ſay; ſo my Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Warwick, and Southampton, and Sir John Baker, Sir Thomas Cheney, and Sir Anthony Denny were ſent to him. He was long obſtinate, but after much perſuaſion was brought to give an anſwer to the firſt three Articles, viz.

The Lord Admiral's Anſwer to three of the former Articles.

TO the firſt, he ſaith, that about Eaſter-Tide was twelve-months, he ſaid to Fowler, as he ſuppoſeth it was, that if he might have the King in his cuſtody, as Mr. Page had, he would be glad; and that he thought a man might bring him through the gallery to his chamber, and ſo to his houſe: But this he ſaid he ſpoke merrily, meaning no hurt. And that in the mean time after he heard, and upon that, ſought out certain precedents, that there was in England at one time, one Protector, and another Regent of France, and the Duke of Exeter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Governors of the King's Perſon: Upon that, he had thought to have made ſuit to the Parliament-Houſe for that purpoſe, and he had the names of all the Lords, and totted them whom he thought he might have to his purpoſe to labour them. But afterwards communing with Mr. Comptroller at Ely-place, being put in remembrance by him of his aſſenting and agreeing with his own Hand, that the Lord Protector ſhould be governour of the King's Perſon, he was aſhamed of his doings, and left off that ſuit and labour.

To the ſecond, he ſaith, he gave money to two or three of them which were about the King. To Mr. Cheek, he ſaith, he gave at Chriſtmas-Tide was twelve-months, when the Queen was at Enfield 40*l.* whereof to himſelf 20*l.* the other for the King, to beſtow where it pleaſed his Grace amongſt his ſervants. Mr. Cheek was very loth to take it, howbeit he would needs preſs that upon him; and to him he gave no more, at no time, as he remembreth, ſince the King's Majeſty was crowned.

To the Grooms of the Chamber he hath at New-Year's-Tides given money, he doth not well remember what.

To Fowler, he ſaith, he gave money for the King, ſince the beginning of this Parliament now laſt at London, 20*l.*

And divers times, he ſaith, the King hath ſent to him for money, and he hath ſent it. And what time Mr. Latimer preached before the King, the King ſent to him to know what he ſhould give Mr. Latimer; and he ſent to him by Fowler 40*l.* with this word, that 20*l.* was a good reward for Mr. Latimer, and the other he might beſtow amongſt his Servants. Whether he hath given Fowler any money for himſelf, he doth not remember.

To the third, he ſaith, it is true, he drew ſuch a bill indeed himſelf, and proffered it to the King, or elſe to Mr. Cheek, he cannot well tell; and before that he ſaith, he cauſed the King to be moved by Mr. Fowler, whether he could be contented that he ſhould have the Governance of him as Mr. Stanhope had. He knoweth not what anſwer he had; but upon that he drew the ſaid bill to that effect, that his Majeſty was content; but what anſwer he had to the bill, he cannot tell: Mr. Cheek can tell.

Then he on a ſudden ſtopt ſhort, and bad them be content, for he would go no further, and no intreaties would work on him, either to anſwer the reſt, or to ſet his hand to the anſwers he had made. On February the 25th, was read in the Houſe of Lords the firſt time, The Bill for Attainder of the Lord Admiral: Feb. 26. read the ſecond time: Feb. 27. read the third time; and concluded with the common aſſent of all the Peers . The ſame day

* It is a ſtrange thing, that as the particulars of his charge were manifeſtly prov'd, if any credit is to be given to the Council Book, not only by witneſſes, but by letters under his own hand, they ſhould refuſe however to try him according to the laws of the land, and to bring his accuſers face to face; and yet he was a Peer of the Realm, Lord High Admiral of England, and Uncle to the King. At laſt, finding he could not obtain this favour, or rather juſtice, he deſired the Articles of his accuſation might be left with him, and ſaid he would anſwer to them when he had examined them; but even this was denied him: I don't know whether it was lawful then to leave with the party accuſed the Articles of his charge, and to allow him time to examine them. But as for the bringing his accuſers face to face, it is evident that could not be denied him without injuſtice, though this pernicious cuſtom had been introduced in the late Reign. Rapin (Engliſh Oct. Edit.) Vol. VIII. p. 50.

† It is a pretty hard task to juſtify the Duke of Somerſet for proſecuting his own Brother to death, for crimes committed againſt his perſon only. But indeed it was never clearly proved, that he had formed any ill deſign either againſt the King or the State, as he proteſted to his laſt breath. But this is not the only time that Plots againſt the Miniſters have been reckoned High-Treaſon. Rapin (Engliſh) Vol. VIII. p. 52.

 Biſhop Burnet, in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, Vol. II. p. 99. ſays, The Peers had been ſo accuſtomed to agree to ſuch bills in King Henry's time, that they did eaſily paſs it. All the Judges and the King's Council delivered their opinions, That the Articles were Treaſon. Then the Evidence was brought: Many Lords gave it ſo fully, that all the reſt, with one voice, conſented to the Bill; only the Protector, for natural pity's ſake, as in the Council Book, deſired leave to withdraw. On the 27th, the Bill was ſent down to the Commons, with a meſſage, That if they deſired to proceed as the Lords had done, thoſe Lords that had given their Evidence in their own Houſe, ſhould come down and declare it to the Commons. But there was more oppoſition day being Wedneſday, the bill was ſent down to the Commons; when it was thought good by them to ſend down certain members of their Houſe, to declare unto the Commons the manner after which the Lords had proceeded in that matter; and further to declare unto them, that in caſe they were minded to proceed in like ſort, certain Noblemen who had given evidence againſt the ſaid Lord Admiral, ſhould be ſent unto them to declare by mouth and preſence ſuch matters, as by their writing ſhould in the mean time appear unto them. The Maſter of the Rolls, Sir James Hales, and Serjeant Molineux, were the perſons ſent by the Lords. March the 2d, they were ſent again to the lower Houſe, with the like Commiſſion in effect, as they were ſent the Wedneſday before. Anſwer was made, That they would conſult together, and thereupon they would with ſpeed ſend up their reſolution. But no haſte having been made therein by them of the Nether Houſe, the Lords having ſat ſo long, as it was thought the time now far ſpent, they concluded to depart; deſiring the Lord Protector, that it would pleaſe him to receive ſuch anſwer as ſhould be ſent touching that purpoſe, and to make report thereof at their next Aſſembly, which ſhould be the next Monday. March the 5th, the bill was brought from the Commons for the attainder of the Lord Sudley. Thus it is related in the journal of the Houſe of Lords.

By the journal of the Houſe of Commons it appears, that this Bill was read there the laſt day of February the firſt time; March the 1ſt read again; and March the 2d the Maſter of the Rolls, Serjeant Molineux, Serjeant Hales, and the King's Sollicitor, were ſent from the Lords to know the pleaſure of this Houſe, if it ſhould be reſolved there, to paſs upon the attainder of the Admiral in ſuch order as it paſſed in the higher Houſe. Whereupon it was ordered, that advertiſement thereof be ſent to the Lords by ſome of that Houſe: That it was reſolved, that the evidence ſhould be heard orderly, as it was before the Lords: And alſo to require, that the Lords who affirmed that evidence, might come hither and declare it viva Voce. And this to be delivered to the Lord Protector by Mr. Speaker, and other the King's Privy Council of the Houſe. March the 4th, the Maſter of the Rolls, &c. declared the King's pleaſure to be, that the Admiral's preſence was not neceſſary in this Court; and therefore not to be there. And further declared, That if the Houſe would require to have the Lords to come and to ſatisfy the Houſe for the evidence againſt the Admiral, the Lords would come. Then it was ordered, that Maſter Comptroller, and others of the King's Privy Council, ſhould hear the Lords; and require, that if it were judged neceſſary to have the Lords come down, that upon any further ſuit they might come down to the Houſe. And the bill for the attainder of High-Treaſon of Sir Thomas Seymour, Lord Sudley, was read the third time. Thus far the journal of the Houſe of Commons. On the 5th of March the royal aſſent was given to the bill, which here followeth:

An Act for the Attainder of Sir Thomas Seymour Knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, High Admiral of England.

IN their moſt humble wiſe beſeeching your moſt Excellent Majeſty, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled; that where Sir Thomas Seymour, Lord Seymour of Sudley, High-Admiral of England, not having God before his Eyes, nor regarding the Duty which by Nature, Benefits, and Allegiance he owght to your Highneſs, nor being content with his honourable State and Condition, whereunto your Majeſty hath called and indued him with; but repleniſhed and filled with the moſt dangerous, inſatiable, and fearful Vice of Ambition and greedineſs of Rule, Authority, and Dominion, did in the firſt Year of your moſt noble and victorious Reign, determine and reſolve with himſelf to take into his hands your moſt Noble Perſon, and the ſame either by violence, ſtealth or other undue means, to have in his poſſeſſion, with the Order, Rule, and Government of your Majeſty's Realms, Dominions, and Affairs, which were before that time, as well by your Royal Aſſent, as by the conſent and liberate advice of all your Nobles and Council, whereof he the ſaid Lord Admiral was one, otherwiſe ordered, decreed, and determined; by the means whereof, and by the moſt prudent foreſight and direction of your Grace's deareſt Uncle the Duke of Somerſet, Governour of your Majeſty's moſt Royal Perſon, and Protector of your Highneſs's Realms, Dominions and Subjects, being the ſaid Admiral diſappointed of his malicious Enterpriſe. The ſame Admiral continuing nevertheleſs his great Ambition, and moſt deteſtable, malicious, and traitorous purpoſe, thinking by Tumult and Violence openly to atchieve that thing which by ſlight he could not ſecretly compaſs, travailed with your Majeſty, being yet for your tender Years not able to conceive his falſhood, by crafty, ſubtile and traitorous means and perſuaſions, having alſo prepared about your Grace, by corruption, ſundry Perſons to be Inſtruments to help forward all his naughty traitorous purpoſes, to have cauſed your Grace at his contemplation, to have written a Bill or Letter of your Majeſty's own Hand, to your High-Court of Parliament, deſiring the ſame thereby to be good unto the ſaid Lord Seymour, in ſuch Suits and Matters as he ſhould open and declare unto them; which Bill or Letter the ſaid Lord Admiral thought and determined not only in his own Perſon to have brought into the nether Houſe of your ſaid Court of Parliament, but alſo to have likewiſe opened the ſame in the Higher Houſe, having in both the ſame Houſes laboured, ſtirred, and moved a number of Perſons to take part and join with Cap. xviii.

poſition made in the Houſe of Commons. Many argued againſt Attainders in abſence, and thought it an odd way that ſome Peers ſhould riſe up in their places in their own Houſe, and relate ſomewhat to the ſlander of another, and that he ſhould be thereupon attainted: Therefore it was preſſed, that it might be done by a Trial, and that the Admiral ſhould be brought to the bar, and be heard plead for himſelf. But on the 4th of March a meſſage was ſent from the King, That he thought it was not neceſſary to ſend for the Admiral; and that the Lords ſhould come down and renew before them the Evidence they had given in their own Houſe. This was done, and ſo the Bill was agreed to by the Commons in a full Houſe, judged about four hundred, and there were not above ten or twelve that voted in the negative. The Biſhop, in the next page ſays, But the way of proceeding was much condemned, ſince to attaint a man without bringing him to make his own defence, or to object what he could ſay to the Witneſſes that were brought againſt him, was ſo illegal and unjuſt, that it could not be defended, only this was to be ſaid for it, That it was a little more regular than Parliamentary Attainders had been formerly; for here the Evidence, upon which it was founded, was given before both Houſes.

with him in ſuch things as he would ſet forth and enterpriſe, whereby he thought to breed ſuch a Tumult, Uproar and Sedition, as well in the ſaid Court, as in the whole Realm, as by the troubling of the whole State and Body of this your Realm, he might the more facily and eaſily bring to paſs his moſt fearful, deviliſh and naughty Purpoſe: for the more ſure and certain compaſſing whereof, like as he feared not to ſay to certain Noblemen and others, that he would make the blackeſt Parliament that ever was ſeen here in England, ſo moſt traitorouſly for the further Accompliſhment of his leud enterpriſe, he retained a great number of Men, and prepared a great Furniture of Weapons and Habiliments of War, ready for the execution of his ſaid traitorous Attempts. And to colour and cloak his ſaid miſchievous purpoſes, did by all ſuch ways and means as he could poſſibly deviſe and imagine, practiſe as it were for his entry towards the ſame, to ſeek and attain the Government of your moſt Noble Perſon, and thereby to have gotten into his hands the order of your Realms and Dominions, whereunto he aſpired in ſuch ſort, as he did even then travail expreſsly with the moſt part of your Highneſs's moſt Honourable Council, to help him to the ſaid Government, doing likewiſe all that he could in the Parliament by himſelf, his Servants and Miniſters, not only to hinder and lett all things there proponed, which touched the Honour, Surety and Benefit of your Majeſty and the Realm; but alſo ſpreading abroad Slanders touching your Majeſty's Perſon, your deareſt Uncle the ſaid Lord Protector, and the whole State of your Council, over-vile, dangerous, and unmeet to be here recited: Which things being by the Goodneſs of God revealed, as your ſaid Uncle the Lord Protector could not chuſe but heartily lament the ſaid Lord Admiral's evil, malicious, and corrupt Diſpoſition, chiefly in reſpect of the apparent and irrecuperable danger, which was like by the ſame preſently to have enſued to your Majeſty, and to your Realms and Dominions; and ſecondly for that he was by proximity of Blood ſo nearly joined unto him. So hoping, that by good Advertiſements and Counſels, he might yet recover and ſave him, and by the Grace of God cauſe him to caſt away his naughty, vile, and ambitious Diſpoſition, and to have had a better conſideration hereafter to his Duty, both to God, and unto your Majeſty, whereunto he was moſt bounden; the ſaid Lord Protector laboured with the whole Council and otherwiſe, to reconcile and reform him, which preſently muſt elſe have periſhed in his folly and outrage. And albeit the ſaid Lord Protector had then perfect knowledge of the Attempts and Misbehaviours of the ſaid Admiral before rehearſed; and that the ſaid Admiral had then ſaid, that he would not come at the ſaid Lord Protector and Council, altho' they ſent for him, and that he would not be committed to any ward for his doings by the beſt of them, whereby it appeared that he thought his Party ſtrong enough to reſiſt your Majeſty's Power, and ordinary Authority; yet the ſaid Lord Protector, not ceaſing with all clemency to follow his godly and charitable purpoſe, did not only uſe all the good means he could deviſe by the perſuaſions of certain of your Grace's Council, and otherwiſe, to frame him to the amendment of his Evils, and ſo to bring him to the better remembrance of his Duty; but alſo conſidering, that if the matter ſhould have grown to extremity, being ſo near, and ſo much bound to your Majeſty, being new come to your Kingdom, your Subjects not altogether left in the beſt concord for matters of Religion, great ſlander, tumult, and danger might have inſued thereby as well here at home in your Realm, as from ſome outward parts, with whom you were in the War, and in ſome ſecret enmity ready to enter the Wars, thought it, with the Advice of your whole Council, moſt meet and ſureſt for your Majeſty to paſs his evil Doings over in ſilence, and in ſomewhat the more in reſpect of the better ſtay, for the time of your preſent Eſtate, to bridle him with your Liberality, and therefore to give unto him Lands to the yearly value of eight hundred Pounds, truſting thereby, and by ſuch other good means as were uſed towards him, to encourage and move him to leave for ever that Ambition, and ſeditious Mind, and to live in ſuch order as might have pleaſed God, and ſerved your Majeſty, and your Publick Weal. But all this notwithſtanding, the Devil, who had before planted that vile and evil Weed ſo deeply in his Heart, that the Root of the ſame could not be clearly pulled out, but cauſed his Ambition eftſoons to ſpring, and ſhew itſelf more rankly than it had done before: For it plainly appeareth, that he tarried not long in his diſſembled good Mood and Promiſe, but began afreſh to imagine, compaſs, and deviſe for the ſatisfying of his traitorous deſire, to make a Party, Faction, and Confederation, whereof he would be the Head, and did not only get as many Rules and Offices into his hands of all Men, as he could poſſibly attain, and retained many Gentlemen and Yeomen into his Service, making a full account and reckoning, which he declared ſecretly to ſome of his familiars, that he was thereby able of his own ruled Tenants and Servants to make ten thouſand Men, for the obtaining of his ſaid purpoſe; for whoſe Wages he had alſo deviſed after ten thouſand Pounds by the Month, out of your Majeſty's Mint at Briſtol, which he had obtained, with all your Treaſure in the ſame, by the means and conſent of Sir William Sharington Knight, Vice-Treaſurer there, to be at his commandment, which Sir William now ſtandeth attainted of Treaſon; and alſo had put your Grace's Caſtle of the Holt, whereof he had the keeping, even now of late in a readineſs, and there cauſed to be prepared a great furniture of Wheat, Malt, Beefs, and a great maſs of Money, for the feeding and entertainment of a number of Men: which Money he cauſed to be levied and taxed half the Year before the ſame was due; bruiting alſo for the better atchieving of his purpoſe, and to amaze therewith the more the people, that your Majeſty (whom God long preſerve to us) ſhould be dead; but alſo he laboured ſundry of your Nobles, and other your Grace's Subjects, to join with him, deviſing with divers of them, how and by what Policy, Ways and Means they ſhould make themſelves ſtrong in their Countries for that purpoſe, and how they ſhould win unto them the head Yeomen, and Ringleaders of the common People; declaring how he meant to have matched, and ſet one Nobleman againſt another Nobleman, as he thought he could never compaſs and win to aſſent to this Faction and falſe Conſpiracy, promiſing to divers of them ſundry Benefits; yea, taking ſo much upon him, for the accompliſhment of his ſaid traitorous intent and purpoſe, as he ſpared not to promiſe your moſt Excellent Perſon in marriage to a Nobleman's Daughter of this your Realm. And yet not contented herewith, with, for the further advancement of his moſt naughty and traitorous purpoſe, did traitorouſly and unnaturally practiſe even with your Highneſs's own Perſon, to make your moſt Excellent Majeſty (for your tender Years unable to underſtand his falſe and traitorous purpoſes) an inſtrument towards the undoing and deſtruction of your Highneſs, and the ſubverſion of the whole State of this your Grace's Realm: perſuading your Majeſty, as much as in him did lie, not only to take upon you now in your young and tender Age, the Rule and Order of your ſelf, intending and meaning by the colour thereof, to take in his hands your moſt Royal Perſon, the Rules and Orders of all the Affairs of your Realms and Dominions; being already by the ſaid Lord Protector, with the Advice of your Grace's moſt honourable Council, as well prudently and politickly governed, as valiantly and nobly defended againſt outward Enemies, to the increaſe of your immortal Fame and Honour; but alſo to receive and ingender an hatred in your moſt noble Heart, both againſt your deareſt Uncle the ſaid Lord Protector, and all your true and faithful Counſellors: To the which his deviliſh perſuaſions and aſſaults, God gave your Highneſs, even at this age, to the great rejoice of all us your faithful Subjects and Servants, a ſpecial Grace to reſiſt, above common reaſon, and all expectation, and moſt graciouſly without any Advice or Counſel to refuſe and deny his evil advertiſements and perſuaſions. And further, the ſaid Admiral did moſt falſely and traitorouſly corrupt ſundry of your Highneſs's Privy-Chamber with many Gifts, and otherwiſe, to the intent they ſhould move and procure your Majeſty to write ſundry Letters at his or their devices, and to put into your Grace's head, a ſpecial and ſingular favour, affection, and truſt towards him, and a diſpoſition to follow whatſoever he would have wrought towards all others, that he might the rather have compaſſed his moſt traitorous purpoſe, which muſt needs have tended to your Majeſty's deſtruction (which God forbid) and to the utter ruin of all us, your Highneſs's moſt loving, faithful, and obedient Subjects. For, moſt gracious Sovereign Lord, beſides all this, it is moſt evident and apparent, that as immediately after the King your Father's death, of moſt noble memory, he bear a ſpecial Love and Favour to your Grace's Siſter, the Lady Elizabeth, ſecond Perſon in the Remainder of the State of Succeſſion to the Crown of this Realm after your Majeſty, and the Heirs of your Body, whom the living God long preſerve unto us, with the increaſe of much Fruit; and would then of his great preſumption and traitorous determination have married her, if he could by any means have brought to paſs the ſame, but that he was ſtayed by the ſaid Lord Protector, and other of your Grace's Council; ſo he did not only continue in his ſaid determination towards her, in the Queen his late Wife's time, but alſo by divers ſecret and crafty means and practices, continually ſought by atchieving of the ſame ſince the Queen's death, as by ſundry ways is confeſſed, and appeareth. Inſomuch as the ſame being perceived by your ſaid deareſt Uncle, and ſome other beſides of your Council, and other Perſonages of Reputation; and the ſaid Admiral by them earneſtly adviſed to beware of it, and to forbear his pretenſed purpoſe, ſpecially for that it could not be but dangerous to your Grace's Perſon, he hath not been afraid to defend his naughty doings and purpoſes in it, and to ask why he ſhould not continue his ſuit towards the ſaid Lady Elizabeth? with ſundry other words declaring his full intent and determinations to it; and neglecting all good advices, reaſons, and admonitions made, given or alledged, contrary to his purpoſe, he hath ſecretly and earneſtly followed it, in ſuch ſort, as if ſundry other his miſchievous devices and practices had not appeared, and come to knowledge: it is evident that he would have done what he could ſecretly to have married her, as he did the late Queen, whom it may appear he married firſt, and after ſued to your Majeſty, and the Lord Protector, and your Council, for his preferment to it; whom nevertheleſs it hath been credibly declared, he holp to her end to haſte forwards his other purpoſe. But what this marriage of your ſaid Siſter, with his prepared forces and confederacies ſhould mean, and what the getting of the rule and order of your Majeſty's Mint at Briſtol into his hands, with ten thouſand men, which beſides all his friends, and divers retainers, he accounted himſelf furniſhed of, and able to make all times within his own rules, and of his own ſervants and tenants, ſhould tend unto, for the wages and entertainments of whom he had prepared, as is aforeſaid, conſidering that the ſaid Admiral at all times when occaſion of the ſervice of your Majeſty was neceſſary or requiſite, went always back, and refuſed to take it upon him, whether it were by ſea or land, as your Grace's Council both know, and divers times have lamented, and in that caſe travelled with him (in vain) to bring him unto it, whereby no good mind or will of him towards your Majeſty's ſafety or aſſurance can appear. And upon all theſe ſiniſter ways and means, what his corrupt and ſubtil attempts of getting your moſt Noble Perſon into his hands, by colour whereof he might have wrought what he would, and whatſoever his ambitious intent could have deviſed with his preparation of victuals and money, and other his ſaid doings at your ſaid Grace's Caſtle of the Holt, and in the parts thereabouts would have wrought in the end, ſpecially in this tender age of your Highneſs, and whilſt your Majeſty is in the Government of a Protector, it is fearful to conſider and think upon, and cannot otherwiſe be taken, but to be indeed more than a manifeſt declaration of a traitorous aſpiring to your Crown of this Realm, and to be King of the ſame, and an open deed and act, and a falſe and traitorous compaſs and imagination to depoſe and deprive your Majeſty from your Royal Eſtate and title of your Realms, and to compaſs and imagine the death of your moſt Noble Perſon, and moſt traitorouſly to take away and deſtroy all things which ſhould have ſounded to the lett and impediment of his moſt traitorous and ambitious enterprize.

And further, gracious Sovereign Lord, to declare the traitorous diſpoſition of his nature, and how little he cared to offend your Grace's law, and how he did yet leſs regard his truth and duty towards your Grace, where William Sharington, Knight, late of London, the tenth day of July, in the firſt year of your Grace's reign, hath in the County and City of Briſtol, falſly and traitorouſly forged and counterfeited certain of your Grace's coin, and further imbezzled and purloined from your Majeſty untruly and falſly at the leaſt, the ſum of forty thouſand pounds, for part whereof the ſame Sir William Sharington upon his own confeſſion is attainted of treaſon according to your Grace's laws; to which ſaid traitorous acts, the ſaid Lord Admiral did not only abet and procure the ſaid Sir William Sharington, labouring him he ſhould get as much money from time to time into his hands for his purpoſe as he could, ſo that he might ever have a good maſs in a readineſs; but alſo ſince the time of the ſaid treaſons and traitorous acts, ſo done by the ſaid Sir William Sharington, the ſaid Lord Admiral having perfect knowledge thereof, as well by the declaration of the moſt part of your Highneſs's Council, as by ſome of his own counſel learned, hath traitorouſly comforted, aided, aſſiſted, and maintained the ſame Sir William Sharington in his ſaid traitorous act and faults againſt your Grace's laws and ſtatutes of this Realm; taking the patent, indentures, books and reckonings of the ſame Sir William Sharington, of his own authority, into his cuſtody, and affirming both to ſundry of your Grace's Council, and to divers of your ſubjects, that the ſaid Sharington had wrong to be committed: deviſing all the ways he could poſſible, contrary to his duty and allegiance, traitorouſly to bear him in his evil and traitorous doings, and to deliver him, if he by any means might have come by him.

And for a further proof to induce that the ſaid Admiral did maintain and comfort the ſame Sharington, where the ſaid Admiral owed to the ſaid Sharington two thouſand eight hundred pounds, the ſaid Sharington upon a miſtruſt which he had before his apprehenſion, that he ſhould for his fault and proceedings come one day to his trial and examination, communicating the ſame with the ſaid Lord Admiral, the ſaid Admiral agreed and promiſed not only to aid and maintain and bear him to the uttermoſt of his power, as indeed he did both as is aforeſaid, and in conſulting with learned men for him, and otherwiſe, but alſo for his more aſſured aid, being indebted to the ſaid Sharington the ſum of two thouſand eight hundred pounds, untruly conſpired with the ſaid Sharington upon a bill, whereby it appeared that the ſaid Sharington ſhould owe unto him the ſum of two thouſand pounds with intereſts, ſo as the ſaid Admiral might help and relieve him with that two thouſand pounds, with the intereſt at your Majeſty's hand as a debt unto himſelf; and alſo with two thouſand eight hundred pounds which the ſaid Admiral owed indeed to the ſaid Sharington, amounting in the whole to five thouſand and ſix hundred pounds: which bill moſt untruly, and to the maintenance and favour of the ſaid Sharington, the ſaid Lord Admiral affirmed before the ſaid Lord Protector, and your Highneſs's Council, to be a true bill, and the ſame two thouſand eight hundred pounds with the intereſt to be his juſt debt, and ſo was taken, until the ſaid Sharington himſelf confeſſed and affirmed the truth, whereby the covin and falſhood plainly appeared to the contrary.

Finally, moſt gracious Sovereign Lord, it were too much and over tedious to moleſt and trouble your excellent Majeſty, either with the remembrance of his evil doings in his office of the Admiralty, wherein he hath ſo manifeſtly recited, maintained, aided and comforted ſundry pirates, and taken to his own uſe the goods piratouſly taken againſt your laws, and expreſly againſt the orders determined by the Lord Protector and the whole Council, whereunto his own hand hath been for the reſtitution of them; whereby he hath moved almoſt all Princes Chriſtian to conceive a grudge and diſpleaſure, and by open wars to ſeek remedies at their own hands, to the great trouble and danger of your Majeſty, your realms and dominions, and to the great charge, loſs and diſquiet of your moſt loving and faithful ſubjects, and to the peril of breaking of the leagues and treaties of amity betwixt your Majeſty and other foreign Princes, as their Ambaſſadors here have plainly declared, and as preſent experience teacheth; or to expreſs his innumerable untruths, falſhoods, and deceitful practiſes, diſcovering and opening of your Majeſty's Councils, refuſal to ſerve your Highneſs as he hath been commanded, oppreſſion and manifeſt extortion of your Majeſty's ſubjects, uſing Iſland and other voyages by the ſea; and his determination of revenge towards all men, with whom he was offended, which his own letters and other teſtimonies do declare againſt him; with a full reſolution to have put the whole of his intent ſhortly in experience and execution (if God had not prevented it) to the deſtruction of your moſt Royal Perſon, and the ſubverſion and alteration of the whole eſtate of your realms and dominions. Wherefore conſidering as well that he is a member ſo unnatural, unkind and corrupt, and ſuch a heinous offender of your Majeſty and your laws, as he cannot nor may conveniently be ſuffered to remain in the body of your Grace's commonwealth, but to the extream danger of your Highneſs, being head, and of all the good members of the ſame, and is too pernicious and dangerous an example, that ſuch a perſon ſo much bound and ſo forgetful of it, ſo mercifully heretofore intreated, and by ſundry and great benefits allured and called, and ſo cruelly and ingrately continuing in his falſe and traitorous intents and purpoſes againſt your Highneſs, and the whole eſtate of your realm, ſhould remain amongſt us:

'It may therefore pleaſe your excellent Majeſty, 'that it may be enacted with your Highneſs's aſſent, 'the Lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the Com- 'mons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, and 'by authority of the ſame, That the ſaid Sir Tho- 'mas Seymour, Knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, high 'Admiral of England, for the ſaid traitorous offen- 'ces and deeds, ſhall be by the authority of this 'preſent Parliament adjudged and attainted of 'treaſon: And that the ſame Sir Thomas Seymour, 'Knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, high Admiral of 'England, ſhall have, ſuffer, and ſuſtain ſuch 'pains of death, as in caſes of High-Treaſon have 'been uſed and accuſtomed. And alſo that the 'ſaid Lord Seymour of Sudley ſhall forfeit and loſe 'to your Majeſty, and your Heirs, all ſuch caſtles, 'manors, lands, tenements, leaſes, meadows, paſtures, woods, waters, rents, reverſions, ſervices, 'offices, fees, annuities, and all other hereditaments, goods, chattels and debts, whatſoever the 'ſame Lord Seymour had, injoyed, or was ſeized 'or poſſeſſed of at the ſeventeenth day of January, 'in the ſecond year of your Grace's reign, or at 'any time ſince.

'And that all ſuch caſtles, manors, lands, te- 'nements, meadows, leaſes, paſtures, woods, wa- 'ters, rents, reverſions, ſervices, offices, fees, an- 'nuities, and other hereditaments, to be by autho- 'rity of this preſent act adjudged, veſted, and 'deemed, in the actual and real poſſeſſion of your 'Highneſs, from the ſaid ſeventeenth day of Ja- 'nuary, without any office or inquiſition to be 'thereof had or found. Saving to all and every 'perſon and perſons, and bodies politick and cor- 'porate,

'porate, and to their heirs, aſſigns, and ſucceſſors, 'and to every of them (other than the ſaid Lord 'Seymour of Sudley and his heirs) all ſuch rights, 'titles, intereſts, uſes, poſſeſſions, reverſions, re'mainders, entries, conditions, leaſes, fees, offi'ces, rents-ſervices, rents-charges, rents-ſeck, an'nuities, commons, and all other commodities, 'profits, and hereditaments, whatſoever they or 'any of them had, might, or ought to have had, 'if this preſent act had never been had or made.

'Furthermore, the King's Majeſty is pleaſed 'that it be enacted, that all perſon and perſons, 'bodies politick and corporate, and their execu'tors and adminiſtrators, ſhall be well and truly 'contented and paid, upon their humble ſuit and 'petition hereafter to be made unto his Highneſs 'of all ſuch debts, which either by ſpecialty, or 'by any other juſt and true contract, the ſaid Lord 'Admiral did owe to them or any of them at any 'time before the ſaid ſeventeenth day of January, 'in the ſaid ſecond year of his Majeſty's reign*.'

On the tenth of March the Council reſolved to preſs the King that juſtice might be done on the Admiral: and ſince the caſe was ſo heavy and lamentable to the Protector, (ſo it is in the Council-Book) though it was alſo ſorrowful to them all, they reſolv'd to proceed in it, ſo that neither the King nor he ſhould be further troubled with it; after dinner they went to the King, the Protector being with them: the King ſaid, he had well obſerv'd their proceedings, and thank'd them for their great care of his ſafety, and commanded them to proceed in it without further moleſting him or the Protector; and ended, I pray you, my Lords, do ſo. Upon this they order'd the Biſhop of Ely to go to the Admiral, and to inſtruct him in the things that related to another life, and to prepare him to take patiently his execution; and on the 17th of March he having made report to them of his attendance on the Admiral, the Council ſign'd a Warrant for his execution, viz.

The Warrant for the Admiral's Execution.

Ex Libro Concilii. fol. 247. THIS day, the 17th of March, the Lord Chancellor, and the reſt of the King's Council, meeting in his Highneſs's Palace of Weſtminſter, heard the report of the Biſhop of Ely, who by the ſaid Lords, and others of the Council, was ſent to inſtruct and comfort the Lord Admiral; after the hearing whereof, conſulting and deliberating with themſelves of the time moſt convenient for the execution of the ſaid Lord Admiral, now attainted and condemned by the Parliament, they did condeſcend and agree, That the ſaid Lord Admiral ſhould be executed the Wedneſday next following, betwixt the hours of nine and twelve in the forenoon the ſame day, upon Tower-Hill: His body and head to be buried within the Tower; the King's writ (as in ſuch caſes as heretofore hath been accuſtomed) being firſt directed and ſent forth for that purpoſe and effect. Whereupon calling to the Council-Chamber the Biſhop of Ely, they willed him to declare this their determination to the ſaid Lord Admiral; and to inſtruct and teach him, the beſt he could, to the quiet and patient ſuffering of juſtice, and to prepare himſelf to Almighty God.

The ſaid Biſhop, after he had been with the Lord Admiral, repairing again to the Court, made report to Mr. Comptroller and Secretary Smith of the Lord Admiral's requeſts†, the which were, that he required Mr. Latimer to come to him; the day of execution to be deferr'd, certain of his Servants to be with him, his Daughter to be with my Lady Dutcheſs of Suffolk to be brought up, and ſuchlike. Touching which requeſts, the ſaid Lords and the reſt of the Council declar'd their minds to Mr. Secretary Smith, willing him to write their anſwer in a Letter to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who ſhould ſhew in all thoſe requeſts their reſolute anſwer to the ſaid Lord Admiral; the which was done accordingly.

On the 20th of March he was brought to the Scaffold.

And in the fourth Sermon of Mayſter Hughe Latymer ‡, whych he preached before the Kynge wythin hys Graces Palayce at Weſtminſter, the xxix day of Marche, is the following account of the Lord Admiral ‖.

I knowe more of my Lord Admiral's death ſith that tyme, then I did knowe before. O ſaye they, the man dyed very boldly, he woulde not have done ſo, hadde he not bene in a juſt quarell.

This is no good argument, my frendes. A man ſemeth not to feare death, therefore hys cauſe is good. Thys is a deceavable argumente. He went to hys death boldely: Ergo, he ſtandeth in a juſt quarrel.

If I ſhould have ſaied al that I knewe, youre eares woulde have yrked, to have hearde it, and nowe God hathe brought more to lyghte. And as touchyng the kynde of hys death, whether he be ſaved or no, I referre that to God onely. What God can do, I can not tell. I wyl not denye but that he maye in the twynkeling of an eye ſave a man, and turne hys harte. What he dyd, I can not tell. And when a man hathe two ſtrokes wyth an axe, whoo can tel that betwene two ſtrokes he doth repent. It is very hard to judge; well, I wyll not go ſo nye to worke, but this I wyl ſay, if thei aske me what I thinke of hys deathe, that he dyed very daungerouſly, yrkeſomelye, horryblye.

The man beyng in the Tower, wrote certayne papers, whiche I ſawe my ſelfe. Thei were two lyttle ones, one to my Ladye Maryes Grace, and anoanother to my Ladye Elizabethe's Grace, tendynge to thys ende, that they ſhoulde conſpyre agaynſt my Lord Protectours grace.

‡ The Reverend Mr. Wilſon in his tranſlation of Monſ. De Thou's Hiſtory of his Own Time, vol. I. pag. 272, ſays. 'The Duke of 'Somerſet the Protector had conceiv'd a jealouſy (which was fomented by the emulation of the women) of his Brother Thomas 'the Admiral, who had married Catherine Parr, the late King Henry's widow; and had order'd him to be committed to priſon, on 'ſuſpicion of aiming at the Crown: and as it is the temper of that nation to be over-haſty and prepoſterouſly ſevere in matters 'which relate to the commonwealth, after he had put him to the rack, he at laſt, by the ſuggeſtion of Hugh Latimer, procured 'him to be condemn'd to death; and on the 20th of March to be beheaded.'

Surely ſo ſeditiouſly as could be. Nowe what a kind of death was thys, that when he was readye to laye his head upon the blocke, he turnes me to the Levetenantes Servaunte and ſayeth, byd my ſervaunte ſpede the thyng that he wottes of: Wel, the worde was over-heard.

Hys ſervaunt confeſſed theſe two papers, and they were found in a ſhooe of hys. They were ſo ſowen between the ſoules of a velved ſhooe. He made hys ynke ſo craftely, and wyth ſuch workmanſhip, as the lyke hath not bene ſene.

I was Priſoner in the Touer miſelfe, and I coulde never invente to make ynke ſo. It is a wonder to heare of his ſubtilitie. He made hys pen of the aglet of a poynte that he plucked from hys hoſe, and thus wrote theſe letters ſoo ſeditiouſlye, as ye have hearde, enforſynge many matters agaynſt my Lord Protectour's grace, and ſo fourth. God had lefte him to himſelfe, he hadde cleane forſaken hym. What woulde he have done if he had lived ſtyll? that went about thys geare, when he layed hys head on the blocke at the ende of hys lyfe. Charity (they ſaye) worketh but godly, not after thys ſorte. Well, he is gone, he knoweth hys fate by thys, he is eyther in joy or in payne. There is no repentance after thys lyfe, but if he dye in the ſtate of damnacion, he ſhall ryſe in the ſame. Yea, thoughe he have a whole monkerye to ſynge for hym, he ſhall have hys fynal ſentence when he dyeth.

And that ſervant of hys that confeſſed and uttered thys gere, was an honeſt manne. He dyed honeſtlye in it. God put it in his herte. And as for the tother, whether he be ſaved or no, I leave it to God. But ſurelye, he was a wycked man, the Realme is well rydde of hym.

It hath a treaſure, that he is gone, he knoweth hys fare by thys. A terrible example ſurelye, and to be noted of every man; nowe before he ſhoulde dye, I hearde ſaye he had commendations to the Kyng, and ſpake manye wordes of his Majeſtye. All is the Kynge, the Kynge. Yea, Bona Verba. Theſe were fayre wordes, the Kynge, the Kynge. It hath been the Caſt of all Traitours to pretend nothing againſt the Kynges Perſon, they never pretend the matter to the Kynge, but to other. Subjects maye not reſyſte anye Magiſtrates, nor oughte to do nothinge contrarye to the Kynges Lawes. And therefore theſe words, the Kynge, and ſo fourth, are of ſmall effect. I have hearde muche wickednes of thys manne, and I have thought oft, Jeſu, what wyl worth, what wyl be the ende of this manne? Among others (that went to execution) I hearde of a wanton woman, a naughtye lyer, a whore, a vayne bodye; and was ledde from Newgate to the place of execution, for a certain robberye that ſhe had committed, and ſhe hadde a wycked communication by the waye. This woman, I ſaye, as ſhe wente by the waye, had wanton and folyſhe talke, as thys: That yf good fellowes hadde kept touch wyth hyr, ſhe hadde not been at thys time in that caſe; and amongſte al other talke, ſhe ſaied, That ſuch a one, and named this manne, had hyr maidenheade fyrſte; and heryinge thys of hym at that tyme, I loked ever what woulde be hys ende, what woulde become of hym.

He was a manne the fardeſt frome the feare of God that ever I knewe or hearde of in Englande. Fyrſte he was author of all thys woman's whoredome. For if he had not had hyr maydenhead, ſhe myghte have been maryed, and become an honeſte womanne; whereas nowe beying nought with hym, ſhee fell afterwarde by that occaſion to other: And they that were nought with hyr fel to robbery, and ſhe folowed; and thus was he author of all thys. This geare came bi ſequels, peradventure thys maye ſeeme to be a lyghte matter, but ſurelye it is a great matter: and he, by unrepentance, fel frome evyl to worſe, and from worſe to worſte of all, tyll at the length he was made a ſpectacle to all the worlde. I have hearde ſaye, he was of the opinion that he believed not the immortalytye of the Soule, that he was not ryghte in the matter. And it mighte well appear by the takynge of hys death. But ye well ſay, What ye ſclaunder, ye breake Charitye.

Nay, it is Charitie that I do, we canne have no better uſe of hym nowe, than to warne others to beware by hym.

Chriſt ſaith, remember Lotte's Wife! ſhe was a woman that would not be content with her good ſtate, but wreſtleled wyth God's callinge; and ſhe was for that cauſe turned in a Salt Stone, &c. Thus may thys man be an example to us. Let us all ſubjects judge well of our Magiſtrates, in ſuche matters, and be content wyth theyr doings and loke not to be of the Counſaile.

And thus toke I occaſion to ſpeake of him, and to profit you thereby, and I beſeech you ſo to take it, he may be a good warnyng to us, and this is the beſt uſe that wee can have of him now.

In his fifth Sermon he ſaieth, You will ſaye this, the Parliament Houſe are wiſer than I am; you might leave them to the defence of themſelves: Although the men of the Parliament Houſe can defende themſelves, yet have I ſpoken thys of a good zeale, and a good ground of the Admiralle's wrytinge: I have not fayned, nor lyed one jote. I will nowe leave the honourable Counſayle to anſwer for themſelves. He confeſſed one fact, he woulde have hadde the Governaunce of the King's Majeſty, and wot ye whye? He ſayed, he would not in his minoritie have him brought up lyke a warde. I am ſure he hath bene brought up ſo godly, with ſuch Schole-maſters, as never King was in Englande, &c.

And in his ſeventh Sermon he ſaieth thus: I have heard ſay, when that good Quene (meaning Queen Catherine) that is gone, had ordained in her houſe, dayly prayer both before none and after none, the Admyral gettes hym out of the waye, lyke a moule diggying in the earth. He ſhal be Lotte's Wyfe to me as long as I lyve. He was a covetous man, an horrible covetous manne; I woulde there were no mo in England: He was an ambicious man; I woulde there were no mo in Englande: He was a ſedicious man, a contemnar of Commune Prayer; I would there were no mo in England: He is gone, I wolde he had lefte none behind him. Remember you, my Lordes, that you pray in your houſes, to the better mortification of your Fleſhe.

II. Proceedings againſt Edward, Duke of SOMERSET, in Parliament, for Miſdemeanours and High-Treaſon. Jan. 1550. 3, & 4 Edw. 6.

THE Duke of Somerſet having taken the part of the common people againſt the Nobility in the buſineſs of incloſures, made himſelf many enemies. He had alſo given great grounds of jealouſy by entertaining foreign Troops in the King's ſervice; and the noble palace he was raiſing in the Strand out of the ruins of ſome Biſhops houſes and churches, drew as publick an envy on him as any thing he had done: And his acting by his own authority, without asking the advice of the Council, and often againſt it, was aſſuming a regal power, and ſeemed not to be endured by thoſe who thought they were in all points his equals. Thus, all September, there were great heats between the Lords and him. The King was then at Hampton-Court, where the Protector alſo was, with ſome of his Retinue and Servants about him, which increaſed the jealouſies: for it was given out, he intended to carry away the King. On the 6th of October, ſome of the Council met, and ſent to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London to obey no Letters from the Protector, and wrote to the Nobility to inform them how they were proceeding. The Protector hearing of theſe things, removed the King to Windſor in all haſte, and armed ſuch as he could gather for his preſervation: Whereupon ſeveral Letters paſſed between the Council at London, and thoſe at Windſor *; and at laſt a Proclamation was publiſhed againſt the Protector to the following effect: 1. "That "the Protector, by his malicious and evil Government, was the occaſion of all the ſedition that "of late happened within the Realm. 2. The "loſs of the King's pieces in France. 3. That he "was ambitious and ſought his own Glory, as "appeared by building of moſt ſumptuous and "coſtly houſes in the time of the King's Wars. "4. That he eſteemed nothing the grave Council "of the Counſellors. 5. That he ſowed diviſion "between the Nobles, the Gentlemen, and the "Commons. 6. That the Nobles aſſembled themſelves together at London, for none other purpoſe, but to have cauſed the Protector to have "lived within limits, and to have put ſuch order "for the ſurety of the King's Majeſty as appertained: Whatſoever the Protector's doings were, "which they ſaid were unnatural, ungrate, and "traitorous. 7. That the Protector ſlandered the "Council to the King, and did what in him lay "to cauſe variance between the King and the Nobles. 8. That he was a great Traitor †, and "therefore the Lords deſired the City and Commons to aid them to take him from the King."

This was ſigned by the Lord Rich, Lord Chancellor; the Lord St. John, Preſident of the Council; the Marquis of Northampton; the Earl of Warwick, great Chamberlain; and moſt of the Council. On the 12th of October the whole Council went to Windſor, and coming to the King, they proteſted, that all they had done was only out of zeal and affection to his Perſon and Service. The King received them very kindly, and thanked them for their care of him. On the 13th they ſat in Council, and ſent for thoſe who were ordered to be kept in their Chambers, only Cecil (afterwards the famous Lord Burleigh) was let go; and, in the end, the Lord Protector was commanded from the King's preſence, and committed to Ward in a Tower within the Caſtle of Windſor, called Beauchamp Tower: and the next day, being the 14th, they brought from thence the Protector, and conveyed him to the Tower of London. Some time after, the Lords reſorted to the Tower, and there charged the Protector with the following articles of Miſdemeanour and High-Treaſon.

Articles objected to the Duke of Somerſet.

1. THAT he took upon him the office of Protector, upon expreſs condition, that he ſhould do nothing in the King's affairs, but by aſſent of the late King's Executors, or the greateſt part of them.

2. That contrary to this condition, he did hinder Juſtice, and ſubvert Laws of his own authority, as well by letters as by other command.

3. That he cauſed divers perſons, arreſted and impriſoned for Treaſon, Murder, Man-ſlaughter, and Felony, to be diſcharged, againſt the laws and ſtatutes of the Realm.

4. That he appointed Lieutenants for Armies, and other Officers for the weighty affairs of the King, under his own writing and ſeal.

5. That he communed with Ambaſſadors of other Realms alone, of the weighty matters of the Realm.

6. That he would taunt and reprove divers of the King's moſt honourable Counſellors, for declaring their advice in the King's weighty affairs againſt his opinion; ſometimes telling them, that they were not worthy to ſit in Council; and ſometimes, that he need not to open weighty matters to them; and that if they were not agreeable to his opinion, he would diſcharge them.

7. That againſt law he held a Court of Requeſt in his own houſe; and did enforce divers to anſwer there for their freehold and goods, and did determine of the ſame.

8. That

 Fox, and Hayward (in his Life of King Edward the 6th) both ſay, the Duke was in the Tower a ſmall time before the Lords laid the Articles to his charge: But Burnet and Rapin ſay, the Duke was called before the Council on the 14th, and that the Articles of his accuſation were then read to him.

8. That being no Officer, without the advice of the Council, or moſt part of them, he did diſpoſe Offices of the King's Gift for money; grant leaſes and wards, and preſentations of Benefices pertaining to the King; gave Biſhopricks, and made ſales of the King's Lands.

9. That he commanded alchimy, and multiplication, to be practiſed, thereby to abaſe the King's Coin.

10. That divers times be openly ſaid, that the Nobility and Gentry were the only cauſe of dearth; whereupon the people roſe to reform matters of themſelves.

11. That againſt the mind of the whole Council, he cauſed Proclamation to be made concerning incloſures; whereupon the people made divers inſurrections, and deſtroyed many of the King's Subjects.

12. That he ſent forth a Commiſſion, with articles annexed, concerning incloſures, commons, high-ways, cottages, and ſuch like matters, giving the Commiſſioners authority to hear and determine thoſe cauſes, whereby the laws and ſtatutes of the Realm were ſubverted, and much Rebellion raiſed.

13. That he ſuffered Rebels to aſſemble and lie armed in Camp, againſt the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, without ſpeedy repreſſing of them.

14. That he did comfort and encourage divers Rebels, by giving them money, and by promiſing them fees, rewards, and ſervices.

15. That he cauſed a Proclamation to be made againſt law, and in favour of the Rebels, that none of them ſhould be vexed or ſued by any for their offences in their Rebellion.

16. That in time of Rebellion, he ſaid, that he liked well the actions of the Rebels; and that the avarice of Gentlemen gave occaſion for the people to riſe; and that it was better for them to die, than to periſh for want.

17. That he ſaid, the Lords of the Parliament were loth to reform incloſures, and other things, therefore the people had a good cauſe to reform them themſelves.

18. That after declaration of the defaults of Bulloign, and the pieces there, by ſuch as did ſurvey them, he would never amend the ſame.

19. That he would not ſuffer the King's pieces of Newhaven, and Blackneſs, to be furniſhed with men and proviſion; albeit he was advertiſed of the Defaults, and adviſed thereto by the King's Council; whereby the French King was embolden'd to attempt upon them.

20. That he would neither give authority, nor ſuffer Noblemen and Gentlemen to ſuppreſs Rebels in time convenient; but wrote to them to ſpeak the Rebels fair, and uſe them gently.

21. That upon the 5th of October, the preſent year, at Hampton-Court, for defence of his own private cauſes, he procured ſeditious Bills to be written in counterfeit hands, and ſecretly to be diſperſed into divers parts of the Realm; beginning thus: Good people; intending thereby to raiſe the King's ſubjects to Rebellion and open War.

22. That the King's Privy-Council did conſult at London to come to him, and move him to reform his Government; but he hearing of their aſſembly, declared, by his letters in divers places, that they were high Traitors to the King.

23. That he declared untruly, as well to the King as to other young Lords attending his Perſon, that the Lords at London intended to deſtroy the King; and deſired the King never to forget, but to revenge it; and deſired the young Lords to put the King in remembrance thereof; with intent to make ſedition and diſcord between the King and his Nobles.

24. That at divers times and places, he ſaid, the Lords of the Council at London intended to kill me; but if I die, the King ſhall die; and if they famiſh me, they ſhall famiſh him.

25. That of his own head he removed the King ſo ſuddenly from Hampton-Court to Windſor, without any proviſion there made, that he was thereby not only in great fear, but caſt thereby into a dangerous diſeaſe.

26. That by his letters, he cauſed the King's people to aſſemble in great numbers in armour, after the manner of War, to his aid and defence.

27. That he cauſed his ſervants and friends at Hampton-Court and Windſor, to be apparelled in the King's armour, when the King's ſervants and guards went unarmed.

28. * That he cauſed at Windſor his own perſon in the night-time to be guarded in harneſs by many perſons, leaving the King's Majeſty's perſon unguarded; and would not ſuffer his own guard and ſervants to be next the King's Perſon, but appointed his ſervants and friends to keep the gates.

29. That he intended to fly to Jerſey or Wales, and laid poſt-horſes and men, and a boat, to that purpoſe †.

After he had read and conſidered the above Articles, he ſent the underwritten ſubmiſſion to the Lords.

Edward, Duke of Somerſet's firſt Submiſſion.

I Eward, Duke of Somerſet, have read and conſidered theſe ſaide twenty nine Articles before ſpecified, and do acknowledge my ſaide offences, faults, and crimes, doone and conteined in the ſame, and moſt humblie proſtrate on my knees, do fullie and wholie ſubmit my ſelfe to the moſt aboundant mercy and clemencie of the King's Majeſtie, for the moderation of my ſaide offences; having my full truſt and confidence, that his Majeſtie, with the advice of his Highneſſe moſt honourable Counſaile, will conſider mine offences, faultes, wordes, and proceedings, that if anie of my ſaide offences be by his clemencie pardoned, remitted, or otherwiſe diſcharged, that I maie enjoye the benefite thereof, although the ſame become unknowne. And farther, I do moſt humblie beſeech all my Lordes, and other his Majeſties moſt honourable Counſayle, not onlie to be meanes to his Majeſtie, to take awaie and conſider mine offences to have proceeded more of ignorance, negligence, follie, wilfulnes, and for lacke of good conſideration, than of anie cankerd or malicious hart, evil intent or thought, tending to anie Treaſon to his Majeſtie or Realm: But that it may pleaſe his Majeſtie, by the

He could not deny that moſt of the facts laid to his charge were true. But the queſtion was, Whether they were crimes: for he was accuſed neither of fraud nor of rapine, nor of extortion. But that was to be decided only by the Peers of the Realm, or by the Parliament.

the charitable adviſe of their good Lordſhips, to have pity upon mee, my wife and children, and to take ſome mercifull waie with me, not according to the extremity of his lawes, but after his great goodneſs and clemencie, whereunto whatſoever it ſhall bee, I doe moſt humblie with all my hart ſubmit my ſelfe.

Written with mine owne hande the 23d day of December, (Burnet ſays the 13th) in the 3d yeere of our Soveraigne Lord King Edward the Sixth.

However, on the ſecond of January, a Bill was put in againſt the Duke of Somerſet of the Articles before-mentioned, with the above Confeſſion. This he was prevailed with to do, upon aſſurance given, that he ſhould be gently dealt with, if he would truly confeſs and ſubmit himſelf to the King's mercy. But ſome of the Lords ſaid, they did not know whether that Confeſſion was not drawn from him by force; and that it might be an ill precedent to paſs Acts upon ſuch papers, without examining the party, whether he had ſubſcribed them freely and uncompelled: Whereupon a Committee was appointed of four Temporal Lords and four Spiritual, who were ſent to examine him concerning it. The day following the Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield made the Report: That he thanked them for their kind meſſage, but that he had freely ſubſcribed the Confeſſion * that lay before them. He made it on his knees before the King and Council, and ſigned it; and he proteſted his offences had flowed from raſhneſs and indiſcretion rather than malice; and that he had no treaſonable deſign againſt the King or his Realms. So both Houſes ſoon paſſed the Bill againſt him, and he was fined, by Act of Parliament, intitled, An Act touching the Fine and Ranſome of the Duke of Somerſet; that is, for the puniſhment of his late miſdemeanours, whereby he was fined 2000*l.* a year of land, and loſt all his goods and offices. Upon this, he ſent another ſubmiſſion.

The ſecond Submiſſion of Edward Duke of Somerſet, Priſoner in the Tower.

I AM moſt fearefull and full of heavineſſe, my verie good Lordes, to underſtande that my laſt letter was no better accepted at your Lordſhips handes, to whom I am bounde during my life, for your moſt gentle and mercifull dealinge with me, that it pleaſed your goodneſſe to bring my caſe to a fine. I truſte your Lordſhipes never think that I ever did, or woulde intende, to ſtand againſt the King's Majeſtie and youre Lordſhipes Goodnes, or that I woulde goe about to juſtifie my cauſe, ſeeing his Majeſtie and your Lordſhipes offereth clemencie, mercie, and pardon. Although the fine be to me importable, yet I doe commit my ſelf wholie to his Highneſſe and your Lordſhipes mercies; I pray onlie the moderation of it, and did covet to declare to youre goodneſſe mine inabilitie to beare it: And yet referred all to his Majeſtie, and your wiſdome, goodneſſe, and diſcretion. And I moſt humbly deſire your Lordſhipes not to think that I was about to contende with your Lordſhipes; when I did ſpeake of my conſcience, I might erre, in that I thought I did for the beſt, as I doe acknowledge and confeſſe, that neither I am the wiſeſt man in the worlde, nor yet if I were, I ſhoulde not eſcape without a moſt ſingular grace, but manie times I ſhoulde offende: But I leave all that, and moſt humblie, ſimplie, wholie, and lowlie, I ſubmit my ſelfe to the Kinge's Majeſtie and to your good Lordſhipes; appealing from the rigour and extremitie of his Majeſtie's lawes, to his Majeſty's great mercie and clemencie; praying your goodneſs to bee meanes to his Majeſtie, not to bee offended with mee, nor to exclude his Majeſtie's mercie and benignitie from me, for my rudeneſs and lack of diſcretion, but to accept my good minde as one that faine woulde doo that were well. And when I cannot or have not doone that things I ought to doe, I would gladlie amende, and am readie at all times without condition to doo and ſuffer willinglie that thing that your honours will appoint mee, accepting what clemencie or mercie ſoever I obtayne to be of his Majeſtie's and your goodneſſe. Moſt humbly on my knees praying his Majeſtie and your good Lordſhips to pardone mine offences, and to order me for them, as to his moſte high mercifull clemencie ſhall appeere convenient. And finallie flying from extremitie of juſtice, deſire mercie, as you bee, and are called, moſt mercifull Counſellors, not imputing my writings and doings hitherto as of ſtouteneſſe or ſtubbornneſſe, but onlie for lack of diſcretion and wiſdome. For the which once again I require pardon and favor to be ſhewed, and if it pleaſed your good Lordſhipes to heare me, I truſt ye ſhould find me lowly unto your honors, and ſo conformable unto your Lordſhips orders, that I truſt to make amends, and obtaine pardon for my former folly. And thus I moſt humblie commit your good Lordſhips to Almighty God, to whom I ſhall alwaies pray that ye maie long continue in honor. From the Tower, the ſecond of Februarie.

He came out of the Tower on the 6th of February, giving bond of 10,000*l.* for his good behaviour, but limited that he ſhould ſtay at the King's houſe at Sheen, or his own at Sion, and ſhould not go four miles from them, nor come to the King or Council, unleſs he were called; and when he knew that the King was to come within four miles of theſe houſes, he was to withdraw from them.

On the 16th he had his pardon, and carried himſelf ſo well, that on the 8th of April following he went by invitation to Court, to the King's Majeſty at Greenwich; where he was honourably received by the King

* Many thought his confeſſion a very ſtrange thing, and aggravated the abjectneſs of ſuch a behaviour. But it was doubtleſs becauſe they would have been glad he ſhould have taken another courſe, which would not have failed to prove fatal to him. It is certain, that among the Articles of his accuſation, there were ſeveral which could be juſtified only by the intention, which would ſcarce have ſerved his turn in the Houſe of Peers: The major part of whom were not inclined to favour him. For inſtance, to mention only the chief Article; could he deny that, contrary to the condition on which he was made Protector, he had degraded, as it were, the other Regents, and reduced them to the ſtate of bare Counſellors? It is true, he might have alledged the King's Patent. But it was the Patent of a minor King, between ten and eleven years old only, who looking upon him as his Governor, did every thing by his advice; wherefore the Duke could never have cleared himſelf upon this Article, any more than upon ſeveral others. Conſequently his only remedy was to own himſelf guilty of all, and to caſt himſelf upon the King's mercy. Beſides, it concerned him highly to get out of priſon if it was poſſible on any terms, ſince it was dangerous for him to continue any longer in the hands of his enemies. Rapin (8vo Edit.) Vol. VIII. p. 76.

King and his Council, and dined with the King, and was ſworn of the Privy-Council; and the King of his ſpecial favour, and at the humble petition of the Lords of the Council, by Patent dated June the 4th, gave him back almoſt all his eſtate that was forfeited.

III. Proceedings againſt Edward, Duke of SOMERSET, for High-Treaſon and Felony, Dec. 1. 1551. 5 Edw. 6. at Weſtminſter.

THE Duke of Somerſet had ſuch acceſs to the King, and ſuch freedoms with him, (notwithſtanding the late judgment againſt him) that the Earl of Warwick had a mind to get rid of him. The Duke ſeemed alſo in April this year to have got the King again in his power, and dealt with the Lord Strange to perſuade the King to marry his daughter Jane; and that he would advertiſe him of all that paſſed about the King. The Earl of Warwick had got himſelf created Duke of Northumberland; and for ſeveral of his friends he procured a creation of new honours. The new Duke of Northumberland could no longer bear ſuch a rival in greatneſs as the Duke of Somerſet was, who was the only perſon that he thought could take the King out of his hands: So a deſign being laid to deſtroy him, he was apprehended on the 17th of October, and ſent to the Tower, and with him the Lord Gray, Sir Ralph Vane, Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Thomas Arundell, were alſo taken, and ſome of his followers, Hamond, Newdigate, and two of the Seymours, and were ſent to priſon. The day after, the Dutcheſs of Somerſet was alſo ſent to the Tower, with one Crane and his wife, and two of her chamber-women; after theſe, Sir Thomas Holdcroft, Sir Miles Patridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Wingfield, Banniſter and Vaughan, were all made priſoners.

But Sir Thomas Palmer, though impriſoned with him as an accomplice, was the perſon that ruined him. The evidence againſt the Duke was chiefly Sir Thomas Palmer's Information; who being brought by the Duke of Northumberland privately to the King, related the whole conſpiracy.

Sir Thomas Palmer's Examination.

HE declared, That upon St. George's Day laſt before, the Duke of Somerſet being upon a journey towards the north, in caſe Sir William Herbert, Maſter of the Horſe, had not aſſured him that he ſhould receive no harm, would have raiſed the people; and that he had ſent the Lord Gray before to know who would be his friends: Alſo that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, and other Lords, ſhould be invited to a banquet; and if they came with a bare company, to be ſet upon by the way; if ſtrongly, their heads ſhould have been cut off at the place of their feaſting. He declared farther, that Sir Ralph Vane had two thouſand men in a readineſs: That Sir Thomas Arundel had aſſured the Tower, that Patridge ſhould raiſe London, and take the Great Seal; that Seymour and Hamond would wait upon him, and that all the horſe of the Gendarmerie ſhould be ſlain.

The Earl of Rutland did affirm, that he had made a party for getting himſelf declared Protector in the next Parliament.

The above-mentioned particulars were told the King, with ſuch circumſtances, that he was induced to believe them, and reſolved to leave him to the law.

Sir Thomas Palmer's ſecond Examination.

THAT the Gendarmerie, upon the muſter-day, ſhould be aſſaulted by two thouſand men, under Sir Ralph Vane, and by an hundred horſes of the duke of Somerſet's, beſides his friends, which ſhould ſtand by, and beſides the idle people, which were thought inclinable to take his part. That this done, he would run through the city and proclaim Liberty, Liberty, to raiſe the apprentices, &c. And in caſe his attempt did not ſucceed, he would go to the Iſle of Wight, or to Poole.

Crane's Examination.

HE confirmed all that Palmer had ſaid; to which he added, That the Lord Paget's Houſe was the place, where the Nobility, being invited to a banquet, ſhould have loſt their heads: And that the Earl of Arundel was made acquainted with the Conſpiracy by Sir Michael Stanhope, who was a meſſenger between them: And that the thing had been done, but that the greatneſs of the enterprize cauſed delays, and ſome diverſity of advice. And further, that the Duke of Somerſet once feigning himſelf ſick, went to London to ſee what friends he could procure.

Hamond's Examination.

HE confeſſed that the Duke of Somerſet's chamber at Greenwich had been ſtrongly guarded in the night by many armed men.

All theſe were ſworn before the Council, and the greateſt part of the Nobility, that their confeſſions were true; and they did ſay, that what was ſworn, was without any kind of compulſion, force, or envy, or diſpleaſure, but as favourable to the Duke as they could ſwear to with ſafe conſciences.

Lord Strange's Examination.

HE voluntarily informed how the Duke deſired him to move the King to take to wife his third daughter the Lady Jane; and that he would be be his ſpy about the King to advertiſe him, when any of the Council ſpake privately with him, and to acquaint him what they ſaid.

Hereupon the Lord Chancellor openly declared in the Star-Chamber theſe Accuſations againſt the Duke of Somerſet; and on the 22d of October, with much Shew and Ceremony, were all the Crafts and Corporations of London commanded to repair to their Halls, and there it was ſhewed them, That the Duke of Somerſet would have taken the Tower, ſeized on the Broad-Seal, and have deſtroyed the City, and then to have gone to the Iſle of Wight. After this Declaration, they were charged each Corporation to ward every Gate in London, and to have a walking Watch thro' the City. Towards the latter end of November, a Letter was ſent to the Lord Chancellor, to cauſe a ſufficient Commiſſion to be made, and ſealed with the Great-Seal of England, of Oyer and Terminer, to the Lord Marquis of Wincheſter, that he may thereby be the King's Seneſchal, hac unica vice tantum, for the hearing and determining of the Treaſons and Felonies of the Duke of Somerſet, giving the Date of the ſaid Commiſſion the 28th of November; and the 1ſt of December was ordered for his Trial.

December 1. the Duke of Somerſet came to his Trial at Weſtminſter-Hall. The Lord-Treaſurer ſat as High-Steward of England, under the Cloth of State, on a Bench between two Poſts, three degrees high. All the Lords, to the number of twenty-ſeven, viz.

Theſe ſat a degree under, and heard the Matter debated.

The Crimes laid againſt him, were caſt into five ſeveral Indictments, as King Edw. VI. has it in his Journal; but the Record mentions only three, whether Indictments or Articles, is not ſo clear. 1. That he had deſigned to have ſeized on the King's Perſon, and ſo have governed all Affairs. 2. That he, with one hundred others, intended to have impriſoned the Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland. And, 3. that he had deſigned to have raiſed an Inſurrection in the City of London. But the Indictment which here follows, is only for deſigning to ſeize on and impriſon the Duke of Northumberland.

Then was read the Depoſitions of Palmer, Crane Hamond, &c. and the King's Council opened the Indictment, and urged ſtrongly Palmer's voluntary Examination (as they call'd it) with Crane's and the other Examinations.

The Duke of Somerſet being it ſeems little acquainted with Law, did not deſire Counſel to plead or aſſiſt him in point of Law, but only anſwered to Matters of Fact ; he deſired no advantage might be taken againſt him for any idle or angry Word that might at any time have fallen from him ; he proteſted he never intended to have raiſed the northern parts, but had only, upon ſome Reports, ſent to Sir William Herbert to be his Friend ; that he had never determined to have kill'd the Duke of Northumberland, or any other Perſon, but had only talk'd of it, without any intention of doing it. That for the deſign of deſtroying the Gendarmery, it was ridiculous to think, that he with a ſmall Troop could deſtroy ſo ſtrong a body conſiſting of 900 men ; in which, tho' he had ſucceeded, it could have ſignified nothing. That he never deſigned to raiſe any ſtirs in London, but had always look'd upon it as a place where he was moſt ſafe. That his having Men about him at Greenwich was with no ill deſign, ſince when he could have done miſchief with them, he had not done it ; but upon his attachment rendred himſelf a Priſoner, without any reſiſtance. He objected alſo many things againſt the Witneſſes, and deſired they might be brought face to face. He particularly ſpoke againſt Sir Thomas Palmer the chief Witneſs. But the Witneſſes were not brought, only their Examinations before mentioned read. Upon this the King's Council reply'd, and avouched the Law to be, to aſſemble Men with intent to kill the Duke of Northumberland, was Treaſon by a Statute of the 3d and 4th of Edw. 6. made againſt unlawful Aſſemblies, which enacts, 'That 'if twelve Perſons ſhould have aſſembled together 'to have killed any Privy-Counſellor, and upon 'proclamation they had not diſperſed themſelves, it 'was Treaſon: or, if ſuch twelve had been by any 'malicious Artifice brought together for any Riot, 'and being warn'd, did not diſperſe themſelves, it 'was Felony, without benefit of Clergy or Sanctuary.' That to raiſe London, or the North parts of the Realm, was Treaſon. That to have Men about him to reſiſt his Attachment, was Felony. That to aſſault the Lords, and to deviſe their deaths, was Felony. Theſe things were urged againſt him by the Counſel (as is their uſual way of Pleading) with much bitterneſs. Then the Peers withdrew to debate the matter. The Proofs about his deſign of raiſing the North or the City, or of killing the Gendarmes, did not ſatisfy them, (for all theſe had been without queſtion treaſonable) ſo they only held to that point, of conſpiring to impriſon the Duke of Northumberland. The Duke of Suffolk was of opinion, That no contention among private Subjects ſhould be on any account ſcrued up to be Treaſon. The Duke of Northumberland ſaid, he would never conſent, that any practice againſt him ſhould be reputed Treaſon. Several of the Lords ſaid, They held it unfit that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke ſhould be on the Trial ; becauſe the Priſoner was chiefly charged with practiſes intended againſt them. But anſwer was made, That a Peer of the Realm might not be challenged. So after great difference of opinion, they all acquitted him of Treaſon. But the greater number found him guilty of Felony*, and Judgement was given that he ſhould be hang'd †.

Then

* One Attainder paſs'd in Edward the Sixth's reign, when tho' the party was not heard, the witneſſes were heard but when the Duke of Somerſet came to be try'd both for Treaſon and Felony, he had not the benefit of the Accuſers being brought face to face, but was proceeded againſt upon depoſitions read in the Court ; he was acquitted of the Treaſon, but caſt for Felony: and that occaſion'd the Act which the Commons grafted upon a Bill ſent down by the Lords in the ſubſequent Seſſions, viz. 5 and 6 Edw. 6. State-Tracts, Vol. II. p. 554. By which Act, no Perſon ſhall be indicted, arraigned, &c. unleſs the Offender be accuſed by two lawful Accuſers ; which Accuſers, at the time of the Arraignment, ſhall be brought in Perſon before the Party ſo accuſed, &c. See Raſtal, vol. I. p. 1023.

† Thuanus, tranſlated by the Reverend Mr. Wilſon, Vol. II. p. 409. ſays, In England there were troubles of a moſt dangerous nature ; for John Dudley, firſt created Earl of Warwick, and then Duke of Northumberland, an ambitious and ſagacious Man, had accuſed the Duke of Somerſet, Protector of the Realm, a Perſon of mean ſpirit, whoſe patience he had long abuſed, of Male-adminiſtration, and had procured his impriſonment ; after that, being reconciled to him, he put him upon beheading his brother, who was exceeding brave and formidable to Northumberland. Which done, after he had gain'd his wiſh, and drawn the chief power into his own hands, he had nothing elſe to do, but to remove Somerſet himſelf out of the way ; towards whom he ſhewed ſuch a contempt, as drove the other upon thoughts of killing Dudley, for the vindication of his own authority. Somerſet therefore went to his houſe under pretence of a viſit, covered with a coat of mail under his clothes, and carrying with him a party of armed

Then the Duke of Northumberland addreſſed himſelf to the Duke, and told him, That now, ſince by the Law he was condemned to die, as he had ſaved him formerly, ſo he would not now be wanting to ſerve him, how little ſoever he expected it from him; he deſired him therefore to fly to the King's mercy, in which he promiſed him, he would faithfully ſerve him. The Duke of Somerſet then thanked the Lords for their favour, and ask'd pardon of the Duke of Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, for his ill intentions againſt them; and made ſuit for his Life, and for his Wife and Children: and from thence he was carried to the Tower, where he remained till January 22. when his Petition for Life having been rejected, he was brought to the Scaffold about eight o' clock in the Morning.

Touching which Execution *, a few words here would be beſtowed in deſcribing the wonderful order and manner thereof, according as it hath faithfully been ſuggeſted to us upon the credit of a certain noble Perſonage, who not only was there preſent at the deed doing, but alſo in manner next unto him upon the Scaffold, beholding the order of all things with his Eyes, and with his Pen alſo reporting the ſame in order and manner as here followeth.

In the year of our Lord 1552, the 22d day of January, the noble Duke of Somerſet, Uncle to King Edward, was brought out of the Tower of London, and delivered to the Sheriffs of the City, and compaſſed round about with a great number of armed Men, both of the Guard and others, he was brought unto the Scaffold on Tower-Hill; where, as he nothing changing neither voice nor countenance, but in a manner with the ſame geſture which he commonly uſed at home, kneeling down upon both his Knees, and lifting up his Hands, commended himſelf unto God.

After that he had ended a few ſhort prayers, ſtanding up again, and turning himſelf toward the eaſt-ſide of the Scaffold, nothing at all abaſhed, (as it ſeemed unto me ſtanding about the midſt of the Scaffold, and diligently marking all things) neither with the ſight of the Ax, neither yet of the Hangman, or of preſent Death; † but with the like alacrity and chearfulneſs of Mind and Countenance as before times he was accuſtomed to hear the Cauſes and Supplications of others, and eſpecially the poor, he uttered theſe words to the people.

Dearly beloved Friends,

I am brought hither to ſuffer death, albeit that I never offended againſt the King, neither by word nor deed, and have been always as faithful and true unto this Realm, as any man hath been. But forſomuch as I am by a law condemned to die, I do acknowledge my ſelf as well as others to be ſubject thereunto. Wherefore to teſtify my obedience which I owe unto the laws, I am come hither to ſuffer death: whereunto I willingly offer my ſelf, with moſt hearty thanks unto God, that hath given me this time of repentance, who might through ſudden Death have taken away my life, that neither I ſhould have acknowledged him nor myſelf.

Moreover (dearly beloved friends) there is yet ſomewhat that I muſt put you in mind of, as touching Chriſtian Religion; which, ſo long as I was in Authority, I always diligently ſet forth and furthered to my power. Neither I repent me of my doings, but rejoice therein, ſith that now the ſtate of Chriſtian Religion cometh moſt near unto the form and order of the primitive Church. Which thing I eſteem as a great benefit given of God, both unto you and me: moſt heartily exhorting you all, that this which is moſt purely ſet forth unto you, you will with like thankfulneſs accept and embrace, and ſet out the ſame in your living. Which thing if you do not, without doubt greater miſchief and calamity will follow.

When he had ſpoken theſe words, ſuddenly there was a terrible noiſe heard: whereupon there came a great fear on all men. This noiſe was as it had been the noiſe of ſome great ſtorm or tempeſt, which unto ſome ſeemed to be heard from above; like as if a great deal of gunpowder being incloſed in an armory, and having caught fire, had violently broken out. But unto ſome again, it ſeemed as tho' it had been a great multitude of horſemen running together, or coming upon them. Such a noiſe then was in the ears of all Men, albeit they ſaw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any evident cauſe, without any violence or ſtroke ſtricken, or any man ſeen, they ran away, ſome into the ditches and puddles, and ſome into the houſes thereabout; other ſome being afraid with the horror and noiſe, fell down groveling unto the ground with their pole-axes and halberds; and moſt of them cried out, Jeſus ſave, Jeſus ſave us. Thoſe which tarried ſtill in their places, for fear knew not where they were. And I myſelf which was there preſent among the reſt, being alſo afraid in this hurly-burly, ſtood ſtill altogether amazed, looking when any man would knock me on the head.

In the mean time, whilſt theſe things were thus in doing, the people by chance ſpied one Sir Anthony Brown riding unto the Scaffold, which was the occaſion of a new noiſe; for when they ſaw him coming, they conjectured that which was not true, but notwithſtanding which they all wiſhed for, that the King men, whom he left in the next chamber; but, when he was introduced in the civileſt manner to Dudley, who was naked and lying upon his bed, the good-natur'd Man repenting him, would not execute his deſign, and departed without ſtriking a ſtroke. The plot being afterwards diſcovered by the treachery of ſome of the accomplices, he was accuſed upon it, and, notwithſtanding the unwillingneſs of the King, who had been brought up under his care, was condemned to death, becauſe he had offended againſt a late Law, which had provided, That whoever was found contriving the death of a Privy-Counſellor, tho' he did not accompliſh it, ſhould forfeit his head. Accordingly, in the beginning of the next year, he was, by the malignant ſport of fortune, beheaded at London. With him ſuffered Sir Ralph Vane, by whoſe advice Somerſet was ſaid to have held his unlawful cabals, and to have conſpired againſt Northumberland and others.

* Taken from Fox's Book of Martyrs, Vol. II. p. 1247.

† Biſhop Burnet in his ſecond Volume of The Hiſtory of the Reformation, p. 186. ſays, It was generally believed, that all this pretended conſpiracy, upon which he was condemned, was only a forgery; for both Palmer and Crane, the chief Witneſſes, were ſoon after diſcharged, as were alſo Bartvile and Hamond, with all the reſt that had been made priſoners on the pretence of this plot. And the Duke of Northumberland continued after that in ſo cloſe a friendſhip with Palmer, that it was generally believed he had been corrupted to betray him. And indeed, the not bringing witneſſes into Court, but only the Depoſitions, and the Parties ſitting Judges, gave great occaſion to condemn the proceeedings againſt him. For it was generally thought, that all was an artifice of Palmer's, who had put the Duke of Somerſet in fear of his life, and ſo got him to gather men about him for his own preſervation; and that he afterwards being taken with him, ſeemed thro' fear to acknowledge all that which he had before contrived. This was more confirm'd by the death of the other four, who were executed on the 26th of February, and did all proteſt they had never been guilty of any deſign, either againſt the King, or to kill the Lords. Vane added, That his blood would make Northumberland's pillow uneaſy to him. The people were generally much affected with this execution.

King by that Meſſenger had ſent his Uncle pardon; and therefore with great rejoycing, and caſting up their caps, they cried out, Pardon, pardon is come: God ſave the King. Thus this good Duke, altho' he was deſtitute of all Man's help, yet he ſaw before his departure, in how great love and favour he was with all Men. And truly I do not think, that in ſo great ſlaughter of Dukes as hath been in England within theſe few years, there were ſo many weeping Eyes at one time; and not without cauſe: for all men did ſee in the decay of this Duke, the publick ruin of all England, except ſuch as indeed did perceive nothing. But now to return from whence we have ſtrayed, the Duke in the mean time ſtanding ſtill in the ſame place, modeſtly, and with a grave Countenance, made a ſign to the people with his hand, that they would keep themſelves quiet. Which thing being done, and ſilence obtained, he ſpake unto them in this manner.

Dearly beloved Friends, there is no ſuch matter here in hand, as you vainly hope or believe. It ſeemeth thus good unto Almighty God, whoſe Ordinance it is meet and neceſſary that we all be obedient unto. Wherefore I pray you all to be quiet, and to be contented with my death, which I am moſt willing to ſuffer: and let us now join in prayer unto the Lord, for the preſervation of the King's Majeſty, unto whom hitherto I have always ſhewed myſelf a moſt faithful and true ſubject. I have always been moſt diligent about his Majeſty in his affairs, both at home and abroad, and no leſs diligent in ſeeking the common commodity of the whole Realm. At which words all the People cried out, and ſaid, it was moſt true.

Then the Duke proceeding, ſaid, Unto whoſe Majeſty I wiſh continual health, with all felicity and all proſperous ſucceſs. Whereunto the people again cried out, Amen.

Moreover, I do wiſh unto all his Counſellors the Grace and Favour of God, whereby they may rule in all things uprightly with juſtice. Unto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to ſhew yourſelves obedient, as it is your bounden duty, under the pain of condemnation, and alſo moſt profitable for the preſervation and ſafeguard of the King's Majeſty.

Moreover, forſomuch as heretofore I have had oftentimes affairs with divers Men, and hard it is to pleaſe every Man, therefore if there be any that hath been offended and injured by me, I moſt humbly require and ask him forgiveneſs; but eſpecially Almighty God, whom throughout all my Life I have moſt grievouſly offended: and all other whatſoever they be that have offended me, I do with my whole heart forgive them. Now I once again require you, dearly beloved in the Lord, that you will keep yourſelves quiet and ſtill, leſt through your tumult you might trouble me. For albeit the Spirit be willing and ready, the Fleſh is frail and wavering; and thro' your quietneſs, I ſhall be much more quieter. Moreover, I deſire you all to bear me witneſs, that I die here in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt; deſiring you to help me with your prayers, that I may perſevere conſtant in the ſame unto my life's end.

After this, he turning himſelf again about like a meek Lamb, kneeled down upon his knees. Then Dr. Cox, who was there preſent to counſel and advertiſe him, delivered a certain Scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a brief confeſſion unto God; which being read, he ſtood up again upon his feet, without any trouble of Mind, (as it appeared) and firſt bad the Sheriffs farewel, then the Lieutenant of the Tower and others, taking them all by the hands which were upon the Scaffold with him. Then he gave the Hangman certain Money. Which done, he put off his gown, and kneeling down again in the ſtraw, untied his ſhirt-ſtrings. After that, the Hangman coming unto him, turned down his collar round about his neck, and all other things which did lett or hinder him. Then lifting up his eyes to heaven, where his only hope remained, and covering his face with his own handkerchief, he laid himſelf down along, ſhewing no manner of token of trouble or fear, neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were covered, there began to appear a red colour in the midſt of his cheeks.

Thus this moſt meek and gentle Duke lying along, and looking for the ſtroke, becauſe his doublet covered his neck, he was commanded to riſe up and put it off; and then laying himſelf down again upon the block, and calling thrice upon the name of Jeſus, ſaying, Lord Jeſu ſave me, as he was the third time repeating the ſame, even as the name of Jeſu was in uttering, in a moment he was bereft both of head and life.

His ſon continued in a diſconſolate condition, deprived of all his Titles; till Queen Elizabeth, in the firſt year of her reign, created him Earl of Hertford, and Baron Seymour; and his Grandſon, William Earl of Hertford, was created Marquis of Hertford 1640. and in the year 1660, he preſented the following Caſe to the Houſe of Peers: which giving a great light into that proceeding, is here inſerted.

The CASE of the Marquis of Hertford, touching the Dukedom of Somerſet, A.D. 1660. when the Bill was brought into Parliament to reſtore him to the Title of Duke of Somerſet.

EDward, Earl of Hertford (great Grandfather of the ſaid Marquis) was by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, bearing date the 6th of April, 1 Edw. VI. created Duke of Somerſet, to hold to him and the Heirs Males of his body, upon the body of the Lady Anne his then wife begotten, and to be begotten for ever; with ſeveral other remainders over in tail.

The ſaid Duke afterwards, viz. in Michaelmas-Term, 5 Edw. VI. was indicted of Felony, for procuring and ſtirring up others to take and impriſon John Earl of Warwick, (one of the King's Privy-Council) which Indictment (though void both in matter and form) was pretended to be grounded on the Statute of 3 and 4 Edw. VI. which makes it Felony to ſtir up and procure others to take away the Life of any of the King's Council; but this Indictment was only for ſtirring up others to impriſon a Privy-Counſellor, (which was never reduc'd into act) and the ſame declared and branded in print to be void by learned Judges. Yet the ſaid Duke was found guilty of Felony, and put to death for this fact, which was but a pretended Felony; and if true, yet no entail'd eſtate forfeitable thereby.

The malice of his enemies not ſatisfied with his blood, afterwards by their power (in the infancy of the Duke's Heir, who continu'd and was own'd for Duke of Somerſet for ſeveral months after his Father's death) procur'd an Act of Parliament in the ſame year, 5 Edw. VI. intitled, An Act touching the limitation of the late Duke of Somerſet's Lands, wherein there is a Clauſe obliquely inſerted*, to take away the ſaid Honour ſo entailed as aforeſaid; which, by no Felony (how notorious ſoever the ſame had been) cou'd by law have been forfeited.

This being a Caſe unprecedented, both in law and hiſtory, and ſo contrary to the rules of law, juſtice and reaſon, to have an attainder of Felony ſtand, for an offence, which apparently neither then, nor at any time after was Felony; and if a Felony, yet to have a forfeiture extended beyond the offence, (if there were any) and to be ſo maliciouſly proſecuted after the death of the ſaid Duke, (who was mainly inſtrumental in bringing about the Bleſſed Reformation of Religion) it is humbly conceiv'd to be moſt agreeable to juſtice to reſtore the ſaid Marquis, who is Heir Male of the bodys of the ſaid Duke and the Lady Anne his wife, to his ancient Honour ſo illegally taken away as aforeſaid.

Whereupon, in September 1660, the ſaid Marquis of Hertford was reſtor'd to the Dukedom of Somerſet, by a repeal of the Act of the 5th of Edw. VI.

* And be it farther enacted, That the ſaid Duke, and his Heirs Males, begotten upon the Body of the ſaid Lady Anne for ever, ſhall by authority of this Act, loſe and forfeit unto your Highneſs, your Heirs and Succeſſors for ever, and alſo be depriv'd from henceforth for ever, as well of the Names of Viſcount Beauchamp, Earl of Hertford, and Duke of Somerſet; and every of them, as alſo of all and every other his and their Honour or Honours, Degrees, Dignities, Eſtates, Preheminences and Styles, by whatſoever Name or Names, he the ſame Duke hath been call'd, nam'd or created, by any Letters Patents, Writs, or otherwiſe.

Upon theſe conſiderations, her Majeſty aſſented to ſign the warrant for her execution, by whom ſuch tumults were raiſed: Notwithſtanding, being being moved to mercy by her great wiſdom, ſhe thought it neceſſary to have it in readineſs, if any attempt ſhould be begun, and yet not in haſte to execute the ſame: this ſo ſigned, ſhe left with Mr. Daviſon to carry to the Great-Seal, to have it in readineſs as aforeſaid. And he, after the ſealing, and without her Majeſty's commandment, preſented it unto the Lords without her privity, contemptuouſly. Notwithſtanding, upon the delivery thereof to him, her Majeſty bid him uſe ſecrecy. And upon queſtion made by the Lords whether her Majeſty continued in that mind for execution of the Scotiſh Queen, he ſaid ſhe held that courſe ſtill; and upon farther queſtion made, ſaid her Majeſty would not be farther troubled with that matter. Whereupon the Lords ſeeing no impediment, diſpatched the execution, wherein Mr. Daviſon did break the ſecrecy her Majeſty repoſed in him, in delivering it unto the Lords, and dealt very contemptuouſly in not making her privy, knowing her mind to be to the contrary. For her Majeſty ſent Mr. Killegrew unto him, commanding him, if it were not ſealed already, it ſhould not be ſealed; and after, when he told her Majeſty it was ſealed already, She asked him what haſte? This act ſo done by him, he being but a particular Counſellor, her Majeſty doth take it a matter of high indignity and abuſe of her Counſellors, and a thing of the greateſt moment that ever happened ſince her Reign, ſince which time never any Counſellor in matters of far leſs importance proceeded without her reſolution or privity: which thing ſhe leaves to your Honours conſideration for puniſhment thereof.

 Queen Elizabeth undertook to make the Publick believe that the execution (of the Queen of Scots) was done againſt her will, and without her Knowledge; the way ſhe went to work was thus. Daviſon was the inſtrument ſhe made uſe of, without his knowing any thing of the matter, to act this ſort of Comedy. A little before the Queen of Scots Sentence, he was made Secretary of State; and it is very likely he was put into that poſt on purpoſe, that he might be drawn into the ſnare, and made accountable for Mary's death. Rapin, vol. IX. (Oct. Edit.) pag. 105, 106. See alſo, pag. 109, 110, 111, 112, 113. for more particulars of this Affair.

Daviſon, with a comely countenance, repleniſhed with gravity, a fine deliverance of ſpeech, but a voice ſomewhat low (which he excuſed by late ſickneſs) diſcretely anſwered in ſort enſuing:

My Lords, I am right ſorry, that an action of this nature, for the honourable proceedings againſt the Scotiſh Queen, than which never was any thing more honourable, ſhould after the full and laudable performance thereof be called into queſtion. Again, my Lords, I am moſt ſorry that her gracious Highneſs ſhould conceive ſuch an high diſpleaſure againſt me, as to trouble your Honours with me at this preſent. But as in all mine actions heretofore, I have been moſt faithful and forward to do her Majeſty's commandments; ſo in this, by your Honours favour, let me bear the teſtimony of my Conſcience, that I have done nothing either wittingly or willingly, but as became an honeſt man. And therefore, firſt, that I delivered it unto the Lords without her commandment, or againſt her commandment; let it be lawful for me with your Honours leave to proteſt the contrary. To that the Attorney anſwer'd, I ſaid not that you delivered it unto the Lords againſt her commandment, but that you knowing her mind to be contrary to it. Daviſon to that reply'd, Well then I deſire to have the proofs: whereupon, the Sollicitor-General read his examination, wherein to the ſixth point, he ſayeth, that after the ſigning and ſealing he made her not privy to the ſending down. Mr. Daviſon to that anſwer'd; My good Lords, the warrant for the execution was ſigned and ſealed by her Majeſty's expreſs commandment; which being ſo, I take it to be irrevocable in law. Whereupon, by the Advice of the Lords it was ſent down, ſhe not being privy to ſending down, wherein I thought I dealt as beſeemed me: for writs of execution do not uſe to come to her Majeſty. That I was ſo forward, I thought it my duty, and for no other reaſon I proteſt; for I never had any private grudge or hatred againſt the Queen of Scots, but in reſpect of my Country and Common-Weal. The Warrant reſted with me ſix weeks before I preſented it, and when I preſented it, my Lord Admiral will witneſs I was ſent for. The place I held, I proteſt I never ſought for; it pleaſed her Majeſty for ſome gracious opinion of me to prefer me thereunto. In which I am aſſured

THE proceedings againſt Mr. Daviſon in the Star-Chamber, by Commiſſion not read, but directed to theſe thirteen following:

1. The Lord Chief Juſtice of England, as Lord Privy-Seal for that day.
2. The Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury.
3. The Lord Archbiſhop of York.
4. The Earl of Worceſter.
5. The Earl of Cumberland.
6. The Earl of Lincoln.
7. The Lord Gray.
8. The Lord Lumley.
9. Sir James A-Croft *.

[* In the above Trial, call'd Croft. But in the Trial of the Earl of Arundel, 1589. he is call'd A-Croft. See State-Trials, vol. I. pag. 157.]

10. Sir Walter Mildmay.
11. The Maſter of the Rolls.
12. The Lord Chief Baron.
13. The Lord Anderſon.

The ſum of that which was propos'd, and enforc'd againſt him by her Majeſty's Counſellors at the Law.

The matter laid againſt him, is a great and heinous indignity, as her Majeſty taketh it, committed by him in this laſt proceeding againſt the late Scotiſh Queen, which although it were in itſelf moſt juſt and honourable, yet in the manner of dealing concerning it, Mr. Daviſon is charged by her Majeſty with want of duty, &c. For whereas by the manifold defects of the ſaid S. Queen, and that in the judgment of all the Realm in Parliament her Life was now to ſatisfy the law, and thus neceſſary for the preſervation of the whole Realm, as was ſhewed; yet her Majeſty, of her natural moſt gracious and merciful aſſured I have not committed any wilful error, but as an honeſt man ſhould do; for nothing in the world is more dear unto me than my reputation. I confeſs I ſaid to ſome Lords, I took it to be her Majeſty's pleaſure to proceed therein, and I appeal to her Majeſty's own conſcience if I had not cauſe to think ſo. But ſhe is my moſt gracious Sovereign, it is not my duty to ſay, if ſhe gainſay; I will not ſtand in conteſtation with her, for it beſeems me not, and therefore I ſubmit myſelf to what puniſhment your Honours ſhall pleaſe to lay upon me.

To that the Sollicitor (Egerton) anſwer'd; Mr. Daviſon, you do well to extol the honour of the proceedings, for it beſeems you, and ſo the truth was. But I muſt tell you, the more honourable the proceedings were, the more is your contempt in not making her privy. In reſerving the execution, I note her Majeſty's magnanimity, who not regarded the dangers of her own ſelf, to continue the other's life. And yet her wiſdom is therein to be commended, who thought good to have it in a readineſs, with intention to have clemency ſo long as might be. In not conteſting with her Majeſty you obſerve duty, but by your means, was a great contempt; and farther, ſhe ſaid to you, you ſhould uſe it with great ſecrecy.

To which Mr. Daviſon ſaid, I confeſs it; and the Sollicitor reply'd, Why then that was a caution not to do it without her conſent: ſo notwithſtanding your intention was good, it was a foul error. Whereto Daviſon rejoined, She is my moſt gracious Sovereign, as good a Miſtreſs unto me as ever any ſervant had, and what I have, I had it at her hands. I hope therefore my Lords think me not ſo unwiſe as to offend her, unleſs by overſight; but that I did it wittingly or willingly, I proteſt I did it not. And notwithſtanding ſhe ſent Mr. Killegrew, that it ſhould not be ſealed if it were not ſealed already; yet it proves not but that ſhe had a mind to do it, when it was ſealed. She ſaid unto me, What haſte? whereto I anſwered, I had done it by her Majeſty's commandment, and that ſuch a thing might not be dallied withall. Now, my Lords, the reaſons to move me to think it was her Majeſty's meaning, were ſundry and divers: firſt, the honour and juſtice of the cauſe; next, I knew of advertiſement from beyond the ſeas of her Majeſty's imminent dangers. Alſo I was privy to the proceedings at Fotheringay. I was not ignorant of the doings in Parliament. Laſt of all, the rumour of invaſion, the cries and tumults in the Realm, which moved me, having no expreſs commandment to the contrary, to do as I did. When he had ſaid this, Mr. Sollicitor read his examination, where to the ſecond he ſaith, when her Majeſty bad him uſe ſecrecy, he ſaid he would be as careful and ſecret as ſhould need: to the third, he confeſſeth Mr. Killegrew came unto him, telling him, if it were not ſealed already, it ſhould not be ſealed. To the ſeventh, after the Warrant was ſealed, her Majeſty asked him, What haſte? Whereto Daviſon anſwered, tho' her Majeſty commanded me to keep it ſecret, and I told the Council of it, how can I be thought ill of for that? for her Majeſty bade me expreſsly ſhew Mr. Secretary Walſingham thereof; my Lord-Chancellor muſt needs know it, foraſmuch as he muſt ſeal it. And her Majeſty made my Lord-Admiral privy thereunto; why then might I not make it known to ſome others, that were chief Counſellors? To that, ſaid Mr. Attorney, Though Mr. Walſingham ſhould know it, yet it was not general. Mr. Daviſon anſwered, Neither was I verbally commanded to conceal it from the reſt. Then ſaid the Sollicitor, Another matter makes againſt you; my Lord-Treaſurer did ask you, whether it was her Majeſty's pleaſure, and you anſwered, yea. To that ſaid Daviſon, I remember not that. The Sollicitor reply'd, It is my Lord-Treaſurer's teſtimony. And Daviſon rejoined, I reverence his teſtimony; and proceeded, ſaying, my Lords, the cauſe is between her Majeſty and me; ſhe is my gracious Sovereign, and I her ſervant, it behoveth me not to ſay, if ſhe gainſay, neither could I, as I ſaid, conteſt againſt her; yet let me proteſt, that in my own conceit, I have dealt as ſincerely, ſoundly and honeſtly as any ſervant could do. Then ſpake the Lord Chief Juſtice of England, ſaying, By that, if ſhe asked you, what haſte? you might know it was her pleaſure to defer it, and therefore you to do it without her commandment, was a great offence. Then ſpake Gawdie, the Queen's Serjeant: My Lords, four things I note that Mr. Daviſon confeſſeth; firſt, that her Majeſty bad him uſe ſecrecy; next, the Warrant being ſealed, Mr. Killegrew was ſent unto him, that were it not ſealed already, it ſhould not be ſealed at all. Thirdly, he confeſſeth her Majeſty was content he ſhould ſhew it Mr. Walſingham, which proves ſhe minded to keep it from the reſt. And it had been his duty to have known her pleaſure; and therefore for ſo much as he confeſſeth this, merciful diſpoſition, after the ſo honourable condition and proclamation of the S. Queen's guiltineſs, notwithſtanding ſo many important allegations and vehement interceſſions, could not be brought to condeſcend to the execution; rather deſiring by all means poſſible, if there were any hope of amendment and reclaim, to ſpare where ſhe might honourably ſpill, than to ſpill where ſhe might honourably ſpare; and in this mind ſhe continued from October to the end of January. But when ſhe ſaw that her malicious enemies daily increaſed their wicked attempts againſt her and the ſtate, that rumours were ſpread and information given daily of attempts by invaſion, by rebellions, by violence upon her Royal Perſon, to work a change and delivery of the ſaid S. Queen, ſhe moſt wiſely reſolved at length to have a bill or inſtrument, ſigned according to Law and Juſtice, in a readineſs; whereby upon all occaſions or occurrences, ſhe might be executed: and this of ſpecial choice and truſt, ſhe thought good to commit to Mr. Daviſon, willing him to carry it to the Lord-Chancellor, to have it under the Broad-Seal, but withal charged him to keep it very ſecret, and not to make any acquainted with it. The very ſame day he carried it to the ſeal, and the next day after, having received charge from her Majeſty by the Lord-Admiral that ſtay ſhould be made, if it was not ſealed; but he declared it was ſealed the day before, &c. whereto the Queen reply'd, What needs that haſte? The next day after this, (which was, I think, on Candlemas-day) my Lord-Treaſurer asked him, if he knew what mind the Queen had towards the execution: he anſwered, to have it go forward; and ſo ſhew'd it to him, and after to the reſt of the Council, procuring their Warrant down to preſent execution, the Queen having this, I take it to be a great contempt, indignity and miſpriſion for him to ſay his intent was good; he thought it ſo, is no anſwer. Fourthly, her Majeſty told him, ſhe thought of ſome other courſe to be taken, and he gave her no anſwer: beſides, he confeſſeth he told the Lords it was her Majeſty's pleaſure upon ſuch a demand made. Daviſon anſwered, that general demand was made. Gawdie reply'd here, it is the Lord-Treaſurer's teſtimony. Daviſon rejoined, let me have right; it was but privately demanded between my Lord-Treaſurer and me. I will not ſpeak in excuſe, but only to anſwer; I demand, whether the imparting of it to the Council be ſuch a contempt: farther, there is difference between an expreſs commandment, and an imply'd ſpeech. The loſs of my place, I do not eſteem, neither weigh I this diſgrace; only her Majeſty's diſfavour is the thing that grieves me. Then Puckering the Queen's Serjeant began to ſpeak, aggravating Daviſon's offence, and forward to accuſe, and yet ſeemed more pro forma tantum, than of any matter he had to charge him withal, more than had been ſpoken of before. Whereupon Daviſon anſwered, All this ſpeech is anſwered, but that I made her not privy; whereto I ſay, I made her not privy in reſpect my Lords of the Council thought it not neceſſary, becauſe it was not fit ſhe ſhould be privy to the execution. I will not ſtand upon terms, as I ſay, for it becomes me not, but ſubmit myſelf to your Honours cenſures.

Then ſaid Wraye, Mr. Daviſon, to ſay it was irrevocable you are deceived, for ſhe might do it at her pleaſure. Then ſaid Daviſon, I beſeech you, my Lords, make means to her Majeſty that I may have her favour; and for the reſt, I wave it not. Whereupon Wraye willed Sir Walter Mildmay to deliver his opinion; who began in form following.

How honourable her Majeſty our gracious Sovereign hath dealt in all juſtice, is known to all the world, againſt ſuch traytors, by whom her life ſhould have been taken away; whereupon ſhould enſue, ſubverſion to the whole ſtate, upon the proceedings whereof it appeared that the Scotiſh Queen was chief author, dealing moſt ingratefully againſt her, who before time had ſaved her from them that vehemently ſought her deſtruction. And notwithſtanding that her Majeſty might have proceeded againſt her as a private perſon, yet ſhe granted her commiſſion to great perſons to hear what ſhe could alledge in her defence. And albeit that upon the hearing thereof ſhe was declared to be guilty, yet none could think execution might be done without her Majeſty's expreſs aſſent. Then he dilated of the proceedings of Parliament, the Petition, her anſwer thereunto, wherein he noted her wiſdom in not being haſty in ſo high a matter; he ſhewed farther, how ſhe was contented to hear Ambaſſadors if they could propound any thing in her defence. Afterward followed the proclamations to notify the proceedings paſſed, unto the people; for people, ſaid he, be deſirous to hear of State-matters, and I warrant you itch to underſtand what we do here: herein, ſaid he, was juſtice, mercy and diſcretion. Afterwards, upon the .... and cries, ſhe thought it neceſſary to look unto it; upon this, ſhe ſealed her Warrant, yet continuing her former clemency, not to put it in execution: for as it was in her to grant that it ſhould be done, ſo ſhe might ſtay and defer it; which ſhe ſo meaning, it behoved her to truſt ſomebody, and ſo, ſaid he, ſhe did this Gentleman, called unto her ſervice upon truſt, who, for the acquaintance that I have had with him, was worthy of that place. This truſt ſhe committed unto him, and I am ſorry, ſaid he, he was not in this, ſo good a ſervant as in all other things. Surely he had notable cautions, not to have preſumed in ſo great a matter, to have done any thing without her commandment. His offence, ſaid he, I interpret in two degrees; an abuſe to the truſt, and the contempt: for the firſt, ſhe willed him to tell it Mr. Walſingham, and it is no excuſe to ſay, ſhe forbade you not the reſt: for you ought not to have told it unto any but whom ſhe would. Alſo, which aggravates your offence, you told the Lords ſhe was pleaſed. For the contempt, the Writ was not delivered unto you, but had it not been delivered unto them to whom it was directed, then had it been a commandment. Your good intention was no anſwer, neither ought my Lords to allow of it, albeit per caſe I could allow it, becauſe I know you. Alſo your fault is the greater, which you know. Farther, you were near her, and had time convenient to ſhew her; hereof, ſaid he, hath followed a greater grief to the Queen's Majeſty, which may turn to all our hindrance, foraſmuch as our welfare depends upon her well-doing. Next, ſaid he, hath followed a diſhonour to her Majeſty, that ſhe having governed this land ſo long time in all obedience, a ſervant of hers in this age, ſhould have ſo ſmall regard. Now for my opinion of the offence, it reſteth to conſider what puniſhment is behoveful in ſuch having not notice nor knowledge of this; and after, when ſhe conferred with him about another courſe to be taken, he concealed from her what had been done therein. Theſe chief matters were proved by his own confeſſion in an examination before taken and urged againſt him, both in reſpect of himſelf being bound to eſpecial obedience, not only as a ſubject, but as a ſervant, a counſellor, a ſecretary ſo much truſted, and yet not to keep ſecret, where ſpecial charge was given him; and in reſpect of the Queen, ſo good and gracious a Prince, ſo well deſerving of him, the fountain and head of all juſtice and authority amongſt us, and yet not to be made privy of the doing of ſuch an act of ſo great a quality and importance as that was, wherein ſhe had ſhewed herſelf always, (and that moſt apparently) whereof Mr. Daviſon could not be ignorant, both backward and unwilling to yield to that which all her Realm deſired and ſued for at her hands; yet Mr. Daviſon, contrary to her known mind, procured with ſuch haſte, (of what good purpoſe in himſelf, this would not regard;) but with apparent want of duty to his Sovereign, which did more appear in his concealing his proceedings, when ſhe purpoſely talked with him of that matter as aforeſaid; all which they left to the Counſellors to judge of.

Mr. Daviſon's Anſwer for himſelf.

NOtwithſtanding at the bar, whither he was brought by his keeper, Sir Owen Hopton, being faint by reaſon of his late ſickneſs, and carrying his left arm in a ſcarf, benumb'd I think by his late taken palſy, he ſpake ſomewhat faintly, unaudibly; tho' being required by his Commiſſioners to ſpeak higher, yet deſired favour to ſpeak as he could, ſuch a caſe. Puniſhments in this Court, are either corporal, or pecuniary; pecuniary, by fines impoſed upon offenders; and corporal, by puniſhments and ſuch like. Now, ſaid he, if the fine ſhould be ſecundum quantitatem delicti, I think he ſhould not bear it; for I know his eſtate. Surely leſs than ten thouſand marks may not be ſufficient, which tho' it be too great for his ability, yet is it too little for his fault. The qualification, wherefore reſteth in them where I doubt not he ſhall find favour; next, he muſt ſuffer impriſonment during her Majeſty's pleaſure, which muſt be reſerved to her merciful mitigation.

And after him ſpake Manwood the Chief Baron, who in the beginning of his tale, took ſo large a ſcope, as many did judge he would be tedious, as he was indeed. Firſt, he declared how in the very beginning the Queen of Scots bewrayed her malice againſt the Crown of this Land when ſhe was Queen of France, at which time ſhe made Letters Patents as Queen of England; ſhe uſurped her Majeſty's Stile, and ſhe quartered the Arms of England. Then he deſcended unto her doings when ſhe was Dowager; how ſhe excuſed her former offences by reaſon of coverture: then he declared her marriage with the Lord Darnly; the murder of her husband, the practices with the Biſhop of Roſs, her conſpiracy with the Duke of Norfolk. To conclude, he couched the whole hiſtory which any way concerned her life or manners. At laſt he came to Mr. Daviſon's offence, which he took in law to be a Miſpriſion; and yet not every commandment of the Prince tranſgreſſed, is a Miſpriſion: but, ſaid he, when one is put in truſt in a point of Juſtice, which is the Government of the Commonweal, there a Commandment tranſgreſſed is a Miſpriſion. For example whereof, he cited a caſe there in that place decided; meaning Sir John Throgmorton's caſe, as many deemed. Alſo, ſaid he, if a Sheriff exerciſe his office without an oath, that is a Miſpriſion. And, ſaid he, if one have power by law to do a thing, if he prevent the time wherein it ought to be done, that is a Miſpriſion. And if a Judge for expedition of Juſtice ſhould ſit in judgement before the Term, that is Miſpriſion. Now, ſaid he, this is a Miſpriſion, becauſe you prevented the time in doing it before you were commanded, altho' the thing were lawful; for you did fuſtum, but not fuſte. Farther, by naming Mr. Walſingham in ſpecialty, it was a ſecluding the reſt in generality. And alſo, if the Warrant were ſealed, yet was it not lawful to kill her, becauſe the direction was ſpecial, and not general. So then he concluded, the contempt was great, and the puniſhment aſſeſſed by Sir Walter Mildmay worthily deſerved, whereunto he agreed.

After him, ſpake Anderſon, Chief Juſtice, who ſaid, The Proceeding had been honourable, which he would not ſpeak of, being known unto all men, and having been ſpoke to before. But to come to the caſe in queſtion; in the accuſation, ſaid he, be two parts, firſt, that Mr. Daviſon without her Majeſty's commandment ſent it down: and the ſecond, that againſt her commandment he made the Lords privy. For the firſt, he confeſſed; to the ſecond, he ſaith ſhe bad him uſe ſecrecy. The cauſes alledged by him are good, and yet the proceeding therein, that which cauſed the offence, the words, uſe ſecrecy, and not to cauſe it to be publiſhed or known to any. Then he being one of her Majeſty's Council, could, which was to this effect: Firſt, proteſting that he was not guilty to himſelf of any wilful diſloyalty, or breach of duty, but that he did always ſince his firſt employment in her Majeſty's ſervice, endeavour to bear himſelf moſt ſerviceable and unblamable; and he took therein her Majeſty's own ſelf and God to witneſs; confeſſing alſo, that his skill and experience was not yet great in this latter kind of ſervice, whereto he was without his ſuit and above his expectation called; and for the matter proteſting alſo, that he would not for any danger, no not preſent death, in juſtifying himſelf, diſcloſe any private ſpeech or commandment that paſſed betwixt her Majeſty and him; nor would he by any means enter into any affirmation or avowing, which could not ſtand with his dutiful regard to her Majeſty's honour, &c. but would admit all that againſt him: and farther, that he would not in any part diſclaim my Lord Treaſurer's reports or teſtimony againſt him. But to the matters, he anſwered, firſt, That he was ſorry that a fact of that importance and neceſſity, ſo honourable and profitable for the Commonwealth, ſhould be ſo heavily taken againſt him; wherein he might take it on his ſoul, that he did nothing but that which in his underſtanding might be agreeable to her mind, neither did he otherwiſe conceive of her meaning and purpoſe; and that upon theſe inducements:

Firſt, the conſideration of the thing itſelf, ſo juſt, ſo neceſſary, ſo honourable, ſo vehemently ſued for by the whole Realm. Secondly, in conſideration of her Majeſty, ſo gracious and wiſe a Prince, ſo loving and careful of her Subjects and Commonwealth; and more ſtrongly in conſideration of her words, which ſhe uſed at the firſt delivery of the bill, Now you have it, let me be troubled no more with it. Beſides the ſufficiency and perfectment of the ſaid inſtruments for the ſaid purpoſe, which was had by her directions, viz. as under the Great-Seal, all which were in his underſtanding proof enough what her meaning was, neither was there any apparent and direct countermand, without the which he took that Inſtrument to be irrevocable. For the charge of ſecrecy, he conceived her meaning was, that it ſhould be kept from the common and publick knowledge only; for ſhe being a Prince ſo wiſe, did in his judgement conſider what violent attempts the favourites of the S. Queen might by likelihood offer in that deſperate plunge, if it ſhould be known that ſuch a Warrant was ſigned for her execution, and not from her Council. For her Majeſty's ſelf after willed in his way to the Lord Chancellor, to impart it to Sir Francis Walſingham, that then lay ſick at his houſe at London; herſelf made my Lord-Admiral privy to it, in ſending him to ſtay the Seal ut ſupra, and my Lord-Chancellor by ſealing muſt needs have ſome knowledge of it: and then why ſhould he think the Council ſhould not know it, being Privy-Counſellors and Counſellors of Eſtate, if he imparted it to none but to my Lord-Treaſurer, and he to the reſt, and that excuſably in regard of the great credit and truſt that her Majeſty uſually repoſeth in my Lord-Treaſurer for matter of greateſt moment and weight. Secondly, for ſending down the Warrant, he did it not without the opinion of the Council, cil, the fault is bad; and it is the worſe, becauſe by her ſaying, what haſte, he might gather what her intent was. Mr. Daviſon ſaith, he excuſeth it by love to the Commonweal, which a man may term blind love, which is no excuſe, but it remaineth a Contempt, and a Contempt is a Miſpriſion; and yet is not every Miſpriſion a Contempt. If a man do a thing without a warrant, it is a Contempt; and ſo he concluded this to be a great offence worthy the puniſhment inflicted upon him: and ſo ended.

After him ſpake the Maſter of the Rolls, agreeing with the cenſures of them that ſpake before; and that Mr. Daviſon's great zeal made him forget his duty: alſo ſaying, that the point did reſt whether he did know it was her Majeſty's pleaſure it ſhould be ſtayed, which, ſaid he, appeareth by his own confeſſion; and therefore, in fine, he agreed with the former cenſures.

Next ſpake Sir James Croft, who ſaid not very much, and yet ſpake ſomewhat: that he loved the man well, and ſo had cauſe, ſaying, that he had no lack of good-will; but yet had grievouſly offended. So he ſubſcribed in opinion to the former judgement.

After him, ſpake the Lord Lumley, who divided the offence into two parts. Firſt, the neglect of his duty; and ſecondly, the breaking of his duty: ſaying further, that the Judge had told the law, and we muſt believe them, that it is within the compaſs of a Contempt. The matter, ſaid he, is evident: for firſt, her unwillingneſs in the Parliament was a ſignification of her mind, which he let ſlip. And farther, in ſaying that ſhe was of that mind ſtill, ſurely you ſpake without the book, which was a very bold part; for you ought to have told them how dutiful it was; yet, Sir, you took a worſe courſe, that ſuch a high matter by your perſuaſions, as it ſhould ſeem, ſhould be done without her privity. Why, ſaid he, what an abuſe of the Counſellors was this; ſurely a great abuſe! and if it were a fault againſt them, much more againſt her Majeſty: this is one of the higheſt offences, by my trowth, (for ſo he ſware) that ever ſubject did againſt the Prince; and tho' you were my brother and heir, (before God I ſpeak it) I think the puniſhment too little; yet with no offence to you, but for the quality of your fault. But I ſay, had a greater fine been impoſed upon you, I would eaſily have agreed thereunto.

After him ſpake my Lord Gray; who ſaid, Two points were ſpoken of: the firſt, touching the Queen of Scots; and the next, Mr. Daviſon's offence. For the firſt, ſaid he, it is largely diſcourſed: for the laſt, my good Lords, let me crave your farther examination. His offence is made the more for divers circumſtances; the firſt circumſtance is, for that it was for execution of a Queen; but what Queen? ſurely ſuch a Queen as practiſed moſt horrible treaſons againſt our ſovereign Queen! ſuch a Queen, as conſpired the overthrow of the whole State! yea, ſuch a Queen, that ſought the ſubverſion of Chriſt's true Religion, to bring our ſouls headlong to the devil: ſo then, my Lords, the taking away ſuch a Queen, can no way aggravate his fate. The ſecond circumſtance is, his breach of ſecrecy, which he excuſeth that he told it but to the chief Counſellors: whereas Mr. Walſingham, my Lord-Admiral and Lord-Chancellor, either by neceſſity, or commandment from her Majeſty, did know it, undoubtedly. Whatſoever my Lords before and therefore no preſumption in him; and in his own judgement, he had ſufficient warrant ſo to do by the firſt delivery of it from the Queen herſelf. Then conſidering the troubleſome rumours that were then abroad, and that information came daily from Ireland and Wales of forces of people in arms, and the report ſcattered abroad that Fotheringay-Caſtle was broken, the priſoners gone, that London was fired, and her Majeſty made away, amongſt theſe terrors, what ſhould I do? Did I not that which any honeſt man and good ſubject would do in ſuch a caſe? Further, it is not cuſtom in Court that particularities ſhould trouble her Majeſty in the execution of any ſuch bills: but when ſhe hath given by her Royal aſſent, warrant, authority and life to it, the reſt for the manner and means of execution is left to the Council; and for all other ſuch circumſtances of time, when; of place, where; of perſons, by whom; eſpecially in this cauſe when her Majeſty had ſaid expreſsly that ſhe would not be troubled any more with it. Thirdly, for the not imparting of it to her upon her communication with him, &c. 'I had it by me five or 'ſix Weeks before ſhe ſpake any thing more of it, 'and was very unwilling to trouble her any more 'with it, eſpecially remembring her words.'

This was the effect of his defence, not uttered continuately, as I have ſet it down, but interruptly to the particulars as they were objected, in much more forcibly large and choice terms; but I think that I have not left out any thing of weight. After this, the Commiſſioners began to ſpeak judiciouſly unto the matter, whoſe Speeches I will by way of abridgement note, where any thing was ſpoken different from others, and eſpecially notable; for moſt of them had the ſame beginning of the Scotiſh Queen's demerits, &c.

The firſt that ſpake was Sir Walter Mildmay.

He handled eloquently the great cauſes the Queen had to deal ſeverely with the S. Queen, and the importance of the Parliament thereto, and her Majeſty's patience in forbearing, her wiſdom in being willing, her natural and accuſtomable clemency in being ſlow; and compared her ſlackneſs with Mr. Daviſon's haſte, tho' he knew her mind herein very well. Then he ſhewed, that ſuch things might not in any wiſe be extorted from Princes, and that perſuaſions and entreaties are the uttermoſt that ſubjects can offer; for the Prince's Heart is in God's hand to diſpoſe of. As for the Council, it is known that no Prince's Counſellors are farther made privy to any thing, than that it pleaſeth the Prince, and oftentimes that is imparted to one that is concealed from another with great cauſe; and therefore you ſhould not preſume farther than you had expreſs leave, much leſs to have been an encouragement to the reſt to proceed therein upon your own opinion, howſoever your deſire was for the end good and honeſt, eſpecially ſeeing there hath not been the like example. So he concluded, that the puniſhment ſhould not be in regard to the man's ability, but to the quantity of the Crime committed, (by his judgement) ten thouſand marks, and impriſonment during her Majeſty's pleaſure. To which all after agreed.

fore me have thought; his anſwer in this behalf doth ſatisfy me, ſo I am reſolved. For the third point, ſhe asking, What haſte? and he afterwards to ſend it down without her privity, here, even here, is the full proof of the Contempt; here is that, that cauſes the offence, which he ſeemeth to acknowledge, yet with two conſiderations: the firſt, the ſeditious tumults within the Realm; the next, advertiſements from Ireland, and beyond the ſeas. Now, my Lords, muſt not theſe conſiderations move him rather to put himſelf in her Majeſty's mercy by dealing without her commandment, than commit her Majeſty to the mercy of her foes by obeying her? for had that other thing happen'd (which God forbid) that her Majeſty ſhould have miſcarried, and then this Warrant ſigned and ſealed had been found in Mr. Daviſon's hands, wanting nothing but execution, ſhould we not then have judged him a traytor? ſhould we not have torn and rent him aſunder? Surely, my Lords, I ſhould then have thought him more worthy of ten thouſands deaths, than now of the leaſt puniſhment that may be inflicted upon him; for each of us in preſervation of our Country ought to loſe our lands, our livings, and ſacrifice our bodies: howbeit, I excuſe not his offence, neither do I agree it as a Contempt, and I agree with the puniſhment; and yet I think his fault proceeded from a very good zeal he bore unto his Country: and I pray God, that that peculiar ornament of pity and compaſſion wherewith her Majeſty is ſingular, may be ſo extended towards him, that all good ſubjects, by his example, may neglect their own private hindrance or diſgrace in reſpect of the furtherance of the Weal publick.

After him ſpake the Earl of Lincoln, who, for his opinion, thought it was but negligently done, and not contemptuouſly; but had it been done in contempt, he would have then thought Fine and Impriſonment no ſufficient puniſhment for an Offence of that quality; yet the Offence being as it is, for company, ſaid he, I agree to the Fine: but in mine opinion it is too much, ſaving that I know her Majeſty is merciful: and for the reſt, I agree with my Lord Gray.

The Earl of Cumberland repeated the caſe, neither aggravating nor denying the offence; but briefly concluded, he agreed in opinion with Sir Walter Mildmay.

And the Earl of Worceſter ſaid nothing, ſaving that he was of the ſame mind with Mr. Chancellor, that ſpake firſt.

After him ſpake the Archbiſhop of York, ſpeaking, as he was, like a Biſhop, rather than a Judge to decide a matter which did concern the State; for he inveighed againſt Mr. Daviſon's offence by places of Scripture: Obedience, ſaid he, is the only virtue, and Diſobedience the contrary; and God requireth nothing elſe but obedience. St. Paul ſaith, Let every ſoul be ſubject unto the higher Powers, &c. And when Joſhua was appointed Ruler over Iſrael, the people ſaid, They would obey him in all things. If then they ought to obey a Prince in all things, much more in thoſe things which be good. I am ſorry, ſaid he, for Mr. Daviſon, for he did it neither wittingly, nor willingly, as I think certainly, but of a good mind to cut off our common enemy: that it was a good deed, muſt needs be confeſſed; but that it was not well done, muſt needs be granted.

2. Sir Roger Manhode, Lord Chief-Baron;

The ſecond, ſhewed at large the Scotiſh Queen's perpetual evil mind to our Queen, to bereave her of her Crown in her life-time, as her uſurping the Arms and Stile of England in poſſeſſion, when ſhe was firſt (out of the ſhell) married into France, her diſſembling of it in her Widowhood, by laying the fault upon her late husband, and yet then ſeeking to be proclaimed Heir apparent in the life of her eldeſt ſiſter, (for ſhe never called her dear ſiſter) which was a dangerous ſtep to her purpoſe. After, in her ſecond marriage, her bloodineſs in conſenting to her husband's murder, and upon that, flight and deprivation; her protection here by our Queen not only in life, but in honour; yet her aſſenting to the purpoſes of the Duke of Norfolk; and yet after that, tho' then our Queen would not ſuffer her for that to be touched, nor any way diſabled, as many would have had her, not only agreeing to traitorous plots, but alſo complotting with them, and therein going beyond them all, ſo as we could never be in quiet, but we had a Somervile, and then an Alden, then a Throkmorton, then a Parry, and now lately Abington and Babington; her Majeſty at length was forced to uſe a little ſeverity with her accuſtomed mercy, and one ounce of one with ten of the other. For even in this proceeding againſt her, ſhe might have been by the Statute of Edward III. by a Jury of Eſquires and Gentlemen, attainted and burned, and her blood corrupt; yet her Majeſty did chuſe by a new order to deal more honourably with her. Then he came to this fact of Mr. Daviſon's, which he amplified by the conſideration of her Majeſty's mind in all this, proceeding as the other did before: the thing he took to be Miſpriſion and Contempt in our Law, puniſhable by Fine and Impriſonment; and he ſaid, that Miſpriſion and Contempt is to do any thing contrary to, or beſides the Prince's commandment in point of Juſtice, not in other things; as Juſtices of Weſtminſter to ſit out of Term, to raze Indictments or Records; and ſo he gave other examples, as in the Miniſters of the Law, viz. Sheriffs to execute their offices, to return Knights to the Parliament without their Oaths. So this thing then being ſo high a point of Juſtice, was not in any reſpect to be done otherwiſe than her Majeſty's expreſs commandment would bear, eſpecially not with ſuch haſte, when ſhe expreſsly declared her mind to the contrary; wherein Mr. Daviſon may ſeem by this haſte, if her Majeſty had any other purpoſe to have prevented her, and God might otherwiſe have turned her mind; for it is not ſtrange to hear of mutation in her Majeſty in reſpect of this, as in the execution of the Duke of Norfolk, day and day was appointed, and often her Majeſty declared her unwillingneſs and lothfulneſs to have put him to death, if otherwiſe the law might have been ſatisfy'd. The commandment to impart it to Sir Francis Walſingham in eſpeciality, was an excluding the reſt in generality; and farther, what he told my Lord-Treaſurer could not be gathered of her Majeſty's words, but rather the contrary; and the inſtrument was not ſo peremptory and irrevocable as he took it, nor a ſufficient Warrant for any kind of proceeding againſt the S. Queen, neither for the aſſociates, nor for any other: for the laſt Statute, beſides the condition and proclamation, doth require the Queen's direction,

To reveal ſecrets was bad: for her Majeſty imparts not each part of her counſel to every Counſellor; ſo then his offence was a diſobedience, and a great fault. He alledgeth in excuſe, I think, a good intention, but that excuſeth not the fault: for obedientia eſt melior quam ſacrificium. And St. Paul ſaith, Non facimus malum ut inde veniat bonum. Therefore, ſaid he, the offence was great, too dangerous; for in ſuch a caſe, one would be twice adviſed, if he were either honeſt or wiſe. Laſt of all, he concluded he agreed with the puniſhment aſſeſſed, and ſo ended his ſermon.

Then ſpake the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, That the matter had been opened; firſt, concerning the doings of the Scotiſh Queen, whom he thought, living and dead, was ordained to diſturb and trouble the State of England. Then concerning Mr. Daviſon's offence, Albeit, ſaid he, that which is done could be wiſh'd to be otherwiſe done, yet none I hope could wiſh it undone; whatſoever he did, in my opinion, ſaid he, he did it in the ſuperabundant zeal of Religion, unto her Majeſty and love to the Commonwealth. Theſe be great arguments, ſaid he, and yet no excuſe: for modus non factum efficit culpam; altho' the act were good, yet can I not excuſe him in the circumſtance: howbeit, ſaid he, the mercy in the Prince in deferring it, was ſevere; for there is a ſevere mercy, as well as a merciful ſeverity: for it is written, He ſlew Og the King of Baſan, for his mercy endureth for ever. Yet, ſaid he, mercy in a Prince is not to be reſtrained; and therefore becauſe the example may be dangerous hereafter, that Counſellors may preſume to do without the commandment of the Prince, which is a miſchief more intolerable than an inconveniency; therefore I agree to that puniſhment which is before agreed.

Laſt of all ſpake Wray, Chief Juſtice, who ſhewed the Cauſe, and ſaid farther, That to every Contempt a commandment was not neceſſary, which in my opinion was needful to be proved; for, ſaid he, the Biſhop of Wincheſter came to the Parliament, and afterwards departed without licence, and therefore had a grievous Fine ſet upon him. My ſelf, ſaid he, am a Juſtice of the King's Bench; in the Term we hear of matters of Treaſon, by the reaſon of our office; and out of the Term, by Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer aſſociate with others: if, ſaid he, a Commiſſion ſhould be directed unto me and others of Oyer and Terminer for a matter of Treaſon, and we ſhould arraign the Perſon, and adjudge him to die, yet would I not put him to execution; and yet the Commiſſion is to hear and determine. Surely, I think you meant well, and it was bonum, but not bene. Finally, he agreed the puniſhment ſhould be as it was firſt of all aſſeſſed. But farther, ſaid he, I muſt tell you, that forſomuch as the fault is yours, it declares her Majeſty's ſincerity, and not privity in this action, and that ſhe is offended therewithal. Farther, my Lords, I muſt ſignify unto you from her Majeſty, that foraſmuch as the Lords of the Council were abuſed by Mr. Daviſon's relation, in telling them ſhe was pleaſed, and that which they did was for her ſafety, upon his wrong information, the Lords be ſorrowful becauſe they were abuſed by him; there-and that muſt be either general, that all men may do it, which is not here granted; or particular, who, or by what means: neither is there here any ſuch, eſpecially her Majeſty having no knowledge of the thing done. Further, ſhe was the Queen's priſoner, and therefore no man might pretend to take her away, or deliver her without ſpecial privity from the Queen: and laſtly, he ſhewed, that the good intent was no warrant to tranſgreſs duty; whereof he put a caſe or two, as where Judgement of death is given againſt one, and the Sheriff, for that he is a notorious thief or traytor, will hang him preſently, before the Juſtice depart out of Town.

3. Lord Anderſon.

He noted a difference in law between Miſpriſion and Contempt, that one was larger than the other, and both in point of Juſtice, and might be when the Warrant of a Juſtice, or a Commiſſioner's Letter in ſuch matters is not directly and ſtraitly obſerved; and urged, that a Secretary ſhould be ſecret, and that it was his duty to have an expreſs commandment.

4. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Maſter of the Rolls.

He handled the ſame matters that before is ſpoken by others, but ſomewhat otherwiſe.

5. Sir James A-Croft.

He ſhewed his mind indifferently, with proteſtations of his good-will and good-opinion of the man; that it was a rare example, and committed, as he thought, for want of experience more than for want of duty.

6. Lord Lumley.

He was ſomewhat ſharp. Such Commiſſions of execution are ſent to Sheriffs; you, no Sheriff, ought to be very particular for ſuch great perſonages; you had no more commiſſion than I, &c. and of likelihood you have hereby prevented other good purpoſes, which God might have put into her Majeſty's mind, and herein you have ſeduced ſo many grave Counſellors, &c. If you were my brother, I would think ten times ſo much to be little enough, &c.

7. Lord Gray.

He propoſed very vehemently the great exigence the good Gentleman was in at that time: My good Lords conſider, quoth he, and call to mind in what caſe we were daily, there came advertiſement of forces come and arrived in Ireland, in Wales, advertiſements from abroad, from our Provinces at home, even within fifteen miles of this City, of riſing, firing, breaking up holders, yea of the deſtruction of her Majeſty's Royal Perſon: if otherwiſe than well had come to her Majeſty's Royal Perſon, which of us would not have run to him, and torn him with our hands? My Lords, why ſhould Daviſon be more zealous and forward for his Prince than we? After he reply'd to that of my Lord Chief Baron, that the telling of Sir Francis Walſingham did not exclude the reſt, as he proved, but rather imply'd and preſuppoſed that the reſt ſhould know it: for without this eſpecial information, he being ſick in his houſe, and ſo abſent from the Court, could not in any due time have knowledge of it. After he agreed to the puniſhment, but wiſh'd that her Majeſty ſhould have compaſſion therefore her Majeſty imputeth no fault to any of the Counſellors, but only to him; and the reſt ſhe doth diſburden of all blame.

This ſaid; Mr. Daviſon craved leave to demand one queſtion, and make one petition.

For your queſtion, ſaid Wraye, I think it was never the order in this Court, after the matter is heard judicially, to anſwer any queſtion, (which Sir Walter Mildmay affirmed;) but for your petition you may ſpeak.

Truly, my Lords, ſaid Daviſon, my queſtion ſhall be ſuch as in your own conſcience ſhall ſeem reaſonable.

Whereat they neither gave him leave, nor deny'd him.

Whereupon Daviſon ſaid, If this Warrant being ſigned and ſealed, and left with me, and wanting nothing but execution, it ſhould have fortuned her Majeſty ſhould have miſcarried, whether then——

Nay, ſaid Wraye and Mildmay, now you enter into that which is diſcuſſed already: yea, ſaid Manwood, that queſtion was moved by my Lord Gray.

Well then, ſaid Daviſon, I will not ſeek for preſent enlargement of my liberty, nor releaſe of my impriſonment, altho' my body be not well able to endure it. Only let your Honours clear me, I beſeech you, of all blemiſh of diſhoneſty, and be Mediators for me, that I remain not in her Majeſty's diſfavour and diſgrace: for I proteſt I ſhall be contented with any condition and ſtate of life whatſoever, if I may have her Majeſty's favour.

Whereunto the Lords univerſally anſwered, he ſpake like a good ſubject. And ſo the Court aroſe *.

on him to encourage others that were zealous to deſerve well of her and the State, and ſo he ended. Vulgique ſecutum ultima murmur erat.

8. Earl of Lincoln ſaid little to the purpoſe.

9. Earl of Cumberland was very ſhort.

10. Earl of Worceſter was ſhort, and as before.

11. Archbiſhop of York diſcourſed theologically of the neceſſity and worthineſs of the virtue of Obedience, even ſtrictly to Princes in all things; and that non faciendum malum ut inde eveniat bonum, adding the difference between bonum and bene, (as before my Lord Chief-Juſtice of juſtum and juſte, which I forgot afore to relate) and good intents do not make the fact excuſable, and that he ought to have a direct, expreſs, and iterated command; whereto he cited a Rule out of Civil-Law, (wherein he ſaid he was ſo ſound and converſant) to this purpoſe, If the Prince commanded aliquid magnum delibera, tenta ſi perſiſtat, & habe ſecundum juſſionem: he concluded, he did agree to the puniſhment, but was ſorry that Mr. Daviſon, of whom he had heard ſo well, ſhould fall into this cauſe, he could not help it; a wiſer man might have been led with zeal, and none of us would have it undone.

12. Archbiſhop of Canterbury, having ſaid firſt ſomewhat of her who troubled us all both alive and dead, and theologically of miſericordia puniens, as out of the Pſalm, where God plagueth the enemy of his Church, for his mercy endureth for ever; for this preſent matter, he ſaid, non factum ſed modus was in queſtion, a thing done, as he thought, unfeignedly of zeal, and that which might have been better done in conſideration of her Majeſty's purpoſe to forbear her death, which could not be unknown to Mr. Daviſon; for ſuch things are by no means to be wreſted from Princes, God will extraordinarily move their hearts, and when it ſhall be moſt for his glory. This example, he ſaid, might be dangerous and inconvenient hereafter; and therefore he concluded it rather a miſchief than an inconvenience, and ſo agreed to the puniſhment.

13. Wraye, Lord Chief-Juſtice. He, as Chief, concluded the matter, and pronounced Judgement judicially upon the grounds alledged before of others, which he enforced, &c. And after, as from her Majeſty, ſpake ſomewhat to juſtify her proceedings in all theſe matters, and to declare that ſhe did not for this impute any fault to her Council, for that they were miſled by this man's undue ſuggeſtions.

Mr. Daviſon ſubmitted himſelf to the Judgement of the Queen's mercy, and requeſted that he might propoſe a queſtion, which he took upon his credit to be ſuch as they would not diſlike, and therefore he had leave and a requeſt. His queſtion was, If this being in my hands, her Majeſty had miſcarried, what ſhould have become of me? To this, Sir Walter Mildmay and my Lord Chief-Baron anſwered, that my Lord Gray had moved it already. His requeſt was not for mitigation of his fine, nor for enlargement of priſon, altho' he could never in all his life worſe bear it than now; much leſs for his former eſtate: but only that he might, with her Majeſty's favour, enjoy any condition whatſoever, requeſting them to be interceſſors for this. Nothing to this was ſaid, but they aroſe and departed.

'Theſe I am ſure are the principal matters by any 'of them uttered, ſo far as by myſelf, or by my 'conference I could recall to mind.'

Ex Autographo Gulielmi Nutti, qui oculatus teſtis adfuit.

* Daviſon thus excuſed himſelf in an apologetical diſcourſe of his to Walſingham: The Queen, ſays he, after the departure of the French and Scotiſh Ambaſſadors, of her own motion, commanded me to deliver her the Warrant for executing the ſentence againſt the Queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, ſhe ſigned it readily with her own hand; when ſhe had ſo done, ſhe commanded it to be ſealed with the Great-Seal of England; and in jeſting manner ſaid, Go tell all this to Walſingham, who is now ſick, altho' I fear he will die for ſorrow when he hears it. She added alſo the reaſons of her deferring it ſo long, namely, leſt ſhe might ſeem to have been violently or maliciouſly drawn thereto; whereas in the mean time ſhe was not ignorant how neceſſary it was: moreover, ſhe blamed Pawlet and Drury, that they had not eaſed her of this care, and wiſhed that Walſingham would feel their pulſes touching this matter. The next day after it was under the Great-Seal, ſhe commanded me by Killegrew, that it ſhould not be done: and when I had informed her that it was done already, ſhe found fault with ſuch great haſte; telling me, that in the judgement of ſome wiſe men, another courſe might be taken. I anſwered, that that courſe was always beſt and ſafeſt which was moſt juſt. But fearing leſt ſhe would lay the fault upon me, (as ſhe had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to death, upon the Lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, proteſting that I would not plunge myſelf any deeper in ſo great a buſineſs. He preſently imparted it to the Lord Burleigh, and the Lord Burleigh to the reſt of the Council, who all conſented to have the execution haſten'd, and every one of them vowed to bear an equal ſhare in the blame, and ſent Beale away with the Warrant and Letters. The third day after, when by a dream which ſhe told of the Queen of Scots death, I perceiv'd that ſhe waver'd in her reſolution, I ask'd her, whether ſhe had changed her mind? ſhe anſwered, No: but another courſe, ſaid ſhe, might have been deviſed. And withal ſhe ask'd me, whether I had received any anſwer from Pawlet? whoſe Letter when I had ſhewed her, wherein he flatly refuſed to undertake that which ſtood not with honour and juſtice; ſhe waxing angry, accuſed him and others (who had bound themſelves by the Aſſociation) of perjury perjury and breach of their vow, as thoſe that had promiſed great matters for their Prince's ſafety, but would perform nothing; yet there are, ſaid ſhe, who will do it for my ſake. But I ſhew'd her how diſhonourable and unjuſt a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger ſhe would bring Pawlet and Drury by it: for if ſhe approved the fact, ſhe would draw upon herſelf both danger and diſhonour, not without cenſure of injuſtice; and if ſhe diſallowed it, ſhe would utterly undo men of great deſert, and their whole poſterity. And afterwards ſhe gave me a light check the ſame day that the Queen of Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe was not yet put to death. Camden's Eliz. in Kennet's Hiſt. of England, vol. II. p. 538.

Freebairn in his Life of Mary Queen of Scots, p. 269. ſays, Queen Elizabeth ſent orders to Pawlet, on whoſe obedience ſhe could reckon with certainty, for committing of any act of barbarity to make away with his priſoner, the Queen of Scots; and p. 270, 271, and 272, inſerts a letter from Walſingham and Daviſon (her two Secretaries,) to Sir Amias Pawlet, with his anſwer, which were found among Sir Amias Pawlet's Papers; a copy of which tranſcribed from the originals was ſent to Dr. Mackenzie, by Mr. John Urry of Chriſt's Church-College, Oxford.

The Letter wrote to Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury.

'AFTER our hearty commendations, we find by a ſpeech lately made by her Majeſty, That ſhe doth note in you, both a lack of 'that care and zeal for her ſervice, that ſhe looketh for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time (of your ſelves, without other provocation) found out ſome way to ſhorten the life of the Scots Queen, conſidering the great peril ſhe is hourly ſubject to, ſo long as the ſaid Queen ſhould live; wherein, beſides a kind of lack of love towards her, ſhe wonders greatly that you 'have not that care of your own particular ſafeties, or rather the preſervation of Religion, and the publick good and proſperity 'of your Countries, that reaſon and policy commandeth; eſpecially, having ſo good a warrant and ground for the ſatisfaction of 'your conſciences toward God, and the diſcharge of your credit and reputation towards the world, as the oath of aſſociation, 'which you both have ſo ſolemnly taken and vowed; eſpecially the matter wherewith ſhe ſtandeth charged, being ſo clearly and 'manifeſtly proved againſt her: and therefore ſhe taketh it moſt unkindly, that men profeſſing that Love towards her that you 'do, ſhould in a kind of ſort, for lack of the diſcharge of your duties, caſt the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her indiſpoſition to ſhed blood; eſpecially, of one of that ſex and quality, and ſo near to her in blood as the ſaid Queen is. Theſe reſpects, 'we find, do greatly trouble her Majeſty; who, we aſſure you, hath ſundry times proteſted, that if the regard of the danger of 'her good Subjects, and faithful ſervants, did not more move her than her own peril, ſhe would never be drawn to aſſent to the 'ſhedding of her blood. We thought it meet to acquaint you, with theſe ſpeeches lately paſs'd from her Majeſty, referring the 'ſame to your good judgments: And ſo we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.

London, February the 1ſt. 1586.

Your moſt aſſured Friends,
Fra. Walſingham, Will. Daviſon.

Directed thus,
To the Right Honourable Sir Amias Pawlet Knight, one of her Majeſty's Privy-Council.

This Letter was receiv'd at Fotheringay, the 2d of February, at five in the afternoon; and in another Letter from Mr. Daviſon, of the 1ſt of February, to Sir Amias, he ſays, I pray you, let both this and the incloſ'd be committed to the fire, which meaſure ſhall be likewiſe met to your anſwer, after it hath been communicated to her Majeſty, for her ſatisfaction. And in a Poſtſcript of another Letter from Mr. Daviſon to him, dated the 3d of February, 1586, he ſays, I intreated you in my laſt Letters to burn both the Letters ſent you for the argument's ſake; which by your anſwer to Mr. Secretary (which I have ſeen) appeareth not to be done; I pray you let me intreat to make Hereticks of the one and the other, as I mean to uſe yours after her Majeſty hath ſeen it. And in the end of the Poſtſcript, I pray you let me know what you have done with my Letters, becauſe they are not to be kept, that I may ſatisfy her Majeſty therein; who might otherwiſe take offence thereat, and if you intreat this Poſtſcript in the ſame kind, I ſhall not care a whit. But it ſeems none of them obſerv'd this; for amongſt the ſame papers, is the following Letter to Sir Francis Walſingham.

Sir,

'YOUR Letters of yeſterday coming to my hands this preſent day, at 5 p. m. I would not fail, according to your direction, 'to return my anſwer with all poſſible ſpeed; which I ſhall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterneſs of mind, in 'that I am ſo unhappy, as living to ſee this unhappy day, in which I am requir'd by direction from my moſt gracious Sovereign, 'to do an act, which God and the law forbiddeth. My goods and life are at her Majeſty's diſpoſition, and I am ready to loſe 'the next morrow, if it ſhall pleaſe her; acknowledging, that I do hold them as of her meer and moſt gracious favour, and do 'not deſign to enjoy them, but with her Highneſs's good liking: but God forbid I ſhould make ſo foul a ſhipwreck of my conſcience, or leave ſo great a blot to my poor poſterity, and ſhed blood without law or warrant; truſting, that her Majeſty, of 'her accuſtom'd clemency, and the rather by your good mediation, will take this my anſwer in good part, as proceeding from 'one who never will be inferior to any chriſtian Subject, living in honour, love and obedience towards his Sovereign; and thus I 'commit you to the mercy of the Almighty.

From Fotheringay, the 2d of February, 1586.

Your moſt aſſured poor Friend,
A. Pawlet.

P. S. Your Letters coming in the plural number, ſeem to be meant to Sir Drew Drury, as to my ſelf; and yet becauſe he is not named in them, neither the Letter directed unto him; he forbeareth to make any particular anſwer, but ſubſcribeth in heart to my opinion.

V. The Arraignment of Sir Richard Knightly, and others, in the Star-Chamber, for maintaining ſeditious Perſons, Books and Libels; Feb. 13, 1588. 31 *Eliz.

ON Friday the 13th of February, were brought as priſoners to the Bar before the Lords in the High-Court of Star-Chamber, Sir Richard Knightly, Mr. Hales, Mr. Wickſtone and his wife, whoſe offences hereafter follow. And firſt, Mr. Attorney-General Popham began, That the proſperous and happy ſtate of her Majeſty was not unknown unto them all that were preſent, and ſo dilated thereon, &c. until two enemies had choſen to diſturb this quietneſs, viz. the Papiſts abroad, who by foreign arms, &c. and the ſeditious Sectaries at home, whereof there are leud people; next the Browniſts, and their Fellows: but juſtice had been done on theſe men, and the law executed. But there is another ſort of ſectary, that are of no ſettled ſtate, but ſeek to transform and ſubvert all. Theſe men would have ------ Government in every ſeveral Congregation, ſeverally in each Province, in every Dioceſs, yea, in every Pariſh; whereupon would enſue more miſchief than any man by tongue can utter: they themſelves cannot agree among themſelves, but are full of envy and emulation; for what greater emulation, than to fall to contention, and from from contention, to proceed to violence? But they ſtay not here, nor contented with railing againſt the Church and the State thereof, but proceed to Court and the Common-Weal, that all things might contribute to preſerve unity among the Brethren; no law, no order left, all propriety of things taken away and confounded.

But of what ſort of People theſe Sectaries? of the very vileſt and baſeſt ſort, and theſe muſt make confuſion of all State, and ſo advance themſelves in their Congregations, this their courſe and this their purpoſe; ſo the heel ſhould govern the head, and not the head the heel, if theſe men be allowed. Her Majeſty, in her great wiſdom duly conſidered the great danger of theſe inconveniencies, took order that no pamphlets or treatiſes ſhould be put in print, but ſuch as ſhould be firſt ſeen and allowed; and farther, leſt that were not ſufficient, ſhe ordained that no printing ſhould be uſed any where but in London, Oxford and Cambridge. Notwithſtanding, all this ſerved not, but they would print in corners, and ſpread abroad things imprinted; wherefore her Majeſty ſet forth a Proclamation in Anno 25. that all Browniſts books, and ſuch other ſeditious books ſhould be ſuppreſſed and burnt. Afterwards, when their new ſeditions and infamous libels were ſpread abroad; her Majeſty in February laſt ſet forth another Proclamation, that all her Subjects might take warning: but becauſe no reformation is had, ſhe now holds it neceſſary to proceed in juſtice: And therefore theſe men, now priſoners at the Bar, but anſwer to their offences, and receive according to their demerits: and firſt for their faults. Sir Richard Knightly being a great man in his Country, a Deputy-Lieutenant, who had the government thereof, a ſeditious and leud rebel came unto him to have place and entertainment with him, and there Sir Richard received him to print: Sir Richard doth confeſs that Penry told him he would ſet forth ſuch a like book as he had before-time ſet forth for the Government of Wales. That book contains ſedition and ſlander moſt opprobrious; and yet Sir Richard was contented ſuch a like book ſhould be printed.

But farther, Sir Richard ſent his man a ring for a token to receive the preſs into his houſe, who did ſo, and there they printed the Epitome, Walgrave himſelf being the printer; this is a moſt ſeditious and libellous pamphlet, fit for a vice in a play, and no other: but then the Parſon of the Pariſh having found out the printing, told Sir Richard that it was very dangerous; whereupon Sir Richard cauſed him to take it down, but neither diſliked nor diſcovered it, but kept it ſecret, and read the books himſelf. Again, when it was told him that his houſe would be ſearched for the preſs, he ſaid he would courſe them that would come to ſearch his houſe; beſide, at his recommendation Walgrave was commended unto Mr. Hales, and there had entertainment, and there The Supplication to the Parliament was printed by Walgrave, and publiſhed by Newman, Sir Richard's man: and another book, viz. Have you any Work for the Cooper? was there printed likewiſe. Therein the Sectaries themſelves confeſs, that inconvenience would enſue of this Government which they ſo ſought to eſtabliſh; but yet it muſt be brought in, becauſe they were ſo determined. And from Mr. Hales's houſe in Coventry, theſe books and this preſs muſt be conveyed to Mr. Wickſtone's, where Martyn ſenior, and Martyn junior were both printed; wherein theſe libellers ſay, that all laws that any way impugn this doctrine of theirs are not to be obey'd in any cauſe: then if this be ſuffer'd, confuſion and diſorder muſt needs enſue. But farther, in theſe books they affirm that the time doth offer them a great opportunity, as though all things would be ſuffered in this ſo troubleſome a time, rather than they ſhould any way be diſquieted. And for Mr. Wickſton, albeit he knew the preſs was in his houſe, yet he kept it ſecret, and would never diſcover it, but came many times, and did viſit there at the preſs; and his wife, by whoſe procurement and perſuaſions with her husband, they were firſt received into his houſe, did often relieve them with meat and drink, and gave them money in their purſes. This is the ſubſtance and ſum of their offence, which if they will deny, unconteſtable and manifeſt proofs ſhall be produced againſt them. And ſo he concluded.

Hereupon Sir Richard Knightly began to anſwer, and moſt humbly beſought their Lordſhips to conſider of his ſimple wit, and weak capacity, not able to ſpeak in ſuch a place, and before ſo honourable an aſſembly: and ſaid, that theſe miſhaps which were now ſo aggravated againſt them, were a puniſhment impoſed by God, to put him in mind of other his grievous crimes committed againſt the Majeſty of the moſt Higheſt. He affirmed conſtantly that he was no Sectary, but of that religion, that ſelf-ſame religion, which he hoped all they which were then preſent were of, and ſo he truſted were all other her Majeſty's loving Subjects. And if he ſhould ſpeak any thing amiſs, he deſired them not to impute it to his ill diſpoſition, but to his wants, which were many, and the more, by reaſon of his late impriſonment: and ſaid, he was right glad that their Honours were ordained by God, and appointed by her Majeſty to be his Judges, at whoſe hands he was ſure to receive nothing but juſtice: wherefore he beſought them to be an interceſſor and mediator to her Majeſty in his behalf, againſt whom, for any offence committed, or againſt the State, to his knowledge he was as clear as any preſent, and as good a Subject as ever came to that Bar. He utterly diſclaimed the books, and denied to have any familiarity to his knowledge with thoſe that were the writers of them; and ſhew'd that the preſs was brought into his houſe upon this reaſon: There was a book, that before-time was printed in Oxford, which to his knowledge was never call'd in; this book was written by one Mr. Penry, who requeſted Sir Richard that this book might be printed again in his houſe, and in reſpect of the want of learning, which he knew to be in the Miniſtry, he did the rather incline an ear unto. For although he muſt needs confeſs there were in the Miniſtry ſome good, yet to his thinking, for one good, there were forty bad, yea, ſo bad, as he thought them not worthy to ſweep the Church; and therefore his zeal for the furtherance of God's glory cauſed him to allow of this book. This, as he ſaid, was about St. James-tide was twelvemonth, and he had heard nothing thereof again until All-Hallow-Tide following; and ſaid, that the preſs was never in his own houſe, but in a houſe at the farther end of the town. And he ſaid, that at Chriſtmas following Walgrave came to him and deſired the preſs, and ſaid that Mr. Cartwright had wrote a book againſt the Jeſuits, which he hoped to print. This is the truth, ſaith he.

He wrote to Mr. Hales to defend a houſe for a poor man: all this was done before the Proclamation, ſince which time he never meddled therein, as he ſaid; for my Lord Chancellor moſt honourably gave him warning to look unto that, which he hath accompliſhed like a good Subject to her Majeſty, to whom he confeſſeth himſelf moſt bounden, as he thinketh all the world is beſide; and now hath learned of David, not ſo much as to touch the hem of the Lord's Anointed. He hopeth her Majeſty will likewiſe forgive him, as ſhe hath forgiven greater offences: And beſought them all to be good unto him, and he for his part would ſay with Moſes and Paul, that he would rather deſire to be wiped out of the book of life, than not perform his duty to her Majeſty. And ſo he concluded.

Mr. Hales began, That albeit it were a great grief unto him to be convented before their Lordſhips, yet in this he joyed that they were his Judges, that were the Governors and Judges of the Land, which could and would do him nothing elſe but juſtice; he confeſſed the bleſſing of God to be exceeding great unto the Commonwealth for placing her Majeſty over the ſame, by whoſe means we enjoy that peace which other nations want, and we happy that live under her: he diſclaimed the books; but he had great reaſon as he thought to gratify Sir Richard Knightly in any thing, to whom he owed much reverence, as him that had married his Aunt. Sir Richard deſired him to lend his houſe for a poor man, to the which he condeſcended; but he knew not the man, nor his intent: he met with Penry in Coventry, at a Sermon, who deſired him to direct him to his houſe, there he had The Supplication to the Parliament that was printed at Oxford; he told him he would print Mr. Cartwright's book againſt the Romiſh Teſtament: he was privy that there was a preſs there, but nothing elſe.

It was an eaſy matter for a wiſer man than himſelf to be thus overtaken, Penry himſelf was not indicted nor impeached. And he hoped, if a man ignorantly did receive a Traitor or Jeſuit, that it was not treaſon, unleſs himſelf knew of it.

Attorney. You acknowledge you had a book of him?

Hales. I do.

Attorney. And you came to the maker of it?

Hales. It was before the Proclamation.

Attorney. It was after.

Hales. It was after the firſt, and before the ſecond Proclamation. Hereupon was read the firſt Proclamation, made in 27 Eliz. againſt ſchiſmatical and ſeditious libels, Dr. Brown and ſuch others.

Hales. But Mr. Penry's was no Libel, for he ſubſcribed his name.

Attorney. There is no doubt but it is a Libel, tho' it be ſubſcribed: whereunto Hales ſaid nothing. And then was read the other Proclamation in 31 Eliz. And the Order in the Star-Chamber, made in 28 Eliz. whereby printing was allow'd only in London, Oxford and Cambridge.

Wickſtone ſaid, he was an ignorant man, and craved he might anſwer by Counſel, which might direct him: whereunto the Lord Chancellor anſwered, that this was matter of fact which lay moſt properly within his own knowledge, and that he muſt provide to anſwer for himſelf, and that he needed no Counſel.

Whereupon Wickſtone confeſſed, that his wife deſired him to permit them a home in his houſe, which he conſented unto, knowing the purpoſe of them, and that was all.

Mrs. Wickſtone confeſſed that the zeal of reformation in the Church, cauſed her to give them entertainment in her houſe, and ſhe was the cauſe that they came thither, not thinking that it had been any way hurtful or dangerous to the State; and ſhe humbly beſought, that what fault ſoever ſhe had committed, her husband might not be puniſhed therefore, ſince he was not privy, but only by her means and requeſt.

Hereupon Mr. Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant, began to lay open the enormities of thoſe books, which they had in Court, and divers clauſes of them were read. Firſt, he affirmed they tended to the ruin of the whole State, next to the aboliſhing of all eccleſiaſtical Government, to the removing of all manner of ſervice, the overthrow of laws; and yet, ſay they, all laws which reſiſt theſe men, are no more to be allowed than thoſe which maintain ſtews. But Penry will never give that over, he ſays, though the Spaniards were overthrown and diſcomfited by famine and by hunger, yet the Lord will raiſe them up again, and make a weak and feeble generation to overthrow us. So here was read a great part of The Epitome.

Puckering. This is moſt ſcornful and ſeditious: But what is their concluſion? They conclude our Parliament and Councils be aſſembled where no truth beareth ſway; which is moſt falſe and ſcandalous: but if this their Government be not received, thoſe of the Parliament-houſe nor their ſeed ſhall never proſper, nor they ever bear any more rule in England. And I Penry will never leave: till either this be performed, or that the Lord in vengeance and blood do plague and puniſh us.

For the other book [Have you any work for the Cooper?] therein is affirmed that our Church Government is utterly unlawful: And albeit this form of theirs would be inconvenient in many points, yet every chriſtian is bound to receive paſtors, doctors, elders and deacons.

For Martin junior, he affirms that it is unlawful to have any other Government, that all human laws maintaining any other form are ungodly and not to be obeyed; that the warrant that Biſhops have to maintain their authority, is no better than that which did maintain the ſtews. That Antichriſt is the head of their doctrine, and they part of his body.

For Martin ſenior, he loudly termeth the book of common ſervice, the - - - - - book at Lambeth, that 100,000 hands would ſign to their poſitions and government which they ſeek. And farther, that they are the ſtrength of the land, that it were no policy to reject their ſuit at ſuch a time when the land was invaded.

After which, they read Sir Richard's examination, wherein he confeſſed that Penry came unto him as before; but when Sharp the miniſter told him the books were leud and dangerous, he cauſed them to be pulled down, and that he knew of no book but the Epitome.

He ſent a ring to his man Jackſon by Penry to receive a load of ſtuff into his houſe, which was the preſs and other neceſſaries for printing.

Newman the Cobler wore his livery, and Waſtall his man help'd Walgrave away from his houſe, to Mr. Hales at Coventry: Fox his ſchoolmaſter, and Waſtal his man, would commonly read the books in Sir Richard's houſe, and ſcoff and ſcorn at John of Canterbury.

Sharp ſaith, that Sir Richard conferr'd with Walgrave, as Newman told him The Epitome was printed there: that when it was told Sir Richard his houſe would would be ſearched, he anſwered, the knaves durſt not ſearch his houſe; and if they did, he would have courſed them.

The printer's man ſaith, that the Mind-Alls were printed there; but Sir Richard anſwered, he never knew ſo much before. Have you any work for the Cooper? went in hand there, but they went away then to Coventry.

The printer's man would have ſubmitted himſelf long before, but Sir Richard adviſed him not to do ſo in any caſe, for the Lords were ſo incenſed, as he ſhould be hanged if he were catched.

For Hales, Have you any work for the Coóper? was printed at his houſe, he came once to the preſs as they were printing it.

Mrs. Wickſtone confeſſeth, Martin junior and Martin ſenior were printed in her houſe, ſhe gave them entertainment, and placed them in a parlour, her husband knew it not till it was done: ſhe told him it was works of embroidering, and willed him to will his ſervants not to peep or pry into the parlour ſince it pertained not to them: Hodgskins and two more printed them all. Hodgskins was deſired to print more, but he refuſed. Hodgskins confeſſeth, that he printed them two; and from Mr. Wickſtone's they were conveyed to Warrington in Lancaſhire: She gave them 2 s. 6 d. at their departure, and her husband 2 s.

Upon this Mr. Sollicitor Egerton began to declare the danger of theſe books, that they tended to confuſion of all ſtates, to take away her Majeſty's Prerogative Royal, to the diminution of her yearly revenue, where ſhe at this time was forced to ſell her revenues for maintenance of her Realm and People, to the diſheriſon of a great number of their patronages and advowſons and appropriations, to the abrogating of the common law and the civil law in many points: Whereupon he deſired their Lordſhips to proceed to ſentence.

All the Lords agreed that the books were moſt leud, dangerous and ſeditious, and pernicious to the State, moſt ſcandalous in reſpect to our adverſaries the Papiſts, who took occaſion of our diſagreement; that they were ſlanderous to her Majeſty, in accuſing her for not maintaining religion. Whereas, ſhe for defence of religion only hath ſcared all the enemies of the State: that the ſword of war had been drawn out againſt her for that cauſe; nay, the ſword of death had compaſſed her chair in her own chamber: [Mr. Parrie and Mr. Barnwell.] Notwithſtanding ſhe, nothing diſmayed, being of princely magnanimity and fortitude, hath not feared any of theſe dangers only for religion ſake. That they took away her Majeſty's regal Power, diſinherited Noblemen and Gentlemen, took away all property, aboliſh'd the reverend eſtate and calling of Biſhops, which are one of the three ancient eſtates of this land; and ſo they meant to pick out one ſtone after another, till they pull'd the whole houſe on their heads. That the faults of them there preſent were groſs and grievous; Sir Richard, a man highly favour'd of the Queen, and much bounden more than ordinarily any of his ſtate.

Yet notwithſtanding, ſaid Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, you be beloved of all of us, yet juſtice muſt be done without affection or compaſſion; for Puniantur hi ne tu puniaris; let the magiſtrate puniſh offenders, leſt himſelf be puniſhed. And again, St. Auguſtin ſaith, pereat unus ne pereat unitas; let the offender rather be puniſhed, than the unity of the Church be confounded.

That their ignorance was no excuſe, that ignorance which was wilful and malicious only to eſcape the puniſhment of law, which is as high an offence as any privity.

That it was a ſillier anſwer of Mr. Wickſtone, to ſay his wife deſired him, a great folly to be ruled by her, and ſhe paſs'd the modeſty of her ſex to rule him. And Sir John Perrot ſaid expreſsly, he thought him worthy of the greater puniſhment for giving ſuch a fooliſh anſwer, as that he did it at his wife's deſire.

The Lord Chancellor gave the aſſembly that ſtood by to note, that theſe priſoners were not the deviſers and makers of theſe books; for if they had, another place had been fit for them, and not this: that the County of Northampton did ſwarm with theſe Sectaries, and in one place there was a Presbytery planted among them, till at length one of the brethren had offended, wherefore the other would have puniſhed him: but he, when he ſhould be puniſhed, fled, and complained to a Juſtice of Peace, and ſo their power ſurceaſed, and all revealed; whereby he noted the vanity of their Government: yea, ſaid he, it is proceeded ſo far in that Country, that the people were full of contention, and in ſome places had riſen in arms about that quarrel; whereby he concluded it was neceſſary to prevent ſuch miſchief, and to make example of it, and deſired the Judges to notify his action herein in their circuits abroad, to the end the whole Realm might have knowledge of it, and the people no more ſeduced with theſe leud libellers. For puniſhment, they all agreed that Sir Richard ſhould be fined two thouſand pounds; Mr. Hales a thouſand marks; Mr. Wickſtone for obeying his wife, and not diſcovering it, five hundred marks; Mrs. Wickſtone a thouſand pounds*: and all of them impriſonment at her Majeſty's pleaſure.

* Camden ſays, That at this time ſeveral ſcurrilous pamphlets were publiſhed againſt the Church of England by the Diſſenters; their great patrons and abettors were Sir Richard Knightly and Wickſtone, perſons in other reſpects ſober and pious, but drawn into the party by ſome inſtruments that were to make a private market of them. However, the Knights (Knight) had a pretty round fine laid on them (him) in the Star-Chamber; but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſo generouſly good-natur'd, as to procure a remiſſion of it at her Majeſty's hands. See Camden's Eliz. in the complete Hiſtory of England, vol. II. pag. 550.

VI. Pro-

VI. Proceedings in Parliament againſt John Earl of Gowrie, Alexander Ruthven his Brother, Henry Ruthven, Hugh Moncreif and Peter Eviot, for High Treaſon, Nov. 15. 1600. at Edinburgh *.

WIlliam, Earl of Gowrie, having been condemn'd at Stirling, and executed in the year 1584, with two others, for ſeditious practices, in ſeizing the King's Perſon at Ruthven-Houſe, when in his minority, and baniſhing from him all others who were not of their party, making him condeſcend to what they propos'd, and levying forces to ſecure themſelves and the King's Perſon in their cuſtody; occaſion'd the hot Clergy of their party, both to preach and publiſh ſcandalous pamphlets againſt the King and Government: this did beget a ſtrict friendſhip between young Gowrie and the factious Clergy. Albeit, the King did, with great benignity, reſtore the Earl of Gowrie to his Father's honours and eſtate; yet, his two ſons, the Earl, and Mr. Alexander, were nurſed up in ſuch malice againſt the King, by ſome of his relations, (but eſpecially by the Clergy,) that neither the King's reſtoring him to his Eſtate and Honour, conferring alſo other marks of favour and truſt on him, (and placing his Siſter as the firſt Lady of Honour to the Queen, and making his Brother Alexander one of his Bedchamber) could allay his revenge; till at laſt, he reſolved to bring his long-deſign'd purpoſe to effect. For, in Auguſt 1600, he devis'd and contrived the bringing the King from Falkland, to his houſe in Perth; and there, with his fellow-conſpirators, to have murdered the King.

On account of this Treaſon †, and ſeveral diſorders, a Parliament was indited to meet at Edinburgh on the firſt of November that year 1600, albeit the printed Acts bear its meeting to be on the 15th.

Accordingly a Parliament was indited, to be holden at Edinburgh on the firſt of November 1600, and (as is ordinary) it was adjourned to the 4th of November. On which day, Sir Thomas Hamilton, King's Advocate, produced a ſummons of Treaſon duly executed againſt William Ruthven, Brother and apparent Heir to John Earl of Gowrie; and Mr. Alexander Ruthven: calling alſo, in the ſummons, the tutors and curators of the ſaid William, (if he had any) and all others, having pretence or intereſt in the matter, to hear it found; and declared, that the ſaid Earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander his Brother, had committed Treaſon, in attempting to bereave his Majeſty of his Life, at St. Johnſtoun, on the 5th day of Auguſt laſt bypaſt: The ſummons and executions being read, and the Heraulds and Meſſengers ſworn to the veracity of the executions; both at their private houſes, mercat-croſſes, and Shoar and Peer of Leith, &c. (Which, are the moſt publick intimations and citations that can be given by the law of Scotland.) Which citations, were given on the 28th day of Auguſt and 29th ditto, in their reſpectives places and mercat-croſſes, and the Parliament was declar'd current daily.

On the 9th day, the ſaid ſummons and executions were read over again, another ſummons of treaſon was produc'd, with their executions and verifications, made on oath in the face of the court, againſt Alexander and Henry Ruthven, ſons to Alexander Ruthven of Frieland; and againſt Hugh Moncreif, brother to William Moncreif of that Ilk; Patrick Eviot, brother to Colin Eviot of Balhouſie; to hear and ſee themſelves decern'd, as guilty of High-Treaſon, and Leſe-Majeſty, againſt the King at Perth, the 5th day of Auguſt laſt paſt.

And likewiſe, by warrant from the Parliament, one Andrew Henderſon, who was priſoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, on accuſation for the ſaid crime, was brought by the Baillie of Edinburgh, and ſiſted before the Parliament; he having received formal ſummons in the Tolbooth, on the 28th of Auguſt laſt paſt.

The ſummons being thrice called, the executions all verified, and none of the perſons cited compearing, excepting Andrew Henderſon the priſoner; the King's advocate did take inſtruments: and likewiſe the King's advocate did then, and there, produce before the Lords, our ſovereign Lord's letters of relaxation, given under his Highneſs's ſignet at Edinburgh, relaxing all the perſons ſo ſummoned from the horn, and from all the ſummons executed againſt them, at the inſtance of whatſoever perſons; that ſo, they might have ſafety and freedom to compear: and which relaxations were promulgated, at the mercat-croſſes of the ſhires where each perſon had his abode; and alſo, at the mercat-croſs of Edinburgh, and ſhoar and peer of Leith. And theſe executions and relaxations were regiſtrated in the records of the ſhires where the accuſed did reſide: on which production, the King's advocate did take inſtruments.

The Lords Commiſſioners in Parliament did remit the ſaid Andrew Henderſon to the Tolbooth, for ſafe cuſtody, and the Parliament adjourn'd until the 15th day of November: on which day, the Parliament having met, the ſaid Sir Thomas Hamilton

* Extracted from the authentick Records, and the principal Vouchers, (which lie in publick cuſtody in the Parliament-Houſe at Edinburgh,) by George, Earl of Cromerty, Keeper of the Records, Temp. Car. 2.

† See Spotſwood's Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, pag. 457, 458, 459, 460.

Advocate, produc'd the ſaid ſummons of Treaſon and Executions; and the heraulds and meſſengers having, of new, verified the executions upon oath formally, &c. neither William, nor none for him, nor the others cited, compearing; the King's Advocate did take inſtruments thereon: only Mr. Thomas Henriſon, one of the Commiſſaries of Edinburgh, compeared for the foreſaid Andrew Henderſon, and produc'd the writ following, underſubſcribed by the King's Advocate. "It is our "will, and we command you, that upon ſight "hereof, ye delete Andrew Henderſon, Chamber-"lain to umquhile John Earl of Gowrie, his name "furth of the ſummons of Treaſon and Forfaulture, "raiſed and executed againſt him, for being art, "part, redd, counſel, and counſelling, of the "late Treaſon conſpired by the ſaid umquhile Earl, "his umquhile brother, and complices, againſt "our Perſon; and as you will anſwer to us here-"upon; keeping thir preſents for your warrant. "Subſcribed with our hand at Holy-rood-houſe, the "ninth of November, 1600. Sic ſubſcribitur, JA-"COBUS REX." Conform whereunto, the Advocate did delete his name.

The heraulds and meſſengers did, at that ſame time, again verify upon oath the executions given in; and the relaxations and executions againſt William, and Alexander, and Henry Ruthven, Patrick Eviot, and Hugh Moncreif; and the Parliament found the Dittay relevant: and then adjourned till the 15th day of November, and remitted the examination of the witneſſes to the Lords of articles, which are a Committee of Parliament, according to the conſtant practice and cuſtom in Parliament.

Nota, The Lords of the articles in that Parliament, were two Biſhops and four Abbots, all men of great worth and integrity; four Earls, viz. Lenox, Errol, Mariſchal and Marr; four Lords, viz. Seton, Levingſtoun, Newbottle and Fivie; ſeven Barons, and nine Commiſſioners of Burrows.

On the 15th of November, the Parliament did again meet, and the Advocate did again call the ſummons of Treaſon againſt all the foremen-tioned Perſons, (except Henderſon) for enterpriſing the ſlaughter of the King, on the 5th of Auguſt laſt paſt. Being all three called, and none compearing, the hail eſtates did find both the ſummons *, reaſons and cauſes therein mentioned, relevant; and therefore admitted the ſame to the Advocate's probation. Whereupon the Advocate did produce the Letters of horning duly executed and indorſed, againſt Alexander and Henry Ruthven, Hugh Moncreif, and Patrick Eviot; bearing, that they were denounced Rebels, and put to the horn, for crimes of Treaſon therein mentioned.

And the oaths and depoſitions of the witneſſes, led and adduc'd by the Advocate, for proving of the Treaſon againſt the defenders, (taken before the Lords of Articles,) viz. the depoſition of umquhile Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun, and George Craigingelt, when they were executed to death, for the foreſaid crime of Treaſon: and likewiſe, the Advocate repeated the notoriety, with the circumſtances of the matter of fact, to prove the points of the Libel; and produc'd the depoſitions of all the witneſſes, which were all read, as follows.

The Depoſitions of the Witneſſes, examined in preſence of the Lords of Articles, for proving of the ſaids two Summonſes of Treaſon.

[Nota, That the Words are printed, as they were then written and ſpoke, for exactneſs ſake.]

THE Duke of Lenox, ſworn and examined, depones, That upon the fifth day of Auguſt laſt by-paſt, this deponent, for the time being in Falkland in company with his Majeſty, he ſaw Mr. Alexander Ruthven ſpeaking with his Grace before the ſtables, betwixt ſix and ſeven in the morning; and ſhortly thereafter, his Majeſty paſſing to the hunting of the Buck, and having ſlain one in the park of Falkland, his Highneſs ſpake to the deponent diſyring him to accompany his Majeſty to Perth, to ſpeak to the Earl of Gowrie. And incontinent thereafter, this deponent ſent his ſervant for another horſe, and for a ſword, and lap on and followed his Grace: and as this Deponent overtook his Grace, Mr. Alexander Ruthven was ſpeaking with his Majeſty; and ſhortly after the Deponent's coming to the King, his Highneſs rode a-part, and ſpake with this Deponent, ſaying, Ye cannot gueſs, man, what errand I am riding for; I am going to get a poſe in Perth: and Mr. Alexander Ruthven has informed me, that he has fund a man, that has a pitchard full of coined Gold, of great ſorts. And in the mean time, his Highneſs enquired of this Deponent, of what humour he thought Mr. Alexander to be of? who anſwered, that he knew nothing of him, but as of an honeſt diſcreet gentleman. And after that his Highneſs had declared to this Deponent, the hail circumſtances of the man who had the ſaid Gold, the place where it was found, and where it was kept; this Deponent anſwered, I like not that, Sir; for that is not likely. And they riding beſide the bridge of Erne, his Majeſty called to the Deponer, that Mr. Alexander diſyred him to keep that matter of the poſe ſecret, and take no body with him; and then his Highneſs both at that time, and thereafter at St. Johnſtoun, within the Earl of Gowrie's hall, ſaid to this Deponer, Take taint where I paſs with Mr. Alexander Ruthven, and follow me. And as his Majeſty was within a mile to Perth, after that Mr. Alexander had come a certain ſpace with his Highneſs, he rode away and galloped to Perth, before the reſt of the company, towards his brother's lodging, of purpoſe, (as the Deponent believes,) to advertiſe the Earl of Gowrie of his Majeſty's coming there. And as his Majeſty was within two pair of butt-langs to the town of Perth, the Earl of Gowrie, accompanied with diverſe perſons, all on foot, met his Highneſs in the Inche, and ſaluted him; and immediately thereafter, his Majeſty accom-accompanied with this deponent, the Earl of Mar, Inchechaffrey, Sir Thomas Erskin, Laird of Urquhil, James Erskin, William Stuart, Sir Hugh Herries, Sir John Ramſay, John Murray, John Hamilton of the Grange, and John Graham of Bagowie, paſt all together, in the Earl of Gowrie's Hall; the ſaid Earl of Gowrie, and the ſaid Mr. Alexander Ruthven, being baith preſent with them. And after their entry, his Majeſty cry'd for a drink, which was a long time a coming: and it was an hour after his firſt coming, before his Majeſty got his dinner. And in the time that his Majeſty got his deſert, the Earl of Gowrie came to this deponent, and to the Earl of Mar, and remanent perſons foreſaid, and deſired them to dine, which they did, in the Hall; and when they had near hand din'd, the Earl of Gowrie came from his Majeſty's chamber to the Hall, and called for wine; and ſaid, that he was directed from his Majeſty's chamber, to drink his Scoll, [the Word us'd then for drinking a health,] to my Lord Duke, and the reſt of the company; which he did. And immediately after the Scoll had paſs'd about, this deponent did raiſe from the table, to have waited upon his Majeſty, conform to his former direction; and then the Earl of Gowrie ſaid to the deponent, that his Majeſty was gone up quietly, ſome quiet errand. And then, the ſaid Earl of Gowrie cry'd for the key of his garden, and paſs'd in company with this deponent, to the garden, accompanied with Lindores and Sir Hugh Herries, and certain others: and ſhortly after their being in the garden, Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun came down to the garden, crying, the King's Majeſty is on horſeback, and riding through the Inche: and then the Earl of Gowrie cry'd, Horſe, Horſe. And the ſaid Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun anſwered to him, your horſe is in town; to whilk the Earl of Gowrie made him no anſwer, but cry'd, ay, Horſe, Horſe. And this deponent and the Earl of Gowrie came firſt out of the garden, through the hall to the cloſs, and came to the oute gate; and this deponent ſpeird at the porter, if the King was furth; who anſwer'd, that he was aſſured that his Majeſty was not come furth of the place. Then the Earl of Gowrie ſaid, I am ſure he is firſt always; ſtay, my Lord, drink, and I ſhall gang up, and get the verity and certainty thereof. And the ſaid Earl of Gowrie paſſed up, and incontinent came again to the cloſs, and he affirmed to this deponent, that the King's Majeſty was furth at the back-gate, and away. Whereupon, this deponent, the Earl of Gowrie, and Mar, and hail company, paſt furth at the fore-gate of the lodging; and ſtaid before the ſame gate, upon the ſtreet: and as they were ſtanding there, adviſing where to ſeek the King, incontinent, and in the mean time, this deponent heard a voice, and ſaid to the Earl of Mar, this is the King's voice, that cryes, be where he will: and ſo they all look'd up to the Lodging, and ſaw his Majeſty looking furth of the window, wanting his hat; his Face being red, and an hand gripping his cheek and mouth; and the King cry'd, I am murder'd! Treaſon! My Lord Mar, help, help! And incontinent, this deponent, the Earl of Mar, and their company, ran up the ſtair of the gallery-chamber, where his Majeſty was, to have relieved him: and as they paſſed up, they found the door of the chamber faſt; and ſeeing a ladder ſtanding beſide, they raſht at the door with the ladder, and the ſteps of the ladder brake: and ſyne, they ſend for hammers; and notwithſtanding large forcing with hammers, they got not entry at the ſaid chamber, while after the Earl of Gowrie and his Brother were both ſlain. That Robert Brown paſt about be the back-door, and came to his Majeſty, and aſſured his Highneſs, that it was my Lord Duke and the Earl of Mar, that was ſtricking up the chamber-door; and the hammer was given through the hole of the door of the chamber; and they within brake the door and gave them entry: and, at their firſt entry, they ſaw the Earl of Gowrie lying dead in the chamber, Mr. Alexander Ruthven being ſlain, and taken down the ſtairs before their entry. And at their firſt entry within that chamber where the King's Majeſty was, the deponent ſaw ſundry halberts and ſwords ſtricking under the door of the chamber, and ſides thereof, by reaſon the ſame was nae cloſs door; and knew none of the ſtrickers, except Alexander Ruthven one of the defenders, who deſired to ſpeak with this deponent thro' the door, and ſpeird at him, For God's ſake tell me how my Lord of Gowrie was. To whom this deponent anſwered, he is well: and the ſaid deponent bad Alexander to gang his way; and that he was ane fool; and that he would get little thanks for that labour. And, in the mean time, as they were continuing to ſtrick with halberts under the door, meikle John Murray, ſervant to Tullibardin, was ſtricken through the legg; and how ſoon the ſaid Alexander Ruthven had heard the ſaid Lord Duke ſpeak, he and his hail complices paſt from the foreſaid door, and made no more trouble thereafter thereat, and paſſed down to the cloſs, and ſtood there. And ſaw none of the remanent defenders preſent, at the doing of the violent turns that day, except by report, but the ſaid Alexander Ruthven: but ſays, that he ſaw Hugh Moncreif, Earn and Alexander Daithvenies, and Patrick Eviot, with the Earl of Gowrie, at the King's dinner that day; and that before and thereafter, looking over the chamber-window, he ſaw George Craigingelt and Alexander Ruthven; and did ſee others of the Earl of Gowrie's Servants, whom this deponent knew not, ſtanding in arms within the cloſs: and alſo, ſaw other Perſons carrying ane Joiſt from the town, to the cloſs of the Earl of Gowrie's lodging: and declares, that there abode ſundry perſons within the ſaid cloſs, and in the high-ſtreet, before the ſaid Earl's lodging, crying and making tumult, to the ſpace of two hours mair, next after the death of the ſaid Earl of Gowrie, and his brother.

THE Earl of Mar, ſworn and examined, depones, conform to the Lord Duke of Lenox's depoſition, in all thing ſubſtantial, except, that his Lordſhip ſaw not Mr. Alexander Ruthven in Falkland, while about ten hours the day libelled, ſhortly before the ſlaying of the Buck; and alſo, overtook not his Majeſty that day, while his Majeſty was near the bridge of Erne: and, that after their dinner, my Lord of Mar paſſed not to the yeard, in company with the Earl of Gowrie, but paſſed to a chamber where the King dined, and ſaw nothing of the Joiſt.

ANdrew Henderſon, Chamberlain of Scoon, ſworn, depones, That he is of the age of thirty-eight years; declares, that upon Monday at night, the fourth day of Auguſt laſt by-paſt, this Deponent being, after ſupper, in company with the Earl of Gowrie and Mr. Alexander Ruthven, within my Lord's own chamber; the Earl of Gowrie inquired at this Deponent, what he had to do to-morrow? To whom this Deponent anſwered, That he had to do, to ride to Ruthven, to ſpeak with the Tenents. Then the Earl of Gowrie anſwered, Stay that journey, you muſt ride to Falkland, in company with my brother, Mr. Alexander; and take Andrew Ruthven with you; and that ye be ready to ride be four hours in the morning: and haſte thou back with anſwer, as my brother orders you, by writ or otherways; and let Andrew Ruthven remain with my brother. And in the morning, after four hours, they rode all three together to Falkland; and coming to Falkland, they lighted at John Balfour's houſe, and ſeeing that Colonel Edmund was there, they lodged in ane Law's houſe; and the Maſter ſent this Deponent about ſeven hours in the morning, to ſee what the King's Majeſty was doing. And as he was within the place, he ſaw the King's Majeſty coming furth Mid-Cloſs, booted; and then he returned back again to the Maſter, and ſaid to him, Haſte you, the King's Majeſty is coming forth: and incontinent, the Maſter followed his Majeſty, and ſpake with his Majeſty foranent the Equirie; and the King laid his hand on his ſhoulder, and clapped him, where they ſpake together, be the ſpace of ane quarter of an hour. And thereafter, the Maſter directed this Deponent to ride to Perth in haſte, as he loved the Lord Gowrie's and his honour, and advertiſe his brother, that his Majeſty will be there, with a few number incontinent; and cauſe make his dinner ready. Then this Deponent anſwered, Shall I ride preſently? The Maſter anſwered, No, but ſtay a while, and follow the King and me, while I ſpeak with his Majeſty again. And, as his Majeſty was riding through the Sloap of the Park-Dike, the Maſter ſpake to his Majeſty; and immediately thereafter, the Maſter bad this Deponent to paſs to St. Johnſtoun, with all poſſible diligence, according to his former directions. And, at this Deponent's coming to Perth, it was ſhortly after ten hours in the morning, he entered in the Lord of Gowrie's chamber, where he ſaw his Lord ſpeak with George Hay and Mr. Peter Hay: and how ſoon my Lord of Gowrie ſaw this Deponent, he came aſide to this Deponent, and enquired ſecretly, What word he had brought from his brother; and if he had brought a letter? This Deponent anſwered, That he had brought no letter: What anſwer then, ſaid he, has he to me? This Deponent anſwered, That the Maſter his brother bad tell his Lordſhip, that the King's Majeſty would be there incontinent; and bad haſte his dinner. Then the Earl bad this Deponent to follow his Lordſhip to the Cabinet, and ſpeird at him, how his Majeſty had tane with his brother? he anſwered, That he was well tane with; and when he did his courteſy, the King laid his hand upon his ſhoulder. The Earl ſpeird, what number of perſons was with the King at the hunting? who anſwered, That he knew not well; but that there were ſundry of his own with him, and ſome Engliſh-men. And then the Earl ſpeird, what Noblemen were with him? he anſwered, None but my Lord Duke. And thereafter, this Deponent paſs'd to his own houſe in the town, and took off his boots, and returned to the Earl within an hour: and how ſoon the Earl ſaw him in his chamber, he call'd upon this Deponent, and bad him put on his Secret, [a Coat of Mail] and Plate-Sleeves. The Deponent inquired to what effect? the Earl anſwered, I have an Highland-man to take in the Shoegate; and then the Deponent paſs'd to his own houſe, and put on his Secret and Plate-Sleeves, came back again to the Earl of Gowrie's houſe: and about half an hour to one, the Earl commanded this Deponent, take up my dinner; and this Deponent paſs'd, and took up the firſt ſervice, by reaſon Charles Craigingelt was ſick. And incontinent the ſaid Earl paſs'd to his dinner, accompanied with Mr. John Moncreif, Laird of Petcreif, Mr. James Drummond, Alexander Peebles Baron of Findowne. And ſhortly after the firſt ſervice was ſet down, my Lord ſitting at the table with the foreſaid company, Andrew Ruthven came in from the Maſter, and rounded to the Earl, but heard not what he ſaid; and ſhortly after, this Deponent paſſing down to take up the ſecond ſervice, Mr. Alexander Ruthven and William Blair came in to the Earl, my Lord ſitting at his dinner: and how ſoon my Lord ſaw them, he and his hail company roſe from the table; and then this Deponent hearing my Lord on foot, bid this Deponent ſend for his Steel-bonnet and Gantlet, believing that my Lord was going to take the ſaid Highland-man. And as this Deponent perceiv'd my Lord paſſing to the Inche, and not to the Shoegate, he ſent home his Steel-bonnet, and caſt his Gantlet in the pantry, and thereafter followed the Earl to the Inche, where he ſaw the ſaid Earl with his Majeſty, the Duke, and the Earl of Mar, and came in all together to the Earl's houſe. And after his Majeſty had come to the Earl's houſe, the Maſter of Ruthven ſpeird at this Deponent, where the key of the gallery-chamber was? who anſwered, That he handled not that key ſince the Earl came in Scotland. Then the Maſter bid this Deponent ſpeak to Mr. William Rynd to give to him the ſaid key. And the Maſter paſſing up to the gallery, Mr. William Rynd followed him, and gave to him the ſaid key: and thereafter, immediately after his Majeſty's down ſitting to his dinner, Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun came to this Deponent *, and bad him gang to the Earl of Gowrie; which this Deponent did. And the Earl of Gowrie, in the outer-chamber, where the King dined, ſpake to this Deponent ſecretly, and bad him paſs to the gallery to his brother. So he paſſed up, and the Earl follows him; and they being all three together in the gallery-chamber, (whereof he had the key from Mr. William Rynd) the Earl ſaid to this Deponent, Tarry ſtill with my brother, and do any thing he bids you. Then this Deponent came to the Maſter, and ſpeird, What will you with me, Sir? then the Maſter ſpoke to my Lord, Let Andrew Henryſon go into the round of the chamber, and I will lock him in, and take the key of the chamber with me; where this Deponent abode half an hour or thereby, locked his allane, having his Secret, Plate-Sleeves, Sword and Whinger with him, and wanting his Steel-bonnet. And all this time, this Deponent feared ſome evil to be done: that, upon this, he kneel'd and pray'd to God; and about the end end of the half hour, Mr. Alexander opens the door of the room, and entred firſt within the ſame, having the King's Majeſty by the Arm, and puts on his hat upon his head, draws forth this Andrew Henderſon Deponent's whinger; and ſays to the King, having the drawn whinger in his hand, Sir, you muſt be my priſoner; remember on my father's death. And, as he held the whinger to his Majeſty's breaſt, this Deponent threw the ſamen furth of Mr. Alexander's hands. And the time that Mr. Alexander held the whinger to his Majeſty's breaſt, the King was beginning to ſpeak. The Maſter ſaid, Hold your tongue, Sir, or, by Chriſt, ye ſhall die. Then his Majeſty anſwered, Mr. Alexander, Ye and I were very great together; and as touching your father's death, man, I was but a minor. My Council might have done any thing they pleaſed. And farther, Man, albeit ye bereave me of my life, ye will not be King of Scotland; for I have both ſons and daughters, and there are men in this town and friends that will not leave it unrevenged. Then Mr. Alexander anſwered, ſwearing with a great oath, that it was neither his life nor blood that he craved. And the King ſaid, what traiks, [what then] albeit ye take off your hat; and then Mr. Alexander took off his hat. And the King ſaid, What is it ye crave, man, and ye crave not my life? who anſwered, Sir, it is but a promiſe. The King anſwered, What promiſe? The ſaid Mr. Alexander anſwer'd, For, my Lord my brother will tell you. The King ſaid, fetch hither your brother. And ſyne the ſaid Mr. Alexander ſaid to the King, Sir, you will not cry, nor open the window while I come again? and the King promiſed ſo to do. Then Mr. Alexander paſſed forth and locked, and paſſed not from the door, as he believes. In the mean time, the King entred in diſcourſe with this Deponent, How came you in here, man? And this deponent anſwered, As God lives, I am ſhot in here like a dog. The King anſwered, Will my Lord of Gowrie do me any evil, man? this Deponent anſwered, I vow to God I ſhall die firſt. And then the King bad this Deponent open the Window, and he opened the window that looked to the Spy-tower: and the King anſwered, Fy, the wrong window, man! And thereafter, this Deponent paſſing to the other window neareſt his Majeſty, to open the ſame; before he got to the window, Mr. Alexander opened the door, and came in again, and ſaid to his Majeſty, By God! there is no remedy; and then he loups to the King, and got him by both the hands, having ane garter in his hands. Then the King anſwered, I am a free Prince, man; I will not be bound: ſo his Majeſty caſt looſe his left hand from Mr. Alexander; and at that ſame time, this Deponent draws away the garter from Mr. Alexander, and his Majeſty loups free from the ſaid Mr. Alexander, and the ſaid Mr. Alexander follows his Majeſty, and with his left hand about his Majeſty's craig, puts his right neeve [fiſt] in his Majeſty's mouth: ſo his Majeſty wreſtling to be quite of him, this Deponent puts his hand out of his Majeſty's mouth. And thereafter, this Deponent did put his left hand over his Majeſty's left ſhoulder, and pull'd up the broad of the window, whereunto the ſaid Mr. Alexander had thruſt his Majeſty's head and ſhoulders; and with the force of the drawing up of the window, preſſes his Majeſty's body about, his right ſide to the window: at which time his Majeſty cries furth, Treaſon! treaſon! So the Maſter ſaid to this Deponent, Is there no help with thee? wo worth thee, thou villain! we all die. So twining his hand on the guard of his own ſword; and, incontinent, the King's Majeſty put his hand on the Maſter's hands, and ſtay'd him from drawing of his ſword: and this ways they both being graſped together, comes furth of the cabinet to the chamber: and, in the mean time, this Deponent threw about the key; then ſtanding in the door of the head of the turnpike, which entred to the chamber, and opened the door thereof, to eſchew [eſcape] himſelf, and to let his Majeſty's ſervants in. And how ſoon he opened the door, John Ramſay came in at the ſaid door, with an haulk on his hand, and paſſed to the King's Majeſty, and laid about him, and drew his whinger; and as he ſaw him minting with the whinger, this Deponent paſſed forth at the ſaid door, and paſs'd down the turn-pike. And, as this Deponent paſs'd through the cloſe, and came to the fore-gate, this Deponent ſaw the Earl of Gowrie ſtanding before the gate accompanied by ſundry perſons, of whom he remembers none; but remembers well, that the Earl had this Deponent's knapſchaw, or head-piece, on his head, and two ſwords drawn in his hands: and incontinently thereafter, this Deponent paſs'd to his own lodging, where he remained while the King paſſed furth of the town; and then the Deponent paſs'd to the bridge, and walked up and down by the ſpace of an hour, and returned not again to the Earl's lodging. And the time of his entry to his houſe that night, this Deponent's wife inquir'd at this Deponent, What trouble was within the place? to whom he anſwered, Well is me of one thing, that if I had not been there, the King had been twice ſticked this night: but wo's me for the thing that is fallen out. And this Deponent being demanded by Mr. John Moncreif, after his returning from Falkland, where have you been with your boots on? anſwered, He had been two or three miles beyond Erne, and durſt not tell him the verity, by reaſon the Earl of Gowrie had diſcharged him to tell the errand, he ſent him, to any body. And farther, this Deponent declares, That when he ſaw the Earl of Gowrie ſtanding with the drawn ſwords before the gate, this Deponent ſpoke not to the Earl, neither yet the Earl to him at that time, but he paſſed to his own houſe.

* Upon the information of Henderſon, and other witneſſes, Cranſtoun and Craigingelt were pannelled before the Juſticiary at St. Johnſtoun; and upon clear teſtimonies, and on their own confeſſion at the Bar (which they alſo adher'd to on the Scaffold) they were both executed: Only alledging, that they did not know of the deſign to murder the King; but that they intended to force the King to make great reparations for the late Earl of Gowrie's death: and that this Earl of Gowrie was to be made a great man.

THE Abbot of Inchechaffrey, ſworn and examined, depones, That, upon the 5th day of Auguſt laſt by-paſt, this Deponent being in Falkland, about ſeven hours in the morning, he met Mr. Alexander Ruthven accompanied with Andrew Ruthven; and, at that time, only ſaluted the ſaid Mr. Alexander Ruthven, without any conference farther at that time. And at that time, he ſaw the ſaid Mr. Alexander enter in conference with his Majeſty, upon the green, betwixt the ſtables and the park: which conference enduring for the ſpace of a quarter of an hour, and the ſaid Mr. Alexander accompanied his Majeſty while they came to the Meadow; and, at his returning from his Majeſty, this Deponent deſired Mr. Alexander to disjune with him, by reaſon his own could not be ſo ſoon prepar'd. To whom Mr. Alexander anſwered, He might not tarry, by reaſon his Majeſty had commanded him to await upon him. And, as this Deponent paſſed to Falkland, leaving Mr. Alexander behind him, met his horſe with his man, coming from Falkland to him; and then this Deponent, after he had diſjuned in Falkland, he took his journey the high-way to Inchechaffrey, and the Deponent being but a mile be-north Stramiglo, he's incompany'd with my Lord Duke, Lindores, the Laird of Urquhill, John Hamilton of the Grange, Finlay Tailzies; and Mr. Alexander Ruthven came by this Deponent, riding the high-way to Perth. Then incontinent, this Deponent horſed, and accompanied his Majeſty to Perth, where he ſaw the Earl of Gowrie meet his Majeſty in the Inche, and paſſed in company with his Majeſty, and his Noblemen, and ſervants, to the Earl of Gowrie's lodging, where they dined all together. And after dinner, this Deponent being in the chamber at the north-end of the hall, word paſſed thro' the hall, that his Majeſty was paſſed away, and ridden towards Falkland; and then this Deponent, in company with the Lord of Mar, and remanent preſent for the time, paſſed to the cloſe, and from that to the high-ſtreet; and the Earl of Gowrie being preſent with them, deſired them to ſtay, while he returned and advertiſed them of the verity thereof. And incontinent the Earl of Gowrie paſſed up the ſtair, and returned back, and certified the Deponent and his colleagues of his Majeſty's departure. Then the Lord Duke, this Deponent and remanent, cried for their horſes to follow the King. Then, as they were ſtanding upon the high-ſtreet, they heard ane cry and a voice; and the Duke firſt declared, I am ſure, yon is his Majeſty's voice, be where he will himſelf. And immediately thereafter, this Deponent ſaw his Majeſty looking forth of a window of the round, wanting his hat, and his face red, crying, Fy, help, my Lord Mar! treaſon! treaſon! I am murder'd! And, at that ſame inſtant, to his judgement, was pull'd per force in at that ſame window. And incontinent thereafter, this Deponent paſſed in haſte up with the Earl of Mar and my Lord Duke, to the chamber within the gallery; where he ſaw, heard, and did in all things conform to the Earl's depoſition.

THE Abbot of Lindores, ſworn and examined, depones conform to the Lord Duke of Lenox, in all things; addendo, That after dinner, when word was of his Majeſty's departure towards Falkland, and that they had all together come down to the Porter, and had enquired at him, Gif the King's Majeſty was gone furth? the Porter anſwered, He was not paſſed furth; and the Earl of Gowrie affirmed, That he was paſſed furth at the back-gate: and the Porter ſaid to the Earl of Gowrie, That cannot be, my Lord, becauſe I have the key of the back-gate. And, after that his Majeſty had cried furth of the window of the round, Treaſon! treaſon! &c. this Deponent ſaw James Erſkin incontinently lay hands on the Earl of Gowrie upon the high-ſtreet; and immediately Sir Thomas Erſkin gripped the Earl of Gowrie: Fy, traitor! this is thy deed, thou ſhalt die. Then the Earl of Gowrie anſwered, I ken nothing of the matter. Then inſtantly the Earl of Gowrie's men tugged the ſaid Sir Thomas Erſkin and James Erſkin from the Earl of Gowrie; who incontinent ran the ſpace of half ane pair of butt-lands from them, towards Glenurchie's houſe, and drew furth his two ſwords, and cried, I will either be at my own houſe, or die by the gate. And incontinently thereafter the ſaid Earl, accompanied with thirty perſons, or thereby, paſſed within the ſaid place, wherein his Majeſty was for the time: and ſhortly after, the Deponent, as appeared to him, ſaw a multitude of people carrying a joiſt towards the place.

LINDORES.

SIR Thomas Erſkin, of the age of thirty-ſix years, ſworn, depones, conform to the Lord Inchechaffrey, and Lord of Lindores; addendo, That immediately after this Deponent heard his Majeſty cry furth of the window of the round, Fy, help! I am betray'd, they are murdering me! he ran with diligence towards the place, to have helped his Majeſty; and before his entry, ſeeing the Earl of Gowrie, this Deponent and his brother gripped him by the neck, and ſaid to him, Traitor, this is thy deed. Whilk Earl anſwered, What is the matter? I ken nothing. Immediately the Earl's ſervants ſever'd him from this Deponent and his brother. And then this Deponent entred within the cloſe, he foregathered with Sir Hugh Herries, who demanded of the Deponent what the matter meant; and, in the mean time, the Deponent heard Sir John Ramſay crying out at the turnpike-head, Fy, Sir Thomas, come up the turnpike, even to the head! And, as this Deponent had paſſed up five ſteps of the turnpike, he ſees and meets with Mr. Alexander Ruthven blooded in two parts of his body, viz. in his face and in his neck; and incontinent, this Deponent cries to Sir Hugh Herries, and others that were with him, Fy, this is the traitor, ſtrike him! And incontinent he was ſtricken by them, and fell; and as he was fallen, he turn'd his face, and cried, alas! I had not the wyte of it; this Deponent being ſtanding above him in the turnpike. Thereafter, this Deponent paſs'd to the head of the turnpike, and entered within the chamber at the head of the gallery, where the King and Sir John Ramſay were there alone preſent; and, at the firſt meeting, this Deponent ſaid to his Majeſty, I thought your Majeſty would have concredited more to me, nor to have commanded me to await your Majeſty at the door, gif ye thought it not meet to have taken men with you. Whereupon his Majeſty anſwered to this Deponent, Alas! the Traitor deceived me in that, as he did in the leave; for I commanded him expreſsly to bring you to me, which he promiſed to me to do; and returned back, as I thought, to fetch you: but he did nothing, but ſteiked the door. Shortly thereafter, Sir Hugh Herries followed the Deponent into the chamber, and George Wilſon, ſervant to James Erſkin: and immediately thereafter Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun, with his ſword drawn in his hand, entered within the ſaid chamber; and the Earl of Gowrie followed him within the ſame chamber, with ane drawn ſword in every one of his hands, and ane knapſchaw on his head, who ſtruck at this Deponent and his colleagues ane certain ſpace. Likeas, they defended them and ſtruke again: and that ſame time, this Deponent was hurt in the right hand be Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun; and this Deponent heard my Lord of Gowrie ſpeak ſome words at his entry, but underſtands them not. At laſt, Sir John Ramſay gave the Earl of Gowrie ane dead ſtraik; and then the Earl leand him to his ſword, and the Deponent ſaw a man ha'd him up, whom he knew not; and how ſoon the Earl fell to the ground, Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun, and the remanent who accompanied him, departed and paſs'd down the turnpike. And the Deponent remembers, that at that time, there were more perſons in the chamber with the Earl of Gowrie by Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun, but knew nane of them, except that he believes that ane black man, that was there in company within the chamber, was Hugh Moncreif, brother to the Laird of Moncreif; but the Deponent knows not well, whether or not it was Hugh Moncreif.

that,

Sic ſubſcribitur,
Sir THOMAS ERSKIN.

SIR John Ramſay, of the age of twenty-three years, or thereby, ſworn, depones, That immediately after he had dined, the day libelled, in the Earl of Gowrie's houſe, he took his Majeſty's haulk from John Murray, to the effect the ſaid John might have dined: and the Deponent miſſing his Majeſty, and forgathering with the Laird of Pittencreif, in the Earl of Gowrie's hall; and demanding of Pittencreif, where his Majeſty was? the ſaid Laird firſt convoy'd the Deponent to the chamber where the King dined, thereafter to the yaird, hoping that his Majeſty had been there: and miſſing his Majeſty in the yaird, convoy'd the Deponent up to ane fair gallery, where the Deponent was never before; where having remain'd a certain ſpace beholding the gallery, they came both down to the cloſs, where they met with Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun in the midſt of the cloſs, who ſaid to them, that his Majeſty was away upon horſeback, at the Inche: whereupon this Deponent and Pittencreif ſindered; and the Deponent paſſed furth of the gate, to his ſtable, to have gotten his horſe, and being ſtanding at the ſtable-door, he heard his Majeſty cry, knew his Highneſs's voice, but underſtood not what he ſpake. Whereupon he comes immediately within the cloſs, and finding ane turnpike-door open, he enters within the ſamen, and runs up the turnpike, while he comes to the door upon the head thereof; and hearing ane ſtruggling and din of men's feet, he ran with his hail force at the door of the turnpike-head, which enters to the chamber at the end of the gallery; the Deponent having in the mean time his haulk on his hand, and having dung open the door, he ſees his Majeſty and Mr. Alexander Ruthven in others arms, ſtriving and wreſtling together, his Majeſty having Mr. Alexander's head under his arm, and Mr. Alexander being almoſt on his knees, had his hand upon his Majeſty's face and mouth: and his Majeſty ſeeing the Deponent, cried, Fy! ſtrike him laigh, becauſe he has ane pyne doublet upon him. Whereupon the Deponent caſt the haulk from him, and drew his whinger, wherewith he ſtrake the ſaid Mr. Alexander; and immediately after he was ſtriken, his Majeſty ſhot him down ſtairs whereat this Deponent had entered. Thereafter, this Deponent addreſſes himſelf to a window; and looking furth thereat, and ſaw Sir Thomas Erskin, the Deponent cried, Sir Thomas, come up this turnpike, even to the head. In this mean time, his Majeſty did put his foot upon the haulk-leaſh, and held her a lang time, while the Deponent came and took her up again: and then Sir Thomas Erskin entered. And in the reſt depones conform to Sir Thomas Erskin in all points; and further ſays, That when the Deponent firſt entered within the chamber, he ſaw a man ſtanding behind his Majeſty's back, whom he no ways knew, nor remembers what apparelling he had on; but after that this Deponent had ſtriken Mr. Alexander, he ſaw that man no more.

Sic ſubſcribitur,
Sir JOHN RAMSAY.

John Graham of Urquhill, ſworn and examined, depones conform to the Lord Duke of Lenox and Earl of Mar in all things, reddens eandem cauſam ſcientiæ; adding, That this Deponent the time that he was at dinner in the hall, with my Lord Duke and Earl of Mar, he ſaw the King and Mr. Alexander Ruthven paſs throw the hall up the turnpike, towards the gallery: and, as this Deponent, John Hamilton and others, were following, Mr. Alexander cry'd back, Gentlemen ſtay, for ſo it is his Highneſs's will.

JOHN GRAHAM of Urquhill.

John Graham of Balgowne, of the age of fifty years, or thereby, married, depones conform to the Lord Duke in all things; adding, That this Deponent the day libelled, after the death of the Earl of Gowrie and his brother, and hearing his Majeſty report, that Mr. Alexander preſſed to have bound his Highneſs's hands with a garter; this Deponent found a garter at the cheeck of the round door among the bent, and immediately thereafter this Deponent preſented the garter to his Highneſs: and at the ſight thereof, his Majeſty ſaid, That the ſame was the garter wherewith Mr. Alexander preſſed to have bound his hands; and then, Sir Thomas Erskin gripped to the ſame garter, and ſaid, That he would keep it, which he has yet in keeping.

JOHN GRAHAM of Balgowne.

IN Mr. John Moncreif depones as follows, to wit, That day I was ſtill preſent with my Lord of Gowrie, unto the time I heard his Majeſty cry, Treaſon! and ſaw him put his arm furth of the window of the room, and then left him: for I conceived in my heart it was plain treaſon, conſpir'd againſt his Majeſty, and was induced hereto, in reſpect of theſe preſumptions following: Firſt, I ſaw the King's Majeſty and umquhile Mr. Alexander Ruthven my Lord's brother go furth at the hall-door their alanes; whereas his Majeſty had no weapons, and Mr. Alexander had a ſword. Next, I ſaw his Majeſty come in a quiet and ſober manner to the town, wherethrough appeared, he would have no evil purpoſe in his mind. Item, He ſaid, Mr. Alexander riding to Falkland in the morning, was obſcured from me and my brother Hugh where he was: and I having enquired of my brother Hugh where he was riding to, he knew nothing thereof; ſo that neither he nor I could get trial of the ſame. Item, I having enquired at Andrew Henderſon himſelf, who rode to Falkland, and returned two hours before him, ſaluted me, and anſwered, That he had been two or three miles above the town; and ſays, the ſaid Andrew had another doublet on, more than he uſed commonly, and was more bulkſom; and, as appears, might have contained ane Secret. Item, That day being the Council-day of the town, my Lord excuſed himſelf, in reſpect of his advice. Item, I having preſſed him to ſubſcribe ane Confirmation of ane Lady's, firſt refuſed, in reſpect foreſaid; always paſſed it thereafter. Item, My Lord tarried longer from his dinner nor he uſed: and albeit Andrew Ruthven, who was with the Maſter, came and rounded my Lord at the board, he made him to miſknow all things, unto the time that the ſaid Mr. Alexander came himſelf, and then raiſe from the board, and met his Majeſty. Item, My Lord obſcured altogether, that he knew of the coming of any any man, while the Maſter came. Item, Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun was the firſt that I heard cry, The King's Majeſty is away. Item, After my Lord Duke and my Lord Mar, and his Majeſty's ſervants were in the cloſe, my Lord of Gowrie came back again to the hall, ſaying, The King was away: ſo that, as I thought, he would have each man thinking ſo. And I thought his Majeſty was not received with that hearty complement as became. Item, After his Majeſty's riding away, my brother Hugh came to my houſe, and I enquiring of him what he thought of thir matters; anſwered, Before God, ſo far as I can perceive, I trow, it ſhall kyth ane plain treaſon on my Lord's part. And I ſpeiring at him, If he knew any thing thereof? anſwered, He knew nothing; but he and Henry Ruthven, after all things were ended, fell in conference thereanent, and he thought things were likely. Laſtly, Andrew Henderſon's Letter moves me moſt of all. And, upon my ſalvation and condemnation, I know no farther in this matter; nor yet can remember of any other circumſtance or preſumption, might have induced me to conceive the former, which I apprehended, in manner foreſaid.

Mr. JOHN MONCREIF.

I Andrew Roy, one of the Baillies of the Burgh of Perth, be thir Preſents teſtifies upon my conſcience, and in the ſight of God, as I ſhall anſwer to him in the Great Day, That upon the fifth day of Auguſt, one thouſand and ſix hundred years, I being in the umquhile Earl of Gowrie's Lodging, when his Majeſty was there, ſaw his Majeſty, after his dinner, accompanied with the Maſter of Gowrie, riſe from the table, and gang furth of the chamber where he had dined; but, to what place, I know not; being beholding the ſaid umquhile Earl of Gowrie's entertainment of the Noblemen, in drinking his Majeſty's Scoll to them; which, his Majeſty, before his riſing from the table, had commanded him to do. And after this, the Lords, viz. my Lord Duke, my Lord of Mar, my Lord Lindores, and my Lord of Inchechaffrey, with ſundry of his Majeſty's Gentlemen and Servants, accompanied with the Earl of Gowrie in perſon; and ſhort ſpace after dinner, had miſſed his Majeſty, and enquired where he ſhould be; they went to the fore-gate, and ſpeir'd at the Porter, If he ſaw the King go furth at the fore-gate? and heard the Porter anſwer, That his Majeſty was not gone furth that way. Alſo, that the Earl of Gowrie ſaid to the Porter, Ye lie, knave, he is furth, and the Porter replied, That he ſhould give his head, in caſe his Majeſty were furth. Yet, upon the Earl of Gowrie's aſſurance, that his Majeſty was furth to the Inche, the Lords iſſued out in haſte at the foregate, and ſpeiring where the King was, I ſaw ane ding up the long front-window, in the north-ſide of the turret, upon the high-gate; but who dang it up, I know not. And farther, ſaw clearly his Majeſty ſhut furth his head and arm at the foreſaid window, and heard his Majeſty crying loudly, Fy, treaſon! treaſon! and murder! help, Earl of Mar! Whereupon, I being very agaſt, and wonderfully aſtoniſhed, at that cruel and terrible ſight, and pitiful and woful cry, I not knowing what the matter meant, but perceiving his Majeſty in extream and great danger, ran with all poſſible diligence thro' the ſtreets, crying loudly, Fy, treaſon! treaſon againſt the King! for God's ſake, all honeſt men, haſte and relieve the King: and commanded to ring the common bell, that all men might come in haſte to his Majeſty's relief; and then I returned with all poſſible diligence, with a great number of the people with me, and came before the foreſaid turret and window, where I ſaw his Majeſty firſt cry out; and then I cried out, How is the King? But my Lord Duke and my Lord of Mar anſwered, The King is well, (praiſe be to God.) Then I cried again up to his Majeſty, and ſhew his Majeſty, That the Baillies and Townſhip were then come, in all haſte, to ſupply and relieve his Majeſty: and therefore beſought his Majeſty to command what was his Majeſty's Will, and beſt to be done. And then his Majeſty beckoned furth his hand to me and to the people, commanding me to cauſe the people retire them to their lodgings. Which commandment I incontinent obey'd, and commanded all manner of men to retire themſelves to their lodgings; and likewiſe paſſed to the mercat-croſs, and, by open proclamation, commanded in his Highneſs's name, that all men ſhould retire them to their lodgings, under the pain of treaſon, who obeyed not incontinent after my charge. And this I teſtify to be of verity, by the faith and truth of my body, ſo far as I juſtly can remember. In witneſs of which, I have ſubſcribed theſe Preſents, with my hand, at Perth, the thirteenth day of October, one thouſand and ſix hundred years, before theſe witneſſes, Mr. Patrick Gallowah, Miniſter to his Majeſty; James Drummond of Letchel; Oliver Young, Conſtantine Wallace, Thomas Johnſton, Baillies; Henry Elder, Clerk; Robert Anderſon, Andrew Mowat, and William Jack, Burgeſſes of Perth. Sic ſubſcribitur, ANDREW ROY, Baillie, with my hand. Mr. Patrick Gallowah witneſs, James Drummond witneſs, Oliver Young Baillie, witneſs; Thomas Johnſton Baillie, witneſs; Robert Anderſon witneſs, Andrew Arnolt witneſs, William Jack witneſs, Henry Elder Scribe, witneſs.

RObert Chriſtie, porter to umquhile John Earl of Gowrie, of the age of thirty years, ſolutus, depones, That he was porter to the Earl of Gowrie, the fifth day of Auguſt libelled: ſicklike, he was by the ſpace of five weeks before. And ſhortly after the dinner, this Deponent ſaw my Lord Duke, the Earl of Mar, the Earl of Gowrie, come to the cloſe; and my Lord Duke ſpeird at this Deponent, if his Majeſty was paſſed furth of the cloſe? The Deponent anſwered, that he was not furth. Then the Lord of Mar ſaid, Billy, tell me the verity, if his Majeſty be furth or not? And he anſwered, in truth, he is not furth. The Earl of Gowrie looking with an angry countenance, ſaid, Thou lied, he is furth at the backgate, and through the Inche. Then this Deponent anſwered, that cannot be, my Lord, for I have the key of the backgate, and of all the gates of the place. Thereafter, this Deponent heard and ſaw his Majeſty looking furth of the window of the round, and crying, Treaſon! Treaſon! fy, help, my Lord of Mar! And incontinent, my Lord Duke, the Earl of Mar, and others, ran up the ſtair of the turnpike to the gallery: and thereafter, the Lord of Gowrie came from the high-ſtreet, within the cloſe, having a ſteel-bonnet on his head, and a drawn ſword in his hand, accompanied with Alexander and Hary Ruthven, Patrick Eviot and Hugh Moncreif, Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun; all having drawn ſwords in their hands, and paſſed all together with my Lord up the old turnpike; but what was done within the houſe and place thereafter, knows not, but by report: neither ſaw he any joiſt brought to the place, by any of the town. And knows no more of the matter.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

ALexander Blair, younger of Balthyik, ſworn and examined, depones, conform to immediatè præcedenti; except, That he ſaw not my Lord of Gowrie paſs with his company, and drawn ſwords, up the turnpike: but ſaw Alexander and Hary Ruthven, and Hugh Moncreif, come down the little turnpike, where they and my Lord had aſcended, the ſaids three perſons having drawn ſwords in their hands; but ſaw not Patrick Eviot there. And this Deponent ſays, that after the tumult was riſen, and this Deponent preſſing to enter within the place, he was a little ſtaid by them in the place; but they yielded at once, and the Deponent got entry. Likewiſe, he ſaw a joiſt brought from the town, and ſet up at the wall of the cloſe; but who brought the ſamen in, he knows not.

The Sentence and Doom pronounced by the Lords and Eſtates of Parliament for High-Treaſon, againſt John Earl of Gowrie and his Brother Mr. Alexander Ruthven.

[To repeat the Libel and Executions, or the Libels verbatim, would be uſeleſly tedious to Readers; therefore I inſert the Doom or Sentence verbatim, pronounced on the 15th Day of November 1600.]

'THE ſaids Lords and Eſtates of Parliament finds, decerns and declares, that the ſaid umquhil John Earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven his Brother, committed and did open and manifeſt Treaſon againſt our ſaid Sovereign Lord, in all points, articles and matter contain'd in the ſaid ſummons: and therefore it was given for doom, by the mouth of David Lindſay Dempſter of Parliament, in manner and form as follows:

'This Court of Parliament ſhowes for law, that 'the ſaid umquhil John Earl of Gowrie, and um-'quhil Mr. Alexander Ruthven his Brother, com-'mitted the foreſaid crime of Treaſon and Leſe-'Majeſty in their life-times, againſt our Sovereign 'Lord and his Authority Royal, in manner at 'length contain'd in the ſaid ſummons: and there-'fore decerns and declares the name, memory and 'dignity of the ſaid umquhil John Earl of Gowrie, 'and umquhil Mr. Alexander Ruthven his Brother, 'to be extinguiſh'd, and their arms to be cancell'd 'and deleted furth of the books of arms and nobi-'lity; ſo that their poſterity ſhall be unhabile, and 'uncapable in all time coming to bruik, poſſeſs or 'enjoy any offices, dignities, honours, ſucceſſions, 'poſſeſſions, and all goods, moveables and im-'moveables, rights, titles, hope of ſucceſſion, and 'others whatſomever within this Realm; and all 'goods, lands, rents, offices, benefits, honours, 'dignities, hope and appearance of ſucceſſion, 'rights, titles, poſſeſſions, and other goods and 'gear, moveable and immoveable, and to theirs 'whatſomever, whilk is any ways pertain'd to the 'ſaid umquhil John Earl of Gowrie, and umquhil 'Mr. Alexander Ruthven his Brother; or whilk is 'by any right, title, hope of ſucceſſion, poſſeſſion, 'or any other manner of way might have belong'd 'or pertain'd to them, to be confiſcated, devolved 'in our Sovereign Lord; and to appertain to his 'Highneſs: and in all time coming, remain in 'property with his Majeſty for ever. And farder, 'his Majeſty and Eſtates foreſaid, in deteſtation of 'the ſaid horrible, unnatural and vile Treaſon, 'attempted by the ſaid umquhil John, ſome time 'Earl of Gowrie, and umquhil Mr. Alexander Ruth-'ven, againſt his Highneſs's own life; decerns, 'ſtatutes and ordains, that the ſaid bodies of the 'ſaids Traitors ſhall be carried upon Monday next, 'to the publick croſs of Edinburgh; and there to 'be hang'd, quarter'd and drawn, in preſence of 'the hail People: and thereafter, the heads, quar-'ters and carcaſſes, to be affix'd upon the moſt 'patent parts and places of the Burroughs of Edin-'burgh, Perth, Dundee and Stirling. And this I 'give for doom.'

Beſides the perſonal ſentence given againſt the Earl of Gowrie, this Parliament did, by diſtinct Acts, diſinherit and inhabilitate the brethren, and all the poſterity of the Earl of Gowrie, from enjoying any heritage, place or office within Scotland; and diſcharging all Perſons whatſoever to move or interceed for them, under high pains.

By another Act, the ſurname of Ruthven is appointed to be extinguiſh'd and aboliſh'd for ever; and ſuch of them as were innocent of this Treaſon, were ordered to take other names, and to be inſerted in publick Records.

By another Act, the fifth of Auguſt was appointed to be obſerved for thankſgiving, annually, and in all time coming, for the King's deliverance from the ſaid Treaſon *.

By another Act, the lands and eſtate of Ruthven were annexed to the patrimony of the Crown. And, by ſeveral other particular Acts, Sir Thomas Erskin, (afterwards Earl of Kelly,) Sir John Ramſay, and Sir Hugh Herries, and ſome others, who did moſt immediately preſerve the King's Perſon, had benefices and other favours conferr'd upon them in Parliament.

The Sentence and Doom pronounced by the Lords and Eſtates of Parliament, for High-Treaſon, againſt Alexander and Harry Ruthvens, Hugh Moncreif and Patrick Eviot; who were actors in the ſame crime, and judged by the ſame Parliament, on the 15*th day of* November 1600.

'THE ſaids Lords and Eſtates of Parliament, 'finds, decerns and declares, that the ſaids 'Alexander and Harry Ruthven, Hugh Moncreif, and 'Patrick Eviot, and ilk ane of them, committed, 'and did open and manifeſt Treaſon againſt our 'Sovereign Lord in all points, articles, and man-'ner contain'd in the ſaid ſummons; and therefore, 'it was given for doom by the mouth of David 'Lindſay, Dempſter of Parliament, in manner and 'form as follows:

'This Court of Parliament ſhows for law, that 'the ſaids Alexander Ruthven, Harry Ruthven 'his Brother, Sons lawful to umquhil Alexander 'Ruthven of Freeland; Hugh Moncreif, Bro-'ther to William Moncreif of that ilk; and Patrick 'Eviot, Brother to Colin Eviot of Balhouſie; com-'mitted the crimes of Treaſon and Leſe-Majeſty 'againſt our Sovereign Lord and his Authority 'Royal, in manner at length contain'd in the ſaid 'ſummons: and therefore decerns and declares 'thir Perſons to underly the pains of Treaſon and 'Leſe-Majeſty, and laſt puniſhment preſcrib'd by 'the laws of this Realm; and all their goods, 'moveable and immoveable, as well heritages as 'offices, benefices, and others whatſomever per-'taining to them, or whilk is, might any ways 'belong, or appertain to them, to be confiſcated 'to his Majeſty, and to remain with his Highneſs 'in property for ever; and their poſterity to be 'now, and in all time coming, uncapable and un-'habil to bruik and poſſeſs within this Realm, any 'honours, dignities, offices, benefices, ſucceſſions, 'or other goods or gear, moveable or immoveable. 'And this I give for doom.'

Mr. Stephens in his note on that paſſage in Lord Bacon's Letter, ſays, "The fifth of Auguſt being the Anniverſary of the King's "deliverance from the Earl of Gowrie's conſpiracy, was by ſome call'd the Court Holy-day, and ridicul'd as a fiction; though the "truth thereof being deliver'd down by Archbiſhop Spotſwood, and other good Hiſtorians, I ſee no great reaſon to call it into queſtion.

In the Parliament which condemn'd John Earl of Gowrie, and his Brother Mr. Alexander in the year 1600, let it be conſidered, that a great part of the Nobility, and many of the Gentry, which did ſit in that Parliament, were deſcended of Gowrie's family, and nearly allied to it. As alſo the Lords of the Articles, who did examine the witneſſes and evidences, ſeveral were of near relation to the Pannel, particularly Lenox and Livingſton; and the Barons and Burgeſſes being elected members, not by the King and Court, but by the Barons and Burroughs; and two Biſhops and four Abbots, Church-men, being alſo of that number; what ground remains for doubting their impartiality and veracity, in making a report of what was aſſerted and ſworn ſo publickly by the witneſſes? VII. The Arraignment and Judgement of Captain THOMAS LEE, at the Seſſions-houſe near Newgate, on Monday the 26th of February, 1600*. for High-Treaſon, 43 Eliz.

The INDICTMENT.

"THAT he plotted and compaſſed to "raiſe Sedition and Rebellion to the "Queen's Majeſty's Perſon, to de- "prive her of her Crown and Dig- "nity, take away her life, commit "her people to ſlaughter, alter the form of Go- "vernment and Religion; and upon this wicked "reſolution, on the 12th day of February, 1600. "in the afternoon about the hours of four and five, "he the ſaid Captain Lee repaired to the chamber "of one Sir Robert † Croſſe Knt. (ſic MS.) in the "Pariſh of St. Giles in the Fields, of purpoſe to diſ- "cover his plot to him, and to perſuade the ſaid "Sir Robert Croſſe to conſent to join with him; "namely, to go to the Royal Palace of our So- "vereign Lady, being then at Weſtminſter, and "then and there to lay violent hands on her ſacred "Perſon, and to take her priſoner; thinking by "that means to ſet at liberty the Earls of Eſſex "and Southampton, and other Traytors now in "priſon. But the ſaid Sir Robert Croſſe not con- "ſenting to that traitorous practice; this Thomas "Lee himſelf repaired to the ſaid Royal Palace "between the hours of eight and nine in the ſame "night, and preſſed into the preſence, even to the "Privy-chamber door, with purpoſe to have taken "the Perſon of our ſaid Sovereign Lady, and per- "formed his other traitorous deſigns."

But there in that manner was apprehended, and examined, and ſo committed to priſon.

To this being aſked, whether he were guilty, or not?

He anſwered, Not guilty in manner and form as there ſet down.

And by whom he would be tried?

Said, by God and the Country, if he might ſee his Jury. He ſaid farther, (proteſting he was not guilty of any ill intent) that my Lord Admiral had long ſought his life, and now he was like to have it.

The Jury called, he took exception to one, ſaying, he liked not his face; but urged to ſhew other reaſons, he challenged him peremptorily.

But that, the Judges told him, could not be allowed in that caſe.

Capt. Lee. Then I am contented; proceed as you will.

My Lord Chief-Juſtice, at the end of the calling and impanelling, advertiſed the Jury what Treaſon was; namely, to intend to lay violent hands upon her Majeſty, or to take away her life; to raiſe Rebellion, even the intent was Treaſon, if it could be diſcovered by any overt-act.

Mr. Attorney-General. That he would prove him that ſtood at the bar, guilty of many foul Treaſons.

Capt. Lee. Nay, for all your wit and learning, you ſhall never do that. I care not what you can ſay. I have loſt a great deal of blood in her Majeſty's ſervice, and done good ſervice in Ireland.

Mr. Attorney. That we ſhall ſee anon; and proceeded upon the Indictment: Where he ſhewed how, in the late Rebellion of that Arch-traitor Eſſex. For, ſaid he, all the Nobility draw their Honour and Dignity of the Queen, as the Stars take their Light from the Sun; and ſo when they enter into any Rebellions and traitorous Practices againſt her Majeſty, they deprive themſelves of the Light, as it were, of that glory and honour which before-time they received from her, the chief and fountain of all their Light: and ſo he doubted not to call thoſe perſons Traitors, who, whilſt they ſtood, were Noblemen; and now, failing of their allegiance, loſt their Titles.

In the late Rebellion of this Traitor Eſſex, this Lee came flagrante crimine, and offered his ſervice to the Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary, as he pretended, to kill the Earl; which he ſaid he could do, as being well acquainted, and loved of the Earl: but they refuſing, he would needs have offered ſo much to the Queen's Majeſty; but with what mind, his practice will diſcover.

Capt. Lee. It is true, I would have been the firſt man ſhould have gone againſt him whilſt I thought him a traitor, and ſo would have adventured againſt any, to have defended the Queen.

Mr. Attorney-General. How you meant it, that will be plain anon.

After this, he came to Sir Henry Nevil, a Gentleman of noble blood, and uttered his mind to him concerning the practice in the Indictment; and after that came to Sir Robert Croſſe, as you ſhall hear, and opened his vile purpoſe at large to perſuade him. That theſe worthy men deſerving all honour for their Loyalty, refuſed, and revealed his vile Plot in good time. And thus much he had confeſſed under his hand.

Capt. Lee. What I have ſet my hand to, I cannot tell; but I am ſure I had never ſuch intent as you would perſuade the Jury I had.

Mr. Attorney. That is to be proved by Sir Robert Croſſe, what you meant when you went about to perſuade him.

Capt.

* From an authentick Manuſcript, lent the Editor.

† Though the name in the MS. is Croſſe, yet I take it to be Crofts, as Camden writes it.

Capt. Lee. I perſuaded him not; and he will not ſay ſo.

Mr. Attorney. Well! he ſhall ſpeak it before your face.

Then Sir Robert Croſſe was ſworn, and ſet in ſight of the Priſoner; and began to tell,

That upon Thurſday about five of the clock at night, Capt. Lee came to his lodging, he being ready to go abroad, and told him, he ſhould not go out, yet he muſt ſpeak with him; and ſo taking him aſide, he ſpoke to him of theſe matters of Treaſon, and ſaid, that half a dozen reſolute men, &c.

Capt. Lee here interrupted him, ſaying; Nay, good Robin Croſſe, ſpeak all the truth.

Mr. Attorney will'd Capt. Lee to give him leave to ſpeak, upon his oath.

Capt. Lee reply'd, I would nothing but put him in mind of the circumſtance; and ſaid, good Robin remember how I began.

Sir Robert ſaid he would. Thus then you ſpake to me:

I marvel what will become of theſe matters; a man might do a brave act to ſet thoſe Lords at liberty. Why how? quoth I. Marry, Sir Walter Rawleigh might get him eternal honour and love more than ever he can otherwiſe, if he would procure her Majeſty's warrant to free them, which he might compaſs by undertaking her perſon. I anſwered, You may be ſure he will not do it. Then Capt. Lee reply'd, If half a dozen reſolute men, ſuch as might have acceſs to the preſence, would ſtep unto the Queen, and kneel before her, and never riſe till ſhe had ſign'd a warrant, and then ſend it by the Lord-Admiral, and never ſtir till the Earls of Eſſex and Southampton were brought to the Queen's preſence, they might do it. And then he named Sir Henry Nevil, Sir Jarvis Clifton, Sir George Gifford, Sir Richard Weſton, and themſelves. I objected, how if ſome ſhould offer to come upon us, and remove us from her Majeſty. He anſwered, we might keep any body out by ſhutting the door, and telling them that offered to come in, that if any harm came to the Queen, if ſhe ſhould do otherwiſe than well, be it at their peril; and this was all. To which Sir Robert anſwered, he would ſleep upon it.

Capt. Lee. But I did perſuade you, Sir Robert, with proteſtation, ſaying, I never meant to be an actor myſelf, or perſuade any other to it. And what a wretch am I, to be thought a villain for that I never meant? For my Lord of Eſſex indeed, I loved and honoured him, ſo long as I thought him an honeſt man and a good ſubject. I ſpake theſe words with an if; If, ſuch a thing could be done.

Mr. Attorney. Why preſs'd you to the Privy-chamber door at ſuch a time, where you were not wont to come?

And then was ſhewed the Examination of William Poynes, (who was himſelf in the Fleet,) to this purpoſe.

That he ſaw Capt. Lee preſs towards the Privy-chamber door, and ſtand very near, and miſtruſting the worſt, drew towards him. When he came near, he mark'd his colour, that was pale, his countenance ſtern, and his face having great drops of ſweat ſtanding on it*. When he came near to him, Capt. Lee lean'd hard upon him, and ſaid, It was one of the wonders of God that I was in this action with the Earl of Eſſex. Why? ſaid Mr. Poynes. I was ſo well acquainted, and ſo much with my Lord of Eſſex, anſwered he. Then they paus'd. And Capt. Lee aſk'd, Whether the Queen were at ſupper? Mr. Poynes anſwer'd, No.

Mr. Attorney. Mark, all the reſt was but to bring in this.

Mr. Poynes told Capt. Lee farther, perhaps he might do good ſervice, if he were ſo well acquainted with the Earl, it was likely he knew ſomewhat of the Plot. Not I, anſwered Capt. Lee; but you ſhall hear more villanies and knaveries yet.

Mr. Attorney. Mark: What meant he by that ſpeech?

To this, Capt. Lee could not deny but he ſpake it; but ſaid, how was I there? had I any company? had I any dagger, or any thing about me, that might ſhew I meant to do the Queen any harm? No, I had not, neither did I mean any ſuch thing; and for my being at the Privy-chamber door, I had been there five hundred times, and never was noted. And what reaſon had I for my Lord of Eſſex, to adventure any ſuch thing. I have ſpent my blood in her Majeſty's ſervice, and ſo would again.

Mr. Attorney. You mark, there was love between him and the traitor Eſſex. And then Mr. Attorney cauſed a Letter to be read, which was written in the behalf of Captain Lee, to the now Deputy, by the Earl of Eſſex: 'That he knew it 'was for one in place to do what he would; and 'farther, What an unſeaſonable thing it was for 'any to require that at his friend's hands, that were 'out of time. He deſired his Lordſhip to take no-'tice of the Bearer Capt. Lee, one near allied to 'him, and that ſuffered for him; one that did as 'good ſervice as any, when himſelf was in Ireland, 'and one that was as well ſeated for ſervice as any; 'thus, whatſoever he did for the bearer, he would 'acknowledge as for himſelf: and ſo he concluded.'

Then likewiſe was read the confeſſion of Capt. Lee, to this purpoſe, That he loved and honoured the Earl of Eſſex, as much as any man in England, ſaving Sir Henry Lee.

Mr. Attorney. This being but the prologue to an enſuing Tragedy, he would give a taſte of the practices and treaſons of the Earl of Eſſex, and his complices.

Capt. Lee. He doubted the treaſon would light on ſome of them that held the Earl a traitor.

Whereat a confuſed noiſe there was, that he was a villain, to defend a traitor.

Mr. Attorney proceeded to ſhew the Queen's great grace in ſending to him the ſaid Earl, and the con-

* On the 12th of February, Thomas Lea (a kinſman of Sir Henry Lea, who had wore the honour of the Garter) told Sir Robert Croſts, Captain of a man of war, that it would be a glorious enterprize for ſix brave mettled fellows to go to the Queen, and compel her to diſcharge Eſſex, Southampton, and the reſt that were in priſon. He was a man himſelf of great aſſurance and reſolution, had commanded a company in Ireland, was very intimate with Tir-Oen, and an abſolute creature of the Earl of Eſſex's. This did Croſts immediately diſcover to the Council; inſomuch that Lea was ſought for, and found in the dusk of the evening about the door of the Queen's Privy-chamber. He ſeemed very thoughtful, was extreme pale, and in a great ſweat, and frequently asked, Whether her Majeſty was ready to go to ſupper? and, whether the Council would be there? In this poſture he was ſeized, and examined, the next day had his trial, and by Croſts's evidence, and his own confeſſion, condemned, and carried away to Tyburn; where he owned that he had been indeed a great offender: but as to this deſign, was very innocent; and having moreover proteſted, that he had never entertained the leaſt ill thought againſt the Queen, he was there executed. And this, as the times were, appeared a very ſeaſonable piece of rigour. Camden's Eliz. in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. II. p. 632. edit. 1706.

contempt and indignities offered to thoſe honourable Perſons and Counſellors ſent to call him to his allegiance.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice ſpake to this point, confirming of his own knowledge what the Attorney ſaid, much after the manner it was delivered at the Earl's arraignment. The Attorney, continued he, would of his own knowledge affirm, that all the aſſociates and complices of the Earl in this practice, were of theſe three ſorts; either, Atheiſts, Papiſts, or Men of broken eſtates: for he had looked into them all particularly. Then named he, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and Sir John Davis, known Papiſts: Catesby and Treſham likewiſe; the laſt of which he ſaid was a ſtock, that was genere minax Dei, and was he that abuſed the Lord-Keeper in Eſſex-houſe: Salisbury alſo he named to be a notable villain, and theſe ſeven years together, laid out for by the Lord Chief-Juſtice: and ſo of the reſt he ſaid he could ſpeak.

Mr. Attorney. Beſides, in Ireland, it is plain to be proved, how he held intelligence with Seminaries and Prieſts, entertaining them to deal with the King of Spain and the Pope, to make himſelf King of England.

Capt. Lee. Who, my Lord of Eſſex deal with Seminaries and Prieſts? nay, it is well known he too much diſliked thoſe Pater-noſter fellows to call them to a reckoning in any ſuch matter.

Mr. Attorney ſaid further, It is well known that the Earl of Eſſex uſed this Capt. Lee as a meſſenger to Tyrone, and Tyrone made him his bed-fellow, and Capt. Lee brought a meſſage back to the Earl of Eſſex, as he had confeſſed. Then there was ſome mention of a Letter between them; but I could not well hear what. Then was read Capt. Lee's Confeſſion to that point, how Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, being Marſhal, ſent him to Tyrone, and when he came, he found him very peremptory, uſing inſolent ſpeeches, and condemning our Nation as a baſe people, and ſaid, the Earl of Eſſex was ſent to kill him, but he ſhould not compaſs it; any of his ſlaves might eaſily kill the Earl, but he would not take the life of any. And further, if he would (meaning the Earl of Eſſex) follow his plot, he would make him the greateſt in England. Capt. Lee had them read out all: they left out much matter that ſhould be known.

Mr. Attorney would not have any further thing read, and preſſed further, the circumſtances that Capt. Lee had confeſſed, that made him think the Earl of Eſſex knew of his going; namely, for that the Marſhal was well known not to do ſuch things, of far leſs conſequence, without the Earl's privity and conſent. Again, the Earl of Eſſex made a private ſudden journey to the then houſe of the ſaid Captain Lee, where the ſaid Sir Chriſtopher Blunt lay ſick, and within a day after, Sir Chriſtopher ſent him to Tyrone.

To theſe confeſſions read, Capt. Lee anſwered nothing, as not belonging to the matter of his Indictment.

Mr. Attorney urged, That it was very likely that this man had been made acquainted with theſe late practices; which Captain Lee with proteſtation denied.

Mr. Attorney. Nay, it could not be but he muſt have an ill meaning, that he ſhould offer, as he did, to kill the Earl of Eſſex, flagrante crimine, in that ſort, and after enter into this plot and practice. Mark, ſaid the Attorney, he ſaid they might force her Majeſty to do it: mark this word, force, (which, as I remember, was in ſome part of his own confeſſion) Go in unto her, and never leave her till ſhe had done it.

Capt. Lee. Why I did ſay, with an If; and then I am not a fool, but I know they muſt have been of a reſolution that ſhould have undertaken ſuch a thing, and ſuch as would not fear to diſpleaſe her Majeſty for half an hour, to pleaſe her all her life after: but I never meant to have been an actor myſelf.

The Court affirmed it was Treaſon to undertake to force her Majeſty to do any thing againſt her will.

Capt. Lee. I never undertook it.

Mr. Attorney urged his words to Sir Robert Mansfield riding in his coach after he was apprehended, that ſhewed himſelf guilty: and ſo willed Sir Robert Mansfield ſhould be ſworn.

Sir Robert Mansfield affirmed, That Captain Lee ſhould ſay, that he had humbly ſued to her Majeſty this twelvemonth, that he might be employ'd in ſome ſervice, wherein he might have ſome throats cut; and now he thought he had done ſomewhat to bring him to his end.

Captain Lee ſeemed to take ſome exceptions againſt Sir Robert Mansfield.

Sir Robert Mansfield proteſted he would neither wrong him, nor any man; and but for this cauſe, he had no reaſon to think otherwiſe than well of Captain Lee.

Captain Lee confeſſed he had lived in miſery, and cared not to live, his enemies were ſo many and ſo great.

Mr. Attorney urged her Majeſty's pardon to him heretofore; for he ſaid, he was a man many ways having paſſed the danger of the law, being full of cruelty and blood.

Captain Lee anſwered, it was the worſt thing her Majeſty did for him, to pardon him.

Mr. Attorney. Hark, how ungrateful he is?

Capt. Lee. Nay, I humbly thank her Majeſty for that her grace; but it had been better for me, I had died then. I have loſt a great deal of blood ſince, and now am like to end worſe: and for that it is ſaid I am a bloody man and cruel, I proteſt I have been in her Majeſty's ſervice forward, and indeed in fair fight I would do the worſt againſt her Majeſty's enemies: but when they ſubmitted to my mercy, I ever uſed them but as became a Soldier and a Gentleman, as merciful as any.

My Lord of London told him, he knew it was a common thing in Ireland, they would not believe a man was dead, till his head were off; and ſo you would not have any body perſuaded that you were a traitor, unleſs her Majeſty (God bleſs her) were dead.

Capt. Lee. No, my Lord, I never meant any ſuch thing. You know, my Lord, it was ever my fault to be looſe and laviſh of my tongue; and that was my fault now, and I am like to pay for it.

Then the Jury were put together, who quickly found him guilty.

Upon Verdict given,

Mr. Attorney ſaid, Now, Captain Lee, you may do well to confeſs this matter, what you know, and who ſet you on.

Capt. Lee. What? I am not a fool to be ſet on like a dog upon a bear; nobody ſet me on, for I endeavoured nothing.

Mr.

Mr. Recorder with a very grave admonition to him, to make him ſee his fault, and to fly to God's mercy for pardon, pronounced Judgement; which he took patiently.

They aſked him, what he had to ſay: he anſwered, nothing; but deſired my Lord of London, that he might have one ſent to him, fit for a man in his caſe.

Lord of London. What? you would not have a Jeſuit or a Prieſt.

Capt. Lee. No, I am a Proteſtant: I never liked thoſe Pater-noſter fellows; but I deſire a miniſter, and to receive the ſacrament: and further, I deſire my Lord Chief-Juſtice, that my ſon may have no wrong, and that he may have that little that he had got together, and ſhould leave behind him; for it was his by right, and his ſon might prove an honeſt man, and do his Country good ſervice one day.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. He ſhould have his right; no body ſhould be wronged.

So the Court broke up.

Captain Lee ſtill proteſting he never intended any ſuch thing againſt the Queen, as was laid to his charge; which he continued to affirm afterwards to Mr. Paſfield, to whom he confeſſed his other ſins very freely, even taking his death upon it.

He died the next day at Tyburn very chriſtianly, confeſſing his other vices, but ſtill denying this.

VIII. The Trial of Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gilly Merrick, and Henry Cuffe, March 5, 1600. 43 Eliz. at Weſtminſter; for High-Treaſon *.

The Commiſſioners were,

The Earl of Nottingham, Lord High-Admiral.
The Lord Hunſdon, Lord Chamberlain.
Mr. Secretary Cecil.
The Lord Chief-Juſtice Popham.
Sir John Forteſcue, Chancellor of the Exchequer.
Mr. Secretary Herbert.
With divers of the Judges.

THE Commiſſion being read, the Court proceeded to the Indictment, which was in ſubſtance as follows.

" That on the 8th day of Fe- " bruary laſt, at Eſſex-houſe, they " conſpired the death and diſinheriſon of the " Queen's Majeſty, and on that day cauſed an in" ſurrection of the ſubjects, and made war in Lon- " don againſt the Queen, and intended altering the " Government, State, and Religion now eſtabliſh-

" Queen underſtanding of their intended Treaſons,
" for prevention thereof, upon the 8th of February,
" ſent the Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Worceſter, Sir
" William Knowles, and the Lord Chief-Juſtice,
" to Eſſex-houſe; they then commanded the Earls
" of Eſſex and Southampton upon their allegiance
" to deſiſt from their purpoſes, to diſperſe their " forces aſſembled, and to demean themſelves as " dutiful ſubjects. But they refuſed to obey their " command; and committed them the ſaid Lord-
" Keeper, Earl of Worceſter, Sir William Knowles,
" and the Lord Chief-Juſtice, to be ſtrictly kept
" and detained in Eſſex-houſe, by the ſaid Sir John
" Davis, keeping them in by force; and theſe
" words being uſed by ſome, Kill them! kill them!
" And that the Earl of Eſſex, upon his going out of " the houſe, commanded that if they ſhould offer
" to deliver them out of their cuſtody, or if the " ſaid Earl ſhould miſcarry in London, then they
" ſhould kill the ſaid Privy-Counſellors and the " Earl of Worceſter. And that the ſame day, they
" with the number of 300 men went into the City
" of London, ſeeking to ſtir up ſuch Citizens as " they could move to their Rebellion. And that " the ſaid Sir Charles Davers, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt,
" and Sir John Davis, on the ſaid 8th day of Fe- " bruary, together with the Earl of Eſſex, did
" fortify the ſaid houſe, and armed themſelves
" againſt the Earl of Nottingham, the Queen's
" Lieutenant, and againſt the Queen's Army and " Forces ſent for the ſuppreſſing of the ſaid Re-
" bels."

The Priſoners being demanded, whether they were guilty, or not guilty of the ſeveral Treaſons whereof they were indicted;

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt confeſſed ſeveral of the things contained in the indictment, and would have pleaded not guilty to the reſt †; but the Court told him he muſt plead general, either guilty or not guilty to the † Bacon, who by command of Queen Elizabeth publiſhed a declaration touching the Treaſons of the Earl of Eſſex and his accomplices, (ſee his Works, vol. IV. p. 534.) in that part, which relates to what paſſed at the Arraignment of Blunt, &c. ſays, There were arraigned and tried by a Jury both of Aldermen of London, and other Gentlemen of good credit and ſort, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gilly Merrick and Henry Cuffe; the three firſt whereof, before they pleaded, the whole indictment; and upon evidence excuſe himſelf in what parts he can. Whereupon he pleaded to the Indictment, Not guilty; and put himſelf for his trial to God and his Country.

Sir Charles Davers made the like proteſtation, but was directed by the Court to plead to the Indictment; and ſo he pleaded, Not guilty.

Sir John Davis ſaid, his caſe was different from the reſt; but ſeeing he muſt plead negatively to all, he pleaded not guilty.

Sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe were arraigned upon another Indictment, but upon the points of the former Indictment, ſaving for levying of war in London, and aſſaulting the Queen's forces there, and conſpiring and plotting at Drury-houſe.

Yelverton, the Queen's Serjeant, began the evidence, and opened the Indictment, ſhewed the act itſelf to be Treaſon by the Statute of 25 Edw. 3. therefore for the priſoners to pretend an intent to another purpoſe, is no excuſe.

To alter the State, change the Religion, inforce the Prince to ſettle power, and for ſubjects to ſway things at their liſt, is crimen læſæ majeſtatis; and all Indictments term this Treaſon: for that ſubject that will rule his Prince, will never be ruled by his Prince; and to rule with his Prince, the world may as well bear two ſuns, as the ſtate ſuffer two ſuch governments.

For particular proofs and plain convincing of the parties, there need no other but their confeſſions; which he proteſted, as he would be credited in the world, came voluntarily from every man examined, no man being racked or tormented.

It is not unknown with what clemency the Queen let paſs the offence committed by the Earl in Ireland; ſome of as great place as he, have ſuffered for leſs offence than was proved againſt him at his convention before the Lords. But ſuch was her Majeſty's clemency towards him, as not to ſuffer him to be brought to publick trial for thoſe offences: but he to ſhew the mind he bore, impatient to expect the Queen's leiſure and grace, gives himſelf wholly to think how he may wreſt the Queen to his fancy. He being priſoner in the Lord-Keeper's houſe, the Queen was contented to let him take his choice of any Country in England where to live, only confined with this, that he ſhould hold himſelf a ſubject under her Majeſty's diſpleaſure; yet left to be guarded only with his own diſcretion. This grace notwithſtanding, he ceaſed not to plot with divers foreigners he ſends to in the Low-Countries, practiſes in Ireland, raiſes ſpirits at home in Drury-houſe and Eſſex-houſe, for ſuppreſſing the Queen, calling of a Parliament, taking the Tower, poſſeſſing of London; and this cannot be intended without the deſtruction of her Majeſty: and all theſe Plots, by all their own confeſſions, were conferred and diſputed of divers times. Being ſent for to come before the Lords of her Majeſty's Privy-Council, the Earl refuſes to come; and the ſame night ſends for all his friends and followers to repair to him. The Queen hearing of this, ſends the Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Worceſter, Sir William Knowles, and the Lord Chief-Juſtice unto him. Theſe Counſellors find the outward Court guarded: theſe Counſellors coming to the Earl, command the Earl and all his accomplices to lay down force, and deſiring private conference with the Earl, he refuſeth, and ſaith he will go into London, and take order with the Mayor and Sheriffs of the City, and will then return to them again; ſo confident he was of his own ſtrength and favour of the City. The other matters opened by Mr. Serjeant, were the former points laid in the indictment.

Mr. Attorney-General Coke, coming to urge the evidence, deſired, becauſe the bar was peſtered, to have Sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe removed for a time, which was done. Then Mr. Attorney ſaid, he was now to ſpeak not before common Judges, nor of common matters, but the greateſt and the weightieſt cauſe that ever he had to deal in, tho' he had now ſerved the Queen ſome time.

The Queen's Serjeant hath generally delivered the matter, and he was now to prove what had been opened, wherewith he had ſtriven with himſelf to have ſpoken nothing of him that dead is; but unavoidable neceſſity forced to name him, but it ſhould be with theſe two cautions: firſt, to ſpeak nothing but what the very matter enforceth; ſecondly, to ſay nothing but that without all con-pleaded, asked this queſtion of the Judges, Whether they might not confeſs the Indictment in part, and plead Not guilty to it in the other part. But being reſolved by the Judges, that their pleading muſt be general; they pleaded Not guilty, as did likewiſe the other two, without any ſuch queſtion asked. The reaſon of that queſtion was, as they confeſſed, in reſpect of the clauſe laid in the Indictment: That they intended and compaſſed the death and deſtruction of the Queen's Majeſty; unto whoſe perſon (although they confeſſed at the bar, as they had done in their examinations, that their meaning was to come to her in ſuch ſtrength, as they ſhould not be reſiſted, and to require of her divers conditions and alterations of Government, ſuch as in their confeſſions are expreſſed) nevertheleſs they proteſted, they intended no perſonal harm to herſelf. Whereupon, (as at the Arraignment of the two Earls) ſo then again the Judges delivered the rule of the Law; that the wiſdom and foreſight of the laws of this land maketh this judgment, That the Subject that rebelleth or riſeth in forcible manner to overrule the royal will and power of the King, intendeth to deprive the King both of crown and life: and that the law judgeth not of the fact by the intent, but of the intent by the fact. And the Queen's Council did again inforce that point, ſetting forth that it was no myſtery or quiddity of the common law, but it was a concluſion infallible of reaſon and experience: for that the crown was not a ceremony or garland, but conſiſted of preeminence and power.

And therefore, when the Subject will take upon him to give law to the King, and to make the power ſovereign and commanding, to become ſubject and commanded; ſuch ſubject layeth hold of the Crown, and taketh the ſword out of the King's hands. And that the Crown was faſtened ſo cloſe upon the King's head, that it cannot be pulled off, but that head and life, and all will follow, as all examples, both in foreign ſtories and here at home do make manifeſt. And therefore, when their words did proteſt one thing, and their deeds did teſtify another; they were but like the Precedent of the proteſtation uſed by Manlius the lieutenant of Catiline, that conſpired againſt the ſtate of Rome, who began his Letter to the Senate with theſe words, Deos hominesque teſtor, Patres conſcripti, nos nihil aliud, &c.

And it was ſaid further, that admitting their proteſtations were ſo far true, that they had not at that time in their minds a formed and diſtinct cogitation to have deſtroyed the Queen's perſon: yet nothing was more variable and mutable than the mind of man, and ſpecially Honores mutant mores: when they were once aloft, and had the Queen in their hands, and were Peers in my Lord of Eſſex's Parliament, who could promiſe of what mind they would then be? eſpecially, when my Lord of Eſſex at his arraignment had made defence of his firſt action of impriſoning the Privy-Counſellors, by pretence that he was inforced to it by his unruly company. So that if themſelves ſhould not have had, or would not ſeem to have had that extreme and deviliſh wickedneſs of mind, as to lay violent hands upon the Queen's ſacred Perſon: yet, what muſt be done to ſatisfy the multitude, and ſecure their party, muſt be then the queſtion. Wherein the example was remembred of Richard the Third, who (though he were King in poſſeſſion, and the rightful inheritors but infants) could never ſleep quiet in his bed, till they were made away. Much leſs would a Catilinary knot and combination of Rebels (that did riſe without ſo much as the fume of a title) ever endure, that a Queen that had been their Sovereign, and had reigned ſo many years in ſuch renown and policy, ſhould be longer alive, than made for their own turn.

This ſhort Extract from Bacon, is the chief part of what is call'd, The Trial of Sir Chriſtopher Blunt in State-Trials, vol. I. p. 202. Edit. 1730.

contradiction was true. The queſtion now is not to you, my Maſters of the Jury, whether Sir Chriſtopher Blunt is guilty of Treaſon, yea or no; for he confeſſes himſelf guilty of matter which is rebellion and inſurrection, and that of itſelf is flat Treaſon.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid hereupon, that he was now a man, what through weakneſs of his hurts, and through grief of his action, not himſelf, ſcarce compos mentis; therefore deſired not to be concluded by what he ſaid, for he hoped the Lords had call'd him thither rather to confeſs his faults, than to excuſe or defend them.

Mr. Attorney ſaid, they muſt now proceed, and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt is not now alone in queſtion: but as the Earl is concerned and intereſted in this cauſe, for order of proceeding, there was no man in the world but muſt be ruled by reaſon and by precedent; therefore if by theſe all men muſt, then would he ſo proceed againſt him.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt deſired them to proceed againſt the others, for he would confeſs all that had been ſaid. But Mr. Attorney deſired to be heard againſt him, ut pœna ſit paucis culpa ab aliis. Now, to ſhew this point of treaſon, the indictment containeth the matters touching the Queen's perſon. In private caſes, if the ſervants ſhall come to their maſters with armed petitions, this is a ſhew of diſobedience, and tendeth to deſtruction. To prove the point of notiora, 8 Hen. VIII. the Labourers of Kent made an inſurrection againſt the Statute of Labourers, for the increaſing of their wages. Finieux, and all the Judges then reſolved this to be Treaſon. Trin. 37 Eliz. the Prentices in London, making a rout in Southwark, upon information made againſt them in the Star-Chamber, ſome of them were ſentenced to be whipped; whereupon others conſpire to riſe at Burhill, and agree to whip the Mayor for ſuffering the Prentices to be whipped. And this intending to riſe and make an inſurrection, was reſolved by all the Judges to be Treaſon.

39 Eliz. Bradſhaw, and others in Oxfordſhire, riſing to overthrow cloſes, and to reſtore tillage; the riſing was at Inſlow-hill, the indictment was of treaſon and conſpiring the Queen's death, and adjudged treaſon againſt the Perſon of the Queen. Now, if the law make this conſtruction of the acts of mechanical men, what ſhall be thought of the acts of Earls, and other ſtrong Perſons intending to ſurprize the Tower, to take the City, poſſeſs themſelves of the Court, to call a Parliament, to change Government, to tolerate Religion? Theſe intents of force muſt needs tend to Treaſon. The Prentices of London, the men of Oxfordſhire, were hanged, drawn and quartered.

The Chief-Juſtice Popham delivered the reaſons of all this to be, for that by force to compel the Prince to any government, is in itſelf Treaſon.

The Attorney. He that conſpires to take London, and to ſurprize the Court, this doth merely concern the State: but this Catiline company, to conſpire againſt the Queen herſelf, this concerns more! but the toleration of Religion, this of all things concerns moſt! for from before her coming to the Crown, her Majeſty having holden ſo conſtant profeſſion of the Religion now eſtabliſhed, and ſince her reign, ſo bleſſed of God in it; and for her now, by compulſion or otherwiſe, to be drawn to change it, what impiety and ingratitude againſt God, were it to think it? This quarrel for the changing of Religion, was the great cauſe of the Spaniſh Invaſion intended in 88. and the many treacheries againſt the Queen's perſon, by poiſoning her gloves, the pomel of her ſaddle, and many other ways: therefore at the requeſt or compulſion of a ſubject to change this true profeſſed Religion, her Majeſty would rather loſe her Crown, and venture her Perſon itſelf in defence thereof, than ever ſuffer or endure it. Adeo periculoſum is this to think? Theſe things I have ſhewed for precedents. Now for ſtory, ſee the Chronicles of our own Kingdoms. Queen Iſabel, in the time of King Edward II. aſſembles great numbers, pretending for the good of the King and the Church; this was a glorious pretence! but ſhe being upon the wings of her power, calling a Parliament in the name of the King, ſeeks the overthrow of the King, ſpecioſaque nomina culpis imponis. But the cataſtrophe, the concluſion was the ſmothering of the King, and putting to death the Treaſurer and Chancellor: for, ſaid ſhe, the letter of the law is ſuch, as we are all traitors; therefore ſo long as the King lives, we are all in danger. The ſtory of Richard II. the Act of 1 Henry IV. calling a Parliament, putting the King in Pomfret-Caſtle, and the King's death following, are dangerous precedents, and too fitting theſe indictments. This treaſon's bird hath been long a hatching, like unto an Elephant's whelp, long a breeding, but bred in a hollow-tree, and diſcovered before it was fledged.

It was forecaſt, that if they were few, it would not be acted; if they were many, it would not be concealed: therefore reſolved few ſhould know it. And upon the ſudden, even when the matter was to be acted, then all to have notice of it. And for the tale of being to be murdered in his bed, or to be ſet upon by Sir Walter Raleigh going to the Lord-Treaſurer's, this was but a buz, and ſo invented by them for a buz: but on the other ſide, it ſhall be proved directly, that they intended to kill Sir Walter Raleigh. It was objected, that the Queen's forces that would be ſuddenly raiſed, would be an impediment to this action; but to prevent this, it was reſolved to pretend that the State generally was with them now, where it may be ſome may think themſelves excuſable of Treaſon, becauſe they knew not of the Treaſon intended, tho' they were preſent in the thing acted. For the clearing of this, Mr. Attorney referred himſelf to the opinion of the Judges in this point; whereupon it was delivered by my Lord Chief-Juſtice,

That in caſe, where ſome pretended Treaſon, and others accompanied and aſſiſted them in any action, tho' not knowing of the Treaſon intended, yet were they all offenders in Treaſon.

And for the honour of the Indictment, and manifeſting the due of their proceedings, Mr. Secretary deſired their judgements, whether in caſe, when men were actors and abetters in ſuch a matter, whether the law charged them not in this point with direct Treaſon againſt the Perſon of the Prince; which was affirmed by the Judges to be ſo, and the indictment muſt ſo charge them.

Now, for ſeveral proofs againſt every ſeveral perſon then arraigned, he would firſt begin with Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and with his own confeſſion againſt him. The confeſſion of Sir Chriſtopher

Blunt *, contained this, That the 20th of January, he was ſent for by the Earl of Eſſex to come up to London; whereupon he came, and was at Drury-houſe when the conference was there the Sunday or Monday ſevennight before the going into London, but came when the conference was ended. The reaſon of their going into London, as they did on Sunday the 8th of February, was, becauſe the alarm was given at the Court, and knowing into what hazard the Earl adventured, he went with him for ſafety of the Earl's life, as far as there might be power in him, and thought it lawful for ſubjects to uſe force for their ſafety, and the ſettling of true Religion. And being aſked by Mr. Attorney, whether he was privy to the purpoſe of taking the Court; ſaid, he was privy to the conference of going to take the Court, but it was a thing firſt to be conſidered of, but not reſolved. And being further aſked by the Secretary, if in their conference it was not reſolved, that if the Earl prevailed, and came to the authority he ſhot at, he would have ſuffered Toleration of Religion? anſwered, that he thought ſo; and ſaid, he ſhould be to blame to deny it: for the Earl had many times ſaid to him, that he liked not the forcing of men's conſciences; and in his uſual talk would ſay, he miſliked that any ſhould be troubled for their conſcience. And in a ſecond confeſſion, he ſet down, that the Earl five days before his going into London, wrote down with his own hand, certain articles to be diſputed upon; whereof one was, whether they ſhould take the Tower; another, touching the ſurprizing of the Court; and that the Earl uſually ſpoke of this purpoſe, to alter the government of the Realm. But the Examinant deſired that might not have been ſet down, becauſe it was no grace unto the reſt.

Mr. Secretary deſired to know the reaſon wherefore he would not have had this ſet down, which he underſtood to be, for that the confeſſion was ſo liberal of matters ſo foul, as this being added, it would embroider the reſt.

But Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, he was miſtaken; but the altering of the Government being moved, and the removing of the Secretary, he deſired forbearance to expreſs any further matter, for gracing of himſelf. And in the ſaid confeſſion, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſeemed to diſſuade from the attempt intended, but utterly diſliked the taking of the Court at that time of the night.

For farther proof againſt Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, that he had wrought with the Earl for a Toleration of Religion, and ſought to ſeduce Sir John Davis; the confeſſion of Sir John Davis was read, wherein it was ſet down, that Sir John Davis aſking of Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, if the Earl had promiſed Toleration of Religion, the Catholick Religion; Sir Chriſtopher Blunt anſwered, that the Earl gave good hope of it. And Davis in his confeſſion ſet down, that principally by the perſuaſion of Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, he became a Catholick; therefore being taken and committed to Mr. Mompeſſon's, he deſired Mr. Mompeſſon to help him to a Prieſt. But at the Bar, Davis ſaid, that many times he had conference with Sir Chriſtopher Blunt touching Religion, but he was not the original perſuader of him unto that Religion; but being bred up in Oxford, his Tutor, Mr. Allen, was a Catholick, and from him he took it, and hath ever lived free from giving offence by his profeſſion; and ſaving this unhappy action, he hath always been loyal and obedient to law, hath accompanied the Earl ordinarily at ſummons, and communicated with him; and the reaſon of his words upon his firſt commitment, was ſuppoſing Mr. Mompeſſon to have been a Catholick, did requeſt him to help him to a Prieſt, but grieved afterwards he was deceived in Mr. Mompeſſon. And the Lord-Admiral proteſted he knew that Mr. Mompeſſon was not affected to that Religion, which Sir John Davis thought to be true; but ſaid, Mr. Mompeſſon had not kept word with him, for he promiſed upon his credit not to reveal his requeſt.

And to prove Sir Chriſtopher Blunt was an author, and a chief ſtirrer of the Rebellion in London, the confeſſion of the Lord Sands was read, wherein was ſet down, that he went with the Earl to Sheriff Smith's, but went not into the houſe: but being ſent for by the Earl, went with him, and came back with him towards Ludgate; and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt and the Lord Sands, at the chain before their coming to Ludgate, gave charge upon the Queen's forces, and were both hurt at that place.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt at the Bar confeſſed he was too forward in that action, and gave charge upon the Pikes, but denied the killing of ..... at that place, which Mr. Attorney charged him withal; but he deſired Mr. Attorney to think charitably of him, and not to charge him with that man's blood.

Then Mr. Attorney proceeded to prove, that where it was pretended and given out for a buz, that Sir Walter Raleigh ſhould have ſought to have murdered the Earl, that indeed they ſought to murder Sir Walter Raleigh, to which purpoſe the confeſſion of Sir Ferdinando Gorge was read; wherein was contained, that the Earl and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, that Sunday-morning that Sir Walter Raleigh had ſent to ſpeak with him, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt adviſed Gorge to kill him; and to this end, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſent four ſhot after him when he went to ſpeak with Sir Walter Raleigh.

But Blunt ſaid, that Sir Ferdinando Gorge did much wrong him in ſo ſaying; but confeſſed, that in reſpect Sir Ferdinando Gorge was to be one of the principal executioners in this buſineſs, he wiſhed Gorge not to go naked to Sir Walter Raleigh, nor to go home to him, but to meet him upon the water, and to take ſome piſtols with him, that in caſe Sir Walter Raleigh ſhould not ſuffer him to come off, that then he ſhould be of force to come away, and bring Sir Walter Raleigh with him; and this was his advice.

And being aſked by Mr. Secretary, whether he thought, or was perſuaded that my Lord Cobham, or Sir Walter Raleigh intended any ſuch thing againſt the Earl?

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt anſwered, that he did not believe that they ever meant any ſuch matter, nor the Earl himſelf feared it not, only it was a word caſt out to colour other matters.

Gorge alſo confeſſed, that the Earl intended, after he had poſſeſſed himſelf of the Court, then to have gone into London with ſome principal Officers of the State carried with him, and after a while to have called a Parliament, and ſettled things to his liking.

And

* See alſo Bacon's Works, vol. IV. p. 537. for the ſeveral confeſſions relating to Eſſex's conſpiracy, as ſigned before the Lords, and others of the Council.

And Mr. Secretary ſaid, that Sir Ferdinando Gorge being confronted with the Earl, had ſaid as much; and to ſatisfy thoſe queſtions, would have had Gorge ſent for.

To prove that Sir Chriſtopher Blunt would not take notice of the Proclamation publiſhed in London by an Herald at Arms, the confeſſion of Capt. Edward Bromley was read, wherein was ſet down, that the Earl coming from Sheriff Smith's houſe, ſaw in Gracechurch-ſtreet an Herald at Arms, and ſent Sir Chriſtopher Blunt to him, to tell him, that he ſhould not approach the Earl, for he would not hear him abuſe the Queen's name. And to prove that Sir Chriſtopher Blunt was a chief director of things done in the houſe that Sunday-morning the 8th of February, it was ſhewed, that Mr. Killegrew of the Privy-chamber coming that morning to Eſſex-houſe, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt meets him in the Court, and Mr. Killegrew told him, that he had a meſſage from the Queen to Sir William Knowles; and hearing by Sir Chriſtopher Blunt that Sir William was gone, he would have gone back again, but Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid he muſt not go; and ſmiling upon him, wiſhed him not to take it diſcourteouſly, for he muſt ſtay him.

But Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid hereupon at the Bar, that the reaſon of the ſtaying of Mr. Killegrew, was this; Mr. Killegrew being a Gentleman whom he knew the Queen truſted, he told him, he would deſire him to ſtay in the houſe, and hear the matter, and ſee their proceedings, that ſo he might truly inform the Queen of that which he knew would be diverſly and ſtrangely ſpoken of.

But againſt this, Mr. Killegrew himſelf ſaid, that he was ſtaid by Sir Chriſtopher Blunt by theſe words; "I muſt deal ſomewhat unmannerly with you, and "ſtay you now till you have ſpoken with my Lord;" and ſent Sir John Davis to go tell my Lord of Eſſex: whereupon the Earl, accompanied with divers others, came to Mr. Killegrew.

Mr. Attorney perceiving ſome ſhiftings in Sir Chriſtopher Blunt's anſwers, willed him to confeſs things plainly, otherwiſe he would prove him guilty of the Earl's death.

Whereupon Sir Chriſtopher Blunt wiſhed that his death were worthy to reſtore the Earl to life again; but for his confeſſions, they had always been plain and true from the firſt, and plain to all he knew: wherein he appealed to Mr. Secretary, if he had found other by him.

Mr. Secretary acknowledged that he had always found him to deal honeſtly and plainly.

Now, to come to the great matter againſt Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and the reſt. The Queen's Majeſty having intelligence of their intended treaſons, yet graciouſly diſpoſed to extenuate the offence of the Earl, commands her Privy-Council to meet at the Lord-Treaſurer's houſe on Saturday at night, and that night ſends Mr. Secretary Herbert to the Earl, to ſignify unto him, that it was the Queen's pleaſure he ſhould repair unto her Council there; but the Earl refuſed to come. Mr. Secretary Herbert, the rather to invite his coming, offered to go in the coach with him alone without any light, or take boat and go by water, that they ſhould go and come without being diſcerned by any; but the Earl ſtill refuſed.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt confeſſed he heard of Mr. Secretary Herbert's coming, but wiſhed to God he had dealt more peremptorily with the Earl.

Mr. Secretary Herbert ſaid, he was not to be more peremptory with him than in the words of the Queen's own meſſage, which he delivered directly.

Mr. Secretary Cecil affirmed, that ſuch was the reſpect given to the Earl, and that nothing ſhould break out to the underſtanding of others, as it was once reſolved all the Council to have gone home to him to his own houſe.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, that the Earl kept very ſecret to himſelf the cauſe of his ſending for to the Lords of the Council, and what Mr. Secretary Herbert's meſſage was; for being aſked what it was, he ſaid, that ſuch was the Queen's opinion of him, for all thoſe diſgraces, as her Council being to conſult of great matters, ſhe had ſent to have him amongſt them, and to have his opinion.

Mr. Attorney further urged, that the Queen's exceeding favour reſted not there, but even the ſame Sunday morning before his going into London, the Queen ſent Mr. Secretary Herbert to him, to ſignify to him, that her pleaſure was he ſhould come before her Council, which he refuſed again; and thus was it true with him, that conſuetudo peccandi, did tollere ſenſum peccati. Her Majeſty notwithſtanding, after both theſe refuſals, vouchſafeth again the ſending unto him, maketh choice of his beſt friends and neareſt allies he had in the Court; the Lord-Keeper, the Lord Chief-Juſtice, two that loved him exceedingly well while he ſtood a good ſervant and a true ſubject; the Earl of Worceſter and Sir William Knowles his near kinſmen. Theſe Lords valiantly, (for ſo I will term it, and to their honours I will ſpeak it, that it ſhall appear that in ſome gown-men there reſts as valiant minds, where the cauſe requires it, as in them that wear ſwords:) The Lord-Keeper ſtoutly in the midſt of his armed troops, commands the Earl upon his allegiance to deſiſt from his purpoſe, and to lay down arms, when others in the tumult cried, my Lord, my Lord, you ſtay too long; others ſaid, kill them! kill them! and at this time, Blunt adviſed the Earl to impriſon them, which is Treaſon in itſelf.

But Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, that his advice to my Lord then was, that the place was unfit to talk in, being openly in the Court, and that therefore he would withdraw into ſome private place.

But my Lord Chief-Juſtice Popham ſaid, that he himſelf hearing the company tumultuouſly cry, away, away, you loſe time, hereupon he ſtept to the Earl, and perſuaded him to withdraw into ſome place private, and there to conſult with them. And to manifeſt in what manner the Lords were received and uſed, and how they found the houſe at their coming in, a Narrative was read, ſet down by my Lord-Keeper all under his own hand-writing, which was thus: That coming to Eſſex-houſe the 8th of February, about ten of the clock in the morning, they found the gates ſhut. Upon their knocking, the wicket was opened, but none of their ſervants ſuffered to enter in with them, ſave only J. Hughs who carried the Great-Seal. From the Gate to the houſe-door ſtood a guard of ſhot on both ſides; at their coming in, the company aſſembled tumultuouſly together; before their coming to the hall-door, the Earls of Eſſex, Rutland, and Southamptom came and met them, and divers others flocked about the Earl. The Lord-Keeper ſtepping to the Earl of Eſſex, told him, that they were ſent to know the cauſe of their grievance; if there was any, the Queen would hear it. But hearing that he had aſſembled ſo many into that houſe, and not knowing for what cauſe, the Queen had commanded them to command him to diſperſe thoſe companies. The Earl anſwered, that his life had been ſought, he had been perfidiouſly dealt with, and for his defence that company of his followers and friends were gathered together. The Lord-Keeper anſwered, if any ſuch matter was, he ſhould be heard and relieved. Hereupon the Earl of Southampton ſaid, that he was aſſaulted in the ſtreet by the Lord Gray. The Lord Chief-Juſtice anſwered, he had Juſtice for that. The company gathering thick about them, the Lord-Keeper deſired the Earl of Eſſex to draw aſide; and they conferring ſecretly, the company cried, All, all. The Lord-Keeper told the Earl, that if he had any wrong done him, he ſhould be honourably righted. Then the company cried, Away, away, my Lord, they betray you, they undo you. All this while they were bare, but hereupon the Lord-Keeper put on his hat, and commanded the Earls upon their allegiance to deſiſt, and lay down their weapons: and private conference being again deſired, they were carried up into the great chamber; and as they went, ſome ſaid, Throw the Great-Seal out of the window; ſome ſaid, kill them, kill them; others, cried, away, away. Then they were led into one of the Earl's cloſets. The Lord-Keeper preſſing to ſpeak with the Earl, he ſaid, my Lord, be patient a while; I will go take advice, ſpeak with my Lord-Mayor, and the Sheriffs of London, and will be with you again within this half hour. Then the Earl departed, and left them to the cuſtody of Sir John Davis, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and Sir Gilly Merrick. The Lords being thus in cuſtody, deſired leave to be gone, or that they might ſend one to the Queen to let her know how they were uſed: but this was denied them; and anſwered, that the Earl would return ſhortly, and till his return, they muſt not let them go.

The Earl of Rutland's confeſſion being read after the former narration of the Lord-Keeper's; thereby it appeared, that the Earls of Eſſex and Southampton and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt of long time had been diſcontented, and that Blunt many times adviſed the Earl to ſtand upon his guard; and it was the advice of the Earl of Southampton, Blunt and Davis, that the Lords ſhould be detained.

For the Earl of Rutland himſelf, Mr. Secretary ſaid, he thought him not to be acquainted with the plot; and the Earl of Eſſex himſelf had ſaid that the Earl of Rutland was not privy to it: for his conceit of him was, and thus ſaid, that the Earl of Rutland knew it but two hours before. And ſaid Mr. Secretary, if equality of juſtice would ſuffer it, he wiſhed that no blood more might be ſpilt; for it was not the blood of any man that was required, and the Queen ſhould gain more by their lives than by their deaths; and doubted not but her Majeſty, in this lamentable accident, would triumph in mercy, but where and when there ſhould appear no other cauſe but merely her exceeding mercy. The Earl of Rutland's confeſſion ſhewed further, that Blunt, when their going to the Court was intended, ſaid, O how fearful, and of how ſeveral humours ſhall we find them, when we come to the Court!

Further, to enforce the hard uſage of the Lords, the confeſſion of one Whittington, was read, who ſaid, That after the Lord-Keeper and the other Lords were in the inner room, other company coming up towards the place, ſwore they would ſtab and kill the Counſellors; whereupon Whittington ſent to the Earl of Eſſex, how violently ſome men preſſed, how cruelly they meant againſt the Counſellors? Sir Chriſtopher Blunt hearing theſe words, ſaid it was no time now to make orations. Whereupon the Earl of Eſſex preſently departed, and word left, that if the Earl of Eſſex miſcarried in London, or if they offered to eſcape before his return, then the Lord-Keeper and the Chief-Juſtice ſhould be killed.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice hereupon aſked Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, why they ſtood at the great chamber-door with muſkets charged and matches in their hands; which, through the key-hole, the Lord Chief-Juſtice ſaid, he diſcerned.

Davis anſwered, and ſaid, he was charged with the cuſtody of the Lords, but againſt his will, for he much more deſired to have gone with the Earl into London, and that the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Davers, or ſome other might have kept them; but the Earl of Eſſex ſaid no, he would but go take order with London, and come again within half an hour, in the mean time he ſhould keep them. Then Captain Salisbury having the guard of the muſkets, was very violent and ſo diſordered, as he doubted what he would attempt, and, contrary to the will of others, brought up the ſhot ſo near the door. And Sir John Davis ſaid, that leſt the fury of Salisbury ſhould attempt beyond that was meant, he ſometimes paſſed amongſt the ſhot, and to ſatisfy the Lords that no harm was meant them, he came in to them, whom when he perceived in ſome fear, he aſſured them that there ſhould be no force offered them.

But the Lord Chief-Juſtice told Sir John Davis at the Bar, that he had no reaſon to think they were in fear, and bad him tell what words the Chief-Juſtice then uſed, which were theſe: If they did take their lives, it was but the cutting off of a few years; and when Gorge came, and would have let out the Lord Chief-Juſtice only, he refuſed to go except they might all go, and ſaid, as they came together, ſo they would go together, or die together.

And Sir John Davis ſaid, that the better to aſſure the Lords that no harm was meant them, he went up to the Ladies, and intreated the Counteſs of Eſſex to come down and be amongſt them; ſhe making ſome pauſe at it, ſaying, with what comfort can I go amongſt them? he perſuaded her to go and be amongſt them, the better to aſſure them that no barbarous uſage ſhould be offered unto them. And that he behaved himſelf reſpectfully towards them, being uncovered before them, when others ſtood covered by them: and ſuch proviſions as the houſe had, he prepared for them, and ſet them a dinner.

But the Lord Chief-Juſtice ſaid, my Lord-Keeper and he, told Davis, they would eat none of my Lord's meat.

But at the coming down of the Counteſs amongſt the Counſellors, Sir John Davis ſaid, that he perceiving the Lords in great doubt what the Earl meant, and hearing them ſay to my Lady, what a ſtrange courſe is this the Earl of Eſſex taketh? thereupon Sir John Davis ſaid, that if he did perceive that the Earl intended any hurt unto the Queen, his ſword ſhould be the firſt that ſhould be drawn againſt him. And the Lord Chief Juſtice aſking what was become of the Earl all that while, they having having then ſtaid from eleven of the clock till it was almoſt two, ſaid, the Earl will be deceived of his purpoſe, if he hope upon the city, for the Citizens are faithful to the Queen. Then Davis anſwered, the Earl had good hope of the city. It being replied, that perhaps ſome looſe people might fall in to him, but he could have no good hopes of any that were ſubſtantial and good Citizens; Davis ſaid, my Lord is ſure of the city, for of twenty-four Aldermen he is ſure of twenty-one; and my Lord in this action will ſet ſuch aids in the city in all places, as no ſpoil ſhall happen.

But to the honour of the City of London, Mr. Attorney often repeated, that of all the City, not one man, ſave only one ſorry prentice, was found to take part with him, and of Inns-of-Court Men, not one man that followed him.

Sir John Davis being farther aſked, when he firſt was made acquainted with this purpoſe of the Earl's, he ſaid he knew not of it till the Sunday ſevennight before their riſing, and then their purpoſe was to ſurprize the Court at ſuch a time as he ſhould have ſmall oppoſition; and that they met twice that Sunday or Monday before their riſing, at Drury-houſe, when they conſulted about ſurprizing the Tower and the Court. But debating long, they could not agree; whereupon breaking off, the Earl ſaid he would ſet order for all himſelf, ſince they could not agree on it; which were the Earl of Southampton, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, and Sir John Davis.

Hereupon Mr. Secretary told Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, that the Earl had confeſſed that he had been a principal inſtigator of him to theſe acts, and a mover of him to plots more pernicious to the State than theſe.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, Hath my Lord that gone is, ſaid ſo by me? Well, ſince I am ſo nearly touched in honour, and my reputation ſo far charged, I will tell you, Mr. Secretary, what I have counſelled him, and what I have kept him from.

Mr. Secretary ſaid, the Earl for part of his Sacrifice to God, hath left it under his own hand all that he could diſcloſe of all confederation in this matter.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſeemed ready at the Bar to have diſcloſed further matter againſt the Earl, but referred to my Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary, whether he ſhould there utter it, or privily deliver it to them two; which afterwards he did, being brought into the Court of Wards to them after Judgement was given.

Mr. Attorney proceeding with his evidence, deſired attention, ſaying, That the laſt day he gave evidence againſt the Earl, ſince which time it had been rumoured, that tho' the letter of the Law was ſtrong againſt the Earl, and his act expounded by the Law to be treaſon, yet his intention was not to touch the Queen's perſon or her State. But the Earl himſelf (whoſe Soul he doubted not but was with God, for his end was moſt penitent and chriſtian,) before his death revoked all his Juſtifications made at his arraigning, ſave only one original purpoſe, not to lay hands upon the Queen; and took it upon his death, that he meant not to lay violent hands upon the Queen's perſon: yet remembring the tumultuous behaviour of them in his company at his houſe, ſaid, that he feared he ſhould have been forced to ſome wrong againſt the Queen's perſon.

Whereupon the Lord Admiral affirmed, that the Earl of Eſſex ſaid, It was fit he ſhould die, for the Queen could not live and he too.

Mr. Secretary alſo delivered how clear a confeſſion the Earl had made of all things; how long time four of them of her Majeſty's Privy-Council at his intreaty had ſpent with him in the Tower upon Saturday before, and how he had revoked thoſe imputations he had caſt upon ſome men, and thoſe aſſeverations uſed in his own defence. Therefore for his part, he muſt needs judge charitably of him, and forgive ſuch wrongs as the Earl had done him; and if the diabolical imputation which the Earl at his arraignment caſt upon him, further moved him to impatiency than his wont was, or was fit, he deſired them that heard it to pardon him for the provocation made him to forget all bands of ſpeech.

Now was read ſome parts of the Earl's laſt confeſſion, which contained four ſheets of paper, all written with the Earl's hand, and it being ſhewed to Cuffe at the Bar, he acknowledged it to be the Earl's hand-writing. Out of the Earl's confeſſion this was only read: That Blunt, Cuffe, Temple, and ſome others, tho' they were not preſent at Drury-houſe, yet they were privy to more dangerous practices and plots than theſe. And Cuffe being brought face to face before the Earl, the Earl charged him to call to God for mercy, and deal truly with the Queen; for he being to go out of the World, muſt deal truly with his ſoul. Cuffe ſaid, it was long before he could be allowed pen and ink to write; elſe the Earl himſelf would have cleared him, as he did in theſe things, that in a few words he ſet down: which being read to the Earl, he ſaid, true; and ſtill as he read, he ſaid, true; out of which Cuffe would infer, that the Earl being truly remembred of things paſſed, would have cleared, and not left an accuſation upon him. But theſe ſeemed to be other matters than ſuch wherewith the Earl had charged him. And Cuffe denied not, but being confronted by the Earl, the words aforeſaid were uſed to him. Then was read an abſtract of the Earl's confeſſion in theſe words:

He thanked God that he was thus prevented, for otherwiſe he knew not what miſery might have befallen this land. He ſaid, that men would wonder, if they knew how many motions had been made unto him to remove the evils of the Commonwealth. He confeſſed that his rebellion was firſt plotted when he was priſoner at the Lord-Keeper's houſe; he intended to have ſurprized the Court with a power of men, and afterward the Tower, to have countermined his actions, and been a bridle to the City, and then to have called a Parliament. He ſaid, that London was a danger unto his ſoul, and the cauſe of his rebellion; for if he had not truſted to thoſe of London, he had not taken this courſe. He called the men of London a baſe and cowardly people, ſaying, that he drove them from their barricadoes with two rapiers a-croſs, and would undertake to ſack London with four hundred men. He called himſelf a burden unto the Commonwealth to be ſpewed out. He called this his ſin, a great ſin, a bloody ſin, a crying ſin, and an infectious ſin, infecting with a leproſy both far and near. He deſired his life to be ſhortned, for that he knew the Queen could not be ſafe ſo long as he himſelf was living. He deſired private death, to avoid the acclamations of the people.

This abſtract read, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, he muſt needs confeſs he was privy to the ſpleen that was carried againſt Mr. Secretary, and was too far conſenting to his hurt; but never gave allowance, or was mover of the Earl to this plot.

Mr. Secretary interrupting him, wiſhed him to conceal nothing that tended to the diſcovery of theſe treaſons. For matter of injury intended againſt him, he wiſhed not the naming of them, he did forgive them.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſaid, that was favour out of his charitable diſpoſition, more than he himſelf was worthy of.

Mr. Attorney proceeding, ſaid, the Queen had charged thoſe of her Council to ſay nothing in this buſineſs, but what might plainly be proved, if it were objected; for ſhe would go with her juſtice untouched: therefore he would open matters, and which though they of the Jury need not to take as any part of their evidence; yet becauſe they were true, and fortified the matter divulged and proclaimed through the Realm, for the honour of the Queen, though againſt an Earl that was executed, he would diſcloſe unto them how this Treaſon had a deeper root than moſt were aware of: wherefore you ſhall plainly have it proved unto you, That there was a correſpondence betwixt the Earl of Eſſex, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and the arch-traytor Tyrone; and this ſhall be proved unto you by the Earl's own creatures. Thus it fell out, after he had ſixteen thouſand foot, and thirteen hundred horſe under his charge; ſuch an army, as he himſelf ſaid, ſhould make the earth to tremble where he went. It was pretended by him that he would go into the north againſt the rebel, but never intended, as appeared; for Lee muſt go to the Rebel, but the Earl muſt not know it; and Blunt muſt ſuffer it, being Marſhal, but give no warrant for it. Lee goes to Tyrone, finds the rebel up in proud terms againſt the Engliſh nation, railing againſt the Earl of Eſſex, as that he ſought his life, and hired ſome about him to perform; which was a baſer thing than ever he had offered to his father, or would do againſt him: but theſe terms were after qualified. Lee returning, brings anſwer from Tyrone, that he deſired conference with the Earl, and would give his ſon for pledge, and ſends word that if the Earl would follow his counſel, he would make him the greateſt man that ever was in England. Lee being returned, the Earl of Eſſex repairs to the place where Sir Chriſtopher Blunt lay, where this being told him, he ſhook his head at it, but ſaid nothing. Now the Earl of Eſſex gathers his army towards winter, takes his journey towards the north, goes with pretence to fight; but coming there, entertains a parley with the Rebel; being jealous leſt any ſhould hear it, takes order that the Earl of Southampton ſhould keep all men from coming near, and he alone goes to parley with the Rebel. The effect of this was confeſſed by Lee while he lived, and to make it evident, the plotting of treaſon between thoſe two Earls, you ſhall underſtand it by an intelligence that paſſed, which were it not the thing had been ſeverally plotted, it had been impoſſible to have been advertiſed: for no bird upon her wing could have carried the news in that time. Sir William Warren, a man moſt truſted by the Rebel of any Engliſhman, he went to Tyrone the 28th of September; the Earl of Eſſex landed in England but the 26th of September; and Tyrone could then tell Warren, that he ſhould ſee a ſtrange alteration in England ſhortly, and it ſhould not be long e'er he ſhould ſee him have a good ſhare in England. This paſſed in the north of Ireland. In the ſouth of Ireland, one Mac-Pueys, Secretary, confeſſed, That it was agreed, the Earl of Eſſex ſhould be King of England, and Tyrone Viceroy of Ireland. In the middle of Ireland, Fitz-Maurice, ſiſter's ſon to Tyrone, affirms the ſame, and ſays, that whenſoever the Earl of Eſſex ſhould need men, then it is agreed, that Tyrone ſhall find him a continual ſupply of 8000 men, and Fitz-Maurice hearing theſe things agreed betwixt the Earls, ſends to know what he will have him to do, leſt he enter into attempt to the croſs of their purpoſes. The Earl of Eſſex being commanded by expreſs Letters that he ſhould not come over, he notwithſtanding comes over, brought all the ſtrongeſt proviſions away with him, left the kingdom at all adventures, only truſts the rebel Tyrone's word for the ſafety of that whole Kingdom. It may be thought theſe things more fitly ſhould have been urged againſt the Earl himſelf; but the cauſe was, one, the ſhortneſs of time; another, becauſe all the Lords were ſatisfied, and ſaid there was treaſon full enough proved againſt him, and it ſatisfied to condemn him. And when I was there entring into this matter, the Lord-Steward ſaid to me, Mr. Attorney, I perceive you have more to ſay, but I enjoin you ſilence for the reſt.

Now for proof of theſe things thus plotted in Ireland, the confeſſion of Lee was read, who was a man the Earl had good opinion of, and he ſo devoted to the Earl, as he wiſhed his own head might have ſuffered for him. Lee confeſſed, that on the Sunday, when he heard they were proclaimed Traitors, he was mightily diſcontented and grieved at the impriſonment of the Earls, and ſtuck not to profeſs unto ſome, that he could be contented to ſpend his life for their delivery, and thought it an eaſy matter to be performed, if ſix reſolute Gentlemen would undertake it, and named them. And whereas the Earl denieth that ever he ſent him to Tyrone, yet he thought the Earl knew when Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſent him, for this reaſon, that the Marſhal never did any great matter without the Earl's privity: And that this matter was ſuch, as the Marſhal would give him no warrant in writing for it. And when he was returned from Tyrone, the Earl of Eſſex then made a ſecret journey to Sir Chriſtopher Blunt's houſe, where Sir Chriſtopher Blunt lay hurt. And Lee ſaid, that at his coming to Tyrone, he found him proud, and railing at our nation, and ſaid that the Earl had hired ſome to take his blood; but afterwards told Lee that he had ſent Eſſex a meſſage by Snode his Secretary, that if he would agree with him, he would make him the greateſt that ever was in England. And Lee further confeſſed, that he knew Eſſex, Blunt, and Tyrone were all one, and all held one courſe.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt confeſſed, he knew of Lee's going to Tyrone, but denied that he had ever notice what he ſaid to Tyrone. It was true, he gave leave unto Lee to go to Tyrone, and the Earl of Eſſex was privy to it, yet the Earl in his life denied it.

But my Lord Chief-Juſtice noted, That it was a thing agreed upon betwixt them, that Lee and Blunt ſhould take this upon them; and for the fact, Lee and Blunt ſhould have a pardon granted them, which was done by the Earl: this being about the 8th of Auguſt; yet the Earl of Eſſex wrote over hither to the Lords of the Privy-Council, the 14th of Auguſt, in theſe words: "Your Lord-

" ſhips would not think what cowardiſe theſe fel" lows are grown to; yet muſt theſe fellows be " taught courage to fight, or elſe this Rebel will " never be ſubdued."

Further was read, a letter all of the Earl's own writing, dated the 8th of October, written to the Lord Mountjoy, after his being in Ireland, and the Earl here in England; ſignifying, " that Lee
" is one ſo near to me, as I muſt needs intreat
" your Lordſhip to do what you can for him, tho'
" it is not in your power to do what you would:
" you ſhall find him a man of better ſervice than " any is in Ireland. When I came thither, I found " him in good place, and ſometimes he entertained
" me to his great charge; which with your favour
" you muſt enable him to again. And let it be
" my ſuit to you, to do him what good you can."

From out of theſe letters, it was urged by Mr. Attorney, that Lee was a man wholly plotted for him. The 26th of September, the Earl of Eſſex came to the Court; the 28th of September, Captain Warren talks with Tyrone. Warren confeſſeth that Tyrone ſware, that within two months he ſhould ſee the greateſt alteration, and the ſtrangeſt that ever he ſaw; but Warren underſtood him not. Then ſaid Tyrone, I hope e'er long to have a good ſhare in England.

The confeſſion of one Knowd, Secretary to Owney Mac-Rory, taken the 16th of February, was read, wherein was ſet down, That Owney Mac-Rory having ſecret intelligence of the plot betwixt the two Earls, Eſſex and Tyrone, wrote and ſent ſo twice, and deſired to be advertiſed thereof, that he might do nothing contrary to their deſigns. But Tyrone grew ſuſpicious, leſt the matter ſhould break out too ſoon; yet the effect of the anſwer was this, that the Earl of Eſſex ſhould be King of England, and he Viceroy of Ireland. And that for a while he ſhould attempt nothing upon the Engliſh; and proved, that the Earl had left ſixteen barrels of powder in the north. And Knowd being aſked by a gentleman, upon his returning out of the north, what news? ſaid, it was agreed, that Eſſex ſhould be King of England, and Tyrone Viceroy of Ireland.

Turlagh Mac-Davy O Kelly, being a meſſenger from the M.... rebels, and brought the anſwer to .... ſaid, the Earl of Eſſex was to go for England, and take that kingdom, and they to help him; and amongſt thoſe rebels it was reported, the Earl of Eſſex wrote a letter to the Earl of Tyrone, to follow his matter thoroughly: for now was the time.

The confeſſion of Thomas Wood, ſiſter's ſon to James Fitz-Maurice, Baron of Lixnow, and a man in great credit with this Baron, was read; wherein he ſheweth, that being with James Fitz-Maurice at his houſe, about Michaelmas, when the Earl of Eſſex came over from England, Fitz-Maurice aſked him, what friends the Earl of Eſſex had in England; who ſaid, he knew not; but heard the Earl was well beloved in England. Then Fitz-Maurice told him, that the Earl of Eſſex was gone for England; had diſcharged many of the forces, and that the Earl of Deſmond had ſent him word, that it was agreed the Earl of Eſſex ſhould be King of England, and Tyrone Viceroy of Ireland.

Hetherington's confeſſion, and ſome others, were ſpared reading, becauſe they only concerned the Earl of Eſſex.

Now Mr. Attorney opened, that notwithſtanding all thoſe plots, practices, and treaſons, were known to the Queen; yet, after all this, ſo graciouſly her Majeſty regarded him, and was pleaſed to cover his offences, as to have him privately to come before ſome of her Privy-Council only at the Lord-Treaſurer's, ſent one of her Secretaries twice to him, offered to paſs in all ſecrecy; nay, Mr. Secretary ſaid, for ſaving his honour, that none ſhould take notice of any thing. They once all propoſed to have gone home to Eſſex-houſe to him, and during all the time of his reſtraint from Court, his letters have always had free paſſage to the Queen, and ſhe ever gave the reading to any thing he ſent. Wherefore, Mr. Attorney ſaid, the action breaking out into that it did, it was a great mercy of the Queen's, that in flagranti crimine, he was not, according to the martial law, preſently put to the ſword.

And then Mr. Sollicitor-General urged new evidence againſt Sir Charles Davers.

Mr. Sollicitor Flemming beginning, ſaid, He would prove Sir Charles Davers guilty of all the Treaſons charged againſt Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and that he was a principal plotter, diſputer, officer and actor in all their treaſons. In fine, he was aſſigned to be keeper of the preſence-chamber; where, upon a ſignal given, all the Nobles to aſſemble, and paſſing to the privy chamber to preſent themſelves to the Queen: and for making their way firſt, they ſhould apprehend Sir Walter Raleigh, captain of the guard; and afterwards ſome of the privy counſellors, and ſome other lords. Theſe being ſeized upon, they ſhould afterwards have been put to an honourable tryal, and afterwards a parliament ſhould be called, and government eſtabliſhed; and ſo principally did the Earl of Eſſex count upon this gentleman, Sir Charles Davers, and ſo ſecret did he hold him to him, as that before Chriſtmas laſt the Earl diſcovered his intent to him, and told him he would lay ſuch a plot for taking the Court, as he would not be reſiſted. And when Sir Charles Davers was in the Country, the Earl would not enter into conſultation about the buſineſs, until Sir Charles Davers came up; and meſſengers were diſpatched preſently for him. Upon his coming up, a meeting was had at Drury-houſe, where divers projects were made, Davis, Davers, Blunt, Gorge and Southampton being preſent, amongſt whom it was agreed, the taking of the Tower to be very fit, for the better countenancing of the action.

The chiefeſt defence and pretence that Sir Charles Davers uſed, was the great love he bore to the Earl of Southampton, who heretofore had cauſed him his pardon, and having gained him his life, he thought he owed his life unto him in any thing he ſhould command him.

But Mr. Sollicitor ſaid, it behoved him rather to have been grateful and ſerviceable to the Queen, who gave him life, more than to him that ſued for his life. But this was the juſt revenge had of God, that followed for the foul murder he had committed.

Sir Charles Davers perceiving that his act had extended to Treaſon, although he intended no harm unto the Queen's perſon, ſaid he was ſorry he had ſo far forgotten himſelf as to plead not guilty; for it was not his purpoſe coming thither to defend, or deny any thing, but to confeſs all things that could be ſaid againſt him: Therefore confeſſed, that before Chriſtmas the Earl adviſed with him, how he might make his way ſo to the Queen, as that his acceſs to her ſhould not be reſiſted. But this was not reſolved till his return out of the Country. When at Drury-houſe, they meeting, and Littleton coming thither; at the laſt, it was reſolved, the plot ſet down by the Earl's own hand, were firſt, to take the Tower: for reaſon he yielded this; it would be a countenance to the action; the taking of the Court, for which he would have ſo many able men, as they would at any time poſſeſs all the places of the Court. The manner to be this; Sir Chriſtopher Blunt to have the gate; Sir Gilly Merrick, the hall; Sir John Davis, the great chamber; Sir Charles Davers, the privy-chamber; the Earl himſelf ſhould come all along by land: at his coming into the great chamber, he ſhould put himſelf betwixt the halberts, (meaning, that he ſhould ſtep to the corner where the guard uſually ſet up their halberts againſt the wall) and poſſeſs himſelf of them, ſo as by them he would have no hurt, and perhaps he ſhould find of the guard apt to take his part.

My Lord Admiral ſaid, it was a fair warning to the guard, that they uſe not that faſhion of ſetting up their halberts in that manner.

When the Earl was thus come into the great chamber, divers of the Lords ſhould come out of the preſence thither, and ſaluting him, to welcome his coming to the Court; then the Earl with ten or twelve Noblemen, to take their way into the Privy-Chamber.

It being asked, what ſhould be done with them that ſhould make reſiſtance to this attempt; it was anſwered, it was meant they ſhould be ſeized upon. And the Court being quieted, then to ſend to ſatisfy the City; and then not long after, to call a Parliament.

A further confeſſion of Sir Charles Davers being read, there was ſet down the ſubſtance of the Earl's former articles, and theſe queſtions farther propounded; as, whether the Court and the Tower ſhould be attempted at one time; and whether this attempt ſhould be with many, or with few; if with many, where the number ſhould aſſemble; and whether it ſhould not be fit for the Earl and ſome others to be armed with Privy-Coats; and who were fitteſt Perſons to have cuſtody of the Lord-Admiral and the Secretaries.

Theſe and ſome further matters alſo, Sir Ferdidando Gorge had confeſſed were diſputed upon.

And ſaid Mr. Secretary, ſince this is a World wherein Princes muſt be accountable for their doings to their Subjects, that men ſhould not marvel why like proceedings were not had againſt Sir Ferdinando Gorge as theſe, the reaſon of forbearance was not that he had deſerved better, or was otherwiſe conceited of, than to be an Arch-Traitor; but becauſe he was the inſtrument of ſaving and letting go thoſe that were ſent from the Queen to Eſſex-houſe: and for this cauſe divers of her Majeſty's Privy-Counſel had been ſuitors to her Majeſty for ſparing his life for a time, though for their opinions of him, they held him an original and principal Traitor; and that he adviſed more miſchievouſly than any other; for he would have had the Court fired upon the taking of it. Sir Charles Davers ſtill profeſſed, as he had done often, that he was privy and a diſputer of all theſe plots, but never was any deviſer of any, or inſtigator of my Lord in theſe things. Sir Chriſtopher Blunt for further clearing himſelf, ſays, he knew not of this plot, till his coming to London, upon the Earl's ſending for him; that they had allotted him to place, he knew; but to what office, he knew not. And the more to be commiſerated, he beſought the Lords Commiſſioners to remember what natural conſiderations were to tie him to the Earl, having married his Mother. Now to how many adventures the obligations of love, and following of that Earl, had before carried him, the World did know; and how liberal, prodigal and venturous I was of this life of mine, while it was my own, good Mr. Secretary, pleaſe to remember and report truly to the Queen. I beg it of you, becauſe I have moſt offended you, and have no cauſe to expect it, but from the bounty of your honour and charity.

Mr. Secretary told him, he freely forgave whatſoever he conceived might give cauſe to him to be offended, and would truly perform for him what he deſired, and would deſire my Lord Admiral to join with him in it; though he ſaid he need not ſeek it of them, for the Queen would require it at their hands, to be truly informed of all their deſires.

Then ſaid Sir Chriſtopher, I muſt needs confeſs that heretofore, I having done much to her Majeſty's ſervice, adventured my life many times, as the marks of this my wretched carcaſs will ſhew; hazarded my fortune when it was at the beſt, and all for the honour of her Majeſty, and in her ſervice, and yet ſhe never vouchſafed notice of me or my ſervice: it gave no little diſcontentment to me, but this never had the power to have an ill thought againſt her Majeſty. Therefore once again I beſeech you, that being as I was to that Earl, you pleaſe to relate to her Majeſty what you find by me, and what I have ſaid to you. And to ſtay any fury going upon me, I here confeſs myſelf guiltey of all that can be ſaid againſt me, and moſt worthy to have deſerved death; wherefore renouncing all juſtification or extenuation of my offence, I wholly caſt myſelf at her Majeſty's mercy. Sir Charles Davers made the like proteſtation.

Againſt Sir John Davis, Mr. Francis Bacon urged the evidence, beginning with diſcourſe upon the former ground of Mr. Attorney's, that every rebellion implied deſtruction of the Prince, and that in the precedents of Edw. II. and Hen. IV. the pretence in both was as in this, againſt certain Subjects, the Spenſers in one, and the Treaſurer in the other. And this ſtile of proteſtation that no harm was intended to the perſon of the Sovereign, was common in Traitors. Manlius the lieutenant of Catiline had that very proteſtation; but the proceeding is ſuch in this, as no long diſcourſing needs to prove it Treaſon, the act itſelf was Treaſon. The principal offences charged upon Sir John Davis were two, one that he was a plotter, and of the Council at Drury-houſe: Another that in the inſurrection he had the cuſtody of the Privy-Counſellors in Eſſex-houſe, which had a correſpondence with the action in the ſtreet. The plot and inſurrection entered into, was to give laws to the Queen; the preparation was to have a choice band of men for action; men not met together by conſtellation, but aſſembled upon ſummons and letters ſent: for, ſaid Mr. Bacon, I will not charge Sir John Davis, although he be a man skilful in ſtrange arts, that he ſent ſpirits abroad, but letters were ſent about this matter. The things to be acted were the matters conſulted of, and then to deſign fit perſons for every action; and for mutual encouragement there was a liſt of names drawn by the Earl, and theſe Counſellors out of them were to elect fit perſons to every office. The ſecond plot was in taking of the Court, and in this conſultation he was penna Philoſophi ſcribentis; you were Clerk of that Council-Table, and wrote all: and in the detaining of the Privy-Counſellors, you were the man only truſted. And as the Earl of Rutland ſaid, you held it a ſtratagem of war to detain pledges, and was meant to have carried the Lord-Keeper with the Great Seal into London; and to have had with you the Lord Chief Juſtice, a man for his integrity, honoured and well-beloved of the Citizens; and this Achitophel plot you thought to have followed.

Sir John Davis hereupon told Mr. Bacon, that if with good manners I might, I would long ſince have interrupted you, and ſaved you a great part of labour; for my intent is not to deny any thing I have ſaid, or excuſe that I have done, but to confeſs myſelf guilty of all, and ſubmit myſelf wholly to the Queen's mercy. But in that you call me Clerk of that Council, let me tell you, Sir Charles Davers was writing, but his hand being bad, I was deſired to take the pen and write. But by and by the Earl ſaid he would ſpeed it himſelf; therefore we being together ſo long, and doing ſo little, the Earl went to his Houſe, and ſet down all with his own hand, which was formerly ſet forth, touching the taking and poſſeſſing of the Court.

The examination of Sir John Davis was read, which was to the effect as before is ſet down touching their conſultations of taking of the Court; but added, it was agreed they ſhould all come by land, and make their way to the Queen's own perſon, and hoped to find way in the Court indifferent.

The Lord-Admiral then charged Sir John Davis again with the detaining of the Lords in Eſſex-houſe, and his unwillingneſs to have let them go, though Sir Ferdinando Gorge came with a meſſage, as he ſaid, for letting them all go. And ſaid the Lord-Admiral, the caſe was hard with theſe worthy Counſellors: for by God he ſwore, though theſe Counſellors had been in the houſe, yet being as he was, General of the Forces, and ſent to force the houſe, he muſt and would have battered and blown it up, tho' it had been the death of them as well as the reſt; and had all his own ſons been there, he would have done it.

It was alſo charged againſt Sir John Davis, that not ten days before this action, Sir John Davis and Sir Charles Davers were ſeen upon the top of the White Tower within the Tower, viewing and ſurveying the place; but they ſaid it was only for pleaſure, to take view from thence, being there confeſſed, that they affirmed the Tower was a place of ſmall ſtrength.

Then Mr. Attorney took in hand the evidence againſt Sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe. To Cuffe, Mr. Attorney ſaid, that he was the arranteſt Traitor that ever came to that Bar; he was Poly . . . . . the very ſeducer of the Earl; and ſince he was a Scholar and a Sophiſter, he would frame him a ſyllogiſm, and bade Cuffe deny what part he would. The ſyllogiſm was this, Whoſoever commits rebellion, intends the Queen's death; but you committed rebellion: Ergo, you intended the Queen's death. For the polypragma, this fellow the cunning coiner of all plots, how to intrap a worthy gentleman, whom I am ſorry to ſee ſo overtaken, I muſt name Sir Henry Nevil: This Cuffe hearing of Sir Henry's landing out of France, watches his coming to London, preſently comes to him, and tells him, he had commendations unto him from the Earl of Eſſex, and ſecretly lets him know what private intelligence my Lord had received from Court by ſome his inward friends; that much miſlike was taken at Court with Sir Henry's ſervice in France; eſpecially that at Bullen. Sir Henry Nevil ſaid, it was more than he knew or had heard, but recommends his ſervice with thanks to my Lord. Shortly after Sir Henry Nevil came to the Court, the Queen uſed him very graciouſly. The Lords interpreted very well of his ſervice; now at his next meeting Mr. Cuffe, Sir Henry told Cuffe, he found no ſuch matter at Court as he told him. Hereupon Cuffe replied, Oh, Sir, things are altered ſince I ſaw you laſt, and e'er long you ſhall ſee a change: my Lord is like to come in favour again and be reſtored to his greatneſs; and uſing one other verſe, concluded with this, Arma ferenti omnia dat, qui juſta negat. Cuffe ſtill making reſort to Sir Henry Nevil, finds opportunity when to diſcloſe unto him all the Earl's plot of going to the Court; who hearing it, objects againſt it, that it was a thing could not be executed but by many, and all would not keep Counſel. Cuffe anſwer'd, that for execution they had ſo many come in to them, that they knew not to entertain all. A further objection being made, that though all places in the Court were poſſeſſed, yet Weſtminſter would riſe, and make force; Cuffe anſwered, we having the face of the ſtate, all will follow and take with us.

For manifeſtation of all, the Narration penned by Sir Henry Nevil himſelf, was read in theſe words: " Their Honours commanding him to diſ-
" cloſe all, and his duty and conſcience binding him
" to the ſame, he hath in that ill-couch'd Nar-
" ration ſet down all his knowledge. Firſt, at his " arrival out of France, he was told that he had
" ill offices done him in Court by divers, and ſome
" of great place; and his actions at Bullen, and car-
" riage there greatly blamed, as cauſing the ill
" ſucceſs of the peace. And by Cuffe it was told " him, the Earl would have him know he was " wronged, becauſe he was one that loved him.
" After this, Cuffe brought him a letter from the " Earl, thereby deſiring his love, and to hold it
" to him, beſides many other words only of com" plement. To which letter Sir Henry returns an " anſwer ſuitable to ſo kind provocations. But all
" this while I never went to him; and being in the " Country within ten miles of the Earl, yet I never " went to viſit him. But Cuffe came to me from him,
" and told me the Earl was now at liberty, and all
" the World that would, might now freely come " unto him: but ſtill I put off my going, till at " one time Cuffe came and told me my Lord ex" pected my coming to him, and ſuch a day he " would ſtay ſupper for me; and if I came, and he " chanced not to be in the way, a Gentleman of " my Lord's ſhould attend my coming, and bring " me to my Lord's Cloſet. About eight of the " clock that night I came to my Lord, and was met
" by a Gentleman, and brought up to my Lord;
" who entertained me kindly, and after a while,
" after many queſtions of his hopes, but uſed no
" undutiful words of the Queen or State, I parted
" with my Lord, there having nothing but ordina" ry terms of Complement paſſed us. Afterward

" Mr. Cuffe repairing often to me, I asked him at " one time how his Lord's matters ſtood in Court. " At one time he anſwered me, well; and told me " of great hopes conceived; at ſome other time he " anſwered me very diſcontentedly in theſe things, " ſaying, it made no matter, it would cauſe my Lord " to take other courſes; and ſaid, there was a pre- " text to lay up the Earl of Southampton, which " was a warning that they meant to lay up the " Lord of Eſſex after him: but my Lord was re- " ſolved they ſhould never curb him up any more. " Then told me, my Lord had in purpoſe ſome " matters, but I ſhould not embark myſelf further " in them than I liſted; and deſired me to give a " meeting to the Earl of Southampton and Sir " Charles Davers. I ſaid, I would, but with this " limitation, that nothing was intended againſt the " Queen's perſon: which was promiſed. But I " detained them at two meetings, which cauſed " them to make an ill judgment of my meaning to- " wards them and the intendment. Monday on " Candlemas-day I ſtanding in Serjeants-Inn-Gate, " the Earls of Eſſex, Southampton, and Sir Chriſto- " pher Blunt paſſed by in a Coach, whom I ſalu- " ted paſſing, and was the firſt time I had ſeen them " of long. Anon after, Cuffe coming to me, told " me he had a commiſſion to deliver a ſecret unto " me; which was, that my Lord finding his life " ſought by men potent about her Majeſty, he " was adviſed to make his appearance to the Queen; " and go with ſtrength for that purpoſe, deſcribing " the ſame manner of taking the Court, and mak- " ing way to the Queen, as before is ſet down by " others. This Cuffe ſaid he was to impart to me, " as one in whoſe love the Earl was confident. (But " Mr. Secretary ſaid, as he was grieved to think " of this Gentleman's full reſpect, his worth and a- " bilities to have done the Queen great ſervice, ſo " this right he would do him, that however the " Earl was perſuaded of him, yet he ſo far tender- " ed his duty to the Queen, that I think the firſt " ſuſpicion given of the Earl's mind grew from this " Gentleman.) The matters being propounded " unto me, I made many objections, and put great " difficulties in the execution; eaſy perfecting of " things being promiſed, my anſwer was, Multa " ſunt quæ non laudantur niſi cum aguntur. When " ſome perſons were named for the actors, I ob- " jected, that if many knew it, it would not be " concealed; if few were uſed, it would not be per- " formed. The Earl of Rutland being named for one, " ſaid they would not truſt him long aforehand; " for if he knew it but two hours before, he would " tell. In concluſion I was deſired to think of the " things propounded in caſe they were ſhewed un- " to me. Afterward Cuffe came unto me, to whom " I related all the ſpeeches uſed in that conference, " and told him I would not allow it, except they " would conjure and take an oath to attempt nothing " againſt the Queen's perſon; and againſt Mr. Se- " cretary, I would never do nor conſent to any " thing, for he was nearer unto me, therefore they " muſt duce pudicè, ſpare me in that. Cuffe ſaid " to me, they would only have me preſent when " things were doing; and if it fell out ſo, that I " ſhould be haſten'd to diſpatch into France be- " fore that time, I might defer it by feigning ſick- " neſs. By their appointment I ſhould have been " Secretary." (Here Mr. Secretary ſaid, Cuffe this was great preſumption, for though to remove me had been no great matter, yet to take upon you to place another, this was high ambition.) " Further, it was required that Sir Henry Nevil " ſhould have ſent a miniſter into London, to find " how the City ſtood affected to the Earl."

(Mr. Attorney here ſaid, it was in their plot, to have had two hundred miniſters in the City and Country, to have blazed in pulpits the ſincerity of this Earl's intentions.) " Cuffe further told " Sir Henry Nevil of a buz in many mens mouths in " London; and that there had been warning given " to the Mayor and Aldermen to look to the City; " but of twenty-four Aldermen he doubted not of " twenty at the leaſt."

Mr. Secretary here ſpeaking, opened what he found had reſolved the Earl to ſo free a confeſſion and diſcovery of all things that he did. Aſhton, who was his miniſter, and as I may term him his confeſſor, was a man much deſired by the Earl; her Majeſty was willing to yield any thing that might give comfort to the Earl's conſcience, and be good for his Soul, ſent Mr. Doctor Dove, a very worthy man to confer with him, and prepare him to a chriſtian end. He perſuading confeſſion as the way to repentance, and amongſt other ſins charging the Earl with this offence, his taking arms again his Prince, and refuſing to come upon the command of his Prince, the Earl anſwered, he thought that refuſal no fault; and for inſtance ſhewed that David refuſed to come to Saul in the like caſe, being ſent for. Mr. Dove ſo ſufficiently anſwered the Earl in his arguments, and ſatisfied him in this example, how different it was from his caſe, and upon what ground that was, that the Earl in a kind relenting and falling from defences, deſired earneſtly confeſſion with his own miniſter Aſhton; which was yielded him. Aſhton like a godly and very learned man, and one deſerving much for this ſervice, dealt ſo roundly and feelingly with him, as that he made the Earl know that there was no Salvation for him to hope for, if he dealt not clearly with his own conſcience in the confeſſions of his ſins, and high offences in this kind. His words ſo pierced and moved, as that to this man he diſcloſed the very ſecrets of his heart, to the purging of his ſoul and conſcience, from the concealment of any thing he knew; and afterward ſpent all the time he had to live in holy meditations, and revealing of ſecrets concerning the State, and diſcourſing of the miſchief intended; and moſt penitently ſorrowed for the accuſations and imputations he had caſt upon others touching the conſpiring with Spain and the infant of Spain.

And being asked touching ſome men ſuppoſed to be confederates in the taking of the City, he ſaid that Captain Bromley, brother to Sir Henry Bromley, and Sir John Scot would aſſiſt him; and that Sheriff Smith being Colonel of a thouſand men, would bring them in aid of him. And confeſſed by the Earl himſelf, that at ſuch time as the Earl had purpoſed to lay down the thought of theſe ambitions, and had reſolved contentedneſs in a private life, Cuffe comes to the Earl, and tells him he had indignities offered him, and his ſufferance was ſuch, as his friends ſaid he had loſt his courage, with praying and hearing of Sermons, and now was become a coward. Whereupon Cuffe perſuaded him to let Sir Charles Davers come to him, who would let him know the mind of his friends; and after ſuch time as the Earl had accuſed his confederates, being asked how he could prove the things diſcovered, anſwered, ſome of them have ſo much grace, as if I ſend but to them, they will confeſs it. Whereupon he wrote a ticket to the Earl of Southampton, who upon view thereof confeſſed all to be true, and ſaid my Lord had the ſtart of him; for if I had had pen and paper, I had confeſſed theſe things firſt.

Whereupon Mr. Secretary ſaid, that he muſt needs ſpeak of a difference he found between Noble and Generous-minded Men, and others baſer born; from the Earls and other the Gentlemen of birth and of good houſe, all their confeſſions came freely and liberally from them, without concealment or covering any thing with untruths. By Cuffe, and ſome others of baſer ſort, nothing would be confeſſed, but what they were convinced of, and ſhadowed with untruths ſo far as their wits could do it. The Earl of Eſſex alſo in his life-time confeſſed to the Lords, that Cuffe was a principal inſtigator of him; and though of theſe plots himſelf had been a principal contriver, yet Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers and Sir John Davis were privy to more dangerous and pernicious purpoſes than this action tended to; as might appear by their counſel given him that morning when he went into the City of London.

Cuffe being willed to ſpeak for himſelf, ſaid, The matters objected againſt him were many, and forced againſt him with all force of wit: therefore for the help of his weak memory, he would reduce all unto two heads; things plotted, and things acted. For the firſt, in them Mr. Attorney thinks he hath concluded me in mood and figure; but my anſwer is, that if a man may be excuſed of Treaſon by committing nothing, I am clear. Yet the number of matters heaped upon me, and the inferences and inforcements of the ſame uſed againſt me to make me odious, make me ſeem alſo as a monſter of many heads in this buſineſs; but ſince by the law all accuſations are to be believed, and facts weighed as by evidence they are proved; and things are beſt proved being ſingled; I will beſeech Mr. Attorney that we may inſiſt upon ſome point certain, and not as in a ſtream have all things at once brought upon me with violence. For my being in Eſſex-houſe the Sunday, I hope it ſhall be conſtrued as in the caſe of others. Then if thoſe who only had their being within the walls of that houſe, and no hand nor head in that action, were not Traitors; I hope that in favour and in charity you will accordingly judge of me, who ſpent all that day locked up in my chamber amongſt my books, and never appeared unto any man till all was yielded up to my Lord-Admiral. To conclude me to be a Traitor, becauſe I was in the houſe where Treaſon was committed, by the ſame reaſon if a lion had been there locked up in a grate, he had been in caſe of treaſon. But whereas your argument, Mr. Attorney, is this, That whoſoever intends Treaſon, and the ſame is afterwards acted by others, there the intender as well as the actor is a Traitor: But I intended Treaſon, and others acted it; Ergo. Mr. Attorney, it is not your Major that I deny, becauſe my Lords the Judges have determined that; but I deny your Minor. For if the thing intended was the going to the Court; yet the thing acted was the going into London.

But Mr. Attorney-General taking him ſhort upon his own confeſſion, concluded him a Traitor; for in Treaſon the very Intent is Treaſon, if the ſame can be proved. Now it is confeſſed by Mr. Cuffe, that he intended the taking of the Court, which in itſelf is Treaſon.

Mr. Cuffe ſaid, My Lords, the matters forced upon me ſo amaze me, as I know not what to ſay; but I beſeech you, even as your ſelves ſhall be judged, judge ſo of me both by my words and deeds, for this is the law both of God and man: and let not the accuſations of others, or arguments now forced, ſo far have power againſt me, as to take from me my juſt defence. I am further charged with contriving plots for reſtoring the Earl to greatneſs. True, I muſt confeſs as a ſervant that longed for the honour of his maſter, I have often wiſhed to ſee his recalling to the Court, and reſtoring to her Majeſty's former favour; but beyond the limits of theſe deſires, my thoughts never carried me, nor aſpired to other greatneſs than to ſee him again in place of a ſervant and worthy ſubject, as before he had been. And whereas I ſtand accuſed to be as one that turned the wheel which elſe had ſtood, and to be the ſtirrer of his mind which otherwiſe had ſettled to another courſe; to clear this, I had written two lines, which you, Mr. Secretary, knew the Earl would have ſubſcribed if he might have been ſuffered.

But Mr. Secretary affirmed he perceived no ſuch purpoſe in the Earl, neither remembred any ſuch matter in that which was written.

Said Cuffe, You know, Mr. Secretary, my paper being read to the Earl, as he read, he ſaid ſtill as he went, true, true.

At the importunity of Mr. Cuffe, Mr. Secretary willed the paper ſhould be read; but it tended only unto this, That if he knew of the Earl's intent to go to the Court, 'twas with ſuch limitations as the Earl had propounded, otherwiſe not, for he had not ſuggeſted any of theſe new practices.

Mr. Attorney ſtill following the matters ſtrongly againſt him, told Cuffe, that he would give him a cuff that ſhould ſet him down, and called to have read the Earl's confeſſion, and ſome part of Sir Henry Nevil's confeſſion; which both were full and plain againſt him, as he had not to anſwer them. Only to the conference with Sir Henry Nevil he ſaid, Whereas Mr. Attorney would make me a Mercury and a meſſenger only from the Earl to Sir Henry, herein Mr. Attorney errs, not knowing, or not reſpecting the ancient familiarity and love that for theſe many years ſpace have been betwixt Sir Henry Nevil and me, for the delight we took together in conference of Learning, and diſcourſes of Travels and States. And whereas I am charged with deviſing a lye, thereby to bind Sir Henry Nevil faſter unto the Earl; it is well known to others, the Earl firſt ſent me to Sir Henry Killegrew to tell him of it, and that from him it might come to Sir Henry Nevil's ear. But Sir Henry Killegrew not being in town, and I afterwards meeting with Sir Henry Nevil, imparted it to him; therefore deſired that he might not be wronged, and wiſhed that juramentum cal. . . . might be forborn, as a fault in any man. And for the ſpeech uſed of twenty-one Aldermen in London that were ſure to my Lord, there were ſome at the Bar as well as he, that had heard the Earl uſe the ſpeech; and vouched Sir Gilly Merrick, but he denied it. For the buz that was given out, he ſaid likewiſe, that Sir John Davis heard what my Lord ſaid of this; but Sir John Davis being asked, denied the hearing of it.

And Cuffe being asked by Mr. Secretary, what he meant by having a Parliament, he anſwered that it was conceived theſe things would work great alteration; and for ſettling of all things, they thought, that ſhortly would follow a Parliament.

Mr. Attorney ſaid, that it was meant that Cuffe ſhould have been Speaker of that Parliament.

And here ended the evidence againſt Cuffe.

Againſt Sir Gilly Merrick, Mr. Attorney urged firſt, that he was the man who fortified Eſſex-houſe againſt the Queen's forces; and if God had not otherwiſe guided it, that day he had been the death of a noble perſon the Lord Burleigh, for he ſet one with a muſket-ſhot to ſhoot at him, but miſſing the Lord Burleigh, Captain Lovel's horſe was killed under him at Eſſex-gate with that ſhot. And the ſame day that the Earl went, Sir Gilly Merrick comes to Mr. Browne's houſe, being adjoining to the Tennis-Court, and ſhuts all his ſervants out of his houſe, and all that Sunday walked up and down the houſe with muſketeers following him. And the ſtory of Henry IV. being ſet forth in a play, and in that play there being ſet forth the killing of the King upon a ſtage; the Friday before, Sir Gilly Merrick and ſome others of the Earl's train having an humour to ſee a play, they muſt needs have the play of Henry IV.

The players told them that was ſtale, they ſhould get nothing by playing of that, but no play elſe would ſerve; and Sir Gilly Merrick gives forty ſhillings to Philips the player to play this, beſides whatſoever he could get.

It was urged alſo that the Earl's purpoſe was to have againſt this time appointed men of his faction placed in all the houſes near about him. To which end the confeſſion of Arthur Smith, dwelling hard by the Tennis-Court, was read; who ſaid, that the week before, Sir Gilly Merrick came to his houſe, and enquired who lay there. It was told him of a lodging there that was kept for Sir Walter Harcourt, which being denied unto Sir Gilly Merrick, he railed and reviled the good man of the houſe with foul words, and willed him to diſcharge Sir Walter Harcourt of that lodging, for my Lord would have his friends to lie about him. Now the men that Sir Gilly Merrick would have lodged in that houſe, were Owen Salisbury, Captain Gwynne, and John Salisbury.

Then was read a letter of Sir Gilly Merrick writ to his brother John Merrick; the effect was to pay money unto Mr. Devereux, and himſelf to come up to London, and Captain . . . . . and Captain Damnye to come up alſo, and my Lord would take it thankfully.

The confeſſion of Thomas Johnſon was read, who ſaid he ſaw Sir Gilly Merrick all that day walk in his doublet and hoſe up and down the houſe with muſkets following him, and went down to the banquetting-houſe in the garden with his hat full of ſhot.

Sir Gilly Merrick ſaid, his going with muſkets after him, was to keep the Privy-Counſellors the ſafer from the fury of Owen Salisbury, who had ſworn that if the houſe was forced, he would ſend them to go to the devil. And Johnſon ſaid, that he ſaw one Wever follow Sir Gilly Merrick to the gate with a muſket to have ſhot out there.

And by the confeſſion of one Watts, it appeared there was a watch in the houſe all Saturday at night, and none of the company went to bed, but for a while's reſt threw themſelves upon their beds in their clothes. And that Sir Gilly Merrick cauſed certain hogſheads to be broken up, to fortify againſt the Tennis-court. That the Earl had a hundred muſkets in the houſe, but wanted flaſkets and much other furniture for them.

And here ended the evidence againſt Sir Gilly Merrick, and the reſt.

Now Mr. Attorney-General deſired to have a word unto all the priſoners at the Bar, and that he might not miſreport, deſired to have a paper read, ſubſcribed by the hand of Mr. Aſhton, Dr. Mountford and Dr. Barlow, for that it was ſpoken in their hearing. The Earl thanked God, that he had given him a deep inſight into his ſins, ſince his juſtifications uſed at the Bar then before; thanked God that his courſe was prevented; acknowledged that all confidence in man was vain; that he was worthily ſpewed out: and further, as in the Earl's confeſſion. Now to conclude, at the Earl's arraignment I uſed a ſentence, ſaying, O tempora, O mores! according to that againſt Catiline, Hic tamen vivit; for which ſaying, divers have ſince charged me, but I will ſay it again; and add this to it:

Dixerat O mores, O tempora! Tullius olim,
Romanum ſtruerat cum Catilina nefas.
O tempora dicimus, &c.
Et cur non dicimus, O mores?

Now the Jury went out to agree upon their Verdict, which after half an hour's time and more, they brought in, and found every of the five Priſoners ſeverally guilty of High-Treaſon. The Verdict being entered, and the Jury diſcharged, the Queen's Serjeant prayed Judgement. The Chief-Juſtice then demanded of the Priſoners, what they had to ſay for themſelves, why Judgement ſhould not be given againſt them.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt then ſaid, My Lords, for my high offence tending to Treaſon, in that I have riſen in Rebellion againſt her Majeſty, I have nothing to ſay to excuſe myſelf, or extenuate my faulr. But of any intention of evil againſt her Majeſty's perſon, my own thoughts cannot accuſe me. My deſerved, but unfatal fall, I muſt needs impute to my overmuch love to that unhappy Earl. How I have followed him, how I have loved him, as being bewitched with too good an opinion of him, I now with grief feel it! But ſince this my too much fondneſs of him hath only led me into folly with him, and no other ambition, hope, or honour, I beſeech your Lordſhips, and you my Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary ſpecially, right me ſo much with your favours, as to relate truly to her Majeſty what my heart and words are before you this day. And let her Majeſty underſtand that it was the fair face of that Earl's pretences, and my near ties unto him, I having married his mother, that carried and allured me to that I did, and no diſloyalty or undutifulneſs of mind towards her. What the ſervices be that I have done, and adventures made in ſervice for her Majeſty, others have ſeen, and know what I have felt. This carcaſs of mine, when it ſhall be diſſolved, will ſhew the marks; ſuch was my readineſs in all actions to the honour of her Majeſty; as when my fortune was at the beſt, ſo good as that I enjoyed two thouſand pounds a year at the leaſt, beſide other wealth by an honourable Lady whom you all know I married, yet when no commands enforced me, for her Majeſty never commanded my going with the Earl in any journey, yet voluntarily I left all to adventure with the Earl in ſervice for her Majeſty into Portugal, at Cales, the Iſlands, and in Ireland, I was with him. And altho' all this be nothing to weigh againſt this preſent fact, and ſo I have nothing of deſert that may plead mercy for me, yet if her Majeſty out of the abundance of her grace and mercy ſhall afford me life, I doubt not but as I have done, ſo I may live to do; and if I live, I will be as ready as any ſubject the Queen hath to do the ſervice for her Majeſty which ſhall deſerve my life. And this is all I wiſh, that ſince I have but a life to give unto her Majeſty, that I might give it to the performance of ſome more acceptable ſervice rather than to this end. But if it be reſolved, as I have deſerved, that die I muſt, it is not life I care for; for a death I owe unto her Majeſty, and will yield it chearfully. And ſince the Earl that gone is, whoſe undue courſe hath brought us to this due puniſhment, hath left a blot upon me, and ſo far touched me in reputation and credit, as if I had been a plotter and procurer of him to more dangerous practices than theſe, I muſt needs clear myſelf, that neither in foreign practices, which I count confederacies with Spain, nor in domeſtical dealings, which I count that with Scotland, in reſpect of their nearneſs to us, I have ever had to do ſo far, as to allow or adviſe any thing to the hurt of this State. Againſt you, Mr. Secretary, I cannot but confeſs I have aſſented to too great wrongs; and beyond that I am worthy, it pleaſeth your Honour of your charitable diſpoſition to forgive me; otherwiſe of the State I have never deſerved evil. And for my further clearing, I deſire humbly to be permitted to private conference with your Honour, my Lord-Admiral, and with Mr. Secretary.

Which was yielded to. And that night he was brought into the Court of Wards, after the Court roſe.

Sir Charles Davers being demanded what he had to ſay, why Judgment ſhould not be given againſt him, uſed theſe words: I have nothing to ſay in ſtay of Judgment, for it is but juſt that I be adjudged to die; only this I ſay, my greateſt fault was to conſent unto things propounded, for my intention was far from thought of hurt unto her Majeſty. I was never any perſuader or inſtigator of the Earl in theſe things; nay, till I was ſent for purpoſely by the Earl out of the country, I was a ſtranger to theſe purpoſes: then finding my Lord of Southampton, to whom I owed my love and life itſelf, that he was ſo far engaged in the buſineſs, and deſired my aſſiſtance, I yielded advice to him, and gave conſent to that I now repent; for there was no reaſon in me to ſeek changes, the preſent being better to me than alteration could promiſe. Ambition I had none, for my eſtate was good; diſcontentment could not trouble me, for I had been well uſed: but by all this my offence was the greater, in giving offence to the Queen, who had been ſo gracious unto me. Contrary to the reſolution I came with, I have pleaded Not guilty, but this grew through the error of my Underſtanding; but to the juſtifying of what is found, I alſo confeſs myſelf guilty. And though I have no cauſe to hope, yet do I not deſpair of her Majeſty's mercy; and if it ſhall be her Majeſty's pleaſure to ſhew mercy, your Lordſhip and all here ſhall ſee, that none lives that ſhall better deſerve life. But if her Majeſty's pleaſure be to execute Juſtice, I only requeſt this with my beſt prayer, that I may die in her Majeſty's favour. And theſe few requeſts I have to make, which I recommend unto your Lordſhips; my Lord-Admiral, and to your Honour, Mr. Secretary, that if I muſt die, that I may have ſome time given me to ſettle my conſcience, and reſolve my ſoul, becauſe hitherto my hoping having been much, my care hath been the leſs this way; and if it may be thought fit, I deſire to have one of my ſervants to repair to me for ordering of ſome things I have to do. And laſtly, that your Honour, Mr. Secretary, remembring what your promiſe was to me in reſpect of my deſcent and alliance to ſome noble blood, you will ſo far grace me, as to beg the favour of her Majeſty that I may be beheaded. And one requeſt more I beſeech you, let me make ſuit to ſee the Earl of Southampton before I die.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt upon this ſaid, My Lords, this weak, bruiſed head of mine made me forget that which I minded to have begged: That in reſpect I have always profeſſed Arms, and been Marſhal of the Field, a place of Honour, I may have ſo much grace as to be beheaded.

My Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary told them both, they would remember it to the Queen.

Sir John Davis ſaid, I have nothing to ſay, but only to appeal to mercy. I confeſs I have highly offended, yet if it pleaſe her Majeſty to extend mercy unto me, it ſhall not be to an unworthy ſervant: my former anſwers and diſcloſes have not been to purchaſe favour, but to diſcover truth; and though by this I challenge no mercy, yet it intimates deſert of favour. My great remorſe and grief is for my poor wife's eſtate, to think that I being ſo much benefited and advanced by her, muſt now be the means to undo her; for I hear all her eſtate is ſeized on. Wherefore I beſeech this favour, that ſhe be not afflicted for my offence, but may enjoy what was her own.

Mr. Secretary, upon occaſion of this ſpeech of Davis, what he diſcloſed, ſaid, Tho' his place did appropriate that to him to be the deliverer and reſtorer of requeſts; yet in this buſineſs nothing had been done or ſaid by any, but three at leaſt of the chief Counſellors of State have been privy to all that paſſed, and I only the Regiſter of things moved unto them. And this I will ſay, that during all the time of the Earl's reſtraint from the Court, his Letters have always had free paſſage to the Queen, and he might write what he liſted, the Queen would ever read that.

Sir Gilly Merrick. I have little to ſay; but let what I have done be conſidered, and my offence will be found leſs than others: but the law hath adjudged it Treaſon, and I muſt die, and not unwillingly; for the tree being fallen, the branches muſt not ſtand. I did the office of a ſervant as my maſter bad me, but it was my fault to obey what was not juſt in him to command. My poor eſtate I pray you let be conſidered, it may be thought better of than it is. What it is, I ſhall ſet it down, and humbly pray that my poor wife and children may be pitied.

Cuffe confeſſed the Jury had done but right, in diſcharging their conſciences; yet it was true that Divines held, condempnatum eum aliquando faciunt quem dampnatum non faciunt. The gracious proceeding afforded, and all reaſonable requeſts yielded, emboldeneth me to make ſome ſmall requeſt: When

I was reſtrained, I had not about me above two ſhillings. I had 350 l. of ready money ſeized upon in my chamber. When I came into the Tower, I was put into a dark place; but afterwards Mr. Lieutenant pitying me, relieved me, and put me in a better place. Wherefore I pray to be returned unto the ſame priſon, for there I am now provided of things neceſſary; otherwiſe perhaps I may be caring for things of this world for neceſſary ſuccour of life, whenas I would now more willingly ſpend all my thoughts in other meditations.

This requeſt was granted.

My ſecond requeſt is to you, Mr. Secretary, that I may have the company of ſome Divine repairing to me for the comfort of my ſoul, and crucifying of my fleſh, that ſo at my farewel to this world with joyful arms I may embrace my Saviour; and for human reſpects, I deſire the law may be ſatisfied with my life, without torturing or quartering my fleſh; and the rather for favour's ſake unto learning, tho' I have neither place nor great birth to ſpeak for that. To plead for longer or other mercy I will not, but when my body ſhall be executed, ſorrow be unto my ſoul, if ever I intended evil unto her Majeſty's perſon. Alas! it was my too much love unto my Maſter that brought me unto this; but as that Earl, my Maſter, ſaid, now the ſcales were taken from his eyes, and he ſaw his faults; ſo do I, but too late: heretofore in the courſe of my private ſtate, things went ſo ſmoothly with me as I could deſire. My religion was always ſorting to the profeſſion at this day. Some further things I would utter, but I deſire to know whether now I muſt ſpeak, or that I may be allowed pen and paper to write them hereafter.

It was allowed he ſhould have means to write what he would.

Here ended all that paſſed before Judgment.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, Sir John Popham, being now to pronounce Judgment, uſed theſe words:

" I am ſorry to ſee any ſo ill affected to this " State as to become plotters and practiſers againſt " the State, and that ſo ſtrongly as you and others " in this action have done. And my grief is the " more in this, men of worth, ſervice and learn- " ing are the actors in that conſpiracy! Shall it " be ſaid in the world abroad, that we Engliſhmen " now after forty-three years peace under ſo gra- " cious and renowned a Prince, are become weary " of the Government of ſuch a Queen, whom all " the world elſe admires for her government? " Conſider it well, whoſoever had beſt hopes in " this attempt of change, what would have fol- " lowed upon it? Let me tell you of the ſmalleſt " hurt, the blood of children, families and friends; " for none of yourſelves can otherwiſe think but " this action would have coſt much blood. And I " am ſorry to think, that Engliſhmen ſhould ſeem " to excuſe themſelves by ignorance of the law, " which all ſubjects are bound to know, and are " born to have the benefit of. Some of you now " at the Bar are Chriſtians; Where, I pray you, " did you ever read or hear that it was lawful for " the ſubject to command or conſtrain his Sove- " reign? It is a thing againſt the law of God, and " all Nations. God forbid but that by actions " men ſhould be allowed to expound intents. Now " your actions tending to a ſovereignty, cannot " but by your ſelves be expounded Treaſon. But " your intents, if they were otherwiſe, as you " pretend, yet are not they to expound the law. " For know this, that the law, which tends prin- " cipally to the preſerving of the Prince's perſon, " is more tender and preciſe in this than in any " other point.

" And although your Example be pitiful, yet " by this, let all men know and learn how high all " actions treaſonable do touch, and what they " tend to. To leave off from further diſcourſe, " I ſhould now remember one thing to you all, " but I ſee you all careful of it; that is, the care " of your ſouls, to keep them from death, whereof " ſin is the cauſe; and ſin is not removed but by " repentance, which being truly and heartily per- " formed, then follows what the prophet David " ſpake of, Bleſſed are they to whom God imputeth " no ſin. There will be a courſe taken to inſtruct " you how to kill ſin in this world, which other- " wiſe ſhall not be killed in the world to come; for " as you leave this world, ſo ſhall it be with you " in the life to come."

And then pronounced Judgement againſt every of them, as in caſe of High-Treaſon *.

The Effect of the INDICTMENT.

In " one of theſe places they meant to have kept the " King for the ſpace of three months, and at their " firſt entrance, they ſhould require three things. " 1. That he ſhould remove " and cut off the fore-mentioned Counſellors, and " others who ſhould be thought to hinder this de- " ſignment, for which purpoſe Watſon named " Veale, alias Cole, to alledge ſufficient matter a- " gainſt them."

" And for the better effecting of this their pur- " poſe, Watſon had deviſed under writing an oath " ſhould be adminiſtred for the preſervation of the " King's perſon, for the advancement of the catho- " lick religion, and for the concealing of all ſe- " crets that ſhould be revealed unto them. That all " the actions ſhould be proceeded withal in the " King's name, and they meant to ſend for the " Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, that the " King would ſpeak with them: whom they meant " to keep in ſafe cuſtody, till they had delivered " hoſtages to them not to withſtand their aſſign- " ments, and to furniſh them with all ſuch neceſſa- " ries as they ſhou'd require from them. Watſon " was the villainous hatcher of theſe Treaſons; " and Brooke, upon the learning of them, was as " eager a proſecutor; and the Lord Gray more " eager and violent than he, purpoſing to make a " ſuit to the King for the carrying over a regiment " for the relief of Oſtend, which he would have " ready for the defence of his own perſon in this " action, fearing the greatneſs of the catholick " forces according to the promiſes of George Brooke, " Markham and Watſon, and knowing not how " he might be dealt withal amongſt them."

Mr. George Brooke ſaid little or nothing in his own defence, only he made a ridiculous argument or two in the beginning: viz. that, that only could be the judge, and examiner of any action, which was the rule of the action; but the Common Law was not the rule of the action, Ergo, it could not be judge or ruler of the action: and therefore apealed to the perſon of the King. 2. That the Commiſſioners or Common Law had no authority over them; becauſe it is a maxim in the law, ejus eſſe condemnare, cujus eſt abſolvere: but the Common Law could not abſolve him, being guilty, therefore could not condemn him.

Mr. Attorney to this would have anſwered particularly, but was by the Commiſſioners and Judges willed to reduce himſelf to his own element.

My Lord Henry Howard undertaking to have anſwered him, my Lord Chief-Juſtice told him, that the King, by reaſon of his many cauſes, had many under him to execute the law of Juſtice; but he kept in his own hands the key of Mercy, either to bind or looſe the proceedings, as in his own princely wiſdom he ſhould think fit.

Therefore, ſaid Mr. Attorney, you Mr. Brooke profeſſing yourſelf to be learned, cannot be ignorant that both your anceſtors have been, and you muſt be liable and ſubject yourſelf to the trial of the law of this nation, wherein you were born, and under which you live, & ignorantia Juris non excuſat. Theſe treaſons were term'd by the Lord Cobham The Bye, as Mr. George Brooke confeſſed to Watſon, and the Lord Gray; but ſaid he, Walter Raleigh * and I, are chanced at the Main. Whereupon Mr. Attorney gave a touch of the treaſons of the Lord Cobham and Raleigh: who had procured from Aremberg five or ſix hundred thouſand Crowns, to be diſpoſed by the Lord Cobham, who ſhould therewith raiſe forces for the extirpation of the King and his Cubbes: and putting both Scotland and England in combuſtion; and ſo upon Cobham's return out of Spain, to meet Raleigh at the iſle of Jerſey, and ſo to put on foot both titles, both within and without the land.

Mr. George Brooke, after his firſt arguments, ſpake little or nothing for himſelf, more than his own confeſſion led otherwhiles to excuſe or qualify his own offence; only he gave caſt of a letter, which, he ſaid, he received from his Majeſty, wherein he had liberty and authority, to deal in the ſounding out of theſe practices: but neither at any time before nor at his arraignment, could ſhew the ſaid letter. And the King being by ſome of the Lords Commiſſioners queſtioned withal on that point, requireth his letter to be produced, and denieth he wrote any ſuch letter.

Sir Griffin Markham anſwered exceeding well, and truly to all things; denying nothing for his fault of Treaſon; but that he deſerved death upon the perſuaſion of Watſon, by whom he was miſled, and aſſured that the King before his Coronation, was not an actual, but a political King: only he deſired to avoid the imputation of effuſion of blood in that enterprize, and (if it were poſſible) the brand of a Traitor for his houſe and poſterity, proteſting how careleſs he was of his own life, which he deſired to be expoſed to any hazard or ſacrifice (though it were never ſo deſperate;) which if the King would not (in mercy) yield him, yet he deſired their Lordſhips to be interceſſors, that he might die under the Axe, and not by the Halter.

Watſon ſpake very abſurdly and deceivingly, without grace, or utterance, or good deliverance; which (added to his foreſaid villainy) made him more odious and contemptible to all the hearers.

Clarke, the other Prieſt (an excellent nimble-tongu'd fellow) of good ſpeech, more honeſt in the carriage of the buſineſs, of an excellent wit and memory, boldly, and in well-beſeeming terms, uttering his mind, not unwilling to die, but deſireth to avoid the imputation of a Traitor.

Copley, a man of a whining ſpeech, but a ſhrewd invention and reſolution.

Brookesby drawn in merely by Watſon to take the oath before-mentioned, for ſome of the particularities, as the bringing the King to the Tower for the advancement of religion; but ſpake with nobody to incite them to the buſineſs, nor came himſelf according to his time appointed by Watſon, the 23*d* or 24*th* of June, but at that inſtant attended upon the Queen.

Sir Edward Parham, was alſo by that villain Watſon dealt withal after he had tender'd him the oath to this purpoſe: that he underſtood the Lord Gray meant with forces to ſet upon the King, and to ſurprize him, that againſt that time, whether he would not draw his ſword againſt the Lord Gray with the King's ſervants and friends? And if the King's ſervants were diſcomfited, whether with the reſt of the Catholicks he would not encounter the Lord Gray, and if he could bring him to the Tower for his relief and the advancement of the catholick religion.

Parham told him, that he would ſo, if he was perſuaded that his intendment of the Lord Gray were true, which at that time Watſon could not aſſure him of; for he did but hear of ſo much: but ſaid he, when I have better aſſurance thereof, which will be within theſe three days, you ſhall further hear of me. He ſtaying the time, Watſon came not, and ſo Parham's proceedings went no further: but being urged in the point for bringing the King to the Tower, for the advancement of the catholick religion

* Sir John Hawles (Solliciror-General Temp. Will. III.) in his reply to Sir Bartholomew Showers's Magiſtracy and Government of England vindicated, &c. pag. 32. ſays, the King came to London in May, and in July following, was the pretended plot diſcovered; and in November following, the pretended delinquents were tried at Wincheſter, together with Watſon and Clarke. Their accuſations were in general.

Firſt, To ſet the Crown on the Lady Arabella's head, and to ſeize the King.

Secondly, To have a toleration of Religion.

Thirdly, To procure aid and aſſiſtance from foreign Princes.

Fourthly, To turn out of Court, ſuch as they diſliked, and place themſelves in Offices.

Of theſe the firſt Article is Treaſon; what crimes the reſt are, is doubtful. What of them was proved againſt the Lords Cobham and Gray, Watſon and Clarke, or how their Trials were managed, doth not appear: but Sir Walter Raleigh's Trial does appear, and is much like the Lord Ruſſel's, and therefore of ſome circumſtances of it, I think, it is fit to take notice. Inſtead of conſults, &c. in the Lord Ruſſel's Trial, the cant words of the ſurprizing the Bye, and the Main, were made uſe of in Sir Walter's, interpretable as the Council thought fit; at leaſt it was aſtoniſhing to the Jury, which was all that was deſigned by the Council, and fatal to the Priſoners. I have no mind to run through all the ramble of Sir Walter Raleigh's Trial, as it is printed before his Hiſtory of the World, becauſe the parallel is too exact, and ſticks too cloſe to the memory of Perſons gone: only I will ſay, That if Sir Walter Raleigh was guilty of the thing he was accus'd of by the witneſſes; though the accuſation did not amount to a legal proof, it was High-Treaſon: but if the Lord Ruſſel was guilty of the things he was accuſed of, he was not guilty of High-Treaſon.

And the ſame Author, ſays, pag. 35. I think it is plain at this day, that of Sir Walter Raleigh's is thought a ſham plot; what the Lord Ruſſel's is thought, let the Author ſay. I am loth to enumerate all, but if any Perſon will give himſelf the trouble of reading and comparing the Trial of the Lord Ruſſel with that of Sir Walter Raleigh, they will find them exactly parallel in a number of other particulars.

Religion, he ſaid, he made no doubt, but that he with others, adventuring their lives for the reſcuing the King from the Lord Gray, and bringing him for his ſafety to the Tower, this then would not but merit ſome grace from the King, for the advancement of the catholick religion.

Sir Francis Darcy being foreman of the Jury, and excellently commended for this day's carriage and behaviour, made two or three doubts concerning Sir Edward Parham's caſe, and received reſolution from the bench in ſome points, and the reſt left to his conſcience and underſtanding, went with the reſt of the Jury, and found all guilty, ſaving Parham, and ſo he was diſcharged; and upon the reſt ſentence of death was pronounced by the Lord Chief-Juſtice.

The Copie of a Letter written from Maſter T. M. neere Salisbury, to Maſter H. A. at London, concerning the proceeding at Wincheſter; where the late Lord Cobham, Lord Gray, and Sir Griffin Markham, all attainted of hie Treaſon, were ready to be executed, on Friday the 9th of December, 1603.

At which time his Majeſties Warrant, all written with his own hand, (whereof the true Copie is here annexed) was deliuered to Sir Benjamin Tichbourne, high Sheriffe of Hampſhire, commanding him to ſuſpend their execution, till further order.

Imprinted at London, 1603.

S I R,

I Haue receiued a letter from you; by which I perceiue howe much you deſire to be particularly enfourmed of the cauſe and manner of the ſtay of the late Lord Cobham's, Lord Graye's, and Sir Griffin Markham's execution, appointed at Wincheſter: wherein, although there are many better able to diſcourſe at large of ſuch an action then myſelfe, yet I conceiue when you have peruſed this plaine and true relation, of that which all men there behelde that day, and many more ſince haue heard, from perſons of the beſt qualitie and knowledge, you will thanke me more, for ſuffering the trueth to ſhew it ſelf vnclothed, then if I had laboured to haue deliuered you a tale well painted with curious words and fine phraſes.

You muſt therfore vnderſtand, that as ſoone as the arraignments were paſſed at Wincheſter, his Majeſties Priuie-Counſel (to the number of fourteene or fifteene, of which companie all of them had either beene tryers of the Noblemen as their Peers, or ſitten as high Commiſſioners vpon the Gentlemen) were called before his Majeſtie (in his Priuie-Chamber) at Wilton, where hee commanded them to deliuer (without reſpect to any perſon) the true narration onely, of the order in the Triall of theſe perſons that had beene condemned by the lawe, and of the nature and degree of their offences, as had appeared in euery one of them, by their ſeueral anſweres.

All which being cleerely and juſtly reported by them, (each ſpeaking in the hearing of the reſt) his Majeſtie, for his part, vſed himſelf ſo grauely and reſeruedly in all his ſpeeches, as well to themſelues at that time, as alſo to all other perſons after, in priuate or publique, as neither any of his Priuie-Counſell, Nobilitie, or any that attended neereſt to his ſacred perſon, durſt preſume to mediate for any, or ſo much as to enquire what ſhould be the concluſion of this proceeding.

In the meane time, while the Court was full of uariety of diſcourſe, ſome ſpeaking out of probabilitie, others arguing out of deſire, what was like to be the fortune of all, or of any of theſe offendours, his Majeſtie hauing concluded onely in his own ſecret heart (which is the true oracle of grace and knowledge) in what manner to proceed; and that without asking counſel of any earthly perſon; it pleaſed him to reſolue (betweene God and himſelfe) that their execution ſhould be ſtayed, euen at the inſtant when the Axe ſhould be layde to the trees rootes. For the ſecret and orderly carriage whereof, his Majeſtie was careful to preuent all cauſe or colour of ſuſpicion, of that judicious, royall, and vnexpected courſe which followed. And therefore, after the two Prieſts were executed, on Tueſday the 29th of November, and Maiſter George Brooke on Monday following, his Majeſtie on the ſame day, being the 1ſt of December, ſigned three Warrants, for the execution of the late Lord Cobham, Lord Gray, and Sir Griffin Markham Knight, with particular direction to the Sheriffe, to performe it on Friday after, before ten a clocke in the morning.

All theſe directions being now become notorious, both by the writs of execution (which paſſed vnder the Great Seale) and by the making readie the Scaffolds at Wincheſter, his Majeſtie uery ſecretly (as now appeareth by the ſequele) drewe himſelfe into his cabinet, on Wedneſday before the day of execution, and there priuately framed a Warrant, written all with his own hand, to the Sheriffe, by vertue whereof, he countermaunded all the former directions, alledging the reaſons therein mentioned. Of which ſeeing no mans pen can ſo well expreſſe, as his owne, I ſend you the Copie verbatim, as I took it out of the originall, which many read in my couſin Sir Benjamin Tichbournes hand.

And now to come to the ordering of this buſineſſe; among many other circumſtances, it is uery remarkable, with what diſcretion and foreſight that perſon was elected, which muſt bee vſed in carriage of the Warrant. Firſt his Majeſtie reſolued it ſhould be a Scottiſhman; being thereby like to be freeſt from particular dependencie vpon any Nobleman, Counſellors, or others, their friends or allyes. Next hee reſolued, to ſend a man of no extraordinarie ranke, becauſe the ſtanders-by ſhould not obſerue any alteration, nor the delinquents themſelues ſhould take any apprehenſion of ſuch a mans being there at that time: this being his Majeſties ſpeciall deſire, that euery one of them (being ſeuerally brought vpon the Scaffold) might quietly breath foorth their laſt wordes, and true confeſſion of his ſecreteſt conſcience. And ſo (to be ſhort) his Majeſtie made choiſe of Mr. John Gibb, a Scottiſhman (as aforeſaid) a man that had never dealt with any Counſellor, or other, for ſuite or buſineſſe, but one that had (within ſhort while after the Kings firſt entrie) bene ſent backe into Scotland, from whence he was but freſhly arriued at Wilton, ſome fewe dayes before.

This party being by the King approoued for an ancient, truſtie, and ſecret ſeruant (as a Groome of his Majeſties bed-chamber) and a man (as is ſaid before) little knowen, and leſs bound to any Subject in England for any benefit, receiuing the Warrant ſecretly, on Thurſday, from the Kings owne hand, hand, and telling his fellowes (who would otherwiſe haue miſſed him) that he muſt lie that night at Salisbury vpon ſome priuate buſineſſe of his owne, he rode directly to Wincheſter, and there, keeping himſelfe priuate all night, roſe earely in the morning on Friday, and went obſcurely to the Caſtle-greene, where the people flocking in all the morning, as the time drewe neere, he put himſelfe with the throng, cloſe by the Scaffold, and there leaned till the Sheriffe brought up Sir Griffin Markham to the place, who was the man appointed firſt to die.

There the ſayd Sir Griffin Markham, hauing ended his prayer, and made himſelfe readie to kneele downe, Mr. John Gibb finding it fit time, while the axe was preparing, to giue ſome ſecret notice of his charge, called to my couſin Tichbourne, the Sheriffe, to ſpeake with him, and then deliuered him (priuately) his Majeſties Warrant, with further directions uerbally, how he ſhould vſe it.

Herevpon the Sheriffe, perceiuing fully his Majeſties intention, ſo warily and diſcreetly marſhalled the matter, as hee onely called Sir Griffin Markham vnto him on the Scaffold, and told him, that he muſt withdraw himſelfe into the hall, to be confronted (before his death) before thoſe two Lords, that were to follow him, about ſome points that did concern his Majeſties ſeruice: and ſo carrying Markham into the hall, he left him there, and went vp haſtily, for the Lord Gray, to the Caſtle, who being likewiſe brought vp to the Scaffold, and ſuffered to powre out his prayers to God (at great length) and to make his laſt confeſſion, as he would anſwere it upon his ſoule, when he was readie to kneele downe, to receiue the ſtroke of death, Maſter Sheriffe cauſed him to ſtay, and told him that he muſt goe downe for a while into the hall, where finding Sir Griffin Markham, he willed him to tarry there till he returned.

Laſt of all, he went for the Lord Cobham, who hauing alſo ended his deuotion to God, and making himſelfe ready to receiue the ſame blow, the Sheriffe finding the time come to publiſh the Kings mercie to the world, and to reueale his myſterie, he cauſed both the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin Markham, to be brought backe to the Scaffold, and there, before them all three that were condemned, and in the hearing of all the company, notified his Majeſties Warrant, by which he was authoriſed to ſtay the execution. Which ſtrange and vndeſerved Grace and Mercie, proceeding from a Prince, ſo deeply wounded without cauſe, or colour of cauſe giuen by himſelfe toward them in any thing, but meerely contrary (to both the Lords eſpecially) bred in the hearts, as well of the offenders as of the ſtanders by, ſuch ſundry paſſions, according to the diuers tempers of their minds, as to ſome that ſhall receiue thoſe things by report, which others did behold with their eyes, my relation may rather ſeeme to be a deſcription of ſome ancient Hiſtory, expreſſed in a well-acted Comedy, then that it was euer poſſible for any other man to repreſent, at one time, in a matter of this conſequence, ſo many liuely figures of Juſtice and Mercy in a King, of Terror and Penitence in Offenders, and of ſo great Admiration and Applauſe in all others, as appeared in this Action, carried only and wholy by his Majeſties owne direction.

The Lord Cobham (holding his hand to heauen) applauded this incomparable Mercie of ſo gracious a Soueraigne, aggrauating his owne fault, by comparing it with the Princes Clemencie, wiſhing confuſion to all men aliue, that ſhould euer thinke a thought againſt ſuch a Prince, as neither gave cauſe of offence, nor tooke reuenge of ingratitude.

The Lord Gray, finding in what meaſure this rare King had rewarded good for euill, and forborne to make him an example of diſcouragement, and terror to all men that hereafter might attempt to break the bonds of loyalty, vpon the paſſions of any ambition, began to ſob and weep for a great while, with moſt deep contrition, proteſting now, that ſuch was his zeale and deſire to redeeme his fault, by any meanes of ſatisfaction, as he could eaſily ſacrifice his life, to preuent the loſſe of one finger of that royall hand, that had dealt ſo mercifully with him, when he leaſt looked for it.

Sir Griffin Markham (ſtanding like a man aſtoniſhed) did nothing but admire and pray. The people that were preſent, witneſſed, by infinite applauſe and ſhouting, the joy and comfort which they took in theſe wonderfull effects of Grace and Mercy, from a Prince whome God had inſpired with ſo many royall gifts, for their conſeruation, and would conſerue for his owne glorie.

The crie being carried out of the Caſtle-gates into the Town, was not onely ſounded with acclamation of all ſexes, qualities and affection, but the true report, diuulged ſince in all partes, hath bred, in the woorſt-diſpoſed mindes, ſuch remorſe of iniquitie, in the beſt ſuch incouragement to loyaltie, and in thoſe that are indifferent ſuch feare to offend, and generally ſuch affection to his Majeſties Perſon, as perſwades the whole world, that Sathan himſelfe can neuer ſo far prevail with any, as to make them lift vp their hearts or hands againſt a Prince, from whome they receiue ſuch true effects of Juſtice and Goodneſs.

To conclude therefore, I haue now done my beſt to ſatisfie your deſire, though I feele (to my griefe) how ſhort I come to my own wiſh; becauſe I would haue expreſſed to the life (if it had beene poſſible) both the matter and the forme of this proceeding; of both which the wiſeſt men, that haue ſeene and vnderſtoode all particular circumſtances, are at the ende of their wits, to giue an abſolute cenſure, whether of them both deſerue greater recommendation: this being moſt aſſured, that there is no Record extant, wherein ſo great wiſdome and vnderſtanding, ſo ſolid judgement, ſo perfect a reſolution, to give way to no requeſt, or mediation: ſo inſcrutable a heart, ſo royall and equall a tempered Mercie, after ſo clear and publike Juſtice, haue euer concurred ſo demonſtratiuely as in this late Action, wherein this bleſſed King hath not proceeded after the manner of men and of Kings, Sed cæleſtis Judicis æternique Regis more, whereof he ſhall be moſt aſſured to reape theſe laſting fruites, of being beloued and feared of all men, obeyed with comfort, and ſerued with continuall joy and admiration. And ſo forbearing to hold you any longer at this time, I end. From my houſe, neere Salisbury, the 15th of December, 1603.

Your Lovin Couſin and Friend,

T. M.

His Majeſties Warrant, written with his own Hand.

X. The Caſe between Sir Francis Goodwin and Sir John Fortescue, in the Reign of King James I. as it ſtands upon the Journal of the Houſe of Commons.

[Mercurii 14 die Martii, 1704.

Ordered,

That what ſtands upon the Journal of this Houſe, of King James I. in the Caſe between Sir Francis Goodwin and Sir John Forteſcue, be printed.

Paul Jodrell, Cl' Dom' Com'.]

Die Jovis, 22° Martii, 160¼.

THE firſt motion was made by Sir William Fleetwood, one of the Knights returned for the County of Bucks, on the behalf of Sir Francis Goodwin Knight; who, upon the firſt Writ of Summons directed to the Sheriff of Bucks, was elected the firſt Knight for that Shire: but the Return of his Election being made, it was refuſed by the Clerk of the Crown, (quia utlagatus:) and becauſe Sir John Forteſcue, upon a ſecond Writ, was elected, and entred in that place, his deſire was, that this Return might be examined, and Sir Francis Goodwin received as a Member of the Houſe. The Houſe gave way to the motion; and for a more deliberate and judicial proceeding in a caſe of Privilege ſo important to the Houſe, Ordered, That the Serjeant (the proper Officer of the Houſe) ſhould give warning to the Clerk of the Crown to appear at the Bar at eight a clock the next morning, and to bring with him all the Writs of Summons, Indentures, and Returns of Elections for the County of Bucks, made and returned for this Parliament; and to give warning alſo to Sir Francis Goodwin to attend in perſon, whom their pleaſure was to hear, ore tenus, to deliver the ſtate of his own cauſe, and the manner and reaſons of the proceeding in the election of the Knights of the Shire for that County.

This being a motion tending to matter of privilege, was ſeconded with another by Mr. Serjeant Sherly, touching an arreſt of Sir Thomas Riley, &c.

Die Veneris, viz. 23° Martii, 160¼.

SIR George Coppin Knight, Clerk of the Crown in the Chancery, this day, (according to former Order) being attended by the Serjeant of the Houſe with his Mace, appeared at the Bar, and produced all the Writs of Summons, Indentures, and Returns made of the Knights for Buckinghamſhire for this Parliament; which were ſeverally read by the Clerk of the Houſe, and then the Clerk of the Crown commanded to retire to the door: And after, Sir Francis Goodwin himſelf (whom it ſpecially concerned) attending to know the pleaſure of the Houſe, was called in, to deliver the ſtate of his own cauſe, ore tenus; wherein he was heard at large, and commanded again to retire until the Houſe had determined what to do.

In this mean time the whole caſe was at large opened, and argued pro & contra by ſundry learned and grave Members of the Houſe; and after much diſpute, the queſtion was agreed upon, and made.

Queſt. Whether Sir Francis Goodwin were lawfully elected and returned one of the Knights for Bucks; and ought to be admitted and received as a Member of this Houſe?

Upon this Queſtion, it was Reſolved in the affirmative, That he was lawfully elected and returned, and (de jure) ought to be received.

Hereupon the Clerk of the Crown was commanded to file the firſt Indenture of Return: And order was given, that Sir Francis ſhould preſently take the oath of Supremacy uſual, and his place in the Houſe; which he did accordingly.

Die Martis, viz. 27° die Martii, 1604.

SIR Frantis Bacon, in reporting a conference with the Lords, touching Wardſhip and other things, reported, That a Lord touched the Caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin as a thing he had heard at large, but did not underſtand it; and therefore deſired to know it more particularly from this Houſe.

Anſwer was made, That they had no warrant from the Houſe to ſpeak of it.

Sir Edward Coke, his Majeſty's Attorney-General, and Mr. Doctor Hone, bring a meſſage from the Lords, expreſſing with what acceptation their Lordſhips entertained their motion yeſterday, not only for the matter, being of very great weight and conſequence, but eſpecially for the manner; namely, That, touching Wardſhip, they would not petition for eaſe in it as a matter of wrong, but of grief; and pray to be relieved by grace, and not by juſtice: And their Lordſhips for anſwer were deſirous, and moved at that time to couple in the ſame petition the matter of grievance, of reſpite of homage; which his Majeſty, out of his gracious favour and love to his people, had himſelf taken knowledge of. "And as they conceive it to be likely, that the "conference may continue between the two Houſes, "touching the ſaid matters; as they are very "zealous of the furtherance of their purpoſe, ſo "are they jealous of any impediment that may "breed lett or hindrance therein: therefore they "deſire, for a more clear proceeding and removing "of all ſtumbling-blocks, that the former Com-"mittees may, in a ſecond conference to be had, "have authority to treat touching the caſe of Sir "Francis Goodwin, the Knight for Buckinghamſhire, "firſt of all, before any other matter were farther "proceeded in."

A. The anſwer to this meſſage, (as in ſuch caſes is for the more part uſual) That they would return anſwer by meſſengers of their own.

Upon this meſſage it was argued by ſome, That in no ſort they ſhould give account to the Lords of their proceedings in the Houſe; but that Mr. Speaker ſhould from the Houſe be a Suitor to his Majeſty, to have acceſs, and as their common mouth give his Highneſs ſatisfaction by direction from the Houſe: That now the judgment of Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe having paſſed the Houſe, it could not, nor ought not, to be reverſed by them. A precedent, Anno 27 Eliz. cited; where a bill brought down from the Lords, upon the firſt reading was rejected; the Lords ſent meſſengers to demand a reaſon of their judgment. It was denied to yield any reaſon.

This Argument brought forth this queſtion, which Mr. Speaker was ordered by the houſe preſently to make, viz.

Queſt. Whether they ſhould confer with the Lords, touching the caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin the Knight for Buckinghamſhire?

And Reſolved, That they ſhould not.

It was then conſidered as fit to return ſome anſwer of the meſſage from the Lords; and Mr. Secretary Herbert, with ſome other of the Committees, were appointed to deliver to their Lordſhips, from the Houſe,

That they did conceive it did not ſtand with the Honour and Order of the Houſe, to give account of any their proceedings or doings: but if their Lordſhips have any purpoſe to confer for the reſidue, that then they will be ready at ſuch time and place, and with ſuch number as their Lordſhips ſhall think meet.

Upon the laſt meſſage to the Lords, the Meſſengers return, That their Lordſhips would preſently ſend anſwer by meſſengers of their own.

Sir Edward Coke, his Majeſty's Attorney-General, Mr. D. Carew, Mr. D. Hone, and Mr. Tyndall, delivered from the Lords, That their Lordſhips taking notice in particular of the Return of the Sheriff of Bucks; and acquainting his Majeſty with it, his Highneſs conceived himſelf ingaged and touched in honour that there might be ſome conference of it between the two Houſes: and to that end, ſignified his pleaſure unto them, and by them to this Houſe.

Upon this meſſage, ſo extraordinary and unexpected, the Houſe entred into ſome conſideration what were fit to be done; and

Reſolved, That his Majeſty might be moved for acceſs the next day. And afterwards they underſtood his pleaſure to be, That they ſhould attend at Whitehall at eight a clock the next morning. But becauſe the time was then ſomewhat far ſpent, they Ordered, That the Houſe, with Mr. Speaker, ſhould meet at ſix a-clock the next morning in the Houſe.

Yet afore their riſing, they thought fit to name a Committee, to ſet down the effect of that which Mr. Speaker was to deliver from the Houſe to the King, viz.

Sir Francis Bacon.	Sir Edwyn Sandis.
Mr. Wentworth.	Sir Francis Haſtings.

To meet at four a clock this afternoon at the Parliament-chamber in the Middle-Temple.

Die Mercurii, viz. 28° die Martii.

MR. Speaker, with a great number of the Houſe, aſſembled at ſix a clock this morning, with a purpoſe to treat and reſolve what ſhould be delivered to his Majeſty, (being appointed to attend him the ſame morning at eight a clock) touching the reaſons of their proceeding in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe: but becauſe the Houſe was not then thought full enough for a matter of that conſequence, they proceeded to the reading of Bills.

Upon motion touching Mr. Speaker's attendance on the King, a Committee was named to accompany him, viz.

All the Privy-Council, being Members of the Houſe.

Mr. Speaker, together with theſe Committees, were this day, at eight a-clock in the morning, appointed to attend his Majeſty, and to relate the reaſons of the proceeding of the Houſe in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe; where, upon anſwer or reply, ſuch Lawyers as be of the Committee are to give their aſſiſtance.

Die Jovis, viz. 29° die Martii, 1604.

MR. Speaker relateth what he had delivered to the King by warrant from the Houſe the day before, touching their proceeding in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe, and his Majeſty's anſwer; whereof, becauſe part was afterwards penned by ſelect Committees, read in the Houſe, and offered in writing to the King, I have but touched the heads, omitting many circumſtances. He ſaid, he firſt delivered, 1. The manner and matter. 2. Then ſuch precedents as had been vouched and ſtood upon. 3. He opened the body of the law for election.

The firſt writ of Summons, dated ultimo Januarii before the Parliament: the Writ iſſued duly; the liberty was free, by that writ, to chuſe in pleno comitatu: the election was made according to that writ, and the indenture duly returned; and therefore adjudged by the Houſe, That this firſt election being good, the ſecond was conſequently void.

For the matter of Utlawry againſt Sir Francis Goodwin, there was one proſecuted againſt him at the ſuit of Johnſon, 31 Eliz. for 60 l. and was laid and proceeded in the Huſtings, London. Another, at the ſuit of one Hacker, for 16 l. 39 Eliz. That Sir Francis had ſince been choſen, admitted, and ſerved as a Member of this Houſe, in the ſeveral Parliaments holden 39 and 43 Eliz.

That the Utlawry remained in the Huſtings, ſo as the law could not take notice of it; neither was it pleadable.

1 Eliz. One Smith was found utlawed, and privileged by the Houſe.

23 Eliz. One Vaughan utlawed; and, upon the queſtion and diviſion of the Houſe, privileged: being carried with the difference of ſix voices.

35 Eliz. Three precedents vouched.

39 Hen. 6. Fitz-Herbert. The caſe not judged; but opinions delivered.

Mr. John Killegrew having fifty-two utlawries returned againſt him, was admitted to ſerve in the Houſe.

Sir William Harecourt was found eighteen times utlawed, and yet was admitted to ſerve.

The manner of the Election is limited by the Statute.

The ſuppoſed utlawry, 31 Eliz. againſt Sir Francis, was no utlawry at all; for whereſoever a man is ſued, the proclamation ought to go into the county where the party dwelleth; or elſe the utlawry is not good.

39 & 43 Eliz. The general pardon is good for utlawries, againſt all, ſaving the party at whoſe ſuit.

31 Eliz. It was Franciſcus Goodwin Gen.

39 Eliz. Franciſcus Goodwin Armig. The Sheriff is no judge of the utlawry, neither could take notice it was the ſame man; and therefore could not properly return him utlawed.

His Majeſty anſwered, He was loth he ſhould be forced to alter his tune; and that he ſhould now change it into matter of grief, by way of conteſtation. He did ſample it to the murmur and contradiction of the people of Iſrael.

He did not attribute the cauſe of his grief to any purpoſe in the Houſe to offend him; but only to a miſtaking of the law. For matters of fact, he anſwered them all particularly. That for his part he was indifferent which of them were choſen, Sir John, or Sir Francis: that they could ſuſpect no ſpecial affection in him, becauſe this was a Counſellor not brought in by himſelf.

That he had no purpoſe to impeach their privilege; but ſince they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected they ſhould not be turned againſt. That there was no precedent did ſuit this caſe fully: Precedents in the times of Minors, of Tyrants, of Women, of Simple Kings, not to be credited; becauſe for ſome private ends. By the law this Houſe ought not to meddle with Returns, being all made into the Chancery, and are to be corrected or reformed by that Court only, into which they are returned. 35 Hen. VI. It was the Reſolution of all the Judges, that matter of utlawry was a ſufficient cauſe of diſmiſſion of any Member out of the Houſe. That the Judges have now reſolved, That Sir Francis Goodwin ſtandeth utlawed according to the laws of this Land. In concluſion, it was his Majeſty's ſpecial charge unto us;

That, 1. The courſe already taken ſhould be truly reported. 2. That we ſhould debate the matter, and reſolve among ourſelves. 3. That we ſhould admit of conference with the Judges. 4. That we ſhould make report of all the proceedings, unto the Council.

This

This relation being made, the Houſe did not enter into any further conſideration of the matter at that time; but Reſolved, and Ordered, That it ſhould be the firſt matter moved the next morning.

Die Veneris, viz. 30° die Martii, 1604.

MOved and urged by one, touching the difference now on foot between the King and the Houſe, that there is juſt fear of ſome great abuſe in the late election. That in his conſcience the King hath been much miſinformed; and that he had too many miſinformers, which he prayed God might be removed or leſſened in their number. That now the caſe of Sir John Forteſcue and Sir Francis Goodwin was become the caſe of the whole Kingdom. That old Lawyers forget, and commonly interpret the law according to the time.

That by this courſe the free election of the Country is taken away, and none ſhall be choſen, but ſuch as ſhall pleaſe the King and Council. Let us therefore, with fortitude, underſtanding and ſincerity, ſeek to maintain our privilege; which cannot be taken or conſtrued any contempt in us, but merely a maintenance of our common right, which our Anceſtors have left us, and is juſt and fit for us to transfer to our poſterity.

Another, For a law to be made, That never any man outlawed, ſhould ſhow his face here again. The difference, he obſerved, was ſome unreſpective carriage towards his Majeſty in this matter: and therefore let our proceeding be dutiful and careful towards him, in adviſing of ſome ſpeedy courſe to give his Majeſty ſatisfaction; that is (as he conceived) according to the King's project, firſt, to adviſe amongſt ourſelves, and then to confer with the Judges, not as Parliament-men, but as Counſellors; not as though they were to reverſe our errors, but that we might be better informed; not now the caſe of Sir John and Sir Francis, but a caſe of great difference between the King and us, wherein we are deeply to conſider the conſequence if this pique be bruited in the Country, abroad or beyond the ſeas. It is fit we let the King ſee how much we take to heart this matter, ſithence our affections have ſo much appeared in the paſſing and preſent expediting of the Act of Recognition, &c.

Concluſ. That we ſhould tender our humble petition to his Majeſty, for leave to make a law for the baniſhing of all Outlaws hereafter from the Parliament, and pray, that we may hold all our privileges entire.

A third, That we ought not to conteſt with the King; that it is fit to have a conference: that by it we ſhall loſe no privilege, but rather gain; for the matters of the conference will be two, ſatisfaction of the King, and putting in certainty our privilege. All is not yet ſaid that may be ſaid; we are not to diſpute with one that is Governor of thirty legions. Confitendum eſt ne fruſtra interrogaſſet. Let us deal plainly and freely with the Lords, and let them know all the reaſons. They are jealous of the honour of a Privy-Counſellor, we of the freedom of Election. It is fit great men maintain the Prerogative; ſo is it fit that we maintain our Privileges. This is a Court of Record, therefore ought we by all means ſeek to preſerve the honour and dignity of it. If a Burgeſs be choſen for two places, the Burgeſs makes his choice for which he will ſerve, and a warrant ſhall be directed from Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Houſe, to the Clerk of the Crown to ſend forth a Writ for a new election for the other place left; which is a direct proof that it is a Court of Power and of Record. We have a Clerk and a Regiſter; all matters that paſs here are entered of Record, and preſerved. As they ſtand for the honour of a Counſellor, ſo we for our Privileges. It is to be wiſhed, that we had a law to declare our Privileges, that we have a Court of Record and a Regiſter.

Obj. We (they ſay) are but half of the body, and the Lords are the parts neareſt the Head.

Concl. That we may pray it may be explained by a law what our Privileges are; and that no man outlawed may hereafter be admitted.

There muſt be a Judge of the Return before we ſit; and this is now judged according to the poſitive Laws of the Realm by the King, which infringeth not our liberty, ſince we judge after the Court is ſet, according to diſcretion.

No precedent, that any man was put out of the Houſe for utlawry; therefore it had been fit we ſhould have deſired to inform the King that he was miſinformed.

Let us now leave this particular caſe to the King, and conſider and reſolve of the material queſtions that will fall out in the debate of it. 1. Whether this Court hath power to take notice of Returns made before we ſit here? 2. Whether men utlawed may be of the Houſe? 3. Whether a man pardoned, having not ſued forth a writ of Scire facias, may be called in queſtion? 4. Whether the Writ were returned the 17th of February, or no, upon Oath of the Sheriff?

Some others were ſtrong in opinion, That we ought not to confer nor to commit, ſaying, That Majeſty had conferred with Juſtice; yet Majeſty had left the ſtopping of the wound to us. We ſhould taint ourſelves with three great blemiſhes, if we ſhould alter our judgment, levity, cruelty and cowardice. There be three degrees of upright judgment, motion, examination, judgment: all theſe have paſſed us. No Court can reform their own judgment. Every day a Term here. Every act that paſſeth this Houſe, is an Act of Parliament. Shall juſtice float up and down? Shall he be a Member to-day, and ſhall we tear him off to-morrow? If the Member be ſound, it is violence: if the hand tear the reſt, it is cruelty. No part torn, but it may bleed to the ruin of the whole.

Let Sir Francis Goodwin ſtand as he is: duty and courage may ſtand together; let not the Houſe be inveigled by ſuggeſtions. This may be called a Quo Warranto to ſeize our liberties.

There hath been three main Objections.

1. The King's Exception. We could ſhow no precedent in this kind.

Anſw. "The King could ſhow no ſuch writ before. Our hands were never ſought to be cloſed before, nor we prevented. It opens a gap to thruſt us all into the petty-bag. A Chancellor may call a Parliament of what perſons he will by this courſe. Any ſuggeſtion by any perſon, may be cauſe of ſending a new writ."

2. Obj. by the Lord Chief-Juſtice. By the law we had nothing to do to examine Returns.

Anſw. "Judges cannot take notice of private "cuſtoms or privileges: but we have a privilege "which ſtands with the law." The Judges informed the King of the law, but not of a caſe of privilege. It is true, 35 Hen. VI. all the Judges reſolved, That no outlawed man ought to be admitted; but that was controlled by Parliament. It is the ſame opinion now; let us controll it as then: we have done no offence to the State; let us therefore be conſtant in our own Judgment.

3. Obj. Another, The King's pleaſure, that we ſhould deliver the reaſons of that we have done to be juſt.

If we clear our contempt, we have diſcharged ourſelves. The King's-Bench cannot reverſe their judgment the ſame Term; therefore not the Parliament. Let us ſend a meſſage to the Lords, That we are ready ſo to do, as we do not undo this Houſe.

Others, Non coronabitur qui non legitime certaverit. Not to be termed a difference between his Majeſty and the Commons. Rogamus, Auguſte, non pugnamus. The queſtion is not of matter of privilege, but of judgment. Let us attend them as Lords of the Council, and not as Lords of Parliament.

We do no ways conteſt or contend with his Majeſty. The King is no way bound in honour. If writs go forth unduly, they may be controlled without impeachment to the King's honour. It is the act of his inferiour officers. It is now come to this queſtion, "Whether the Chancery or Parlia-"ment ought to have authority?"

Queſt. Whether we ought to ſatisfy the King in his commandment?

The King's meſſage was, That we ſhould conſider within ourſelves, and reſolve of ourſelves; then no need to confer with the Judges: if we cannot, then it is fit to be reſolved by the Judges.

The Judges have judged, and we have judged; What need then of conference? Let there be no ſpark of that grace taken from us, which we have had already from his Majeſty. Let our reaſons be put into articles, and delivered in all humbleneſs unto him. Upon the concluſion of this debate in this manner, the Houſe proceeded to queſtion; and the firſt was,

1. Queſt. Whether the Houſe was reſolved in the matter?

And the queſtion was anſwered by general voice, That the whole Houſe was reſolved.

2. Queſt. Whether the reaſons of their proceeding ſhall be ſet down in writing?

Reſolved, That they ſhall be ſet down in writing: and Ordered further, That a Committee ſhould be named for that purpoſe, and appointed firſt to ſet them down in writing, and to bring them to the Houſe, there to be publiſhed, and to receive their allowance.

The Committees were inſtantly named, viz.

Sir Robert Wingfield.	Mr. Martin.
Sir George Moore.	Sir Arthur Atye.
Sir Francis Bacon.	Mr. Francis Tate.
Mr. Yelverton.	Sir Roland Litton.
Mr. Dyett.	Sir Henry Nevill.
Sir Francis Haſtings.	Mr. Attorney of the Wards.
Mr. Hedley.
Mr. Recorder of London.	Sir John Hollis.
Sir Edward Hobby.	Sir Robert Wroth.
Sir Francis Barrington.	Sir John Scott.
Mr. Wiſeman.	Mr. Hitcham.
Mr. Hyde.	Sir Edward Stafford.
Mr. Fuller.	Sir John Mallory.
Sir Edward Mountague.	Sir Herbert Croſts.
Mr. Ravenſcroft.	Sir Francis Fane.
Sir William Fleetwood.	Sir Richard Molyneux.
Mr. Winch.	Sir John Hungerford.
Sir Thomas Challoner.	Sir Edward Herbert.
Mr. Sollicitor.	All the Serjeants at Law.
Sir Roger Wilbraham.	Mr. Nathaniel Bacon.
Sir John Thynne.	Mr. Hext.

To meet this afternoon at two a clock, in the Exchequer-Chamber.

The authority given unto them by the Houſe, was this:

The Houſe being reſolved upon the queſtion, That the reaſons of their precedent Reſolution, touching the Return, Admittance and Retaining of Sir Francis Goodwin as a Member of this Houſe, ſhould be ſet down in writing; theſe Committees were ſpecially appointed to perform that ſervice, and have Warrant from the Houſe to ſend for any Officer, to view and ſearch any Record, or other thing of that kind, which may help their knowledge or memory in this particular ſervice: And having deliberately by general conſent ſet down all ſuch reaſons, they are to bring them in writing into the Houſe, there to be read and approved, as ſhall be thought fit.

Die Lunæ, viz. 2° die Aprilis, 1604.

IT was then moved, That Committees might be named to take the examination of the Sheriff of Buckinghamſhire, who was by former order ſent for, and now come. And to that end were named,

Mr. Sollicitor.	Mr. Serjeant Tanfield.
Sir Robert Wroth.	Mr. Serjeant Lee.
Sir William Fleetwood.	Mr. Yelverton.
Sir Thomas Challoner.	Mr. Francis Moore.
Sir Robert Wingfield.

Who were appointed to take his examination preſently.

Sir Charles Cornwallis moveth in excuſe of Sir Francis Goodwin's abſence from the Houſe, and prayeth, That they would as well in their own judgment pardon it, as witneſs and affirm his care and modeſty upon all occaſions to the King, in that he hath forborn, during all the time of this queſtion, to come into the Houſe.

The Examination was preſently taken by theſe Committees, and returned in this form, Interr.

Interr. 1. Why he removed the County from Ayleſbury to Brickhill?

He ſaith, It was by reaſon of the plague being at Aylesbury, the County being the 25th of January, at which time three were dead of the plague there. This was the only motive of removing his County.

Interr. 2. Whether he were preſent at the firſt Election?

Saith, He was preſent; and was as faithful to wiſh this ſecond place to Sir Francis Goodwin, as the firſt to Sir John Forteſcue: ſent Sir Francis Goodwin word, before the election, he ſhould not need to bring any Freeholders, for the election he thought would be without ſcruple for them both; firſt to Sir John, ſecond to Sir Francis. About eight of the clock he came to Brickhill; was then told by Sir George Throckmorton, and others, that the firſt voice would be given for Sir Francis; he anſwered, He hoped it would not be ſo, and deſired every Gentleman to deal with his Freeholders. After eight of the clock went to the election a great number, there being at the County . . . . . After the Writ read, he firſt intimated the points of the Proclamation; then jointly propounded Sir John Forteſcue and Sir Francis Goodwin. The Freeholders cried firſt, a Goodwin, a Goodwin: Every Juſtice of Peace on the Bench ſaid, a Forteſcue, a Forteſcue; and came down from the Bench before they named any for a ſecond place, and deſired the Freeholders to name Sir John Forteſcue for the firſt. Sir Francis Goodwin being in a chamber near, was ſent for by the Sheriff and Juſtices; and he came down and earneſtly perſuaded with the Freeholders, ſaying, Sir John was his good friend, had been his father's, and that they would not do Sir John that injury: notwithſtanding the Freeholders would not deſiſt, but all cried, a Goodwin, a Goodwin; ſome crying, a Forteſcue, to the number of ſixty, or thereabouts; the other for Sir Francis Goodwin, being about two or three hundred: and Sir Francis Goodwin, to his thinking, dealt very plainly and earneſtly in this matter for Sir John Forteſcue; for that Sir Francis Goodwin did ſo earneſtly proteſt it unto him.

Interr. 3. Who laboured him to make the Return ſo long before the day of the Parliament?

He being here in London, Mr. Attorney-General, the ſecond of March, at his chamber in the Inner-Temple, delivered him two Cap. Utlagat, againſt Sir Francis Goodwin; and before he made his return, he went and adviſed with Mr. Attorney about his return, who penned it, and ſo it was done by his direction: and the return being written, upon Friday after the King's coming through London, near about my Lord Chancellor's gate, in the preſence of Sir John Forteſcue, he delivered the Writ to Sir George Coppin: and at this time (it being about four of the clock in the afternoon) and before they parted, Sir John Forteſcue delivered him the ſecond Writ ſealed; Sir John Forteſcue, Sir George Coppin, and himſelf, being not above an hour together at that time, and never had but this new Writ of Parliament to him delivered.

Subſcribed, Francis Cheyne.

This was returned by the Committee to the hands of the Clerk, but not at all read in the houſe.

Mr. Speaker remembreth the matter of conference with the Judges, and offereth to repeat and put again the queſtions that were formerly made; being before uncertainly and unperfectly left (as he ſaid) in the caſe of Buckinghamſhire, viz.

1. Whether the Houſe were reſolved in the matter?
2. Whether they ſhould confer with the Judges?

And at length induced the Houſe to entertain the latter queſtion; and, being made, was carried by general voice in the negative, no conference.

Upon this paſſage, it was urged for a rule, That a queſtion being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be queſtioned again; but muſt ſtand as a judgment of the houſe.

It was thought fit that Mr. Speaker ſhould attend the Committee for penning the reaſons in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe, not by commandment, but voluntary of himſelf.

Die Martis, viz. 3° die Aprilis, 1604.

THE reaſons of the proceeding of the Houſe in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe, penned by the Committee, were, according to former Order, brought in by Mr. Francis Moore, and read by the Clerk, directed in form of a petition.

To the KING's moſt excellent Majeſty,

The humble Anſwer of the Commons Houſe of Parliament to his Majeſty's objections in Sir Francis Goodwin*'s caſe.*

MOST Gracious, our dear and dread Sovereign, relation being made to us by our Speaker, of your Majeſty's royal clemency and patience in hearing us, and of your princely prudence in diſcerning; ſhewing affectionate deſire rather to receive ſatisfaction to clear us, than cauſe to pardon us: we do in all humbleneſs render our moſt bounden thanks for the ſame; proteſting, by the bond of our Allegiance, that we never had thought to offend your Majeſty; at whoſe feet we ſhall ever lie proſtrate, with loyal hearts, to ſacrifice ourſelves and all we have for your Majeſty's ſervice: and in this particular, we could find no quiet in our minds, that would ſuffer us to entertain other thoughts, until we had addreſſed our anſwer to your moſt excellent Majeſty; for which nevertheleſs we have preſumed of the longer time, in reſpect we have prepared ſome precedents, requiring ſearch, to yield your Majeſty better ſatisfaction.

There were objected againſt us, by your Majeſty and your reverend Judges, four things, to impeach our proceedings, in receiving Francis Goodwin, Knight, into our Houſe.

Objection 1ma, The firſt, That we aſſume to ourſelves power of examining of the elections and returns of Knights and Burgeſſes, which belonged to your Majeſty's Chancery, and not to us: For that all returns of Writs were examinable in the Courts wherein they are returnable; and the Parliament Writs being returnable into the Chancery, the returns of them muſt needs be there examined, and not with us.

Our humble anſwer is, That, until the 7th year of King Henry IV. all Parliament Writs were returnable into the Parliament; as appeareth by many precedents of record ready to be ſhewed, and conſequently the returns there examinable: In which year a Statute was made, That thenceforth every Parliament-Writ, containing the day and place where the Parliament ſhall be holden, ſhould have this clauſe, viz. Et electionem tuam in pleno comitatu factam diſtincte & aperte ſub ſigillo tuo & ſigillis eorum qui electioni illi interfuerint nobis in Cancellariam noſtram ad diem & locum in brevi content' certifices indilate.

By this, although the form of the Writ be ſomewhat altered, yet the power of the Parliament, to examine and determine of elections, remaineth; for ſo the Statute hath been always expounded ever ſithence, by uſe to this day: and for that purpoſe, the Clerk of the Crown hath always uſed to attend all the Parliament-time, upon the Commons Houſe, with the Writs and Returns; and alſo the Commons, in the beginning of every Parliament, have ever uſed to appoint ſpecial Committees, all the Parliament-time, for examining controverſies concerning elections and returns of Knights and Burgeſſes: during which time, the Writs and Indentures remain with the Clerk of the Crown; and after the Parliament ended, and not before, are delivered to the Clerk of the Petty-bag in Chancery, to be kept there; which is warranted by reaſon and precedents: reaſon, for that it is fit that the returns ſhould be in that place examined, where the appearance and ſervice of the Writ is appointed. The appearance and ſervice is in Parliament, therefore the return examinable in Parliament.

Precedents: One in the 29th year of the reign of the late Queen Elizabeth, where after one Writ awarded into Norfolk for choice of Knights, and election made and returned, a ſecond was before the Parliament-day awarded by the Lord-Chancellor, and thereupon another election and return made; and the Commons being attended with both Writs and Returns by the Clerk of the Crown, examined the cauſe, allowed the firſt, and rejected the ſecond. So Anno 23 Elizabethæ Reginæ, a Burgeſs was returned dead, and a new choſen, and returned by a new Writ: the party returned dead appeared; the Commons, notwithſtanding the Sheriff's return, admitted the firſt choſen, and rejected the ſecond. Alſo, the ſaid 23d year, a Burgeſs choſen for Hull was returned lunatick, and a new choſen upon a ſecond Writ: the firſt claimed his place; the Commons examined the cauſe, and finding the return of lunacy to be true, they refuſed him; but if it had been falſe, they would have received him. Anno 43 Elizabethæ, the Sheriff of Rutlandſhire returned himſelf elected; the Commons finding that he was not eligible by Law, ſent a Warrant to the Chancery for a new Writ to chooſe anew. Anno 43 Eliz. alſo a Burgeſs was choſen for two Boroughs; the Commons, after he had made election which he would ſerve for, ſent Warrant to the Chancery for a Writ to chooſe a new for the other Borough: Of which kind of precedents there are many other, wherewith we ſpare to trouble your Majeſty. All which together, viz. uſe, reaſon and precedents, do concur to prove the Chancery to be a place appointed to receive the returns, as to keep them for the Parliament, but not to judge of them; and the inconvenience might be great, if the Chancery might, upon ſuggeſtions or Sheriffs returns, ſend Writs for new elections, and thoſe not ſubject to examination in Parliament: for ſo, when fit men were choſen by the Counties and Boroughs, the Lord-Chancellor, or the Sheriffs, might diſplace them, and ſend out new Writs, until ſome were choſen to their liking; a thing dangerous in precedents for the time to come, howſoever we reſt ſecurely from it at this preſent by the now Lord-Chancellor's integrity.

Objection 2^da^. That we dealt in the cauſe with too much precipitation, not ſeemly for a Council of gravity, and without reſpect to your moſt excellent Majeſty, our Sovereign, who had directed the Writ to be made; and being but half a body, and no Court of Record alone, refuſed conference with the Lords, the other half, notwithſtanding they prayed it of us.

Our humble anſwer is, to the precipitation, That we entered into this cauſe, as in other Parliaments of like caſes hath been accuſtomed, calling to us the Clerk of the Crown, and viewing both the Writs, and both returns; which in caſes of ..... and motions, though not of bills requiring three readings, hath been Warrant by continual uſage amongſt us: and thereupon, well finding that the latter Writ was awarded and ſealed before the Chancery was repoſſeſſed of the former, which the Clerk of the Crown, and the Sheriff of the County, did both teſtify, and well held to be a clear fault in law, proceeded to ſentence with the leſs reſpect of the latter election. For our lack of reſpect to your Majeſty, we confeſs, with grief of our hearts, we are right ſorry it ſhall be ſo conceived; proteſting, That it was no way made known unto us before that time that your Majeſty had taken to yourſelf any ſpecial notice, or directed any courſe in that cauſe, other than the ordinary awarding Writs by your Highneſs's officers in that behalf: but if we had known as much as ſome will have, by your Majeſty's royal mouth, we would not, without your Majeſty's privity, have proceeded in that manner. And further, it may pleaſe your Majeſty to give us leave to inform you, That in the examination of the cauſe of the Sheriff avouched unto us, That Goodwin agreed to yield the firſt place of the two Knights to Sir John Forteſcue, and in his own perſon, at the time of election, with extraordinary earneſtneſs, entreated the electors it might ſo be, and cauſed the indentures to be made up to that purpoſe; but the electors utterly refuſed to ſeal them. Concerning our refuſing conference with the Lords, there was none deſired until after our ſentence paſſed; and then we thought, That in a matter private to our houſe, which, by rules of order, might not be by us revoked, we might, without any imputation, refuſe to confer. Yet underſtanding by their Lordſhips, That your Majeſty had been informed againſt us, we made haſte (as in all Duty we were bound) to lay open to your Majeſty, our good and gracious Sovereign, the whole manner of our proceeding; "not doubting, though "we were but part of a body, as to make new "laws, yet for any matter of privileges of our "houſe, we are and ever have been a Court of our-"ſelves, or ſufficient power to diſcern and deter-"mine without their Lordſhips, as their Lord-"ſhips have uſed always to do for theirs without "us."

Objection 3^tia^. That we have, by our ſentence of receiving Goodwin, admitted, That Outlaws may be makers of laws; which is contrary to all laws.

Our humble anſwer, That notwithſtanding the precedents which we truly delivered, of admitting and retaining Outlaws in perſonal actions in the Commons Houſe, and none remitted for that cauſe; yet we received ſo great ſatisfaction, delivered from your royal Majeſty's own mouth, with ſuch excellent ſtrength and light of reaſon, more than before, in that point, we heard or did conceive, as we forthwith prepared an act to paſs our houſe, That all Outlaws henceforth ſhall ſtand diſabled to ſerve in Parliament: but as concerning Goodwin's particular, it could not appear unto us, having throughly examined all parts of the proceedings againſt him, that he ſtood an Outlaw, by the laws of England, at the time of the election made of him by the County; and that for two cauſes: the firſt is, That where the party outlawed ought to be five times proclaimed to appear in the Sheriff's County Court; and then not appearing, ought to be adjudged outlawed by the judgment of the Coroners of the County; there appeareth no record made in the Huſtings of London, that Goodwin was five times proclaimed, or that the Coroners gave judgment of outlawry againſt him: but a Clerk lately come to that office, hath now, many year after the time, and ſince this election, made entries, interlined with a new hand, that he was outlawed: to which new entries we could give no credit, for that the parties, at whoſe ſuit Goodwin was ſued, have teſtified in their writings of releaſe, That they never proceeded further than to take out the Writ of Exigent for an outlawry; and being then paid their money, deſiſted there: by which we find, That Goodwin was not five times proclaimed, nor adjudged outlawed, being a thing uſual in London to ſpare that proclamation, and judgement, if the party call not upon it; and no record being made for many years together that either of them was done.

The ſecond cauſe was, for that the Writ of Exigent, by which the Sheriff was commanded to proclaim him five times, was never lawfully returned, nor certified by Certiorari; without which, we take it, That Goodwin ſtood not diſabled as an Outlaw.

To this, adding the two general pardons by Parliament, which had cleared the outlawry in truth and ſubſtance, (if any were;) and that Goodwin could not apply the pardons by Scire fa. for that no record nor return was extant of the outlawry, whereupon he might ground a Scire fa. we were of opinion, and ſo your Majeſty's moſt reverend Judges would have been if they had known thus much, That Goodwin ſtood not diſabled by outlawry to be elected or ſerve in Parliament: but when we conſidered further, That the courſe taken againſt Goodwin for drawing him into this outlawry of purpoſe to diſable him to ſerve in this place, whereto the County had freely elected him, was unuſual; we could not with the reputation of our places, ſerving as a Council of gravity, in allowance or continuance of that courſe, cenſure him to be rejected as an Outlaw: the particulars of which were theſe, viz.

Two Exigents awarded, ... the other ſeven years paſt to the Huſtings in London: no entry made of five proclamations; nor of any judgment of the Coroners; nor any return of the Exigents made or endorſed; the party plaintiff ſatisfied; the pretended outlawries being but upon a mean proceſs: and as to your Majeſty's duties and contempts pardoned now ſince Goodwin was elected Knight, the Exigent now ſought out ſince the election procured to be returned in the name of the Sheriffs that then were, and are long ſince dead, and new entry made of the five proclamations and Coroner's judgment; and now a return made of that old Exigent, which could be of no uſe, but only for a purpoſe to diſable him for that place. Upon all which we could do no leſs in true diſcretion than certify the election made ſecundum equum & bonum.

Objection 4ta. That we proceeded to examine the truth of the fact of outlawry, and gave our ſentence upon that; whereas we ought to have been bound by the Sheriff's return of the outlawry from further examining, whether the Party were outlawed or not.

Our humble anſwer is, That the precedents cited before, in our anſwer to the firſt objection, do prove the uſe of the Commons Houſe to examine veritatem facti in elections, and returns, and have not been tied peremptorily to allow the return; as if a Knight or Burgeſs be untruly returned dead, or lunatick, yet when he appeareth to the houſe to be living and ſound, they have, contrary to the return, received him into the houſe, preferring the truth manifeſt before the return. By which diſcreet proceeding there is avoided that great inconvenience above-mentioned of giving liberty to Sheriffs, by untrue returns, to make and remove whom they liſt, to and from the Parliament ſervice, how meet ſoever the parties be in the judgment of the County or Borough that elected them.

Thus in all humility we have preſented to your moſt excellent Majeſty the grounds and reaſons of our late action, led with no affections, but guided by truth, warranted in our conſciences, imitating precedents, maintaining our ancient privileges, honouring your excellent Majeſty in all our ſervices; to which in all loyalty and devotion we bind us, and ours for ever, praying daily on the knees of our hearts, to the Majeſty of the Almighty, that your Majeſty and your poſterity may in all felicity reign over us and ours to the end of the world.

Theſe reaſons ſo ſet down and publiſhed to the houſe, Mr. Secretary Herbert was ſent with meſſage to the Lords, That the houſe had reſolved of their anſwer to his Majeſty, (in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe) and had ſet it down in writing, and that it ſhould be ſent to their Lordſhips before four of the clock in the afternoon; who immediately returned their Lordſhips anſwer, That they wou'd be ready at that time in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, with thirty of the Lords, to receive what then ſhou'd be delivered. Then were named threeſcore to attend the delivery of the ſaid reaſons at the time and place aforeſaid.

Eodem die poſt meridiem.

THE houſe entering ſeriouſly into conſultation what courſe was to be held with the Lords; as alſo falling into more length of diſputation, touching the bill of merchants, than were expected, ſent ſome meſſengers to the Lords to excuſe their long tarrying, viz.

Sir Edward Hobby.	Sir Francis Haſtings.
Sir Ro. Wilbraham.	Mr. Martyn.
Sir Henry Nevil.

This

This afternoon about five a-clock, the Committee appointed did attend to deliver the reaſons aforeſaid, at the Council-Chamber, according to appointment and order of both houſes; and they were delivered by Sir Francis Bacon, one of the Committee, with deſire, That their Lordſhips would be mediators in the behalf of the houſe, for his Majeſty's ſatisfaction.

Die Mercurii, viz. 4° die Aprilis, 1604.

SIR Francis Bacon having the day before delivered to the Lords in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, (according to the direction of the houſe) the reaſons in writing penn'd by the Committee touching Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe, maketh report of what paſſed at the time of the ſaid delivery.

Firſt, That though the Committees imployed were a number ſpecially deputed and ſelected; yet that the Lords admitted all Burgeſſes without diſtinction; that they offered it with teſtimony of their own ſpeed and care in the buſineſs, ſo as they ſaid no one thing had precedency, but only the bill of recognition; that they had ſuch reſpect to the weight of it, as they had not committed it to any frailty of memory, or verbal relation, but put it into writing for more permanent memory of their duty and reſpect to his Majeſty's grace and favour: that in concluſion they prayed their Lordſhips, ſithence they had nearer acceſs, they would co-operate with them for the King's ſatisfaction; and ſo delivered the writing to the hands of the Lord-Chancellor, who receiving it, demanded, whether they ſhou'd ſend it to the King, or firſt peruſe it? To which was anſwer'd, That ſince it was the King's pleaſure they ſhou'd concur, they deſired their Lordſhips would firſt peruſe it. The Lord Cecil demanded, whether they had Warrant to amplify, explain, or debate any doubt or queſtion made upon the reading? To which it was ſaid, They had no Warrant. And ſo the writing was read, and no more done at that time.

Die Jovis, viz. 5to die Aprilis, 1604.

MR. Speaker by a private commandment attended the King this morning at eight a clock, and there ſtaid till ten.

Mr. Speaker excuſeth his abſence, by reaſon he was commanded to attend upon his Majeſty. And bringeth meſſage from his Majeſty to this effect; That the King had received a parchment from the houſe. Whether it were an abſolute reſolution, or reaſon to give him ſatisfaction, he knew not: he thought it was rather intended for his ſatisfaction. His Majeſty proteſted, by that love he bare to the houſe as his loving and loyal Subjects, and by the faith he did ever owe to God, he had as great a deſire to maintain their privileges, as ever any Prince had, or as themſelves. He had ſeen and conſidered of the manner and the matter; he had heard his Judges and Council; and that he was now diſtracted in judgment. Therefore, for his further ſatisfaction, he deſired, and commanded as an abſolute King, that there might be a conference between the Houſe and the Judges; and that for that purpoſe there might be a ſelect Committee of grave and learned perſons out of the Houſe: That his Council might be preſent, not as Umpires to determine, but to report indifferently on both ſides.

Upon this unexpected meſſage there grew ſome amazement and ſilence. But at laſt one ſtood up and ſaid: the Prince's command is like a thunder-bolt; his command upon our Allegiance like the roaring of a Lion. To his command there is no contradiction; but how, or in what manner we ſhould now proceed to perform obedience, that will be the queſtion.

Another anſwered, let us petition to his Majeſty, that he will be pleaſed to be preſent, to hear, moderate, and judge the caſe himſelf. Whereupon Mr. Speaker proceeded to this queſtion.

Queſt. Whether to confer with the Judges in the preſence of the King and Council?

Which was reſolved in the affirmative.

And a ſelect Committee preſently named for the conference, viz.

Lawyers.	Gentlemen.
Mr. Serjeant Tanfield.	Sir Geo. Carew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen.
Mr. Serjeant Hobbard.
Mr. Serjeant Leigh.
Mr. Serjeant Shirley.	Sir Francis Haſtings.
Mr. Serjeant Dodridge.	Sir Edward Hobby.
Sir Thomas Hesketh.	Sir Robert Wroth.
Sir Francis Bacon.	Sir Henry Nevil.

Theſe Committees were ſelected and appointed to confer with the Judges of the Law, touching the reaſons of proceeding in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe, ſet down in writing, and deliver'd to his Majeſty in the preſence of the Lords of his Majeſty's Council, according to his Highneſs's pleaſure ſignified by Mr. Speaker this day to the houſe.

It was further reſolved and ordered by the houſe, (upon the motion to that end by Mr. Laurence Hyde) That the aforeſaid Committees ſhould inſiſt upon the fortification, and explaining of the reaſons and anſwers delivered unto his Majeſty; and not proceed to any other argument or anſwer, what occaſion ſoever moved in the time of that debate.

Die Mercurii, viz. 11mo die Aprilis, 1604.

Upon Adjournment.

SIR Francis Bacon was expected, and called to make a report of the late conference with the Judges in the preſence of his Majeſty and the Lords of the Council: but he made excuſe, ſaying, he was not warranted to make any report; and tantum permiſſum quantum commiſſum: nevertheleſs, upon a queſtion, he was over-ruled to make a report; and a motion thereupon made, That the Committees might firſt aſſemble in the Court of Wards, and confer among themſelves, and then the Report to be made.

Sir Francis Bacon, after the meeting of the Committees in the Court of Wards, reporteth what had paſſed in conference in the preſence of his Majeſty and his Council.

THE King ſaid, He would be Preſident himſelf. This attendance renewed the remembrance of the laſt, when we departed with ſuch admiration. It was the voice of God in man: the good Spirit of God in the mouth of man. I do not ſay, the voice of God, and not of man. I am not one of Herod's flatterers. A curſe fell upon him that ſaid it: a curſe on him that ſuffered it. We might ſay as was ſaid to Solomon, We are glad, O King! that we give account to you, becauſe you diſcern what is ſpoken.

We let paſs no moment of time, until we had reſolved and ſet down an anſwer in writing, which we now had ready.

That ſithence we received a meſſage from his Majeſty by Mr. Speaker, of two parts: 1. The one Paternal. 2. The other Royal. 1. That we were as dear unto him as the ſafety of his perſon, or the preſervation of his poſterity. 2. Royal, that we ſhould confer with his Judges, and that in the preſence of himſelf and his Council. "That we did "more now to King James than ever was done ſince "the Conqueſt, in giving account of our Judge-"ments." That we had no intent in all our proceedings, to encounter his Majeſty, or to impeach his Honour or Prerogative.

This was ſpoken by way of preamble by him you employed.

How to report his Majeſty's Speeches; he knew the eloquence of a King was unimitable.

The King addreſſed himſelf to him as deputed by the Houſe, and ſaid he would make three parts of what he had to ſay. The cauſe of the meeting was to draw to an end the difference in Sir Francis Goodwin's caſe.

If they required his abſence, he was ready; becauſe he feared he might be thought intereſted, and ſo breed an inequality on their part.

He ſaid, That he would not hold his Prerogative or Honour, or receive any thing of any or all his ſubjects. This was his Magnanimity.

That he would confirm and ratify all juſt Privileges. This his Bounty and Amity. As a King, Royally: As King James, ſweetly and kindly out of his good-nature.

One point was, Whether we were a Court of Record, and had power to judge of Returns. As our Court had power, ſo had the Chancery; and that the Court that firſt had paſſed their Judgment, ſhould not be controlled.

Upon a ſurmiſe, and upon the Sheriff's Return, there grew a difference.

That there are two powers. 1. Permanent: The other, Tranſitory. That the Chancery was a confidenciary Court to the uſe of the Parliament during the time.

Whatſoever the Sheriff inſerts beyond the authority of his mandate, a nugation. The Parliaments of England not to be bound by a Sheriff's Return.

That our Privileges were not in queſtion. That it was private jealouſies without any kernel or ſubſtance. "He granted it was a Court of Record, "and a Judge of Returns." He moved, That neither Sir John Forteſcue, nor Sir Francis Goodwin might have place; Sir John loſing place, his Majeſty did meet us half-way. That when there did ariſe a ſchiſm in the Church between a Pope and an Antipope, there could be no end of the difference until they were both put down.

Upon this Report, a motion was made, That it might be done by way of warrant; and therein to be inſerted, That it was done at the requeſt of the King: and was further ſaid, (as anciently it hath been ſaid,) That we loſe more at a Parliament than we gain at a Battel. That the authority of the Committee was only to fortify what was agreed on by the Houſe for anſwer, and that they had no authority to conſent.

It was further moved, by another, That we ſhould proceed to take away our diſſenſion, and to preſerve our liberties; and ſaid, that in this we had exceeded our commiſſion; and that we had drawn upon us a note of inconſtancy and levity.

But the acclamation of the Houſe, was, That it was a teſtimony of our duty, and no levity.

So as the queſtion was preſently made,

Queſt. Whether Sir John Forteſcue and Sir Francis Goodwin ſhall both be ſecluded, and a warrant for a new writ directed. And upon the queſtion, reſolved, That a writ ſhould iſſue for a new choice, and a warrant directed accordingly.

A motion made, That thanks ſhould be preſented by Mr. Speaker to his Majeſty, for his preſence and direction in this matter; and thereupon Ordered, That his Majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known by Sir Roger Aſton for their attendance accordingly.

Becauſe it had been conceived by ſome, that Sir Francis Goodwin being the Member ſpecially intereſted, it were fit he ſhould give teſtimony of his liking and obedience in this courſe: being dealt withal to that end, he writ his letter to Mr. Speaker; which, before this queſtion made, for better ſatisfaction of the Houſe, was read in theſe words.

S I R,

"I Am heartily ſorry to have been the leaſt occa-"ſion either of queſtion between his Majeſty "and that honourable Houſe, or of interruption "to thoſe worthy and weighty cauſes, which by "this time, in all likelihood, had been in very "good furtherance: wherefore underſtanding very "credibly, that it pleaſed his Majeſty, when the "Committees laſt attended him, to take courſe "with them for a third writ and election for the "Knightſhip of the County of Buckingham; I am "ſo far from giving any impediment thereunto, "that contrariwiſe, I humbly deſire his Majeſty's "direction in that behalf to be accompliſhed and "performed. So praying you, according to ſuch "opportunity as will be miniſtred, to give furthe-"rance thereunto, I take my leave, and reſt

Weſtm. this 11*th of April*, 1604. Yours, moſt aſſured,

Directed, To the Right Worſhipful Sir Edward Phelips, Knight, Speaker of the Honourable Court of Parliament. to be commanded,

A Motion made, That Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the Houſe, ſhould pray acceſs to his Majeſty, and preſent their humble thanks for his gracious preſence and direction, upon the hearing of Sir Francis Goodwin's cauſe; which was aſſented unto: and Sir Roger Aſton, a ſervant of his Majeſty's Bed-chamber, and one of the Members of the Houſe, was preſently appointed to know his Majeſty's pleaſure; which he did accordingly: And returned, That his Majeſty was willing to give them acceſs in the gallery at Whitehall, at two a-clock in the afternoon, the ſame day. Thereupon a Committee was named to attend Mr. Speaker to the King, with a general warrant to all others that ſhould be pleaſed to accompany them.

Die Veneris, viz. 13° die Aprilis, 1604.

MR. Speaker returneth to the Houſe the effect of his meſſage of thanks, delivered the laſt day in the name of the Houſe to his Majeſty; as alſo of his Majeſty's anſwer, viz.

That he related to this Houſe the humble and dutiful acceptation of what his Majeſty had done, together with the humble thanks of the Houſe for his zealous and paternal delivery of his Grace unto us, by his own mouth: what wonder they conceived in his Judgment, what joy in his Grace, what comfort they had in his Juſtice, what approbation they made of his Prudence, and what obedience they yielded to his Power and Pleaſure.

That his direction gave all men ſatisfaction. That they were determined to purſue the courſe he had preſcribed. That now they were become ſuitors, he would be pleaſed to receive a repreſentation of the humble thanks and ſervice of the Houſe.

His Majeſty anſwered, That upon this ſecond acceſs, he was forced to reiterate what he had ſaid before. That this queſtion was unhappily caſt upon him, for he carried as great a reſpect to our privileges as ever any Prince did; he was no ground-ſearcher; he was of the mind that our privileges were his ſtrength: that he thought the ground of our proceeding, was our not underſtanding that he had intermeddled before we had decided: that he thought alſo we had no wilful purpoſe to derogate any thing from him, for our anſwer was a grave, dutiful, and obedient anſwer.

But as the devil had unhappily caſt this queſtion between them, ſo he ſaw God had turned it to two good ends and purpoſes.

1. One, That he knew, and had approved our loyalty.

2. Another; That he had ſo good an occaſion to make teſtimony of his bounty and grace.

That as we came to give him thanks, ſo did he redouble his thanks to us.

That he had rather be a King of his Subjects, than to be a King of many Kingdoms.

The ſecond part of his Speech directed to the Lords and Us.

That this Parliament was not like to be long: that we would treat of ſuch matters as moſt concerned the Commonwealth; and the laſt, of any thing that concerned himſelf.

Three main buſineſſes in our hands.

1. The Union.
2. Sundry Publick and Commonwealth-Bills.
3. Matter of Religion, and reformation of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline.

For the Union, that it might be now prepared, and proſecuted the next Seſſion.

That Union, which with the loſs of much blood could never be brought to paſs, as now it is. That the better to bring it to paſs, we ſhould be in affections united.

That we ſhould firſt with all care proceed in ſuch laws as concern the general good.

That all Hereſies and Schiſms might be rooted out, and care taken to plant and ſettle God's true Religion and Diſcipline in the Church.

That this wiſh above all things, was at his death to leave,

1. One Worſhip to God.
   One Kingdom entirely governed.
   One Uniformity in Laws.

Laſtly, That his occaſions were infinite, and much beyond thoſe of his Predeceſſors; and therefore that in this firſt Parliament we would not take from him that which we had yielded to others.

That in his affections he was no way inferior to others, nor in his deſire to eaſe us.

The Warrant for a new Election of a Knight for Bucks, read and allowed in this form:

Whereas the Right Honourable Sir John Forteſcue Knight, Chancellor of his Majeſty's Dutchy of Lancaſter, and Sir Francis Goodwin Knight, have been ſeverally elected and returned Knights of the Shire for the County of Bucks, to ſerve in this preſent Parliament: upon deliberate conſultation, and for ſome ſpecial cauſes moving the Commons Houſe of Parliament, It is this day Ordered and Required by the ſaid Houſe, That a Writ be forthwith awarded for a new Election of another Knight for the ſaid Shire: And this ſhall be your Warrant.

Directed, To my very loving Friend, Sir George Coppin Knight, Clerk of the Crown in his Majeſty's High Court of Chancery.

XI. The

XI. The Proceſs and Trial of ROBERT LOGAN of Reſtalrig, for High-Treaſon, in conſpiring with John Earl of Gowrie to murder King James I. June 1609. 7 Jac. I.

IN the year 1608, the Earl of Dunbar, walking in his own Garden, and converſing with a country Gentleman, who lived near the place, falling accidentally to diſcourſe, on the matter of Gowrie's forfeiture; this Gentleman told the Earl, that he being lately in company with one Sprott, a Notary, who lived in Eyemoth, who was ordinarily employ'd in the Laird of Reſtalrig's ſervice, as a Notary and Truſtee, and who was long acquainted with this Gentleman who was ſpeaking to the Earl; told the Earl, that this Sprott had told him things concerning that Treaſon, which he had never heard before; but that he had never told it, ſo long as thoſe concern'd were alive. The Earl was curious to have the information, which the Gentleman told him, and was in ſhort:

That umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, then dead, was a Co-partner and Contriver, with the Earl of Gowrie and his brother Mr. Alexander, in all that affair; and that Sprott had ſeveral letters, yet lying by him, which he had found amongſt Reſtalrig's papers, and ſome papers belonging to one, commonly call'd Laird Bour, the greateſt confident of any man that Reſtalrig had, and who was alſo intimate with Sprott the Notary.

Whereupon the Earl of Dunbar acquainted the King's advocate, and Sprott was ſeized and carried into Edinburgh; who, before ſeveral Lords of the Council, did, with great remorſe of conſcience, acknowledge,

That he knew perfectly, that Robert Logan, late of Reſtalrig, was privy to, and upon the foreknowledge of Gowrie's treaſonable conſpiracy: and for the greater aſſurance of his knowledge, depoſeth, That he knew, that there were divers letters interchanged betwixt them, anent the treaſonable purpoſe aforeſaid, in the beginning of the month of July, 1600; which letters, James Bour, called Laird Bour, ſervitor to Reſtalrig (who was employ'd mediator betwixt them, and privy to all that errand) had in keeping; and ſhewed the ſame to Sprott, in the place of Faſtcaſtle.

And deponed, That he did abſtract (i. e. ſteal) quietly from James Bour, the principal letter written by Reſtalrig to the Earl of Gowrie, which Bour had brought back from the Earl of Gowrie, (as was the cuſtom amongſt them at that time;) and that when James Bour employ'd him (Sprott) to look over his papers; that he did keep the ſame, and that it was yet in his keeping, and was in his cheſt, among his writings; where he left it when he was taken; (and accordingly, the letter was found there by the Sheriff depute, who was ordered by Sir William Hart, Lord-Juſtice of Scotland, to ſeize the ſaid cheſt, and ſearch for this letter, which was found, and delivered to the King's Advocate.)

Whereupon, the King's Advocate produced the ſummons of Treaſon, which was raiſed by warrant under the Seals, on the 5th of February, 1609; againſt all the defenders and others concerned, to compear before our ſovereign Lord or his Commiſſioner, and the Eſtates of Parliament, and Juſtice-General, on the 12th day of April, 1609, to anſwer, &c. And likewiſe produced the verifications of the executions, which were ſworn to, by the Heralds, Meſſengers and Witneſſes, in plain Parliament: all which are contained at length in the Records of Parliament; as are alſo, the letters of relaxation and executions thereupon; relaxing Robert Logan, eldeſt ſon, to umquhil Robert Logan the accuſed, from the horn, and all perils thereby; which relaxations were regiſtrated in publick Records before the day of compearance: and then the Lord-Advocate produced for verifying of the dittay and crimes, the principal letters, and did put them in the Clerk-Regiſter's hands (where they lie among the publick Records;) as likewiſe the depoſitions of the witneſſes, taken by the Lords of the Articles, in common form.

All which being produced in preſence of his Majeſty's Commiſſioner, and the Eſtates of Parliament, upon the day of 1609. the defenders cited, and not compearing; the Advocate deſired the Eſtates declaration, on the relevancy: the true extracts whereof are as follow.

SIR Thomas Hamilton of Binnie, Knight, Advocate to our ſovereign Lord, in his Highneſs's name, for proving of the points of the ſaid ſummons, and reaſon and cauſe of Treaſon and Leſe Majeſty contained therein, repeated divers miſſive bills, all written and ſubſcribed by the ſaid umquhil Laird of Reſtalrig. All the depoſitions of the witneſſes, examined before the Lords of Articles before; and before the Lords of ſecret Council, George Sprott's depoſitions, and conviction and execution to the death, for the ſame cauſe of Treaſon as Gowrie: together with divers writs and other probations, which were preſently produced, before the ſaid Eſtates, by the ſaid Lord-Advocate, in our ſovereign Lord's name, for proving of the foreſaid ſummons of Treaſon, and the reaſon and cauſe of Leſe Majeſty contained therein: of the which miſſive bills and depoſitions produced by the ſaid Advocate in our ſovereign Lord's name, for proving the ſaid ſummons of Treaſon, and reaſons therein con-contained, againſt the ſaid Robert Logan and his foreſaids; the tenour follows.

" RIght Honourable Sir, my duty, with ſervice remembred: Pleaſe you underſtand, " my Lord of Gowrie and ſome others his Lordſhip's friends and well-wiſhers, who tenders his " Lordſhip's preferment, are upon the reſolution " you know, for the revenge of that cauſe: and " his Lordſhip has written to me anent that purpoſe; whereto I will accord in caſe ye will ſtand " to, and bear a part; and before ye reſolve, meet " me and Mr. Alexander Ruthven in the Cannongate, " on Thurſday the next week, and be as wary as you " can: indeed Mr. Alexander Ruthven ſpoke with " me, four or five days ſince; and I have promiſed " his Lordſhip an anſwer within ten days at fartheſt. As for the purpoſe, how Mr. Alexander " Ruthven and I has ſet down the courſe, it will " be a very eaſy done turn; and not far by that " form, with the like ſtratagem, whereof we had " conference in T. S. But in caſe you and Mr. " Alexander Ruthven forgather, becauſe he is " ſomewhat uncautious; for God's ſake beware " with his rackleſſneſs as to this of Padua; for he " told me one of the ſtrangeſt tales of a Noble" man of Padua that ever I heard in my life, re" ſembling the like purpoſe: I pray you, Sir, " think nothing, altho' this bearer underſtand of " it; for he is the ſpecial ſecretary of my life; " his name is Laird Bour, and was old Mander" ſton's man, for dead and life, and even ſo now " for me. And for my own part, he ſhall know of " all that I do know in this world, ſo long as " ever we live together; for I make him my " houſhold-man: he is well-worthy of credit; and " I recommend him to you. Always to the pur" poſe I think beſt, for our plot; that we meet all " at my houſe of Faſtcaſtle: for I have concluded " with Mr. Alexander, who I think ſhall be meeteſt " to be conveyed quietly in a boat by ſea; at " which time, upon ſure advertiſement, I ſhall " have the place very quiet and well provided; " and as I receive your anſwer, I will poſt this " bearer to my Lord: and I pray you, as you " love your own life, (becauſe it is not a matter of " mouſe) be circumſpect in all things, and take " no fear, but all ſhall be well. I have no will, " that either my brother, or yet Mr. N. R. my " Lord's old pedagogue, know any thing of the " matter till all be done that we would have done; " and then I care not who gets wit, that loves us. " When ye have read, ſend this my letter back " again with the bearer, that I may ſee it burnt " myſelf; for ſo is the faſhion in ſuch errands: and " if you pleaſe, write your anſwer on the back " hereof: in caſe ye will take my word for the " credit of the bearer, and uſe all expedition; for " the turn would not be long delayed. Ye know " the King's hunting will be ſhortly; and then " ſhall be beſt time, as Mr. Alexander has aſ" ſured me, that my Lord has reſolved to enter" prize that matter. Looking for your anſwer, " commits you to Chriſt's holy protection. From " Faſtcaſtle, the 18th day of July, 1600.

" LAird Bour, I pray you haſte you weſt to " me about the errand I told you; and we " ſhall confer at length of all things. I have " received a new letter from my Lord of Gowrie, " concerning the purpoſe that Mr. Alexander his " Lordſhip's brother ſpoke to me before: and I " perceive that I may have advantage of Dirleton; " in caſe his other matter take effect; as we hope " it ſhall. Always, I beſeech you, be at me, the " morn and even; for I aſſured his Lordſhip's ſer" vant, that I ſhall ſend you over the water, within " three days, with a full reſolution of all my will, " anent all purpoſes; and I ſhall indeed recommend " you and your truſtineſs to his Lordſhip, as ye " ſhall find an honeſt recompence for your pains " in the end. I care not for all the land I have in " this Kingdom, in caſe I can grip of Dirleton; " for I eſteem it the pleaſanteſt dwelling in Scotland. " For God's cauſe keep all things ſecret, that my " Lord, my brother, get no knowledge of our pur" poſes; for I rather be earded quick. And ſo " looking for you, I reſt till meeting."

From the Cannongate,

P. S. I am very ill at eaſe, therefore ſpeed you hither.

" RIght Honourable Sir, all my hearty with " humble ſervice remembred. Since I have " taken in hand to interpriſe with my Lord of " Gowrie, your ſpecial and only beſt beloved; as " we have ſet down the plat already, I will requeſt " you, that you will be very circumſpect and wiſe, " that no man get an advantage of us. I doubt not " but you know the peril to be both life, lands and " honour; in caſe the matter be not wiſely uſed. " And, for my own part, I ſhall have a ſpecial re" ſpect to my promiſe that I have made to his " Lordſhip and Mr. Alexander his Lordſhip's bro" ther, altho' the ſcaffold were ſet up. If I cannot " come to Falkland the firſt night, I ſhall be timely " in St. Johnſton on the morn. Indeed, I lippened " for my Lord himſelf, or elſe Mr. Alexander his " Lordſhip's brother, at my houſe of Faſtcaſtle, " as I wrote to them both. Always I repoſe on " your advertiſement of the preciſe day, with " credit to the bearer; for howbeit he be but ane " fillie glyed old carle, I will anſwer for him, that " he ſhall be very true. I pray you, Sir, read, and " either burn or ſend again with the bearer; for I " dare hazard my life, and all I have elſe in the " world, on his meſſage, I have ſuch proof of his " conſtant truth. So commits you to Chriſt's holy " protection."

From the Cannongate, the 27*th day of* July, 1600.

P. S. I uſe not to write on the back of any of my letters, concerning this errand.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Yours to all power, with humble ſervice ready,

RESTALRIG.

" MY Lord, my moſt humble duty with ſer-
" vice, in moſt hearty manner remembred:
" at the receipt of your Lordſhip's letter, I am ſo
" comforted; eſpecially, at your Lordſhip's pur" poſe communicated to me therein; that I can " utter my joy, nor find myſelf able how to en" counter your Lordſhip with due thanks. In" deed, my Lord, at my being laſt in the town,
" Mr. Alexander your Lordſhip's brother, impar-
" ted ſomewhat of your Lordſhip's intention, a-
" nent that matter, unto me. And, if I had not " been buſied about ſome turns of my own, I " thought to have come over to St. Johnſton and " ſpoken with your Lordſhip. Yet always, my " Lord, I beſeech your Lordſhip, both for the " ſafety of your honour, credit; and more than " that, that your life, my life, and the lives of " many others, who may, perhaps innocently ſmart
" for that turn afterwards in caſe it be revealed by " any; and likewiſe the utter wraking of our lands
" and houſes, and extirpating of our name; look
" that we be all as ſure as your Lordſhip, and I
" myſelf ſhall be, for my own part. And then, I " doubt not, but with God's grace, we ſhall bring
" our matter to ane fine, which ſhall bring the con-
" tentment to us all, that ever wiſhed for the re" venge of Machiavellian maſſacring of our deareſt
" friends. I doubt not but Mr. Alexander your " Lordſhip's brother has inform'd your Lordſhip
" what courſe I laid down, to bring all your co-
" aſſociates, to my houſe of Faſtcaſtle by ſea;
" where, I ſhould have all materials in readineſs,
" for their ſafe receiving on land and into my houſe:
" making as it were, but a manner of paſſing time
" in ane boat on the ſea, in this fair ſummer-tide;
" and no other ſtrangers to haunt my houſe, while
" we had concluded on the laying our plot; which " is already deviſed by Mr. Alexander and me. And " I would wiſh, that your Lordſhip would either
" come, or ſend Mr. Alexander to me; and there-
" after, I would meet your Lordſhip in Leith, or " quietly at Reſtalrig; where we ſhould have pre-
" par'd ane fine hatted kit, with ſugar and comfits
" and wine; and thereafter confer on matters: and
" the ſooner we brought our purpoſe to paſs, it
" were the better, before harveſt. Let not Mr.
" W. R. your old pedagogue, ken of your com" ing: But rather would I, if I durſt be ſo bold to " intreat your Lordſhip, once to come and ſee my " own houſe, where I have keeped my Lord *Both-
" wel* in his greateſt extremities; ſay the King and " his Council what they would: And in caſe GOD
" grant us happy ſucceſs in this errand, I hope
" both to have your Lordſhip, and his Lordſhip,
" with many others of your lovers and his, at a " good dinner before I die. Always I hope, that " the King's Buck-hunting at Falkland this year,
" ſhall prepare ſome dainty chear for us, againſt
" that dinner, the next year, jocoſe hoc to animate
" your Lordſhip, at this time: but afterwards we " will have better occaſion to make merry. I pro-
" teſt, my Lord, before GOD, I wiſh nothing " with a better heart, nor to atchieve to that which " your Lordſhip would fain attain unto; and my " continual prayer ſhall tend to that effect; and " with the large ſpending of my lands, goods, yea,
" the hazarding of my life, ſhall not afray me from
" that, altho' the Scaffold were already ſet up, be" fore I ſhould falſify my promiſe to your Lord-
" ſhip, and perſuade your Lordſhip thereof: I
" trow, your Lordſhip has ane proof of my con-
" ſtancy already or now: but, my Lord, whereas " your Lordſhip deſires, in your letter, that I " crave my Lord, my brother's mind anent this " matter, I utterly diſaſſent from that, that he " ever ſhould be ane Counſellor thereto; for in good " faith, he will never help his friend, nor hurt his " foe. Your Lordſhip may confide more, in this " old man, the bearer hereof, my man, Laird
" Bour, than in my brother; for, I lippen my life
" and all that I have elſe, in his hands: and I trow
" he would not ſpare to ride to Hell's-gate to plea-
" ſure me; and he is not beguiled of my part to " him. Always my Lord, when your Lordſhip
" has read my letter, deliver it to the bearer again,
" that I may ſee it burnt, with my own eyes: as I
" have ſent your Lordſhip's letter to your Lord-
" ſhip again; for ſo, it is the faſhion I grant: and
" I pray your Lordſhip to reſt fully perſuaded of " me, and all that I have promiſed; for I am re-
" ſolved, howbeit it were to die in the morn. I
" muſt intreat your Lordſhip to expede Bour, and " give him ſtrait directions upon pain of his life,
" that he take never a wink of ſleep, until he ſee
" me again; or elſe he will utterly undo us. I " have already ſent another letter, to the Gentle" man, your Lordſhip knows, as the bearer
" will ſhow your Lordſhip, of his anſwer and for-
" wardneſs with your Lordſhip, and I ſhall ſhew
" your Lordſhip farther at meeting, when and " where your Lordſhip ſhall think it meeteſt. Till
" which time, and ever, I commit your Lordſhip,
" to the protection of Almighty God."

From Gunn's-Green, the 29th Day of July, 1600.

POSTSCRIPT.

" Prays your Lordſhip hold me excuſed for my " unſeemly Letter, which is not ſo well written, as " miſter were; for I durſt not let any Writers ken of " it; but took two ſundry idle days, to do it my-
" ſelf. I will never forget the good ſport that Mr.
" Alexander, your Lordſhip's brother, told me of " a Nobleman of Padua. It comes ſo oft to my " memory; and indeed, it is Aparaſtur, to this
" purpoſe we have in hand."

Your Lordſhip's own ſworn and bunden man, to obey and ſerve with effold and ever ready ſervice, to his utter power, to his life's end.

RESTALRIG.

" RIght Honourable, my hearty duty remem-
" bred, ye know, I told you at our laſt meet" ing, in the Cannongate, that Mr. Alexander, my " Lord of Gowrie's brother, had ſpoken with me
" anent the matter of our concluſion; and for my " own part, I ſhall not be hindmoſt. And ſinſyne,
" I got a letter from his Lordſhip's ſelf, for that
" ſame purpoſe, and upon the receipt thereof, un-
" derſtanding his Lordſhip's frankneſs and forward-
" neſs in it; GOD knows, if my heart was not " lifted ten ſtag[illegible] I poſted this ſame bearer to his " Lordſhip, to whom you may concredit all your " heart in that, as well as I: For, and it were my " very ſoul, I durſt make him meſſenger thereof, I " have ſuch experience of his truth, in many other " things.

" things. He is a ſilly old glyed Carle, but wonder honeſt; and as he has reported to me his " Lordſhip's own anſwer, I think all matters ſhall " be concluded at my houſe of Faſtcaſtle; for I, " and Mr. Alexander Ruthven, concluded, That " ye ſhould come with him and his Lordſhip, and " only another man with you, being but only four " in Company, intil one of the great fiſhing boats " be ſea to my houſe, where ye ſhall land als ſafely, " as on Leith-ſhore; and the houſe againſt your " Lordſhip's coming to be quiet; and when you " are about half a mile from ſhore, as it were paſſing " by the houſe, to gar ſet forth a waff. But for " God's ſake, let neither any knowledge come " to my Lord, my brother's ears, nor yet to Mr. " W. R. my Lord's old pedagogue; for my brother is kittle to ſhoe behind, and dare not enterprize for fear, and the other will diſſuade us from " our purpoſe with reaſons of Religion, which I " can never abide. I think, there is none of a noble heart, or carries a ſtomach worth a penny, " but they would be content and glad, to ſee ane " contented revenge of Greyſteil's death; and the " ſooner the better his Lordſhip be quick; and " bid Mr. Alexander remember on the ſport he " told me of Padua: for I think with myſelf, that " the cogitation on that, ſhould ſtimulate your " Lordſhip. And, for God's cauſe, uſe all " your courſes cum diſcretione. Fail not, Sir, to " ſend back again this letter; for Mr. Alexander " learn'd me that faſhion, that I may ſee it de- " ſtroyed myſelf. So, till your coming, ever " commits you heartily to Chriſt's holy protec- " tion."

From Gun's-Green, the laſt Day of July, 1600.

The Subſcription is torn away from the laſt letter.

The Depoſitions of the Witneſſes produced are as follows.

MR. Alexander Watſon, Miniſter at Coldingham, of the age of fifty years, married, depones, the five miſſive letters ſubſcribed by the Laird Reſtalrig, and produced in proceſs by the Lord Advocate, for proving of the reaſons of Treaſon purſued againſt Robert Logan, ſon and apparent heir to Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, being ſhown to this deponent; and he having at length ſighted and conſidered the ſame, depones, That he takes upon his conſcience, that he verily believes, that the ſaid, five miſſive letters, and every one of them, are verily and truly written by the ſaid umquhile Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, with his own hand; and proves this of ſome of his knowledge, that not only he thinks, that the character of every letter reſembles perfectly the ſaid umquhile Robert's hand-writ every way; but alſo agrees with his faſhion of ſpelling, which he has particularly remembred in every one of the ſaid miſſive letters, in their points following: Firſt, That he never uſed to write ane z in the beginning of any word, ſuch as, zou, zor's, zeld, zea, and ſick-like; but ever-writ, y, inſtead of the ſaid z. That he writ all words beginning with w, when ſingle, v; and when that letter w fell to be in the midſt or end, he put ane double w. That when he writ quban, qubair, qlk, or any ſuch words, whilk uſes to be written and ſpelled by others, with which he wrote only qh, quhen, quhair, and ſicklike. Whenever a word began with con, he never wrote con at length, but wrote with an l7. Whenever t fell to be in the end of a word, he wrote it without a ſtroke thro' t, and did the like whenever it fell in any part of ane word. And for farther confirmation of the premiſſes, he produced three letters written every word, and ſubſcribed by the ſaid umquhile Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, and comparing them to the five other Miſſives produced by the Advocate, ſhow evidently the direct conformity of the ſamen, as well in the character and true reſemblance of the hand-writ, as in the ſpelling and writing of divers writs, ſyllables and letter, according to the particulars above-ſpecified.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Mr. ALEXANDER WATSON.

MR. Alexander Smith, Miniſter at Chirneſide, of the age of thirty years or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with the umquhile Laird of Reſtalrig, by reaſon he was pedagogue to his Bairns, and has ſeen very many of his hand-writs; and having ſeen, read, and at length conſidered the five miſſive letters produced by the Advocate; and inquir'd, if he knew the ſame to be the Laird of Reſtalrig's proper hand-writ? declared, upon his great oath, That he certainly believes the ſaids five letters, and every word thereof, to be the Laird of Reſtalrig's proper hand-writ; becauſe he finds the character thereof to agree every way with the ſhape of his ordinary writing; and remarked very particularly the manner of Reſtalrig's ſpelling of many words, otherwiſe nor other men commonly uſes to write and ſpell, according to the hail particulars remarked of before, by Mr. Alexander Watſon, the witneſs immediately preceeding; and, in theſe points, and in all others, conform to the ſaid Mr. Alexander Watſon's depoſition in all things; Reddens cauſam ſcientiæ, becauſe he was perfectly acquainted with the Laird of Reſtalrig's hand-writ in his life-time; and was pedagogue to his Bairns many years, and in his company.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Mr. ALEXANDER SMITH.

SIR John Arnot, Provoſt of Edinburgh, of the age of threeſcore ten years, or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, and with his hand-writ, becauſe he had receiv'd divers of his letters himſelf, and ſeen many other letters written by him. And the five miſſive letters produc'd by the Advocate, being ſhown to him; and he having ſeen and conſidered the ſame, remembred that he had ſeen, read, and perfectly conſidered the Laird of Reſtalrig's hand-writ, as the letters written by the deponent at any time, or his own hand-writ. And ſo takes on his conſcience, That the foreſaids five miſſive Bills, produc'd by the Advocate, are the proper hand-writ and ſubſcription of the ſaid umquhile Laird of Reſtalrig, be his Judgment. And, for verification thereof, has produc'd four writs, all written be the ſaid umquile Laird of Reſtalrig, and ſent to this deponent, to Archibald Johnſtoun, agreeing perfectly in ſpelling and character, with the ſaids miſſives.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Sir JOHN ARNOT.

Alexander Cuik, Sheriff-Clerk of Berwick, of the age of fifty years or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with the umquhile Laird of Reſtalrig, and has ſeen many and ſundry of his writs, and receiv'd divers of his letters directed to himſelf; and being deſired to ſee and conſider the five letters produc'd by the Advocate, and to declare whether he knew and eſteem'd to be all written by umquhile the Laird of Reſtalrig; depones, upon his conſcience, That he believes and eſteems the ſaids hail letters, to be all written by the Laird of Reſtalrig; reddens cauſam ſcientiæ, becauſe, not only the character agrees every way with the ſhape of Reſtalrig's hand-writ; but alſo the ſpelling in many particulars, wherein Reſtalrig differed from other men's form of writing. And in the particulars thereof, depones conform to the two firſt Witneſſes, the Miniſters of Coldingham and Chirneſide; Reddens eandem cauſam ſcientiæ.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

ALEXANDER CUIK.

William Home in Aytoun-Mill, of the age of thirty-three years, or thereby, married, depones, That all the five Miſſives above-written, being ſhown to this deponent, and having at length conſidered every one of them, takes upon his conſcience, That to his knowledge, that the ſaids five miſſive letters are all written and ſubſcribed by the umquhile Laird of Reſtalrig; for the ſpecial reaſons contain'd in the depoſitions made by Mr. Alexander Watſon, and Mr. Alexander Smith, Miniſters; and Alexander Cuik, Sheriff-Clerk of Berwick; to whom he is conform in all things, reddens eandem cauſam ſcientiæ.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

WILLIAM HOME.

John Horne, Notary in Aymouth, of the age of forty-two years, or thereby, ſolutus, depones, The foreſaids five miſſive Bills, being at length ſighted and conſidered by this deponent, depones and declares, upon conſcience, to his knowledge, all the ſaids five Miſſives are the Laird of Reſtalrig's proper hand-writ and ſubſcription, for the reaſons above-written in the deſpoſition of William Home, reddens eandem cauſam ſcientiæ.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

JOHN HORNE.

MR. William Hogg, Miniſter at Aytoun, of the age of thirty years, or thereby, married, depones, That he knew well the Laird of Reſtalrig, and has ſeen of his writs, and produc'd ane letter, written by Reſtalrig to the Laird of Aytoun, as written with Reſtalrig's own hand-writ. And having conſidered the five writs produced by the Advocate; declares, That he thinks them likely to be his Writs; and, that the ſame appears to be very like his writ, by the conformity of letters and ſpelling.

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Mr. WILLIAM HOGG.

The Depoſition and Declaration of George Sprott, as emitted by him, both before the Jury, judicially; and alſo upon the Scaffold, at the time of his Execution, on the 12th of Auguſt 1608. Which Depoſition and Declaration was made before the Council, on the 10th of Auguſt 1608, written by the Clerk of Council, James Primroſe; and ſubſcribed by Sprott's own hand, in the preſence of the Earl of Dunbar, the Earl of Lothian, the Biſhop of Roſs, the Lord Holy-rood-houſe, the Lord Scoon, the Lord Blantyre, Sir William Hart Lord-Juſtice, Mr. John Hall, Mr. Patrick Galloway, Mr. Peter Hewart, all three Miniſters of the Kirks of Edinburgh.

George Sprott, Notary in Aymouth, being brought to the ſcaffold and place of execution, he, in publick audience of the hail people, at the four nooks of the ſcaffold, ratified his former depoſition, anent his knowledge and concealing of Reſtalrig's guiltineſs of Gowrie's Treaſon: for the which, he craved God and his Majeſty humble forgiveneſs; being moſt ſorry and grieved that he had offended God, and the King's Majeſty, in concealing ſuch a vile, deteſtable and unnatural Treaſon, enterprized by the Earl of Gowrie and Laird of Reſtalrig, againſt his natural King, ſo good and ſo godly a Prince, who has ever been ſo gracious to his Subjects, and to this hail Iſland: proteſting, That if he had a thouſand Lives to render, and were able to ſuffer ten thouſand deaths, it is not ſufficient ſatisfaction and recompence for his ſo foul and horrible offence; and that God had preſerved him from many great perils, when his life was in extreme danger, to bring him to this publick declaration of that deteſtable and horrible fact, in teſtifying of the truth; as he ſaid publickly, in preſence of all the people, in theſe words following: To my own ſhame, the ſhame of the devil, and the glory of God; for ſatisfying the conſciences of all theſe, (if any be) that has, or can make any doubt of the truth of this ſo clear a matter. And he acknowledges, that his haunting with Reſtalrig, who was a man without Religion, and ſubject to many other vices; and his thoughts of himſelf in thir matters, after the firſt ſight of Reſtalrig's letter written to Gowrie, and his continual bearing of company with Reſtalrig and Laird Bour, who was irreligious, and without fear of God, brought him from one ſin to another, and conſequently to this grievous crime, for the which, moſt juſtly, worthily and willingly, he is now to render his life. And he deſired all the people to beware of ill company; and namely of the company of thoſe who are void of Religion. And he deſired, that this his declaration might be inſerted in his proceſs: as alſo, he deſired the miniſters of God's word to publiſh this his declaration to their folks, from their pulpits; and took every one of them who were preſent by the hand, with their promiſe to do the ſame: ſaying unto them, That this was the moſt glorious day that ever his eyes did ſee; and with theſe words he proſtrates himſelf, and falls upon his knees, in preſence of the hail people, and made a very pithy prayer; [as in Vol. I. p. 306.]

And ſo he continued a good ſpace, in a moſt fervent prayer, to the great admiration and rejoicing of all the people; and in a better form and manner, nor any of the beholders and hearers can be able to ſet down in writ, the ſame not being written in the preſent time, becauſe there was no place of writing upon the ſcaffold, in reſpect of the preaſe and and multitude of people. And going up the ladder, he deſired liberty to ſing the ſixth Pſalm, and requeſted the people to accompany him in ſinging thereof; which being granted, and he being at the ladder-head, the ſame was tane up and ſung by himſelf, with a very loud and mighty voice, and was aſſiſted with above the number of five hundred perſons, who, with tears, accompanied him in ſinging of that ſong. After the ending thereof, he repeated and ratified his former depoſition. And, with that, recommending his ſoul to God, he was thrown over, and ſo ended his mortal life. In witneſs whereof, we Under-ſubſcribers, who, for the moſt part, were all of us upon the ſcaffold with him, and remained with him unto the time of his death; and others of us, in ſo convenient places near to the ſcaffold, that we did hear all that was ſpoken by him, have ſubſcribed thir preſents with our hands. Sic ſubſcribitur, Glaſgow, B. Galloway, M. B. Brechin, Balfour of Burley, Holy-rood-houſe, John Preſton, Thomas Regra, Peter Sharp, Mr. Patrick Galloway, John Hall, Walter Balcanquhal, Mr. Hewat, Mr. George Blyth, Charles Lumſden, Richard Tobie Baillie of Edinburgh, William Speir Baillie, James Ainſly Baillie of Edinburgh, &c.

What is contained in this ſpeech, being conſonant to his depoſition made before the Privy-Council, as alſo before the Inqueſt; here is added the depoſition, as emitted by him.

This Sprott, after divers examinations, being moved with remorſe of conſcience, for the long concealing of the foreknowledge of this treaſonable conſpiracy; confeſſeth, declareth, and deponeth, with the peril of his own life,

"THAT he knew perfectly, that *Robert Logan, late of Reſtalrig, was privy, and upon the foreknowledge of Gowrie's treaſonable conſpiracy. And for the greater aſſurance of his knowledge, deponeth, that he knew that there were divers letters interchanged betwixt them, anent the treaſonable purpoſe aforeſaid, in the beginning of the month of July, 1600. Which letters, James Bour, called Laird Bour, ſervitor to Reſtalrig, (who was employed mediator betwixt them, and privy to all that errand) had in keeping, and ſhewed the ſame to Sprott in the place of Faſtcaſtle.

And producing the Earl of Gowrie's letter to Reſtalrig;

"Which letter, written every word with Reſtalrig's own hand, was ſubſcribed by him after his accuſtomed manner, RESTALRIG; and was ſent to the Earl of Gowrie by the ſaid James Bour. After whoſe return, within five days, with a new letter from Gowrie, he ſtaid all night with Reſtalrig in Gun's-green [a houſe of Reſtalrig's:] and Reſtalrig rode to Lothian, the morn thereafter, where he ſtaid five or ſix days. Then after his returning, paſs'd to Faſtcaſtle, where he remained a certain ſhort ſpace.

"And further deponeth, that he ſaw and heard Reſtalrig read the laſt letter, which Bour brought back to him from Gowrie, and their conference thereanent. And heard Bour ſay, Sir, if you think to make any commodity by this dealing, lay your hand to your heart. And Reſtalrig anſwered, that he would do as he thought beſt. And farther ſaid to Bour, howbeit he ſhould ſell all his own land that he had in the world, he would paſs through with the Earl of Gowrie; for that matter would give him greater contentment nor if he had the whole Kingdom: and rather or he ſhould falſify his promiſe, and recall his vow that he had vowed to the Earl of Gowrie, he ſhould ſpend all that he had in the world, and hazard his life with his Lordſhip. To whom Bour anſwered, You may do as you pleaſe, Sir; but it is not my counſel that ye ſhould be ſo ſudden in that other matter. But for the condition of Dirltoun, I would like very well of it. To whom Reſtalrig anſwered, Content yourſelf, I am at my wit's end.

"And farther Sprott deponeth, That he entred himſelf thereafter in conference with Bour, and demanded what was done betwixt the Laird and the Earl of Gowrie. And Bour anſwered, that he believed that the Laird ſhould get Dirltoun without either gold or ſilver, but feared that it ſhould be as dear unto him. And Sprott enquiring how that could be; Bour ſaid, They had another Pye in hand nor the ſelling of any land: but prayed Sprott, for God's ſake, that he would let be, and not trouble himſelf with the Laird's buſineſs; for he feared, within few days, the Laird would either be landleſs or lifeleſs."

And the ſaid George Sprott being demanded, If this his Depoſition was true, as he would anſwer upon the ſalvation and condemnation of his ſoul: and if he would go to death with it, ſeeing he knoweth the time and hour of his death to approach very near? deponeth for anſwer, "That he hath not a deſire to live, and that he knows the time to be ſhort, having care of no earthly thing, but only for clearing of his conſcience in the truth of all theſe things, to his own ſhame before the world, and to the honour of God, and ſafety of his own ſoul: That all the former points and circumſtances contained in this his Depoſition, with the Depoſition made by him the 5th day of July laſt, and the whole remanent Depoſitions made by him ſen that day, are true; which he will take on his conſcience, and as he hopeth to be ſaved of God, and that he would ſeal the ſame with his blood."

And farther, being demanded, where this above written letter, written by Reſtalrig to the Earl of Gowrie, which was returned again by James Bour, is now; deponeth, "That he abſtracted it quietly from

* Great part of this evidence is in the Trial of George Sprott, vol. I. p. 302, &c. tho' not ſo full. For the Earl of Cromerty, in his account of the Conſpiracies of the Earl of Gowrie, (from whence this is taken) ſays p. 126. Mr. Crawford did bring a pamphlet printed at London, anno 1609. publiſhed by Dr. George Abbot, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who being providentially in Scotland in the year 1608. the Doctor's curioſity brought him in amongſt the multitude of hearers of that Trial (of G. Sprots) whereby he was ſo convinced of the truth of Gowrie's Treaſons, and of the malice of the King's Calumniators, as moved the good Doctor to intreat for an extract and account of the whole Proceſs, atteſted by Sir William Hart, Lord Juſtice of Scotland at that time, which the Doctor brought with him to England, and cauſed it to be printed, with a long preface, (from which the Trial of G. Sprott, vol. I. is taken.) But that paper, printed at London, being drawn out as a memorial for Dr. Abbot's own uſe, and not as a full abſtract of what is recorded, which I now publiſh from the original Depoſitions, Letters, and other Writs, lying in Record.

" from Bour, in looking over and reading Bour's " letters, which he had in keeping of Reſtalrig's; " and that he left the above-written letter in his " cheſt among his writings, when he was taken " and brought away, and that it is cloſed and " folded within a piece of paper."

This foreſaid Depoſition was made by him the 10th of Auguſt, 1608. written by James Primroſe, Clerk of his Majeſty's Privy-Council; and ſubſcribed with the ſaid George Sprott's own hand; in the preſence of, The Earl of Dunbar, the Earl of Lothian, the Biſhop of Roſs, the Lord Scoon, the Lord Holy-rood-houſe, the Lord Blantyre, Sir William Hart, his Majeſty's Juſtice; Mr. John Hall, Mr. Patrick Galloway, Mr. Peter Hewart, Miniſters of the Kirks of Edinburgh.

Subſcribed with all their hands.

And alſo, the eleventh day of the foreſaid month and year, the ſaid George Sprott being examined, in the preſence of a number of the Council and Miniſters aforeſaid; and it being declared to him, That the time of his death now very near approached, and that therefore they deſired him to clear his conſcience with an upright declaration of the truth; and that he would not abuſe the holy name of God, to make him, as it were, a witneſs to untruths: And ſpecially, being deſired, that he would not take upon him the innocent blood of any perſon dead or quick, by making or forging lyes and untruths againſt them:

" Deponeth, That he acknowledgeth his grie- " vous offences to God, (who hath made him a " reaſonable creature) in abuſing his holy name " with many untruths, ſen the beginning of this " proceſs: but now being reſolved to die, and at- " tending the hour and time when it ſhall pleaſe " God to call him, he deponeth with many atteſta- " tions, and as he wiſheth to be participant of the " kingdom of heaven, where he may be countable " and anſwerable upon the ſalvation and condem- " nation of his ſoul, for all his doings and ſpeeches " in this earth, that all that he hath deponed ſen " the fifth day of July laſt, in all his ſeveral depo- " ſitions, were true in every point and circumſtance " of the ſame; and that there is no untruth in any " point thereof."

And having deſired Mr. Patrick Galloway to make a prayer, whereby he might be comforted now in his trouble; which was done:

" The ſaid Deponer with many tears after the " prayer, affirmed this his Depoſition to be true; " and for the confirmation thereof, declared, that " he would ſeal the ſame with his blood."

I had almoſt forgotten that, which in this action of his death was ſtrange, and in a manner marvellous. For being urged by the Miniſters and other of good Rank upon the ſcaffold, that now at his end he ſhould declare nothing but the truth (touching the matter for which he ſuffered) on the peril of his own ſalvation or condemnation of his ſoul: he for the greater aſſurance of that his conſtant and true Depoſition, promiſed (by the aſſiſtance of God) to give them an open and evident token before the yielding of his ſpirit. Which he accompliſhed thereafter: for before his laſt breath, when he had hung a pretty ſpace; he lift up his hands a good height, and clapped them together aloud, three ſeveral times, to the great wonder and admiration of all the beholders. And very ſoon thereafter he yielded his ſpirit.

As in the account of Gowrie's and his brother's proceſs, I did not inſert the Libel and Summons, nor Executions, verbatim, as being very tedious and uſeleſs to Readers; on the ſame motives I do ſo here, but I inſert the Doom and Sentence verbatim: The Libel, Summons and Autographons of theſe and others being at full in the publick Records, and patent to all enquirers.

TO whilk Summons, with the Executions and Indorſations thereof reſpective foreſaids, being this inſtant day read in preſence of his Majeſty's Commiſſioner and Eſtates of Parliament, firſt in Latin, and thereafter in Scots; The ſaid Robert Logan being oft times called of new, at the Tolbooth-window of the ſaid Court of Edinburgh, to have compeared and anſwered to the ſaid Summons of Treaſon, and Reaſons and Cauſes therein contained: And he not compearing to have defended in the ſaid matter; and to have anſwered to the ſaid Summons, The ſaid Sir Thomas Hamilton of Bynnie Knight, Advocate to our Sovereign Lord, deſired the ſaid Eſtates Declaration, if the Reaſons of the ſaid Summons were Relevant: the whilk Eſtates found the ſaid Summons and Reaſons and Cauſes therein contained revelant. Therefore the ſaid Advocate, of new for proving of the foreſaid Summons of Treaſon raiſed againſt the ſaid Robert Logan, bearing and containing as is above-written; repeated all the foreſaid miſſive Bills and the ſaids Depoſitions of the ſaid Witneſſes examined before the the ſaids Lords of Articles and Lords of Secret Council reſpective; and alſo George Sprott's Depoſition, Conviction and Confeſſion, in Judgment; and at his Execution to the death, for the ſaid cauſe of Treaſon; with the hail other Writs and Probations produced and repeated by him of before; for proving of the foreſaid Summons of Treaſon, and Reaſons therein contained; and deſired the ſaids Eſtates of Parliament yet, as of before, to adviſe the Probations foreſaids, led and deduced in the ſaid matter; and to pronounce their Sentence of Parliament thereuntil, according to the ſaid Probations and their Conſciences: And thereafter, the hail Depoſitions of the Witneſſes, miſſive Bills, and hail Writs and Probations, being read, ſeen and conſidered, by the foreſaids hail Eſtates of Parliament; and they therewith being ripely adviſed, The ſaid Lord Commiſſioner and Eſtates of Parliament finds, decerns and declares, That the foreſaid umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, committed and did in his life-time, open and maniſeſt Treaſon, in all the Points, Articles and Manner, contained in the ſaid Summons: and therefore, it was given for Doom by the mouth of David Lyndſay, Dempſter of Parliament, in manner and form as follows.

THIS Court of Parliament ſhows for Law, That the ſaid umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, in his life-time, committed the foreſaid crime of Treaſon and Leſe Majeſty; and that he was Art and Part guilty and partaker thereof, againſt our Sovereign Lord and Authority Royal; and that the foreſaids cruel, wicked and treaſonable crimes, were interpriſed, by his cauſing, perſuaſion, counſel and help. Likeas, the ſaid umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, treaſonably counſelled the foreſaid crime of Leſe Majeſty to his death, and in his death, in all manner, at length contained in the ſaid Summons: and therefore, depones and declares, the Name, Memory and Dignity of the ſaid umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, to be extinct and aboliſhed, and his Arms cancelled, riven and delete furth of the books of Arms, and Nobility; ſo that his Poſterity ſhall be excluded, and be unhabile to poſſeſs or enjoy any Offices, Honours, Dignities, Lands, Tenements, Rooms, Rents, Poſſeſſions or Goods, moveable or unmoveable, Rights and others whatſomever, within the Kingdom, in all time coming; and that all the ſaids Goods, Lands, Rooms, Tenements and other Goods, moveable and unmoveable, Rights and others whatſomever pertaining to the ſaid umquhil Robert Logan of Reſtalrig; or which might otherways have pertained to him, at any time, ſince his conſpiring of the ſaid treaſonable Crimes, to be eſcheat and fore-faulted to our Sovereign Lord; to appertain and remain perpetually with his Majeſty in property. And this I give for Doom.

Note, Here, as in Gowrie's Proceſs, that the citing of dead Perſons is among the legal Forms, preſcribed both by our Laws, and Laws of ſeveral other Nations.

XII. The Trial of the Lord BALMERINOTH, at St. Andrews, the 10th of March, 1609. for High-Treaſon, 7 Jac. I. *

[The Lord Balmerino was a profeſſed Protcſtant: But, upon what motive is not known, he often preſſed the King to write a Letter of compliment to the Pope, which, it ſeems, his Majeſty had as often refuſed to do. Hereupon, as the thing is related, Balmerino writ the Letter, and bringing the King ſeveral diſpatches at a time when his Majeſty was in haſte to be gone a hunting, thruſt it in among the reſt; and the King, through inadvertency, in that hurry, ſigned it. The Letter thus ſigned, was ſent away, and no more heard of it till ſome years after, Cardinal Bellarmine mentioning of it to the King's diſadvantage, his Majeſty was obliged to take notice of, and to queſtion the Secretary about it.]

THE Lords being ſet, the Lord Balmerinoth was ſent for; and being come, the Lord-Advocate told him, There was a Warrant come from his Majeſty for his Trial, and therefore deſired to know, whom he had entertained to ſpeak for him.

He anſwered, He had great neceſſity to ſpeak, the Cauſe being ſuch as concerned his Life and Eſtate; but he had greater neceſſity to hold his peace, by reaſon of his Offence, which was ſuch as it admitted no excuſe: and my grief for it ſo great, as it will not ſuffer me to extenuate my Crime: and therefore I will neither make any friend intereſted in that, whereunto my ſelf fell without the advice of any; nor will I deſire a Lawyer to make that ſeem leſs, which I would have all the world know to be ſuch as it is.

Herein are two points in which I would have all men ſatisfied concerning his Majeſty: Firſt, for his Majeſty's innocency in the writing of the letter; for I proteſt I could never draw him to hear with patience my motion. But he did utterly and abſolutely refuſe to take that courſe againſt conſcience, which would neither ſatisfy me, who in a politick natural courſe had conceited it might be behoveful for his Majeſty; and ſo applied myſelf to that crooked device, which hath worthily brought me to this eſtate wherein I now ſtand.

The ſecond thing concerning his Majeſty, is this, That whereas ſome in malice to his Majeſty, or my Friends in commiſeration of my eſtate, may think and report it too rigorous and cruel a courſe, which is held againſt me in a matter of this moment, the ſuggeſting of a letter of recommendation, to proceed againſt my life and eſtate; I would have ſuch know, that his Majeſty's clemency is many ways teſtified unto the world in caſes that have ſeemed more nearly to concern him; and therefore men ſhould not judge of his Majeſty's diſpoſition to mercy by this action: but rather caſt their eyes upon my unhappineſs, who have offended in ſuch a point as his Majeſty can extend no favour to me without the damage of his own honour, which being dearer to him than his life, it muſt needs be more tendered than twenty thouſand ſuch lives as mine. And therefore I deſire not to be ſpared at ſo dear a rate as the impeachment of his Majeſty's honour.

There are likewiſe two things concerning myſelf, which I deſire all men to underſtand. Firſt, That I had no aim at the alteration of Religion, or to bring in a Toleration, or what you will term it, by the writing of that letter: but merely a politick courſe, as I have ſaid, which, as a natural man, I conceited might further his Majeſty's Right. And this I proteſt to be true, as I ſhall anſwer God in the the Day of Judgment, when the ſecrets of all hearts ſhall be diſcloſed.

Next, I would have no man think that it was gain, or any private advantage that drew me to that. For I proteſt I never received or expected the leaſt reward from any Prince in the world, ſave from the King my Maſter. And this, as I ſhall anſwer the great God in heaven.

This ſaid, the Jury was called, and in their hearing was read the Indictment, which aggravated his crime by his Majeſty's favours to him, which had deſerved more regard; by his Majeſty's refuſal; by the dangers which did follow, or might have done; imputing all the Treaſons which have been a-foot ſince, to be fruits of that letter; and laſtly, charging him with having intelligence with foreign eſtates, and enemies of the Goſpel, for the ſubverſion of the ſtate of Religion.

To all theſe he reply'd not one word.

Then was read his confeſſion taken in Frankland, the effect of that which he made in London. Then was read the ſpeech he uttered before the Council at Whitehall, containing his ſorrow, his ſins, the favours he had received, his unworthineſs of them, his deſire to give his Majeſty ſatisfaction for his offence to the laſt drop of his blood. Laſt, was read a Letter from his Majeſty to the Lord-Advocate, ſhewing his Majeſty's refuſal to liſten to the Lord-Preſident's motion, and ſetting down ſome circumſtances which paſſed betwixt his Majeſty and the Lord-Preſident at the time of the refuſal, againſt all which the Preſident ſaid nothing.

So the Jury going together, after a time returned, and found him guilty of all the parts of the Indictment.

Then the Lords conferring upon the Bench; my Lord Juſtice ſignified, That they were not to proceed further till they knew more of the King's pleaſure. And ſo adviſing the Lord-Preſident to fit himſelf for God; and giving the Jury thanks for their pains and care they had of his Majeſty's Honour; the Court roſe.

He then was demanded by the Clerk of the Crown, whether he were guilty of procuring the Murder of John Turner, or not guilty; he made anſwer to this effect.

My LORDS,

That which at my Arraignment the other day I pleaded to the contrary, was not that I could be ſo unworthy to deny any ſyllable of that I had formerly profeſſed before ſo honourable perſonages, nor out of any deſire that the leaſt thing might be conceal'd, which might ſerve for evidence to convince me of this foul fact, whereof I now ſtand accus'd and indicted, and whereof I formerly have, and now do moſt willingly and penitently confeſs myſelf to be guilty; my purpoſe then was only to gain time for the diſpoſing of ſome temporal affairs, and for the better preparing of my Soul for her departure from this Body; for that I ſhould long live, I neither expect, nor much deſire. And now, my Lords, if that it may ſtand with the courſe of the laws of the land (whereof I am altogether ignorant) I will eaſe this Jury, the King's Council, and your Lordſhips, and will confeſs myſelf guilty of this fact in the ſame manner as it is laid in the Indictment.

Or if that may not be permitted by law, yet ſhall I give ſuch evidence againſt myſelf, as I ſhall not leave it needful in any point to be aggravated; only in ſome circumſtances I will endeavour, if not to extenuate the fact, yet at leaſt to move your Lordſhips and this worthy Audience to pity my caſe, wherein I know I can ſay nothing of ſubſtance, that can help in a legal courſe of proceeding; ſo I much fear that thoſe circumſtances I would deliver, I ſhall not be able at full to expreſs my own thoughts, both by reaſon of my own imperfections, and alſo for that I lack the perfect uſe of the phraſe of this Country. But for that point, in ſuch paſſages as I ſhall not be underſtood in, I will humbly intreat your Lordſhips in your Wiſdom, and this Audience in their Chartity to conceive, that my meaning is, to make a full and true relation of all the paſſages of this buſineſs.

The firſt motive of this fatal accident was (as it is well known) that Turner playing with me at foils, now about ſeven years paſt at my Lord Norris's houſe in Oxfordſhire, put out one of my eyes, and that (as my Soul and Conſcience was over-perſuaded) willingly and of ſet purpoſe. At the taking up of the foils, I proteſted unto him, I play'd but as a Scholar, and not as one that would contend with a Maſter in his own profeſſion, and thereupon requeſted him, That he would play as with a Scholar; the order whereof, tho' it be unknown to your Lordſhips, yet to divers honourable perſonages that are preſent it is known to be, to ſpare the Face. After this loſs of mine eye, and with it the great hazard of the loſs of life, I muſt confeſs I ever kept a grudge of my Soul againſt him, but had no purpoſe to take ſo high a revenge; yet in the courſe of my revenge, I conſidered not my wrongs upon terms of Chriſtianity, for then I ſhould have ſought for other ſatisfaction, but being trained up in the Courts of Princes and in Arms, I ſtood upon the terms of Honour, and thence befel this Act of Diſhonour; whereby I have offended,

1. God.
2. My Prince.
3. My Native Country; and
4. This Country.
5. The Party murder'd.
6. His Wife; and
7. Poſterity.
8. Carliel, now executed; and laſtly,
9. My own Soul.

And am now to die for mine offence.

1. Firſt towards God; I hope that my earneſt prayer and ſupplications unto him, have (now at laſt) obtain'd his grace and pardon for this my horrible ſin, for at my return from this place, the people (of whom I expected ſcorn and diſgrace) did by their pity and clemency move that in me, which the pride of mine own heart would not till then ſuffer me to ſee; then I became to have a ſenſe and feeling of the foulneſs of my offence, which formerly I could not perſuade myſelf was any more than a juſt revenge for ſo foul a wrong: and ſince that time ſuch inward comfort and conſolation have I felt in my ſoul, that I doubt not, but that my hearty contrition and true repentance is accepted before God, and that he of his mercy hath pardon'd mine offence.

2. For my offence unto the King's Majeſty; if I had more than my life to make ſatisfaction unto him, I would think myſelf happy: and this favour I requeſt of your Lordſhips, that the King may be truly informed of the ſincerity of my confeſſion, and of my hearty repentance, and if it pleaſe him not of his favour and clemency to pardon me this offence, yet I humbly deſire, That I may die in his grace and favour.

3. For mine own Country, let me intreat you that this my ſingular offence may not be laid as an aſperſion or blemiſh unto my Country; but that myſelf alone may bear the ſhame of it, and my Body the puniſhment.

4. Of this Country, becauſe I do deſerve no favour, I deſire that of Chriſtianity, you would be pleas'd to pity me as a repentant and ſorrowful man.

5. For the party murder'd, my blood muſt ſatisfy the law, to which I ſhall add ſuch true repentance and hearty ſorrowfulneſs, as I hope, by Chriſt's mercy, will make ſatisfaction for my offence.

6, 7. For

6, 7. For his Wife and Poſterity, ſome relief I have given already, and more, God willing, I will add unto it.

8. For Carliel, his too much affection to me, made him too forward an executioner of my will and wicked purpoſe; but I hope by his repentance, he is pardoned his offences to God: in him I muſt confeſs my ſin is doubled, and I pray God to pardon it me; for the manner of the murder, I neither commanded, nor gave allowance to piſtol him. But I confeſs, that at the requeſt of Carliel and Graye, I gave either of them a piſtol to bring themſelves off, after they ſhould kill him. For him who is now ſuſpected, I proteſt before God and all this company, I never knew him, nor ſpake with him, nor dealt either directly or indirectly with him in all my life.

9. Laſtly for myſelf, I commit my Body to the King, and my Soul to God.

But my Lords, beſides mine own offence, which in its own nature needs no aggravation, divers ſcandalous reports are given out, which blemiſh my reputation, which is more dear to me than my life.

Firſt, That I made ſhew of reconciliation with Turner, the which I proteſt is utterly untrue; for what I have formerly ſaid, I do again aſſure your good Lordſhips, That ever after my hurt received, I kept a grudge in my Soul againſt him, and never made the leaſt pretence of reconciliation with him; yet this, my Lords, I will ſay, that if he would have confeſſed and ſworn he did it not of purpoſe, and withal wou'd have forſworn arms, I wou'd have pardoned him: for, my Lords, I conſidered that it muſt be done either of ſet purpoſe or ignorantly; if the firſt, I had no occaſion to pardon him; if the laſt, that is no excuſe in a maſter: and therefore for revenge of ſuch a wrong, I thought him unworthy to bear arms.

The ſecond obloquy is, That to defer the revenge ſo long, argues an inveterate malice, and an ill diſpoſition. For the deferring of my revenge, I anſwer, that at the receiving the hurt, I was ſo aſtoniſh'd, that I thought I had been ſlain; and by the opinion of my Phyſicians from Oxford and other places, my life was then in much danger for many days after; yet after ſome months recovering my ſtrength, and getting ſome eaſe in mine eye, I went immediately over into France, and there continu'd two years, hoping of the recovery of mine eye again. At the King of Denmark's coming hither; I came out of France, and then hearing at Greenwich, that Turner play'd there before the two Kings; I muſt confeſs that after thoſe prizes done, I ſought for him up and down: and if I had met him in any place of the Court, I was then reſolved to have run him through; though I muſt confeſs the place had made my offence far greater. But miſſing him there that day, the next day I went after him to London, and there ſought after him for two days, but could not meet with him; the firſt news then I heard of him was, that he was gone into the Country unto the Lord Norris's, and ſo for that time I was prevented of my purpoſe. Before his return I went into Scotland; and after my return again, I laid about for him, ever intending all this while, to have acted it myſelf. But ſeeing the difficulty of it, both for that I was well known about the White-fryers where he dwelt and kept ſchool, and yet did not myſelf know Turner, but carried others with me for my direction, I afterward agreed with two of my Countrymen, who undertook the acting of this tragedy; but nothing enſued upon it, and therefore I deſire I may conceal their names. After this my occaſions call'd me over into France and other parts, ſo that my reſidence in this Country was very little, till now at laſt I dealt with this unfortunate Carliel, who took unto him one Graye for his partner, and brought him unto me; and thoſe two I directed to take a lodging in the Fryers, the better to diſcover how myſelf might come to revenge myſelf on the perſon of Turner. But after ſome delay they told me, I could with no conveniency come myſelf to do it; but they ſaid, they would undertake it: to which I aſſented, but preſcribed neither time nor manner how they could effect it. After this, Graye fell quite off, and went to the Ships for Denmark, which Carliel came and told me, and withal that Turner was then gone out of town; but ſince Graye had deceiv'd him, he would have no-body but himſelf, and would aſſuredly kill him at his return, tho' it were with the loſs of his own life. But I being long delay'd by two others whom formerly I ſpake of, and now alſo by theſe two, and ſeeing Graye gone, I thought that Carliel had ſpoken this but to give me content, and the more to inſinuate himſelf into my favour, ſo that I left him without any further direction, or much regard to his ſpeech; and never heard more of him till I heard that Turner was ſlain, the time whereof, and the manner, I proteſt before God and his Angels I was altogether ignorant of; for had I expected it to have been done, I would not have ſtay'd myſelf here at the laſt caſt, for before that time I could with eaſe have gone over into France, for I had a licence to travel, and for tranſporting ſome horſes.

Another aſperſion is laid on me, that this was God's juſt judgment, for that I was an ill-natured fellow, ever revengeful and delighted in blood. To the firſt, I confeſs I was never willing to put up a wrong, where upon terms of honour I might right myſelf, nor never willing to pardon where I had a power to revenge. To the ſecond I ſay, that I was never guilty of blood till now, yet I have had occaſion to draw my ſword both in the field, and upon ſudden violences, and have both given and receiv'd hurts, and yet was never guilty of blood unto death till now; only I muſt confeſs that upon commiſſion from the King to ſuppreſs wrongs done me in my own Country, I put divers of the Johnſons to death; but for that, I hope I ſhall need neither to ask God nor man forgiveneſs.

Laſtly, The objection that ſince my Impriſonment I have attempted by the means of my Countrymen to break priſon and eſcape, a courſe which I proteſt upon my ſalvation was never moved unto to me by any, nor did I ever lodge ſuch a thought in my breaſt, and for the further confirmation of that, I refer myſelf unto the Marſhal; and his Officers, who in the Priſon have ſeen and beſt know my deportment during my impriſonment.

Thus, my Lords, have I troubled you with a tedious diſcourſe, whereof I know no circumſtance can in any point of law do me any good, nor would I be thought all this while to plead for my life; my deſires only are, that my life might ſatisfy for mine offence, and that my reputation might not be left defamed.

Laſtly, My Lords, and the reſt of the honourable and worſhipful Preſence, I deſire in Charity, that you will conſider theſe few circumſtances to move you to pity.

Firſt, The indignity I received from ſo mean a man.

Secondly,

Secondly, That it was done willingly, for I have been inform'd he bragg'd of it after it was done.

Thirdly, The perpetual loſs of mine eye.

Fourthly, The want of law to give ſatisfaction for ſuch a loſs.

Fifthly, The continual blemiſh I receiv'd thereby.

Laſtly, Unto this, I add my voluntary and free confeſſion. Let me now add, my laſt requeſt to your Lordſhips, that the King may be truly inform'd of theſe things. Contrition, confeſſion, and ſatisfaction are the means to obtain pardon from God for our ſins; and theſe many times do move the mercy of Princes, which if his Highneſs ſhall extend to me, I ſhall deſire my life may be ſpent to do him ſervice; or if not, I ſhall moſt willingly ſubmit myſelf to his Majeſty's good pleaſure, and yield to die.

The Lord Sanquire having ended his ſpeech, Sir Francis Bacon ſpake as followeth.

In the caſe of life and death, the Jury's part is in effect diſcharged; for after a frank and formal confeſſion, their labour is at an end: ſo that what hath been ſaid by Mr. Attorney-General, and ſhall be by myſelf, is rather convenient than neceſſary.

My Lord Sanquire, your fault is great; it cannot be extenuated, and it needs not be aggravated; and (if it needed) you have made ſo full an anatomy of it out of your own feeling, as it cannot be match'd by myſelf, or any man elſe out of a conceit.

This chriſtian and penitent courſe of yours, draws me thus far, that I agree, that even in extream evils there are degrees: ſo this inſtance of your offence is not of the higheſt ſtrain; for if you had ſought to take away a man's life for his Vineyard as Ahab did, or for Envy as Cain did, or to poſſeſs his Bed as David did, ſurely this offence had been more odious. Your temptation was revenge, which the more natural it is to man, the more have laws both divine and human, ſought to repreſs it: (mihi vindicta.) But in one thing you and I ſhall never agree, that generous ſpirits (you ſay) are hard to forgive; no, contrariwiſe, generous and magnanimous ſpirits are readieſt to forgive; and it is a weakneſs and impotency of mind to be unable to forgive.

But to the purpoſe; howſoever murder may ariſe upon ſeveral motives leſs or more odious, yet the law both of God and Man involves them in one degree; and therefore you may read that in Joab's caſe, which was a murder upon revenge, and match'd with your caſe; he for a dear brother, and you for a dear part of your own blood; yet there was a ſevere charge given, it ſhall not paſs unpuniſhed.

And certainly the circumſtance of time is heavy unto you; it is now five years ſince this unfortunate man Turner, be it upon accident or deſpight, gave the provocation, which was the ſeed of your malice. All paſſions are aſſuaged with time; love, hatred, grief, &c. all fire burns out with time, if no fewel be put to it: for you to have been in the gall of bitterneſs ſo long, and to have been in a reſtleſs caſe of his blood, is a ſtrange example. And I muſt tell you plainly, that I conceive you have ſuck'd thoſe affections of dwelling in malice rather out of Italy, and outlandiſh manners, where you have converſed, than out of any part of this Iſland of England and Scotland.

But now farther, my Lord, I would have you look a little upon this offence in the glaſs of God's judgment, that God may have the glory. You have friends and entertainment in foreign parts: it had been an eaſy thing for you to have ſet Carliel, or ſome other blood-hound on work, when your perſon had been beyond the ſeas; and ſo this news might have come to you in a pacquet, and you might have ſo look'd on how the ſtorm would paſs: but God bereav'd you of this providence, and bound you here under the hand of a King, that is though abundant in clemency, yet no leſs zealous of juſtice.

Again, when you came in at Lambeth, you might have perſiſted in the denial of the procuremen of the fact, Carliel (a reſolute man) might have clear'd you: for they that are reſolute in miſchief, are commonly obſtinate in concealing their procurers; and ſo nothing ſhou'd be againſt you but preſumption. But then God to take away all obſtruction of juſtice, gave you the grace (which ought indeed to be more comfort unto you than any evaſion, or device, whereby you might have eſcaped) to make a clear confeſſion.

Other impediments there were not a few, which might have been an interruption to this day's juſtice, had not God in his providence removed them.

But now, that I have given God the honour, let me alſo give it where it's next due, which is to the King our ſovereign.

This murder was no ſooner committed, and brought to his Majeſty's ears, but his indignation (wherewith at the firſt he was mov'd,) caſt himſelf preſently into a great deal of care and providence to have juſtice done.

Firſt, came forth his proclamation, ſomewhat of a rare form, and deviſed and in effect directed by his Majeſty himſelf, and with that he did proſecute the offenders (as it were) with the breath and blaſts of his mouth. Then did his Majeſty ſtretch forth his long arms, (for Kings you know have long arms) one of them to the ſea, where he took Gray ſhipped for Sweden, who gave the firſt light of teſtimony; the other arm to Scotland, and took hold of Carliel e'er he was warm in his houſe, and brought him the length of this Kingdom under ſuch ſafe watch and cuſtody, as he cou'd have no means to eſcape, nor learn no leſſons to ſtand mute; in which caſe perhaps this day juſtice might have receiv'd a ſtop. So that I may conclude that his Majeſty hath ſhew'd himſelf God's true Lieutenant, and that he is no reſpecter of perſons, but Engliſh, Scots, Noblemen, Fencer, (which is but an ignoble trade) are all to him alike in reſpect of juſtice.

Nay, I may ſay farther, that his Majeſty hath had in this matter a kind of prophetical ſpirit: for at what time Carliel and Gray, and you, my Lord, yourſelf were fled no man knew whither, to the four winds; the King ever ſpake in a confident and undertaking manner, that whereſoever the offenders were in Europe, he would produce them forth to juſtice; of which words, God hath made him maſter.

Laſtly, to return to you, my Lord, though your offence hath been great, your confeſſion hath been free, and your behaviour and ſpeech full of diſcretion; and this ſheweth that tho' you cou'd not reſiſt the temptation, yet you bear a generous and chriſtian mind, anſwerable to your noble Family of which you are deſcended. This I commend in you, and take it to be an aſſur'd teſtimony of God's mercy and favour; in reſpect whereof all worldly things are but traſh: and ſo it is fit for you, as your ſtate now ſtands, to account them.

Then being demanded, whether he would ſpeak any more for himſelf, he ſaid, no; only deſired that the King might be made acquainted with what he had already ſaid.

Whereupon Judgment being required for the King;

Mr. Juſtice Yelverton gave Sentence of death againſt him as followeth:

My Lord Sanquire,

You are a Nobleman of Scotland, and (as I have heard yourſelf ſay) a Baron of above three hundred years antiquity; which I believe to be true. But now you have moſt wonderfully diſhonoured the Nobility of your ancient Houſe by this unhappy action; an action of murder ſo baſe and ſo barbarous, as the like I never heard of, nor ſcant the like a man ſhall never read of.

The manner of it is ſuch, as is exceeding ſtrange: done upon the ſudden! done at an inſtant! done with a piſtol! done with your own piſtol! under the colour of kindneſs: As Cain talk'd with his brother Abel, he roſe up and ſlew him.

Your executioners of the murder left the poor miſerable man that was murdered, no time to defend himſelf; no time to pray for himſelf; ſcant any time to breath out theſe laſt words, Lord have mercy upon me!

The ground of this malice that you bore him, grew not out of any offence that he ever willingly gave you, but out of the pride and haughtineſs of your own ſelf; for that in the falſe conceit of your own skill, you would needs importune him to that action, the ſequel whereof did moſt unhappily breed your blemiſh, the loſs of your eye.

And you have proſecuted this malice very long; for you ſollicited others four or five years at the leaſt, to have committed this foul and heinous murder. And this your fault is far greater, than if you had committed the fact yourſelf; for then it had been but your own ſingle murder only; but now have you made them who were the executioners of your malice, murderers alſo with you: ſo you have made their bodies ſubject to the juſtice of man, and their ſouls ſubject to the juſtice of God, which, without his great mercy, they muſt endure.

All theſe circumſtances do exceedingly aggravate your offence.

This offence of yours is called one of the crying ſins; for God ſaid unto Cain, The voice of thy brother's blood (a ſtrange phraſe, a voice of blood!) crieth unto me from the ground.

And for the puniſhment of it, it is ſaid elſewhere in the ſacred word of God, That he that ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed. Again, But this puniſhment of blood is not indeed to ſhed blood; for it is better that one ſhould die by the law, than many without it.

You are, my Lord, to take a ſerious conſideration of the ſhort eſtate of your life wherein preſently you ſtand; for by the juſtice of the Law, you muſt ſuffer the pains of death, and be aſſuredly perſuaded, the time is not far off: for tho' the King be exceeding merciful, yet he is alſo exceeding juſt. And he hath had ſuch an extraordinary care of juſtice in this caſe, that tho' it were plotted by you, my Lord, that the murderer ſhould eſcape, and fly into his own country of Scotland, far remote from the juſtice of the Law of England; yet his Majeſty's care hath ſo purſued him, that there he was quickly apprehended, and that country could be no protection for him. Nay, his Majeſty moſt religiouſly, and moſt like a juſt Prince, proteſted, that if he were in any part of Chriſtendom to be found, he would ſurely have him; ſo zealous is he of juſtice in this ſo heinous an offence of murder. And in a matter that concerns juſtice, he reſpects not his own native nation of Scotland, more than he doth his own hereditary Realm of England.

Therefore, my Lord, prepare youſelf to die; and tho' the manner of your death be by the Law of England unfitting (as you perhaps may think) for a man of your Honour and Blood, yet ſurely it is fit enough for a man of your merit and offence. And the Law of England makes no difference of ſubjects in matters of Felony for the manner of their deaths, when there is no difference of ſubjects in the manner of their offences; and not where, but how a man dieth, maketh to the purpoſe: for the way to heaven is of like difference from all places. And, indeed, there is no death miſerable, which the death of the ſoul doth not follow.

Death is the way of all the world, the paſſage of all the earth, and the end of all men; and not men alone, but all worldly things are mortal, the ſoul of man only excepted.

Therefore, my Lord, provide carefully that your ſoul may have a good and godly departure from the body, which will ſurely be by your unfeigned confeſſion and earneſt repentance of all your ſins, and eſpecially of this moſt bloody, this moſt heinous and crying ſin, by your humble calling and crying upon God for his mercy and forgiveneſs, and by confident and ſtedfaſt faith in Chriſt Jeſus, to receive and accept it.

For repentance is an act of all acts, and faith in the mercies of God is the Star that goeth before the face of repentance, and very exceeding available by theſe three ſyllables, peccavi.

And ſo with this ſhort Exhortation I will end; and wiſh, whatſoever your life hath been heretofore, yet that your death may be happy now.

And ſo I will proceed to Judgment.

You have been indicted as acceſſary to wilful murder, as acceſſary in procuring the murder; and upon this Indictment you have been arraigned, and upon your arraignment you pleaded not guilty; but ſince, upon better adviſement and judgment, you have confeſſed the fact: The Court therefore doth award, That you ſhall be had from hence to your former place of impriſonment, and from thence to the place of execution, and there be hanged till you be dead. And God have mercy upon your ſoul.

And then the Judge ſpeaking to the Sheriff, ſaid, Mr. Sheriff, ſee Execution be done *.

On

* The King had offered 1000 l. for apprehending of him: the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſeveral great men interceded for him in vain; nothing could avail with the King to pardon him, who thought the making him an example was neceſſary to curb the inſolence of the Scots, who had already committed ſundry outrages in England. It is thought the chief thing that contributed to this murder, was, the Lord Sanquire's being at the Court of Henry King of France, who asked him, How he loſt his eye? he told him, it was done with a ſword. The King replies, Doth the man live? This queſtion made ſuch an impreſſion upon the young Lord, that at his return to England, he cauſed Turner to be murdered in White-Friars. See The Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. II. p. 688. and Rapin, vol. IX. p. 336. 8*vo*.

On Monday following, being St. Peter's day, the 29th of June, 1612. the Lord Sanquire was brought from the priſon ſomewhat early in the morning, into the Great Palace-Yard before Weſtminſter-Hall great gate, there to ſuffer death on a gibbet erected for that purpoſe; where being aſcended the ladder, he ſpake to the people a good while, excuſing himſelf for the fact no otherwiſe than formerly he had done at the King's-Bench Bar: asking God and the world forgiveneſs for the ſame, proteſting his deteſtation thereof, now that he truly underſtood the foulneſs of it; affirming, that till he firſt was brought to his Trial, the devil had ſo far blinded his Underſtanding, that he could not apprehend that he had done amiſs, otherwiſe than was fitting for a Man of his Rank and Quality, having been trained up in the wars, and lived the life of a ſoldier, which ſort of men, he ſaid, ſtood more on points of Honour than Religion. He humbly thanked God that had opened his eyes, and given him the grace to ſee his offence, and truly to apprehend the foulneſs of it. At length, he profeſſed himſelf to die a Roman Catholick, and deſired all Roman Catholicks there preſent to pray for him. He ſaid, that for worldly reſpects he had long neglected the publick profeſſion of his faith in that kind, and he thought God was angry with him for it; and he knew not but God might inflict this juſt puniſhment upon him for that neglect; and therefore he adviſed all men that ſtood ſo affected in heart, not to procraſtinate nor delay; for delays, he ſaid, are dangerous. The Religion, he ſaid, was a good Religion, a ſaving Religion, and if ne had been conſtant in that Religion, he was verily perſuaded he had never fallen into that miſery.

So falling to his prayers for a while in private, and after in publick praying for the King and Queen, their Royal Iſſue, and the State both of England and Scotland, with the Lords of the Council, and Church, he ſubmitted himſelf to the Will of the Executioner; who caſting him off the ladder, ſuffered him there to hang a long time, that people in this great man might take notice of the King's greater juſtice.

Note, That this Lord was tried by the Country, but challenged his Trial by Peers, which was denied him, becauſe tho' he were a Lord in Scotland, yet he was no Lord of the Parliament here in England, nor had any Engliſh Barony.

Note alſo, That Carliel and another with him, but whether it were Gray or no, I cannot certainly affirm, but ſure I am, it was one that was with Carliel when he did the fact (and I take it to be my Lord's Page) were hanging on two gibbets ſet up in Fleet-ſtreet, over-againſt the great Gate of the White-Friars, very early in the morning, before the Lord Sanquire had his Trial*.

Note alſo, That one of thoſe gibbets was higher than the other, by the length of a man, or thereabouts; and I demanding the reaſon thereof, was anſwered by a ſtander-by, that the manner of Scotland is, that when a Gentleman is hanged with a man of meaner quality than himſelf, the Gentleman hath the honour of the higher gibbet, and thinks himſelf much wronged if it be not ſo diſpoſed of. Whether this anſwer was ſerious, or by way of ſcorn, let him that deſireth to be reſolved, by enquiry reſolve himſelf.

Sir Edward Coke, in his ninth Report, p. 117, & ſeq. gives the following account of

The Lord Sanchar's Caſe.

Robert Creighton, Lord Sanchar †, a Baron of Scotland, of his malice prepenſe at Weſtminſter in the County of Middleſex, incited and procured Robert Carliel to kill John Turner, who accordingly aſſociating himſelf with one James Irweng, the 11th of May now laſt paſt, killed the ſaid John Turner within the City of London. And the King in his zeal to juſtice in this caſe, immediately ſent for the two Chief-Juſtices and Chief-Baron, and commanded there ſhould be ſpeedy proceeding againſt the Lord Sanchar, according to law. To which the Juſtices anſwered, That the Lord Sanchar was but an acceſſory in this caſe, and therefore he (a) could not by law be convicted before the principal is attainted; but if the principal could be apprehended, then both might be attainted with more expedition than could be, if the principal ſhould be attainted by utlagary. Then it was asked, how the Lord Sanchar, being an ancient Baron of Scotland, ſhould be tried: and it was anſwered by them, That none within this Realm of England is accounted (b) a Peer of the Realm, but he who is a Lord of the Parliament of England; for every ſubject either is a Lord of the Parliament, or one of the Commons, and the Lord Sanchar was not a Lord of the Parliament within this Kingdom, and therefore ſhould be tried by the Commons of the Realm, viz. Knights, Eſquires, or others of the Commons; and therewith agree our books, as well ancient as others, (c) 11 E. 3. Brief 473. 8 R. 2. (d) Proceſs pl. ult. (e) 20 E. 4. 6. a. b. 20 El. (f) 360. Then the King asked, in what Court, after the principal is attainted, the Lord Sanchar ſhould be tried. And the Juſtices anſwered, that foraſmuch as the procurement was in Middleſex, it was moſt convenient to try him in the King's-Bench. And thereupon the King reſolved that he ſhould not be committed to the Tower, but to the priſon of the King's-Bench, where he might be, if occaſion required, ſooner and eaſier examined than if he ſhould be committed to the Tower: and the King commanded the ſaid Juſtices that all things ſhould be prepared for the legal proceeding; and that he would endeavour to cauſe not only the principal, but others alſo who might diſcover the truth of the fact, to be apprehended. And thereupon the ſaid Chief-Juſtices conferred with the other Juſtices of the King's-Bench, before whom the Lord Sanchar ſhould be tried. And before them divers queſtions were moved concerning the legal proceeding in this caſe. 1. Upon the Statute of (g) 2 E. 6. c. 24. by which it is enacted, as to this point, in this matter: And further be it enacted by the authority aforeſaid, That where any Murder or Felony hereafter ſhall be committed or done in one County, and another perſon or more ſhall be acceſſory or acceſſories by any manner of wiſe to any ſuch Murder or Felony in another County, that that then an Indictment found or taken againſt ſuch acceſſory, or acceſſories, upon the circumſtance of ſuch matter before the Juſtices of the Peace, or other Juſtices or Commiſſioners, to inquire of Felonies, where ſuch offence of acceſſory or acceſſories in any manner of wiſe ſhall be committed or done, ſhall be as good and effectual in law, as if the principal offence had been committed or done within the ſame County where ſuch Indictment ſhall be found: And that the Juſtices of Goal-delivery, or Oyer and Terminer, or two of them, of or in ſuch County where the offence of any ſuch acceſſory ſhall be hereafter committed and done, upon ſuit to them made, ſhall write to the Cuſtos Rotulorum, or Keepers of the Records, where ſuch Principal ſhall be hereafter attainted or convicted, to certify them whether ſuch Principal be attainted, convicted, or otherwiſe diſcharged of ſuch principal Felony; who upon ſuch writing to them or any of them directed, ſhall make ſufficient Certificate in writing, under their Seal or Seals, to the ſaid Juſtices, whether ſuch Principal be attainted, convicted, or otherwiſe diſcharged, or not. And after they, that ſo ſhall have the Cuſtody of ſuch Records, do certify that ſuch Principal is attainted, convicted, or otherwiſe diſcharged of ſuch offence by the Law; that then the Juſtices of Goal-delivery, or of Oyer and Terminer, or other there authoriſed, ſhall proceed upon every ſuch acceſſory, in the County or Counties where ſuch acceſſory or acceſſories became acceſſory, in ſuch manner and form as if both the ſaid principal offence and acceſſory had been committed and done in the ſaid County where the offence of the acceſſory was or ſhall be committed or done. And that every ſuch acceſſory, and other offenders above expreſſed, ſhall anſwer upon their arraignments, and receive ſuch Trial, Judgment, Order and Execution, and ſuffer ſuch Forfeitures, Pains and Penalties, as is uſed in other caſes of Felony: Any Law or Cuſtom to the contrary heretofore uſed in any wiſe notwithſtanding. And upon this Statute, divers (h) queſtions were moved. 1. If the Indictment in the County of Middleſex of the Acceſſory ſhould recite, that the Principal was indicted before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer in the City of London, (as in truth he was) or if the Indictment ſhould recite in facto, that the Principal committed the Murder in London, &c. And it was reſolved, that the Indictment in Middleſex ſhould recite de facto, that the Principal committed the murder in London. For the recital, that the Principal is indicted of murder in London, is no direct affirmation that the Principal committed the murder; for the Indictment is but an accuſation, and in lieu of the King's declaration, which may be true or falſe; and this agrees with former precedents. And accordingly the Indictment was drawn, upon which the Acceſſory was convicted, as appears before by the Indictment itſelf.

The ſecond queſtion moved upon the Statute, was, If the (i) Juſtices of the King's-Bench are within theſe words, Juſtices of Goal-Delivery, or Oyer and Terminer? And it was objected, that the King's-Bench is the higheſt Court of ordinary Juſtice in criminal cauſes within the Realm, and paramount the authority of Juſtices of Goal-delivery, and Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer; and as it is held in 27 Aſſ. 1. is (k) more than the Eyre; for they ſhall examine the errors of the Juſtices in Eyre, Goal-delivery, and Oyer and Terminer; and therefore inaſmuch as the Juſtices of the King's-Bench are paramount and ſuperiors over all the others, they cannot be included within their inferiors, viz. Juſtices of Goal-delivery, or of Oyer and Terminer. Alſo the Juſtices of the King's-Bench have a diſtinct and ſupreme Court; and the Juſtices of Goal-delivery, and Oyer and Terminer, other diſtinct and ſubordinate Courts. And therefore it was adjudged Hill. 30 El. Reg. in the King's-Bench, that where R. (l) Smith was indicted of forgery of a falſe deed at the Seſſions of (m) Peace in the County of Oxford; and the Statute of 5 El. c. 14. which inflicts the puniſhment, and upon which act the Indictment was grounded, provides that the Indictment ſhall be taken before Juſtices of Aſſize, and Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer: And altho' the Juſtices of Peace by their Commiſſion have power to hear and determine Felonies, Treſpaſs, &c. and have an expreſs clauſe ad audiendum & terminand', ſo that they are, as it was urged, Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer; yet it was reſolved per tot' cur', that becauſe there was a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer known diſtinctly by that name, and the Commiſſion of the Peace known diſtinctly by another name, that the ſaid Indictment was not well taken, and therefore was quaſhed. But it was reſolved, that the (n) Juſtices of the King's-Bench are the ſovereign Juſtices of Goal-delivery, and of Oyer and Terminer; and therefore they are included within the ſaid words: And therefore it is held in 7 E. 4. 18. a. & 4 H. 7. 18. that if an Indictment of forcible Entry be removed into the King's-Bench, the Juſtices of the King's (o) Bench ſhall award reſtitution; and yet the Statute of 8 H. 6. c. 9. ſpeaks only of Juſtices of the Peace; but the reaſon is, becauſe they have the ſovereign and ſupreme authority in ſuch caſes. And according to this reſolution, the Juſtices of the King's-Bench wrote according to the ſaid Act to the Juſtices of Goal-delivery in London, before whom the Principal was, &c. who certified the Record, &c. as appears before at large.

3. It was moved, if the Lord Sanchar could not in term-time be indicted, arraigned, and convicted at Newgate before Commiſſioners of (p) Oyer and Terminer for the County of Middleſex, and it was reſolved he could not; for the King's-Bench, as has been ſaid, is (q) more than Eyre, and therefore in (r) term-time no Commiſſioner of Oyer and Terminer, or Goal-delivery, by the common Law, can ſit in the ſame County where the King's-Bench ſits; for (s) in præſentia majoris ceſſat poteſt' minoris, and therewith agrees 27 Aſſ. p. 1. But Carliel and Irweng were indicted and attainted in London, where the murder was committed, before Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer in the (t) term-time, becauſe in another County than where the King's-Bench ſits.

4. It was moved, if the Lord Sanchar being indicted in the King's-Bench, if there muſt be (u) fifteen days for the return of the ve. fa. for if fifteen days are requiſite, he cannot be arraigned this term. And it was reſolved not, becauſe the offence was committed in Middleſex where the Court ſits; but if the Indictment had been taken in any other County, and and removed thither, there ought to be fifteen days, &c. and therewith agree the precedents, and the continual uſage of the ſame Court.

5. It was reſolved, that foraſmuch as there was not any direct proof, that James Irweng was commanded or procured by the Lord Sanchar to commit the murder, but that he aſſociated himſelf to Robert Carliel who was procured by him, that the (v) beſt way is to indict the Lord Sanchar, as acceſſory to Robert Carliel only: for Indictments which concern the life of men ought to be framed as near the truth as may be, & eo potius, becauſe they are to be found by the oath of the grand Inqueſt, which finding is called (x) veredictum, quaſi dictum veritatis; and yet it was reſolved, that if one is indicted as acceſſory to (y) two, and he is found acceſſory to one, the verdict is good. Vide the Statute of W. 1. c. (z) 14. by which it is enacted, That none be outlawed upon appeal of commandment, force, aid, or receit, until he that is appealed of the deed be attainted, ſo that one like law be uſed therein through the Realm: which is but an affirmance of the common Law; for there cannot be an acceſſory, unleſs there be a principal, no more than there can be a ſhadow, unleſs there be a body. But this word appeal has two ſignifications in law; one general, and that is taken for an accuſation generally, and accuſatio eſt duplex, either by inquiſition, i. by Indictment, and that is at the ſuit and in the name of the King; or by the party, and in his name, as in appeal by Writ or Bill: or by Appeal, i. accuſation of an approver, and therewith agree all our books, and Stamf. l. 2. de Plac' cor' c. 52. f. 142. b. where he ſaith, after the confeſſion of the Crime, the Felon may appeal, ſ. accuſe others coadjutors with him to do the Felony, and in this particular ſenſe for accuſation of the party it is oftner taken. And as there are two manner of accuſations, ſo there are two manner of attainders of Felony, ſ. by judgment given, ſ. one at the King's ſuit, and the other at the ſuit of the party; and both theſe attainders are in two manners, one after appearance, and the other upon default after appearance, two ways, ſ. either by verdict, or confeſſion; and at the ſuit of the party, a third way, ſ. by battle, upon default by proceſs of outlawry, where judgment is given by the (a) Coroners, or by thoſe whom an Act of Parliament and cuſtom have enabled. And in the Statute of W. (b) 1. theſe words, upon appeal of commandment, &c. are to be intended of an accuſation generally, ſ. by indictment, as by writ or bill, &c. and theſe words, until he that is appealed of the deed be attainted, are meant of all manner of attainders, either at the King's ſuit, or at the ſuit of the party, and either upon appearance or upon default. And afterwards in the ſame Act, proviſion is made for the appeal of the party, which implies that the word appeal ſhall be taken in the general ſenſe.

6. It was reſolved, that if the principal is (c) erroneouſly attainted, either for error in the proceſs, or becauſe the principal being out of the Realm, &c. is outlawed, or that he was in priſon at the time of the outlawry, &c. yet the acceſſory ſhall be attainted, for the attainder againſt the principal ſtands till it is reverſed; and therewith agrees (d) 2 R. 3. 12. the reſolution of all the Juſtices in the King's-Bench: And in 18 E. 4. 9. b. the (e) principal was erroneouſly outlawed for Felony, and the acceſſory taken, indicted, arraigned, convicted, attainted, and hanged; and afterwards the principal reverſed the outlawry, and was indicted and arraigned of the ſaid Felony, and found not guilty, by which he was acquitted; and all this appears in the ſaid book. Then it will be demanded, that foraſmuch as there cannot be an acceſſory, unleſs there is a principal, and in this caſe there is no principal, how the heir of the acceſſory ſhall be reſtored to the land which his father had forfeited by the ſaid unjuſt attainder? To that it is to be anſwered, that the heir may enter or have his action, for now upon the matter by act in law, the attainder againſt his father is without any writ of error utterly annulled, for by the reverſal of the attainder againſt the principal, the attainder againſt the acceſſory, which depends upon the attainder of the principal, ipſo facto is utterly defeated and annulled; and this notably appears in an ancient book, in the time of E. 1. tit. Mortdaunceſt. 46. where the caſe is, A. was indicted of Felony, and B. of the receipt of A. A. eloined himſelf, (and is outlawed:) B. was taken, and put himſelf upon inqueſt, and found guilty, for which B. was attainted, and hanged, and the Lord entred, as into his eſcheat; and afterwards A. came, and reverſed the outlawry, and pleaded to the Felony, and was found not guilty, by which he was acquitted; whereupon the Heir of B. brought a (f) Mortdaunceſter againſt the Lord by eſcheat, who came and ſhewed all this matter, and there was a demur upon it; and it was awarded, that the heir of B. ſhould recover ſeiſin of the land; for if B. was now alive, he ſhould go quit by the acquittal of A. becauſe he could not be receiver of a felon, when A. is no felon; and all this appears in the ſaid book. Vide 4 E. 3. 36. b. in Dower 43 E. 3. 3. a. in Aſſiſe & Reideſ. 8 H. 4. 4. 11 H. 4. 4. 4 E. 4. 20. 6 E. 4. 9. 13 E. 4. 4. 9 H. 6. 38. b. 8 H. 7. 10. & vide the caſe of ſentence (g) of deprivation of one, and preſentment, inſtitution, and induction of another; and after by relation of a general pardon, ipſo facto, all are reſtored without appeal, or new preſentation, admiſſion, or inſtitution, qd' vide (h) Dy. Nota reader, to ouſt all queſt. to what goal offenders ſhall be committed, it is enacted by the Statute of (i) 5 H. 4. c. 10. that none ſhall be impriſoned by any Juſtice of the Peace, but only in the common goal, ſaving to lords and others, who have goals, their franchiſes in that caſe. By which it appears, how Juſtices of Peace offend who commit felons, &c. to either of the Counters in London, and other priſons, which are not common goals.

But foraſmuch as ſeveral perſons have earneſtly deſired to know the circumſtances, as well of the proceeding, as of the fact itſelf, I will comply with their requeſt.

RObert Creighton, Baron of Sanchar, a Scotchman, about five years ago play'd at Foils with John Turner a Fencing-maſter, and it happened that Turner in playing ſtruck out the Baron's eye with his Foil; upon which the Baron, finding himſelf impatient under ſo great an affront, and not able to bear the loſs of his eye without having his revenge, reſolved to procure ſomebody to kill Turner; and among his other ſervants, he prevailed upon Gilbert Gray

Gray and Robert Carliel, Scotchmen, two of his followers, to ſhoot Turner upon the firſt opportunity that ſhould offer. Theſe two then undertook to accompliſh this deſign, and induſtriouſly endeavoured to execute it; but the ninth day of May laſt, Gray repenting of a purpoſe and act ſo barbarous, vile and bloody, being touched with the motion of the Holy Ghoſt, reſolved to proceed no farther; which the Baron of Sanchar being informed of, and that Gray ſlackened in his promiſe, Robert Carliel, as is aforeſaid, undertook to execute what he had promiſed: who, the eleventh of May following, aſſociating himſelf with James Irweng a Scotchman of the frontiers, about ſeven o' clock in the evening came to a houſe in the Friars, which Turner uſed to frequent as he came from his ſchool, which was near that place; and finding Turner there, they ſaluted one another, and Turner with one of his friends ſat at the door, asking them to drink; but Carliel and Irweng turning about to cock the piſtol, came back immediately, and Carliel drawing it from under his coat, diſcharged it upon Turner, and gave him a mortal wound near the left pap; ſo that Turner, after having ſaid theſe words, Lord have mercy upon me! I am killed; immediately fell down. Whereupon Carliel and Irweng fled, Carliel to the town, and Irweng towards the river; but miſtaking his way, and entring into a court where they ſold wood, which was no thorough-fare, he was taken. Carliel likewiſe fled, and ſo did alſo the Baron of Sanchar. The ordinary Officers of Juſtice did their utmoſt, but could not take them: for in fact, as appeared afterwards, Carliel fled into Scotland, and Gray towards the Sea, thinking to go to Sweden, and Sanchar hid himſelf in England.

The impediments of Juſtice, difficulties of Law, and impoſſibilities of legal Proceeding to take Carliel the principal, which were in this caſe, are remarkable, and worthy of conſideration. The cure and remedy of the whole ought to be only and wholly attributed to the great care of his moſt excellent Majeſty, and to his perpetual love and zeal for Juſtice, as will clearly appear by what follows.

The impediments of Juſtice, were two:

1. The truth of this fact touching the Baron of Sanchar, could not appear, becauſe it conſiſted only in the words of his mouth by incitation and procurement; but by Gray and Carliel, who were fled: or by himſelf, and he was likewiſe gone.

2. It was not as yet known whither they were fled, and it could not be found out by all the ſearch and diligence which was uſed by the Officers and Magiſtrates of Juſtice.

The difficulties of Law are manifeſt by the foregoing reſolutions.

Impoſſibilities of legal proceeding.

1. It was impoſſible by legal proceſs to apprehend the body of Carliel, being in Scotland.

It was impoſſible alſo to proceed againſt the Baron of Sanchar, who was but an acceſſory, before the principal was attainted; a thing which would have required a very long proceeding, if he had not been taken.

Now therefore let us behold here the love and zeal which his Majeſty always had for Juſtice, who being informed by ſome of his principal Judges, with whom he had conſulted touching the nature of this preſent caſe, and finding if this fact ſhould be left to the ordinary proceeding of the Law, Carliel the aſſaſſin could not be taken, and that no ordinary power had been able to find Gray the witneſs, nor Sanchar the author; lo! the King by proclamation gives authority to any perſon whatſoever to apprehend theſe three, with a promiſe of great reward.

Upon this, the Baron of Sanchar, well knowing that the principal aſſaſſin and the witneſs were fled, ſurrendred himſelf, and denied that he incited or procured the fact: wherefore his Majeſty ſent poſt to the ſea-ports (the gates of the Kingdom) as alſo into Scotland and other places of his Dominions, where his admirable prudence had hopes of finding them. And the Lord ſo crowned his Royal Thoughts, and gave ſuch a bleſſing to his zeal for juſtice, that ſome of his Couriers took Gray at the port of Harwich, ready to imbark for Sweden; and Carliel in Scotland, thinking to croſs the ſea for his greater ſafety. Gray then, being by his Majeſty's command examined, confeſs'd the whole truth of the fact againſt the Baron of Sanchar; who likewiſe by his Majeſty's direction being confronted with Gray, and particularly examined touching certain Articles, ſpecial and pertinent ſayings by his Majeſty himſelf, confeſs'd by writing under his own hand, that he had incited and procured this aſſaſſination; and being preſs'd thereupon by the queſtions, he diſcovered a long and inveterate malice which he had had, with all the occaſions and material circumſtances of this murder.

His Majeſty having regard to that which the Holy Ghoſt admoniſhes us of, (quia non profertur cito contra malos ſententia, abſque timore ullo filii hominum perpetrant mala *) gave orders two days after, that Carliel the principal ſhould be brought to London; that he and James Irweng, in full term, (a thing not uſual) might be carried before the Juſtices at Newgate, and attainted and convicted. And a few days after the Baron of Sanchar was likewiſe attainted and convicted at the King's-Bench in full term; and in a ſhort time after, to accompliſh his Majeſty's zeal for juſtice, the Baron Sanchar was (a) hanged publickly in term-time at the Palace of Weſtminſter, according to the judgment and ſentence he had before received.

I have reported this caſe with all the circumſtances, becauſe this example has not its parallel: for altho' it is true, that the late Queen Mary is very famous on account of the exemplary juſtice which ſhe cauſed to be executed upon Baron Sturton for the barbarous murder of Harquil; yet this preſent example of the Baron of Sanchar very much ſurpaſſes that of the Baron of Sturton, and that for many conſiderations. 1. Becauſe the Baron of Sturton was taken by the ordinary courſe of the Law, even within the Kingdom; but the principal in this caſe could not be taken by any common power, but by the means of his Majeſty's royal and abſolute power only. 2. The Baron of Sturton's offence was very apparent, and without any difficulty of Law: on the contrary, this of Sanchar was thereof (as appears) very full; but by his Majeſty's command, all theſe difficulties, with the conference and grave conſideration of his principal Judges, after ſearch of caſes precedent, were reſolved and cleared up, and notwithſtanding the impediments, difficulties and impoſſibilities in legal proceeding, greater expedition was uſed in this caſe than in that. In ſhort, the accompliſhment of the whole, the clearing up the truth of the fact in the caſe of the Baron of Sanchar, muſt be attributed to the great wiſdom, power and vigilance of his Majeſty, as appears by that which has been thereof ſaid before.

The

The Baron of Sanchar was a man of a very ancient and noble family in Scotland; he was a man of great courage and wit, endowed with many excellent gifts as well natural as acquired. The eloquence of his diſcourſe, with the civility and diſcretion of his behaviour, when he came before and went from the Judges, compelled the people (who honoured him on account of his moral virtues, and thoſe for his ſake) to bewail his fall with great grief, (altho' the occaſion of it was this baſe and barbarous aſſaſſination, premeditated for five years together with a malice bloody and inveterate:) this extraordinary affection of the people, was, as he himſelf confeſſed, a very great conſolation to him in his laſt troubles and afflictions. But at laſt their compaſſion abated, becauſe they perceived he died a true Catholick.

XIV. Proceedings againſt John Ogilvie, for High-Treaſon, on Tueſday the laſt Day of February, 1615. at Glaſcow in Scotland.

John Ogilvie alias Watſon came into Scotland, in 1613. and making his reſidence for the moſt part of that winter, in the north parts of Scotland; took his journey to England a little before Eaſter. Where, giving out to ſome of his Countrymen, that he had a ſupplication for ſome wrongs to preſent to his Majeſty, he attended the Court, ſome two months; and falling in acquaintance with a Gentleman of the weſt-country, after his pretended buſineſs was done, or the occaſion diſappointed, he returned into Scotland with the ſaid Gentleman in the beginning of June thereafter. Upon this familiarity, and other intelligences given him, he came to Glaſcow in Auguſt following; and finding a kinder receipt by certain perſons in that city, (who have ſince been juſtly condemned) he made ſome haunt and reſort thither at ſundry times, till at laſt he was detected, and by the direction of the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, who at that time kept his reſidence within the city, apprehended and committed to priſon, on the 4*th* of October.

In his examination, which was the next morning, before the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, the Biſhop of Argyle, the Lords Fleming, Boyde, and Kilſyth, the Provoſt of the City of Glaſcow, Sir Walter Stewart, and Sir George Elphingſton, Knights, he confeſſed his true name to be John Ogilvie, that he was born in the north of Scotland, and had been forth of the Country twenty-one years; that he lived at Grats, in a college of the Jeſuits, and was received in their order; that he returned into Scotland, by the command of his Superior, and was to ſtay there until he was recalled, if no other impediment ſhould offer. Being required to give his oath, that he ſhould declare nothing but truth, in ſuch things as he ſhould be demanded; he anſwered, That he would take his oath, but with ſome exceptions, namely, if he were demanded any thing that touched his eſtate and life, or that might endanger theſe or any of them, he would not anſwer; likewiſe if the ſame tended to the prejudice of others. And when it was reply'd, that his exceptions being admitted, his oath was as good as no oath, ſeeing any queſtions that could be propoſed would concern ſome of theſe: he was induced at laſt to give a ſimple oath, which he did upon his knees; and riſing up from the ground, ſaid, I will neither lye nor equivocate, but what I ſay ſhall be truth; and what I am asked, if I find it impertinent for me to anſwer, I will ſay nothing, or declare plainly I will not tell.

Then being enquired of his coming into Scotland, the time and buſineſs he came to do, anſwered, his buſineſs was to ſave ſouls. Touching the time when he came into Scotland, anſwer'd, in the June before: where he was apprehended to equivocate, notwithſtanding of his proteſtation; for he meaned of his laſt coming, and was asked concerning the firſt. But the time at that examination was not underſtood. Being enquired of the places where he had been received, denied to tell, and if he had ſaid Maſs in any place, he anſwered, he would not ſay any thing that might work prejudice to himſelf or others: and becauſe he had profeſſed, that he would not lye, the reply he commonly made to ſuch queſtions, was, I will not tell you.

The Lords finding him thus obſtinate, returned him to a chamber in the Caſtle, which was prepared for him.

The 12*th* of December, he was preſented at Edinburgh, before the Lords Commiſſioners, appointed by his Majeſty's miſſive for his Examination and Trial: namely, the Lord of Binning Secretary, the Lord of Kilſyth, Sir Gideon Murray, the Theſaurer-Deputy, and Sir William Oliphant, his Majeſty's Attorney-General: to whom he anſwered in all that was proponed, as of before at Glaſcow. There the letters intercepted with him, were preſented, which he acknowledged to be his: yet being demanded touching certain particulars contained in them, he denied to give their Lordſhips any ſatisfaction. So as their Lordſhips perceiving nothing, but a pertinacious refuſing in him, to anſwer to points moſt reaſonable, and withal apprehending his ſtay at Court in the laſt ſummer, to have been for ſome worſe ſervice than he could ſpeed in, determined, according to the power given them, to extort by torments another confeſſion; which being intimated to him, and he replying that he was ready to ſuffer what they pleaſed, it was thought thought fit to prove him with the eaſieſt form of Trial that could be uſed.

It pleaſed his Majeſty in this time, while he was remaining at Glaſcow, to ſend a commiſſion to the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, the Lord Biſhop of Argyle, the Lord Fleming, Sir George Elphinſton, and James Hamilton Provoſt of the city of Glaſcow, for trying the ſaid Ogilvie.

His opinion touching his Highneſs's royal power, and the Pope's claimed juriſdiction, maintained by Bellarmine, Suarez and others of that ſort: The queſtions were theſe.

1. Whether the Pope be judge, and have power in ſpiritualibus over his Majeſty, and whether that power will reach over his Majeſty even in temporalibus, if it be in ordine ad ſpiritualia, as Bellarmine affirmeth.

2. Whether the Pope have power to excommunicate Kings, (eſpecially ſuch as are not of his Church) as his Majeſty.

3. Whether the Pope have power to depoſe Kings, by him excommunicated; and in particular, whether he have power to depoſe the King his Majeſty?

4. Whether it be no Murder to ſlay his Majeſty, being ſo excommunicated and depoſed by the Pope?

5. Whether the Pope have power to abſoil Subjects from the oath of their born and natural allegiance to his Majeſty?

Upon the 18*th* day of January, the foreſaid queſtions being read diſtinctly unto him, and he required to declare his opinion thereanent, anſwered as followeth:

To the firſt, that he thought the Pope of Rome, Judge to his Majeſty, and to have power over him in ſpiritualibus, if the King be a Chriſtian: and where it is asked, if that power will reach over his Majeſty in temporalibus, he ſays he is not obliged to declare his opinion therein, except to him that is judge in controverſies of Religion, which he acknowledges to be the Pope, or ſome one, having authority from him.

To the ſecond he anſwered, That the Pope hath power to excommunicate his Majeſty: and where it is ſaid, that the King is not of the Pope's Church; he ſaith, that all who are baptized, are under the Pope's power.

To the third, where it is asked if the Pope have power to depoſe his Majeſty, being excommunicated? anſwered, that he will not declare his mind, except to him that is judge in controverſies of Religion.

To the fourth, whether it be lawful to ſlay his Majeſty, being excommunicated and depoſed by the Pope? anſwered ut ſupra.

To the fifth, whether the Pope hath power to abſoil Subjects from their born and natural allegiance to his Majeſty? anſwered ut ſupra.

In all theſe Articles he was particularly reaſoned with, by the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, Mr. Robert Boyde Principal of the College, (a man of rare erudition) and Mr. Robert Scot one of the Miniſters of the City; where it was alſo ſignified unto him, that it concerned him in no leſs than his life, what anſwer he ſhould make: if he ſhould ſtand obſtinate in theſe he had given, he might know what favour was to be expected for his other crimes. Not the leſs ratifying all that formerly was ſaid, he added this further, that he condemned the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance proponed to be ſworn in England, and would needs have the writer to inſert thoſe words, to all which he put his hand, ſubſcribing thus, Johannes Ogilveus, ſocietatis Jesu.

Theſe anſwers being ſent to his Majeſty, under the teſtification of the foreſaid Commiſſioners, his Highneſs gave order to the Lords of the Privy-Council, for his Trial, which was appointed to be at Glaſcow, the laſt of February. Immediately after, the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow directed the Provoſt and Bailiffs of the city unto him, to ſignify, that Tueſday following was appointed for Arraignment, and that he would not be accuſed for Maſs ſaying, or any thing elſe that concerned his profeſſion, but for the anſwers that he had made to the demands propoſed to him by his Majeſty's Commiſſioners. They declared alſo, that if he ſhould upon better reſolution recall thoſe anſwers, and apply himſelf to give his Majeſty ſatisfaction in other points, which of duty he was obliged unto, the ſaid Archbiſhop would uſe his credit with his Highneſs, and the Lords of the Privy-Council for his ſafety. His anſwer was, that he thanked his Lordſhip, for the good will and kindneſs offered, but he was ſo little minded to recall any thing he had ſaid, as when he came to the place, he would make a commentary upon his anſwers.

The Arraignment of John Ogilvie, Jeſuit, on Tueſday the laſt of February, in the Town-houſe of Glaſcow, before James Hamilton Provoſt of Glaſcow, James Bell, Colin Campbell, and James Bradwood, Bailiffs of the City, Juſtices appointed by ſpecial Commiſſion for that buſineſs, by the Lords of the Privy-Council. The foreſaid Judges being aſſiſted by the honourable Lords there preſent:

John, Archbiſhop of Glaſcow.
James, Marquis of Hamilton.
Robert, Earl of Lothian.
William, Lord Sanquhar.
John, Lord Fleming.
Robert, Lord Boyde.
And Sir Walter Stewart, Baily-deputy of the Regality of Glaſcow.

On Tueſday the laſt of February a little after eleven of the clock in the forenoon, the Court being ſet, Mr. William Hay of Baro commiſſary of Glaſcow, deputed by ſpecial commiſſion from Sir William Oliphant of Newton, his Majeſty's Attorney-General, produced the Indictment following: together with the citation uſed againſt thoſe, who were to paſs upon the Jury, and the roll of their particular names, ſubſcribed with his hand, according to the cuſtom obſerved in thoſe caſes.

The

The Indictment of John Ogilvie Jeſuit, after the form of the Law of Scotland.

John Ogilvie, by your ſubſcription, a prieſt of the late execrable order of Jeſuits, you are indicted and accuſed, That for as much as God, the author of all righteous government, having eſtabliſhed Kings and Magiſtrates his Lieutenants upon earth, for repreſſing of violence, oppreſſion and vice, and the promoting of piety and juſtice, hath in his particular grace and favour, bleſſed this Country with a more ancient, juſt and permanent deſcent of lawful Kings, than any other nation of the world, and extended our felicity beyond the happineſs of our anceſtors, by the juſtice, wiſdom, and clemency of his Majeſty's proſperous reign; and hath not only rewarded his Majeſty's zeal and righteouſneſs with wealth and peace, but alſo honoured and ſtrengthened him with the acceſſion of the moſt mighty and flouriſhing kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland. Which viſible favours proceeding directly from God's moſt bountiful hand, moved the whole Eſtates of this kingdom aſſembled in the Parliament holden at Perth, the 9*th* of July, 1606. to acknowledge his Majeſty's ſovereign authority, princely power, royal perogative, and privilege of his crown over all eſtates, perſons and cauſes whatſoever, within the kingdom: and all in one voice faithfully to promiſe, maintain, defend, obey and advance the life, ſafety, honour, dignity, ſovereign authority and prerogative royal of his ſacred Majeſty, and privileges of his crown: and to withſtand all perſons, powers and eſtates, who ſhould preſume, preſs, or intend any ways to impugn, hurt, or impair the ſame: As alſo his Majeſty, with advice of the whole eſtates of this kingdom, in the Parliament holden at Edinburgh, the 22*d* day of May, Anno 1584, ratified, approved and perpetually confirmed, his Majeſty's royal power and authority over all eſtates, as well ſpiritual as temporal, within this Realm: and ſtatuted and ordained, that his Highneſs, his heirs and ſucceſſors, by themſelves and their Counſellors, were, and in all times coming ſhould be Judges competent to all perſons his Highneſs's ſubjects, of whatſoever eſtate, degree, function, or condition, that ever they be of, ſpiritual or temporal, in all matters wherein they or any of them ſhould be apprehended, ſummoned, or charged to anſwer unto ſuch things as ſhould be inquired of them by our ſaid ſovereign Lord and his Council: and that none of them who ſhould be apprehended, called, or ſummoned, to the effect aforeſaid, ſhould preſume or take in hand, to decline the judgement of his Highneſs, his heirs and ſucceſſors, or their Council in the premiſſes, under the pain of Treaſon. And likewiſe by the 48*th* Act of King James I. his Parliament, and divers other Parliaments thereafter, it is ordained that all the King's lieges live and be governed under the King's laws and ſtatutes, and under no laws of other Countries and Realms, under the pain of Treaſon, and other, particularly expreſſed in the Acts before mentioned, and other laws of this kingdom. Notwithſtanding whereof, it is of truth and verity, that you having renounced your natural allegiance and duty to your native and righteous King, and caſt off all reverence, reſpect, and obedience to his ſovereign authority and laws, and dedicated your mind and actions to the unlawful obedience of foreign powers, adverſaries to his Majeſty, and reſolving, ſo far as in you lieth, to ſeduce his Majeſty's ſubjects from the faith and allegiance due to his Majeſty, repaired to this Country in the month of June laſt paſt, or thereabout. And by your conferences, inticements, auricular confeſſions, Maſs-ſaying, and other ſubtle and crafty means, endeavoured yourſelf not only to corrupt many of his Majeſty's lieges in religion; but alſo to pervert them from their dutiful obedience due to his Majeſty, till you were diſcovered and apprehended by the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, who with divers his Majeſty's Counſellors and others his good ſubjects, uſed all chriſtian and charitable means to bring you to the ſenſe of your heinous offences and deſire of amendment thereof: but they loſing all their well-intended labours, were (in reſpect of your perverſe obſtinacy) commanded by his Majeſty, to enter to your examination, and the Trial of your heinous crimes and tranſgreſſions. And eſpecially the ſaid Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, and many others of good rank and quality adjoined to him, by his Majeſty, for your examination, having upon the 18*th* day of January laſt, called you before them, to examine you upon ſome particular interrogatories, preſcribed by his Majeſty, to be demanded of you: as directly concerning his Majeſty's moſt ſacred perſon, life, crown, and eſtate. And chiefly you being demanded by them, whether the Pope hath power to depoſe Kings, being excommunicated? and in particular, if he have power to depoſe the King's Majeſty our ſovereign, being excommunicated by him? you anſwered treaſonably, that you would not declare your mind, except to him that is Judge in the controverſies of religion, whom (by your anſwer made to the latter part of the firſt interrogatory, demanded of you that day) you declared to be the Pope, or any, having authority from him. Albeit by the Acts of Parliament and laws of this realm, made in the years of God 1560, and 1567, it is ſtatuted and ordained, that the Biſhop of Rome (called the Pope) ſhall have no juriſdiction nor authority within this realm, in any time coming: and thereby not only declining treaſonably his Majeſty's juriſdiction, allowing of the Pope's juriſdiction, which is diſcharged by Acts of Parliament, as ſaid is; but hath committed moſt damnable and High-Treaſon, in not acknowledging that the Pope hath no power to depoſe his Majeſty, who holding his Crown and Authority abſolutely, ſovereignly, and immediately of God, may not be depoſed by any earthly perſon, power, or authority. And thereafter you being demanded, if it be lawful to ſlay his Majeſty, being excommunicated and depoſed by the Pope? you anſwered ut ſupra: which was, that you would not declare your mind till you were before the Pope, or others having authority from him: thereby not only declining treaſonably his Majeſty's Juriſdiction and authority-Royal; but by your not anſwering clearly, that it is altogether unlawful, damnable, and diabolical, once to think that it is lawful to ſlay his moſt ſacred Majeſty, you have committed moſt heinous, pernicious, and unpardonable Treaſon. And laſtly, being demanded, if the Pope had power to abſoil his Majeſty's born ſubjects from their natural allegiance, you anſwered, ut ſupra: and thereby both declined treaſonably his Highneſs's Juriſdiction and Authority-Royal, in refuſing to anſwer before his Majeſty's Counſellors and Commiſſioners aforeſaid, in one matter meerly concerning his royal power over his people, and their ſubjection to his Majeſty; and alſo committed wilful and deteſtable Treaſon, in not acknowledging profeſſedly and preſently, that none on earth had power to aſſoil his Majeſty's ſubjects from their natural ſubjection and allegiance to him. But that it may be known that your Treaſon proceeded of forethought of felony, and obſtinate reſolution, you freely and unrequiredly did add to your foreſaid anſwers this damnable concluſion, that you condemned the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance given to his Majeſty by his ſubjects in his Dominions: whereby it is apparent, that your errand to this Country, hath been to infect his Highneſs's ſubjects, with the poiſon of your peſtilent and treaſonable opinion foreſaid, to the ſubverſion of Religion, overthrow of his Majeſty's authority and crown, and deſtruction of his moſt ſacred perſon. And albeit the courſe of all his Majeſty's life and reign, hath manifeſted, how unwilling he hath ever been to uſe the ſeverity of his laws againſt thoſe who have ſaid and heard Maſs, and otherwiſe contravened the Acts of Parliament made againſt idolatrous papiſtry, and practiſers thereof within this kingdom, deſiring rather to reclaim them by inſtruction, from their errors, to the knowledge and profeſſion of the truth: and when he found them obdurate, and of deſperate reſolution, relieving the Country of the dangerous progreſs of their courſes, by their impriſonment and baniſhment, whereof you had ſuch experience in the perſons of your own accomplices, condemned for their manifeſt crimes, as might very probably have made you to have expected the like, if any memory of your native duty and born allegiance had poſſeſſed your mind: but you being altogether deſtitute thereof, by the three laſt articles of your depoſitions above-written, you have ſo plainly diſcovered, that you profeſſedly approve the means, and wiſh the effect of the overthrow of his Majeſty's eſtate, the deſtruction of his Highneſs's perſon, and ſeduction of his native ſubjects, from their ſubjection, and dutiful obedience: that thereby, and by every one of your foreſaid anſwers, you have committed moſt heinous, deteſtable, and unpardonable Treaſon, and deſervedly incurred the moſt rigorous pains thereof to be executed upon your body, lands, and goods with all extremity, to the terror of others.

The Indictment being read, Mr. William Hay, ſubſtitute for his Majeſty's Attorney, opened the ſame, to the effect following.

ALbeit the Indictment of itſelf be clear enough, and repreſenteth ſufficiently to my Lords Juſtices, their honourable Lordſhips here aſſiſting, and to yourſelf John Ogilvie, who ſtands there accuſed, the weight and gravity of the crime by you committed, yet I ſhall reſume it to you in few words, that your anſwers may be the more diſtinct, and without miſtaking.

You are not accuſed of ſaying Maſs, nor of ſeducing his Majeſty's ſubjects to a contrary religion, nor of any point touching you in conſcience properly; but for declining his Majeſty's authority, againſt the laws and ſtatutes of the land, and for maintaining treaſonable opinions: ſuch as we of this realm have not heard by any avowed. The ſtatutes mentioned in your Indictment, make it Treaſon not to anſwer the King's Majeſty, or his Council in any matter which ſhall be demanded: you being examined by my Lord Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, and other honourable perſons adjoined to him by his Majeſty's ſpecial commiſſion, refuſed to anſwer to divers interrogatories proponed to you by their Lordſhips, and at the ſame time profeſſedly avouched the Pope of Rome his juriſdiction, which by the laws of the Country is many years ſince plainly diſcharged: therefore have you incurred the penalty contained in the ſtatutes, and the ſame ought and ſhould be executed upon you.

It is further laid unto your charge, that you being demanded in the particulars, namely, Whether the Pope hath power to depoſe the King's Majeſty, our Sovereign? Secondly, Whether it be lawful to ſlay his Majeſty being depoſed by the Pope? Thirdly, Whether the Pope hath power to aſſoil his Majeſty's ſubjects, from their natural allegiance, or not? you denied to give any anſwer, touching any of theſe points except ye were enquired thereof by the Pope, or others having authority from him: and ſo not acknowledging, that his Majeſty's Crown and Authority is held immediately and ſovereignly of God, the author of all government; that it is deteſtable once to think, that his ſacred Majeſty may be lawfully killed, and that no man has power to aſſoil his Majeſty's ſubjects from their natural allegiance to his Highneſs: you have in theſe points, and every one of them, committed moſt heinous Treaſon; for the which what you ſay in your own defence I ſee not. And yet further that it may be ſeen, how deſperate your reſolution is in all theſe points, although you were not required concerning the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance given to his Majeſty, by his ſubjects, ye freely and out of your own motives, condemned theſe oaths, as impious and unlawful. Thereby hath it appeared what a wicked and treaſonable mind you foſter againſt his Majeſty, our Sovereign. If you ſhould deny it, here are your anſwers ſubſcribed with your own hand, which ye cannot but acknowledge; them I deſire to be read, as likewiſe the ſeveral Statutes of Parliament, which you are alledged to have tranſgreſſed, and thereafter, ſince his Majeſty is pleaſed, that the ordinary courſe of Trial be kept unto you; you ſhall have liberty to ſay for yourſelf, either againſt the relevancy of the Indictment, or verification produced, what you think beſt.

Then were read the Statutes of Parliament, mentioned in the Indictment, and the ſaid John Ogilvie's Anſwers to the demands proponed unto him, which he acknowledged for his own, and the ſubſcription thereto ſubjoined; after which, having licence of the Court to ſay what he could for himſelf, he ſpake to this effect:

FIrſt under proteſtation, that I do no way acknowledge this judgment, nor receive you, that have that commiſſion there produced, for my Judges, I deny any point laid againſt me to be Treaſon: for if it were Treaſon, it would be Treaſon in all places, and in all kingdoms; but that, ſaith he, is known not to be ſo. As for your Acts of Parliament, they are made by a number of partial men, the beſt of the land not agreeing with them, and of matters not ſubject to their Forum, or Judicatory, for which I will not give a rotten fig.

Where I am thought an enemy to the King's Majeſty's authority, I know no other authority he hath, but that which he received from his predeceſſors, who acknowledged the Pope of Rome's juriſdiction. If the King, ſaith he, will be to me as his predeceſſors were to mine, I will obey and acknowledge him for my King; but if he do otherwiſe, and play the runnagate from God, as he and you all do, I will not acknowledge him more than this old hat.

Here the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow interrupted his ſpeech, deſiring him to deliver his mind in a greater calm, and with more reverend ſpeeches of his Majeſty, (for he uttered thoſe things in a vehement paſſion, and as one tranſported with fury.) He remembred him, that he was accuſed upon his life, before Judges that were authorized by his Majeſty's commiſſion: to decline the judgement, or rail againſt his Majeſty's authority, was bootleſs, and in a man of his profeſſion, being an eccleſiaſtick, very ſcandalous. He ſhould rather take another courſe to amend what he had offended in, and recall his former anſwers; if they had not proceeded from a deliberate purpoſe, or if he were reſolute to maintain them, to do it with reaſon, and in a moderate ſort; that this were his beſt, either for juſtifying himſelf, and the opinions he held, or for moving the Judges, and their Lordſhips that were aſſiſting, to commiſerate his caſe. He advertiſed him withall to be more temperate in his ſpeeches concerning his Majeſty, otherwiſe he would not be lincenſed thus to offend.

To this, Ogilvie made ſome little anſwer, That he would take the advertiſement, and ſpeak more coolly: howbeit, he would never acknowledge the judgment, nor think they had power to ſit on his life; but ſaid, And for the reverence I do you, to ſtand bare-headed before you, I let you know it is, Ad redemptionem vexationis, & non ad agnitionem judicii.

The Advocate here inſiſted, that ſeeing all his anſwers tended to decline the judgment, and that he brought no reaſon why the Indictment ſhould not go to a Trial, that the Jury ſhould be choſen and ſworn at the bar, according to the cuſtom.

The Names of the Jury.

Sir George Elphingſton, of Blythſwood.
Sir Thomas Boyd, of Boneſhaw.
Sir James Edmeſton, of Duntraith, elder.
James Murhead, of Lachop.
James Roberton, of Ernock.
Hugh Crawfurd, of Jordan-Hill.
John Carſchore, of that Ilk.
Hugh Kennedy, Provoſt of Aire.
William Makarrel, of Hill-houſe.
James Blaire, Bailie of Aire.
John Dunlop, of Powmilne.
John Stewart, Burgeſs of Aire.
John Dumbar, Burgeſs there.
James Johnſton, Burgeſs there.
John Cunningham, of Rawes.

It was allowed the priſoner to challenge any of the fore-named perſons, and to oppoſe unto their admiſſion: who ſaid,

He had but one exception for them all: they were either enemies to his cauſe, or friends: if enemies, they could not be admitted upon his Trial; and if they were his friends, they ſhould ſtand priſoners at the Bar with him.

The Jury were inſtantly ſworn and admitted.

Then was the Indictment read again in the hearing of the Jury, and the evidences ſhewed them for verification thereof, which of before were produced. And the priſoner being of new remembred to ſay what he would for himſelf; for the better information of the Jury, ſpake theſe things following.

I wiſh theſe Gentlemen to conſider well what they do. I cannot be tried nor judged by them; and whatever I ſuffer here, it is by way of injury, and not of judgment. Injuria eſt, non judicium. I am accuſed of Treaſon, but have done none offence, neither will I beg mercy.

Archbiſhop. This is ſtrange, you have done none offence, and yet you are come in his Majeſty's Kingdom, and have laboured to pervert his Highneſs's ſubjects; both of theſe are againſt the Law: In this have ye not offended?

Ogilvie. I came by commandment, and if I were even now forth of the Kingdom, I ſhould return: neither do I repent any thing, but that I have not been ſo buſy as I ſhould, in that which ye call perverting. I hope to come to Glaſcow again, and to do more good in it. If all the hairs of mine head were Prieſts, they ſhould all come into the Kingdom.

Archbiſhop. And do you not eſteem it a fault to go againſt the King's commandment, eſpecially in this point of diſcharging you his Kingdom? If a King have any power within his Kingdom, it ſeems he may rid himſelf and his country of thoſe with whom he is offended; and it favours of great Rebellion to ſay otherwiſe.

Ogilvie. I am a ſubject as free, as the King is a King; he cannot diſcharge me, if I be not an offender, which I am not.

And being asked for what offences he might be diſcharged by the King, anſwered, in the caſes of theft and murder.

Archbiſhop. You come not to anſwer any thing to the points of your Indictment. Why did you decline his Majeſty's authority, and refuſed to ſhew your opinion anent the Pope, his power in depoſing Kings, and looſing ſubjects from their oath of allegiance? And when it was asked you, if it were lawful to ſlay the King, being depoſed, and excommunicated by the Pope, which any loyal-hearted ſubject will abhor to think of, why did you not ſimply condemn it as unlawful? for in that you do not condemn it, you ſhew yourſelf of the opinion of the reſt of your ſect, who in their books maintain, that it is both lawful and commendable to ſlay Kings, if the Pope's commiſſion go forth once for it.

Ogilvie. For the declining of the King's authority, I will do it ſtill in matters of Religion; for with ſuch matters he hath nothing to do: neither have I done any other thing, but that which the Miniſters did at Dundee; they would not acknowledge his Majeſty's authority in ſpiritual matters more than I; and the beſt Miniſters of the land are ſtill of that mind, and if they be wiſe, will continue ſo.

The Archbiſhop reply'd, That he was miſtaken, both in the place and matter; for it was not at Dundee, but Aberdeen, where eight Miniſters meeting in a general aſſembly, contended not againſt the King's authority, but that the aſſemby called to that place and time, could not be diſcharged by his Majeſty's Commiſſioner: neither ſhould the fact of a few, take it at the worſt, be eſteemed the deed of the whole. Theſe have been puniſhed for their offences, and ſome of them have confeſſed their error, and been graciouſly pardoned by his Majeſty. All good Miniſters profeſs otherwiſe, and our Religion teacheth us to acknowledge his Majeſty our only ſupreme Judge in all Cauſes. The King is Keeper of both Tables, and his place bears him not only to the ruling of his ſubjects in juſtice, and preſerving equity amongſt them, but even to maintain Religion and God's pure Worſhip, of which he ſhould have principal care. Your Lord the Pope, hath not only denied this authority to Kings, which God giveth them, but uſurpeth to himſelf a power of depoſing and killing when he is diſpleaſed; and it were the leſs to be regarded, if this his uſurpation had gone no further than your pens: but you have entred, by this pretended right, the throats of the greateſt Kings, as your practice upon the two laſt Henrys of France bears witneſs. You are not able to lay ſuch imputation upon us, nor our profeſſion, which teaches, that next unto God Almighty, all men are bound to fear, ſerve, and honour their Kings. But what anſwer you, touching theſe demands? Hath the Pope power to depoſe the King? or is it not murder to kill him, being depoſed by the Pope?

Ogilvie. I refuſed before to anſwer ſuch queſtions, becauſe in anſwering, I ſhould acknowledge you Judges in Controverſies of Religion, which I do not. I will not caſt holy things to dogs.

Archbiſhop. Is it a point of faith, that the Pope may depoſe his Majeſty? or do you think it a controverſy in Religion, Whether his Majeſty (whom God ſave) may be lawfully killed, or not?

Ogilvie. It is a queſtion amongſt the Doctors of the Church, and many hold the affirmative not improbably. A Council hath not yet determined the point: and if it ſhall be concluded by the Church, that the Pope hath ſuch power, I will give my life in defence of it; and if I had a thouſand lives, I would beſtow them that way, if they will make an article of Faith of it.

Being urged by the Court to declare his own opinion, eſpecially in that point, whether it were Murder to kill his Majeſty, being depoſed by the Pope?

Ogilvie. I would not ſay it were unlawful, tho' I ſhould ſave my life by it. That if the King offended againſt the Catholick Church, the Pope might puniſh him as well as a ſhepherd or the pooreſt fellow in the country. That in abrogating the Pope's authority, the Eſtates of Parliament had gone beyond their limits, and that the King in uſurping the Pope's right, had loſt his own. Nam qui rapit jus alienum, perdit jus ad ſuum.

Being asked touching the oath of allegiance, why he did condemn it, and the ſame being read unto him; he ſaid, It was a damnable oath, againſt God, and his truth, and that it was treaſon to ſwear it, becauſe it brought the King's Perſon and State in danger. Since this Kingdom, ſaid he, was Chriſtian, the Pope's ſupreme power was always acknowledged: this being caſt off, (as we ſee in the Act of your Parliament) againſt all reaſon and conſcience, and ſubjects forced to ſwear to a matter ſo unlawful, what marvel that attempts and dangerous courſes be taken againſt him? Juſtiſſima lex eſt, ut quæ agit aliquis, talia patiatur. But would the King leave off his uſurping upon the Pope, he might live without fear, as well as the King of Spain, or any other Chriſtian Prince. Neither Biſhop, nor Miniſter, nor all the Biſhops and Miniſters in his Majeſty's Kingdoms had done, or could do the like.

The Archbiſhop of Glaſcow did cloſe all to the Jury, to this effect.

Gentlemen, and others, who are named upon this Aſſize, tho' I minded to have ſaid nothing, but ſitten here a witneſs of the proceeding, I have been forced by his proud and impudent ſpeeches, ſomewhat to reply, and muſt with your patience, ſay a little more. It is this ſame day, two and twenty weeks paſt, that this priſoner fell into mine hands; ſince that time he hath had leiſure to think enough what courſe was fitteſt for himſelf to take, for ſatisfying his Majeſty whom he had offended: neither hath he lacked counſel and advice, the beſt that we could give him. Beſides, he hath found on our part nothing but courteous dealing, and better entertainment, than, I muſt now ſay it, he hath deſerved. Mine own hopes were, that he would have followed another courſe, than I ſee he hath taken, and not ſtand to the anſwers which he made to thoſe demands which were moved unto him by his Majeſty's Commiſſioners, and you have ſeen: but if his anſwers at the firſt were treaſonable, they are now ſo little bettered, as in all your hearings, he hath uttered ſpeeches moſt deteſtable, made a commentary worſe than the text was, and ſhewed himſelf to carry the mind of an arrant and deſperate traitor. You perceive he obſcures not his affection towards the King's Majeſty, our Sovereign, in all his ſpeeches preferring the Pope to his Majeſty: and which is more intolerable, affirmeth the King's Majeſty to have loſt the right of his Kingdom by uſurping upon the Pope. He will not ſay, it is unlawful to kill his Majeſty; he ſaith, it is treaſon for ſubjects to ſwear the oath of allegiance, and meaneth ſo much in his laſt words, as the King's Majeſty's life and eſtate cannot be aſſured, except he renders himſelf the Pope's vaſſal.

Thus hath he left you little to do, except that his Majeſty's pleaſure is, the ordinary form be kept with him, you ſhould never need once to remove: all his ſpeeches have been ſo ſtuffed with Treaſon, that I am ſure the patience of the Noblemen, and others here preſent, hath been much provoked.

In all that he hath ſaid, I can mark but two things alledged by him, for the Pope's authority over Kings; the words of our Saviour to St. Peter, Paſce oves meas, feed my ſheep: and the ſubjection of Kings, eſpecially of our Kings, ſince the Kingdom became Chriſtian, to the Pope. For the words of our Saviour, how little they ſerve his purpoſe, I have no need to tell you. To feed the ſheep of Chriſt, is not, I hope, to depoſe Kings from their eſtates, nor to inflame the hearts of ſubjects againſt Princes, much leſs to kill and diſpatch them: we are better taught than to be deceived with ſuch gloſſes. Saint Peter made never that ſenſe of thoſe words, and teacheth us a far other doctrine, in his firſt Epiſtle, fifth chapter, and ſecond and third verſes.

I will not ſpend time with ſuch purpoſe; only this I muſt ſay, that whatſoever was St. Peter's prerogative, the Pope of Rome hath nothing to do with it: for he cannot be St. Peter's ſucceſſor that hath forſaken his doctrine, and gone againſt his practice directly, both in that and other points of Chriſtian Faith. And for the antiquity of his uſurped power, I may juſtly ſay, that Mr. Ogilvie is not well ſeen in antiquity, or then ſpeaketh againſt his knowledge, when he ſaith, that this power of the Pope was ever acknowledged by Chriſtian Kings: the Biſhops of Rome, for many years, made no ſuch claim, neither did Emperors or Kings ever dream of ſuch ſubjection: long it was e'er the Pope of Rome came to the height of commanding Kings, and not till he had oppreſſed the Church, under the pretext of St. Peter's keys, bearing down all the Biſhops within Chriſtendom; which having done, then he made his invaſion upon Princes, and that by degrees. The Hiſtories of all ages make this plain, and the reſiſting he found by Kings in their Kingdoms, teſtifieth that they never acknowledged his ſuperiority. Of our own, howbeit as we lie far from his ſeat, ſo had we leſs buſineſs and fewer occaſions of contradiction: yet can I make it ſeen in divers particulars, when any queſtion fell out anent the proviſion of Biſhops and Archbiſhops to their places, the bulls of Rome were ſo little reſpected, as the King's predeceſſors have always preferred and born out their own choice; and the interdictions made upon the Realm, by theſe occaſions, not without ſome imputation of weakneſs to the See Apoſtolick, have been recalled. The ſuperſtitions of Rome were amongſt us laſt embraced, and with the firſt, by the mercies of God, ſhaken off. Whatſoever you brag of your antiquity, it is falſe both in this and in all the points of your profeſſion elſe, which I could clear, if this time or place were fitting. But to you of this Jury, I have this only more to ſay, you are to enquire upon the verity of the Indictment, whether ſuch and ſuch things as are alledged to be committed by him, have been ſo or not: you have his ſubſcription, which he acknowledgeth; you hear himſelf, and how he hath moſt treaſonably diſavowed his Majeſty's authority: it concerns you only to pronounce as you ſhall find verified by the ſpeeches that you have heard, and the teſtimonies produced. For the reſt, the Juſtices know ſufficiently what to do, and will ſerve God and his Majeſty, according to the commiſſion given them.

Maſter William Hay, Advocate for his Majeſty, aſked Inſtruments upon the priſoner's treaſonable ſpeeches, uttered in the hearing of the Jury, and his ratification of the former anſwers made to his Majeſty's Commiſſioners: likewiſe for the further clearing of the Indictment, repeated the Acts of Parliament mentioned in the ſaid Indictment, with the Act of Privy-Council, made anent his Majeſty's ſupremacy and the oath of allegiance. And deſired the Jury deeply to weigh and conſider the perverſe and deviliſh diſpoſition of the party accuſed; to the effect they might without ſcruple proceed in his conviction. And according to his place, proteſted for wilful error, if they ſhould acquit him of any point contained in the ſaid Indictment.

The perſons named upon the Jury, removed to the higher houſe, which was prepared for them, and having elected Sir George Elphingſton, Chancellor, all in one voice found the priſoner guilty of the whole treaſonable crimes contained in the Indictment.

Which being reported by the ſaid Sir George Elphingſton, and confirmed by the whole Jury, then returned into the Court, judgment was given, by direction of the Juſtices,

That the ſaid John Ogilvie, for the treaſons by him committed, ſhould be hanged and quartered.

The Archbiſhop of Glaſcow demanded, if Ogilvie would ſay any thing elſe?

Ogilvie anſwered, No, my Lord. But I give your Lordſhip thanks for your kindneſs, and will deſire your hand.

The Archbiſhop ſaid, If you ſhall acknowledge your fault done to his Majeſty, and crave God and his Highneſs's pardon, I will give you both hand and heart; for I wiſh you to die a good Chriſtian.

Then Ogilvie aſked, If he ſhould be licenſed to ſpeak unto the people?

The Archbiſhop anſwered, If you will declare, that you ſuffer according to the Law, juſtly for your offence, and crave his Majeſty's pardon for your treaſonable ſpeeches, you ſhall be licenſed to ſay what you pleaſe; otherwiſe you ought no to be permitted.

Then ſaid he, God have mercy upon me! And cried aloud, If there be here any hidden Catholicks, let them pray for me; but the prayers of Hereticks I will not have.

And ſo the Court aroſe.

A true Relation of ſuch things as paſſed at the Execution of John Ogilvie, upon the laſt day of February, Anno 1615. being Tueſday in the afternoon.

AFter judgement was given, by the ſpace of ſome three hours, he remained in the place where he was convicted, having leiſure granted him to prepare himſelf for death. He continued a while upon his knees at prayer, with a cold devotion; and when the hour of execution approached, his hands being tied by the Executioner, his ſpirits were perceived much to fail him. In going towards the ſcaffold, the throng of people was great, and he ſeemed much amazed; and when he was up, Mr. Robert Scott and Mr. William Struthers, Miniſters, very gravely and chriſtianly exhorted him to an humble acknowledgement of his offence, and if any thing troubled his mind, to diſburthen his conſcience. In matters of Religion, they ſaid, they would not then enter, but prayed him to reſolve and ſettle his mind, and ſeek mercy and grace from God, through Jeſus Chriſt, in whom only ſalvation is to be found.

Ogilvie anſwered, That he was prepared and reſolved. Once he ſaid, that he died for religion; but uttered this ſo weakly, as ſcarce he was heard by them that ſtood by upon the ſcaffold. Then addreſſing himſelf to execution, he kneeled at the ladder-foot, and prayed; Mr. Robert Scott in that while declaring to the people that his ſuffering was not for any matter of Religion, but for heinous treaſon againſt his Majeſty, which he prayed God to forgive him. Ogilvie hearing this, ſaid, he doth me wrong. One called John Abircrumie, a man of little wit, replied, no matter, John, the more wrongs the better. This man was ſeen to attend him carefully, and was ever heard aſking of Ogilvie ſome token before his death; for which, and other buſineſs he made with him, he was put off the ſcaffold.

Ogilvie ending his prayer, aroſe to go up the ladder, but ſtrength and courage, to the admiration of thoſe who had ſeen him before, did quite forſake him: he trembled and ſhaked, ſaying, he would fall, and could hardly be helped up on the top of the ladder. He kiſſed the hangman, and ſaid, Maria, mater gratiæ, ora pro me, omnes Angeli orate pro me, omnes Sancti Sanctæque orate pro me:

but with ſo low a voice, that they which ſtood at the ladder-foot had ſome difficulty to hear him.

The Executioner willed him to commend his ſoul to God, pronouncing theſe words unto him, Say John, Lord have mercy on me, Lord receive my ſoul: which he did with ſuch feebleneſs of voice, that ſcarcely he could be heard. Then was he turned off, (his left foot for a ſpace taking hold of the ladder, as a man unwilling to die) and hung till he was dead. His quartering, according to the judgment given, was, for ſome reſpects, not uſed; and his body buried in a place that is kept for malefactors.

We have underſtood, by ſome perſons who viſited him at times during his impriſonment, that amongſt other his ſpeeches with them, he ſaid this, That if he had eſcaped his apprehenſion at this time, and lived till Whitſunday next, he ſhould have done that which all the Biſhops and Miniſters both in England and Scotland, ſhould never have helped. And if he might have lived at liberty unto that time, he would willingly have been drawn in pieces with horſes, and have given his body to have been tormented.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,

IT is the honour of this Court, that it repreſents the higheſt earthly Majeſty, and his preſence; and it is his Majeſty's Honour, that as himſelf is clothed with Juſtice, ſo you, as the greateſt and higheſt next his Majeſty, ſhould put on the ſame garment.

Clemency and Juſtice are the two Lights of every Kingdom, without which, your perſons and eſtates would be expoſed to violence, and without which, great Monarchies would be but great Thefts; and as Juſtice is not to be recompenced in price, ſo ought not the ſcandal hereof to go unpuniſhed; eſpecially, when it toucheth ſo great a perſon, as, in the ſacred Seat of Juſtice, is next to the King: the Chief Judge in this Court, and the ſole Judge in Chancery, who is much defamed by the Gentleman at the Bar, in the moſt precious point of all his virtues, his Juſtice; be it ſpoken without offence, baſely and blameleſsly is my Lord-Chancellor traduced, as if he deſerved, that all the thunderbolts of heaven ſhould fall upon him.

At my Lord's firſt coming into this place, he found a Cauſe in Chancery, between this Gentleman at the Bar, and one Mr. Fiſher, not controverted in the title, but concerning the value of the Leaſe, which Fiſher held of Wraynham; in which, the Lord-Chancellor peruſed the proceedings of the cauſe, called the parties to give a ſummary end to ſo tedious a cauſe; and becauſe the ſucceſs anſwered not the deſire of this Gentleman, therefore he kicks againſt authority, who before was not more grieved at the expence, than now impatient at the ſentence; which was not want of juſtice in my Lord, but of equity in the cauſe.

I confeſs I was of counſel with Mr. Wraynham, and preſs'd his cauſe as far as equity would ſuffer; but I know that Judges look with other eyes than Counſellors do, they go not by tale, but by weight. And therefore, their Judgment muſt anſwer the Counſel, and quiet the mind of the party: and tho' in gaming, loſers may ſpeak, yet in judgment they muſt be ſilent; becauſe it is preſumed that nothing is taken from them, but what is none of theirs. But this Gentleman being of an unquiet Spirit, after a ſecret murmuring, breaks out into a complaint to his Majeſty, and not ſtaying his return out of Scotland, but fancying himſelf, as if he ſaw ſome Cloud

Cloud ariſing over my Lord, wearying and tiring his Majeſty with infinite ſupplications in this caſe. And now, my Lords, as if all his former cauſe had been loſt, he preſents it no more in parts, or looſe papers, but compiling his undigeſted thoughts into a libel, though the volume was but in quarto; faſtens it on the King on Good-Friday laſt.

And his moſt princely Majeſty, finding it ſtuffed up with moſt bitter reviling ſpeeches, againſt ſo great and worthy a Judge, hath of himſelf commanded me this day, to ſet forth and manifeſt his fault unto your Lordſhips, that ſo he might receive deſerved puniſhment.

In this Velvet pamphlet (for this Book is bound in Velvet) is ſet forth his cauſe, the work of this day; wherein Mr. Wraynham ſaith, he had two decrees in the firſt Lord-Chancellor's time, both under the Great Seal, and yet both are altered ſince the laſt Lord-Chancellor's death, and cancelled by this Lord-Chancellor in a prepoſterous manner; and Firſt, without cauſe; Secondly, without matter; Thirdly, without any legal proceedings; Fourthly, without precedent; Fifthly, upon the party's bare ſuggeſtions; and Sixthly, without calling Mr. Wraynham to anſwer. And of this, my Lords, ſpightfully he imagines a threefold end: Firſt, to reward Fiſher's fraud and perjuries; Secondly, to palliate his unjuſt proceedings, and to rack things out of joint; and Thirdly, to confound Wraynham's Eſtate: and that my Lord was therein led by the rule of his own fancy. Yet he ſtayeth not here; but, as if he wou'd ſet ſpurs againſt my Lord, he aggravates my Lord's Injuſtice to be worſe than Murder; ſaying, that in his ſentence, he hath devoured him and his whole family. And ſecondly, as if one ſin ſhou'd follow upon another, he doubles it upon my Lord, and, in a manner, plainly gives my Lord the lye. And hearing that my Lord had ſatisfied his Majeſty in this caſe; he ſaith in his Book, that he that did it unjuſtly, muſt, to maintain it, ſpeak untruly, adding falſhood to my Lord's Injuſtice; ſaying in his Book, it is given out my Lord hath begged Wraynham's pardon: which, tho' it be the ſhew of a gentle heart, yet argues a guilty conſcience, and is but my Lord's cunning to avoid the hearing of the cauſe. And as if my Lord ſhou'd know his own diſeaſe to be foul, and were unwilling to have it ſearched or diſcovered; he chargeth my Lord with ſhifts, and tells him that he hath palliated oppreſſion with greatneſs, wit and eloquence; and that the height of authority, makes men preſume. And to make this yet more ſharp, he urgeth, that my Lord, to maintain this, uſeth ſecret means, whereby the unſoundneſs of his actions may not be ſeen, and ſo to avoid cenſure; and, as if my Lord ſhou'd have ſkill in Magick, he ſaith, that my Lord hath raiſed a report from hell of the late Maſter of the Rolls, which was confuted before his face, and damned before his death; not content to ſcandalize the living, but ſo far, my Lords, doth his malice overſpread his wiſdom, that he doth not ceaſe, with his nails, to ſcrape the dead out of their graves again. When it is well known unto your Lordſhips, that the Maſter of the Rolls was a man of great underſtanding, great pains, great experience, great dexterity, and of great integrity; yet, becauſe this cauſe fell by caſualty into his hands, by reference from the laſt Lord-Chancellor, and he followed not this man's humour in his report; therefore he brands him with theſe aſperſions, and adds this to the reſt, That he grounded this report upon Witneſſes, that ſwore impoſſibilities, groſs abſurdities, and apparent untruths. How can you but think, my Lords, but that this Gentleman's head is full of poiſon, ſeeing it fell out ſo faſt then into his pen, trampling upon the dead? and this is an addition unto his puniſhment, the injury of him that is dead, becauſe the State yet lives, wherein his Juſtice is ſcandaliz'd.

And now, my Lords, that you may the more deteſt his ſlanders, whereby he goeth about to ſlander my Lord-Chancellor's Juſtice; give me leave to open the plain and even way, wherein this great Judge walks in this particular caſe. The queſtions in Chancery at firſt, were two, between Wraynham and Fiſher, upon croſs ſuits, either againſt the other: Wraynham complains of truſt broken, whereby he was defrauded, Fiſher upon a debt of a private reckoning detained by Wraynham. Upon proof of both theſe, it was by aſſent order'd, that Fiſher ſhou'd aſſign the Leaſe made unto him upon truſt, and Wraynham ſhou'd pay the Money, ſo well proved to be due to Fiſher: ſo by aſſent was the Decree had, which is the firſt Decree.

But Mr. Wraynham, wiſely ſuſpecting that Mr. Fiſher had incumbred his Leaſe, and if it ſhou'd be aſſigned to him according to the Decree, it wou'd be merely illuſory; he exhibits a new bill to diſcover what charge, and in what ſort, Fiſher had charged the land with incumbrances. And Mr. Wraynham finding the incumbrances greater, upon the reference of the Lord-Chancellor to the Maſter of the Rolls, a bargain was mediated between them, that Fiſher ſhou'd hold the Leaſe in queſtion, and Wraynham ſhou'd have after the rate of twelve years purchaſe; and to this, both aſſented: ſo that your Lordſhips ſee that the firſt Decree was not cancell'd by my Lord Chancellor, but diſcharged by himſelf; for by the Decree he might have had the Leaſe, but he contented himſelf with twelve years purchaſe.

After this, the queſtion grew upon the value, which being referred to the laſt Maſter of the Rolls, how the value was at firſt, before the improvement, when it was in Leaſe to one Harply, and there upon proof and oath of divers Witneſſes, the Maſter of the Rolls returned and certified the conſtant produce of the Leaſe, to be worth 200 l. by the year; whereupon, Wraynham was to have it at twelve years purchaſe, amounting to 2400 l. Mr. Wraynham ſeeing the land was much improved, by a defence made againſt the ſea and other means, whereby the nature of the land was altered, and the profit much raiſed; moves the Lord-Chancellor not to recede from the bargain, but ſaith, that the Value returned, was not the true value, for the land was worth 400 l. by the year, and yet excepts by retainer in his hands, 2000 Marks, which he owed to Fiſher, one thouſand and ſixty-ſix pounds odd Money; whereby now Mr. Wraynham had received his 2400*l.* in his purſe. And when he ſaw himſelf thus fleeced, having receiv'd 2400 l. for that which coſt but 200 l. now he ſtirs up new ſuits, and moves the Lord-Chancellor by a commiſſion to refer the value to two Knights that had been Farmers to the land, that they might certify the true value: the one, Sir L'Eſtrange Mordant, who certifies the value 318 l. yearly; and the other, Sir Henry Spillman, certified the value to be 364 l. yearly; and my Lord-Chancellor ſtrikes between them, and makes it 340 l. So here is a difference of values, the firſt of 200 l. upon oath yearly, and this at 340 l. yearly, without oath. The firſt value is at the time of Harply's Leaſe, the ſecond is at the time of the commiſſion granted, and after improvement of which, your Lordſhips well know in your wiſdom, the difference between land barren, and improved in value. The laſt Lord-Chancellor, according to the amounting value of 340 l. a year, annexed the increaſe to Wraynham's bargain, and that he ſhou'd have it, as if the lands were worth 340 l. per ann. So that now, the 2400 l. in his purſe, had been worth 1680 l. annexed above 4000 l. Mr. Fiſher finding this annexed to the bargain, and that he ſhou'd be preſs'd to pay the ſurpluſage, and that he had choice either to pay the Money, or to part with the Leaſe; Fiſher moved the Court that he might give up the Leaſe, and deſires his firſt 2000 Marks with damages, which Wraynham aſſented to, ſo that he might have defalcation of that which Fiſher had received of the profits of the land. Upon this, upon conſent of parties, it was again decreed, (and this is the ſecond Decree, which Wraynham ſo much triumphs upon; not being an abſolute and poſitive Decree, but qualify'd with this:) Firſt, that Wraynham ſhou'd pay the 2400 l. with damages to Fiſher: and, ſecondly, that Wraynham ſhou'd have defalcation of ſuch profits as Mr. Fiſher had received out of the land.

Mr. Wraynham ſtrives with this ſecond Decree, being willing to have the value of the land, not according as Fiſher had received, but what he might have recovered.

Now my Lord-Chancellor finding the caſe thus ſtanding, thought it no injuſtice againſt Wraynham's own offer, not that Fiſher ſhou'd loſe his damages, having forborn 2400 l. ten years, nor that Wraynham ſhou'd be allow'd more defalcation than Fiſher cou'd receive, becauſe he was ty'd to a dry rent; and finding that Wraynham was neither willing nor able to return the 2400 l. with damages unto Fiſher, my Lord-Chancellor thought fit to eſtabliſh the bargain, according to the firſt certificate of the Maſter of the Rolls upon oath; becauſe the laſt certificate without oath, was not ſo equal in the ballance of Juſtice, as that with oath, certified by the Maſter of the Rolls, upon the examination of divers Witneſſes.

Now, my good Lords, if this caſe thus ſtands, what Injuſtice is there committed? what unſoundneſs is there in this action? or, what cauſe is there for my Lord-Chancellor to hide himſelf, that this Gentleman ſhou'd in this caſe declaim againſt him this day? If it were, my Lords, to make my Lord-Chancellor, for fear, to take off his hand; he will let the World know he is more conſtant and couragious in the points of Juſtice, than that which he did ſo juſtly, ſo ſlightly to revoke. And if it were to this end, to make my Lord-Chancellor to diſpute with Mr. Wraynham; I am to let you know from his Majeſty, he will not let him forego, nor forget his place, ſo much as to enter into debate with Mr. Wraynham, knowing that it were not fit for him, to ſtand to wreſtle or wrangle with Mr. Wraynham, but rather, to deſpiſe ſo mean an Adverſary.

My Lords, you know that wiſe and juſt men may walk the ſame way, though not the ſame paſſage; there are divers courſes and divers ways to the ſame end, Juſtice: for Juſtice ſake, they are both to be honour'd, neither to be blamed. For my Lords, if Judges ſhou'd be traduced as unjuſt, becauſe they differ in opinion, they ſhou'd have thankleſs offices. Juſtice is the harmony of Heaven, but Lingua detractionis eſt lancea triplex. Though this Gentleman hath ſweat hard to ſcoff and dare ſo high a Judge, yet the raſor of his tongue cannot charge him that any thing came between God and his own conſcience, but the merits of the cauſe; though it be certainly true, whilſt a man carries this fleſh about him, his judgments and faculties will be imperfect. Yet, my Lords, I know that my Lord is the branch of ſuch a tree, who, though he bloſſom'd laſt, yet took more ſap from the root than any of the reſt: the ſon living in the memory of ſo worthy a father, the father living in the m mory of ſo vertuous a ſon, who may ſay, as Ageſilaus once ſaid to his father, I obey you in judging nothing contrary to law.

I am glad this Gentleman is ſo naked of excuſe, yet heartily ſorry his defamation is ſo foul, as to draw ſuch a ſmart of puniſhment as this will be upon him; and here if neceſſity (the true defender of man's wickedneſs) ſhou'd ſtep in, I anſwer, though neceſſity break through all laws, yet flying into the face of Juſtice, it muſt be broken by Juſtice; elſe no ſubject can be ſafe, nor no Court keep itſelf from infamy.

It is well, my Lord, that this fault falls out but ſeldom; for being exorbitant when it happens, it cannot but be foul. It is a pernicious example; for by this, when ſlanders are preſented inſtead of complaints, that is but to ſet diviſions between the King and his great Magiſtrates, to diſcourage Judges, and vilify Juſtice in the ſight and mouths of all the people.

Therefore I beſeech your Lordſhips to pardon me, if I be too long, and ſuffer me to ſhew your Lordſhips what this Court, in like caſes hath done.

In the ſecond year of his Majeſty's reign, when Sir Edward Coke, according to his place, informed againſt Foorth in this Court, ore tenus, for petitioning his Majeſty againſt the laſt Lord-Chancellor, for granting an injunction for ſtaying of a ſuit at the Common Law, (which your Lordſhips know how neceſſary it is) he being convicted upon his own confeſſion, received a ſharp cenſure. I will conclude with this one, and I ſhall deſire your Lordſhips, in this place, to hear it read; and then do humbly beſeech your Lordſhips to hear the Gentleman at the Bar, either for his defence, or excuſe.

Then Wraynham's Examinations were read in this Book and Epiſtle.

Then he was charged with theſe words following, in the end of his Epiſtle to his Majeſty: "He that "judgeth unjuſtly, muſt, to maintain it, ſpeak un- "truly; and the height of authority maketh men "to preſume."

Alſo, in ſhewing of his Majeſty reaſons why the Maſter of the Rolls was faulty, he ſaid; Firſt, the Maſter of the Rolls had omitted many of his material proofs.

Secondly, He ſhifted off other ſome.

Thirdly, That he ſometimes wreſted the equity of his cauſe.

Fourthly, That he did falſely cite Fiſher's proofs.

Fifthly, That he grounded the report upon the depoſition of Witneſſes that ſwore abſurdities, untruths, and mere impoſſibilities.

And, Laſtly, as if the report had been condemned and damned before to the pit of hell, he ſaid it was raiſed as ab inferno.

In his Epiſtle to his Majeſty, he is charged with theſe words:

"I underſtand my Lord-Chancellor hath begged "my pardon: it is outwardly the ſhew of a great "heart, but inwardly it argueth a guilty conſci- "ence; otherwiſe, if firſt I had been found guil- "ty, and his Lordſhip ſhould then have interceded

" with his Majeſty for me, it had been an argu" ment of an indulgent nature; but to beg pardon
" where there is no need, was manifeſtly done to " avoid an hearing, and not in pity towards me;
" for he that deſpoils me of my goods, I will not " truſt him with my perſon. And therefore, far be
" it from me to hope, or truſt in his goodneſs; I
" diſclaim his favour, and infinitely deplore the " judgment of his Majeſty."

And in the concluſion of his Epiſtle were theſe words: " I deſire to ſuffer at your gates, if I ſhall " dare to ſlander ſo great and eminent a Judge, unto " ſo great and wiſe a King.

" If he ſhould not deſire to reward the Fiſhers for " their fraud and perjuries, I know not why he " ſhould have racked all out of joint.

" My Lord, with this his laſt cunning and rhe-
" torick, hath palliated his unjuſt proceedings
" againſt me; for my Lord's geſture and pronun-
" ciation in his ſpeech, is wanting in my writing,
" out of which a cloudy miſt may riſe to hide the " verity of your princely Judgment.

" I could never ſee by what reaſons, or words,
" his Lordſhip hath coloured his dealings to excuſe
" himſelf unto your Majeſty, underſtanding only
" a piece, and not the whole from your Majeſty.
" This muſt move me moſt humbly to beſeech
" your Majeſty to ſave my wife and children; and,
" out of your princely Juſtice, to appoint a day
" of hearing, whereby there ſhall appear unto
" your Majeſty, as well the ſincerity of my affir-
" mations, as the unſoundneſs of his Lordſhip's
" actions. For I never ſought corners, but openly,
" and ſometimes in my Lord's preſence, have no" tified and complained of my wrongs, and deſire
" a publick hearing before your Majeſty, which " the greateſt ſubject dares not do, without truth
" and juſtice."

And in another place, Wraynham ſaith, " My " Lord Chancellor proves nothing by record, nor " delivers any thing by writing, to anſwer the " things objected againſt him; but would hide " himſelf from the eyes of your Majeſty's juſtice."

His Majeſty ſaith, tho' he receive petitions from his ſubjects, againſt his higheſt Juſtices; yet he will have his Judges know, that they are ſubject to his account only, and to none elſe upon earth.

His Majeſty received this petition on Good-Friday laſt, in which this Gentleman hath ſo far exceeded the meaſure of an humble complaint, that I muſt appeal to your Lordſhips againſt him.

Then was Foorth's precedent read, bearing date Mercurii decimo quarto Novembr. termino Mich. 2 Jac. I.

And likewiſe Foorth's two laſt Petitions againſt my Lord-Chancellor, touching which, reference is had. And the Lords asked Mr. Wraynham what he could ſay for himſelf.

Mr. WRAYNHAM.

Right Honourable, and my very good Lords,

FROM a Man ſo perplexed with ſo many miſeries, what can be expected? and what marvel, if I ſhould faulter, or might let fall any ſpeech that might ſeem uncomely?

My Lords, I know not how to behave myſelf, I will not willingly offend any, but eſpecially the King's moſt excellent Majeſty; yet nature commands me to defend myſelf, for it cannot be thought he can be faithful to another, that is not ſo to himſelf. And therefore I humbly deſire, that what I offer in extenuation, or defence, that neither the meaneſt that hear it, nor your Lordſhips, which are to judge of it, would take it offenſively.

My Book conſiſteth of three parts.

Firſt, An Epiſtle to his Majeſty.

Secondly, The body of the book, which relateth the truth of all the proceedings.

And, Thirdly, a concluſive Speech in the nature of an epilogue.

Touching the body of the book, and the truth of the cauſe, I conceive it not now called in queſtion, for I think your Lordſhips will not enter into the particulars; bu becauſe it hath pleaſed Mr. Attorney to ſpeak ſomething of it, I will not be ſilent.

My accuſations, my Lords, are ſet forth in two things: Firſt, That the complaint is of the Right Honourable the Lord-Chancellor. Secondly, That it is in bitter and unreverend terms.

For the firſt, I muſt fly for ſuccour and protection unto our dread ſovereign Lord the King: for it pleaſed his Majeſty, ſitting here in the ſacred Seat of Juſtice, to declare, that if any were wronged in point of Juſtice, to him they might come and have redreſs; and for proof thereof, I humbly deſire your Lordſhips to hear me read a ſentence or two in his Majeſty's Book.

" For, ſaith he, if any were wronged, their " complaint ſhould have come unto me;" none of you but will confeſs you have a King of a reaſonable Underſtanding, &c.

And in another place, " Why then ſhould you " ſpare to complain unto me, being the high-way; " therefore as you come gaping to the Law for " juſtice, &c."

" But if you find bribery or corruption, then " come boldly; but beware of the juſtneſs of your " cauſe."

Firſt, therefore, in his Majeſty's opinion, a man may be wronged in a Court of Juſtice.

Secondly, In that caſe, his Majeſty is not only willing to receive a complaint, but to reform what is amiſs: ſo that his Majeſty publiſhing this much to all his ſubjects, I hope your Lordſhips will not conceive that barely to complain, is a fault; eſpecially ſeeing that his Majeſty ſaith, " Why do " you ſpare to complain?"

The ſecond part of my accuſation is, becauſe I have uſed unreverend and bitter terms.

Firſt, I divided the collections objected againſt me, into two parts.

(1.) Into two Sentences, which Mr. Attorney hath endeavoured to faſten on the Lord-Chancellor by inference.

(2.) Into words, applied to his Lordſhip.

My Lords, Touching the firſt, I hope general ſpeeches ſhall have no ſuch conſtruction.

In the 116th Pſalm, the Prophet ſaith of himſelf; I have ſaid in my fury, all men are lyars. And in the 14th Pſalm, it is ſaid of all men, They have all gone out of the way, and are abominable; there is none that doeth good, no not one. And in the Epiſtle to the Romans, it is ſaid, Let God be juſt, and all men lyars. And again it is ſaid in Scripture, That the poiſon of Aſps is under their lips, that their throats were open ſepulchres. And yet it was never heard, that any of the Prophets and Apoſtles (godly men) found fault with David ſaying, You have ſaid my throat is an open ſepulchre; that I am a lyar; and abominable; becauſe they were but general ſpeeches.

And therefore, my Lords, I humbly pray, that any general ſpeeches may not be applied to my Lord-Chancellor, for I had no ſuch meaning.

For particular words, they are, as I take it, theſe; Unſoundneſs of his Lordſhip's actions, unjuſt proceedings; oppreſſion, and injuſtice.

Now, my Lords, I muſt again fly to the King for ſuccour, in theſe words: for his Majeſty points forth the things for which a ſubject may complain.

For his Majeſty ſaith in his book, "If a man "be wronged in the courſe of Juſtice." What is it but injuſtice?

Secondly, His Majeſty ſaith, "That if one find "bribery, corruption, injuſtice, &c." and then we ſhould come boldly.

Firſt, For the word injuſtice: he that proves the juſtice of his cauſe, proves the judgment given againſt it injuſtice: for, my Lords, I conceive, under your Lordſhips favour, that this very word contains all the reſt, and that all other words that I have uſed, are but ſynonymies unto this; and I uſed them all, yea all, I proteſt, to avoid tautology, and to avoid always the uſing of the ſame word, injuſtice.

And that alſo which urged me to uſe it, was neceſſity; and that twofold neceſſity: Firſt, For that unleſs I particularly accuſed his Lordſhip of injuſtice, I was out of hope ever to obtain an hearing of his Majeſty.

Secondly, My miſeries inforced me unto it: And therefore it may pleaſe your Lordſhips to underſtand, that in my firſt petition to his Majeſty, there was no ſuch word as injuſtice, or that tended near unto it: but only it did ſet forth what the then Maſter of the Rolls, this Lord, and the laſt Lord-Chancellor had done; and deſired his Majeſty to judge, whether the laſt Lord-Chancellor, or the now Lord-Keeper, had moſt juſtly diſtributed juſtice. It pleaſed his Majeſty to give anſwer, "That he would take ſome other courſe, when he "came near London."

When his Majeſty came to Theobalds, I framed two other petitions, and delivered the one to his Majeſty, and the other to Secretary Winwood; and in neither of theſe Petitions was there mention of injuſtice, or a word ſavouring of it.

And when I beſought his Majeſty, at that time, to hear the cauſe, or to refer the examination, he gave me this anſwer: "If myſelf, and the Lords "ſhould trouble themſelves about hearing of Sen-"tences, no other buſineſs would be done by us, "for every man would be ready to complain."

And thus I had fallen off, but that his Majeſty ſaid further unto me, "Will you charge my Lord-"Chancellor with injuſtice, or bribery?" I blanched the matter again, and deſired his Majeſty would be pleaſed to grant me an hearing of the cauſe.

After which, when I had meditated again of his Majeſty's queſtion, I found great coherence between this queſtion and the words in his Majeſty's book, and thereupon was bold to uſe the word injuſtice. Unto which his Majeſty was pleaſed to anſwer, "Theſe accuſations are too too common: but I "will have relation of the cauſe from my Lord "himſelf."

After all this, underſtanding that the Lord-Chancellor had endeavoured to anſwer this matter unto his Majeſty, and to this end had produced the Maſter of the Rolls, Phillips, his report; which, I confeſs, taken by itſelf, may not only ſatisfy my Lord-Chancellor, but the King himſelf, or any man elſe living: and therefore, fearing that my Lord endeavoured to ſatisfy the King with that report, I ſaw there was no other courſe, but to give an anſwer unto it, which I could not do without the book. In making whereof, ſomething was required, both before and after, which drew me to make the Epiſtle and the Epilogue.

In the making whereof, I muſter'd together all my miſeries; I ſaw my Land taken away, which had been before eſtabliſhed unto me; and after ſix and forty Orders, and twelve Reports, made in the Cauſe; nay, after Motions, Hearings, and Rehearings, fourſcore in number, I beheld all overthrown in a moment, and all overthrown without a new bill preferred. I diſcerned the repreſentation of a priſon gaping for me, in which I muſt from thenceforth ſpend all the days of my life without releaſe: for in this ſuit I have ſpent almoſt 3000 l. and many of my friends were ingaged for me, ſome damnified, others undone; and with this, did accompany many eminent miſeries, likely to enſue upon me, my wife, and four children, the eldeſt of which, being but five years old; ſo that we, that did every day formerly give bread to others, muſt now beg bread of others, or elſe ſtarve, which is the miſerableſt of all deaths: and there being no means to move his Majeſty to hear the Cauſe, but to accuſe his Lordſhip of injuſtice; this, and all theſe, moved me to be ſharp and bitter, and to uſe words, tho' dangerous in themſelves, yet I hope pardonable in ſuch extremities.

And now I hope, if this will not acquit me, yet your Honours will be pleaſed to move the King for his gracious pardon: for miſery made patient Job break out and ſwell againſt God himſelf; and therefore, my Lords, how much more may it make me ſo compleatly miſerable, to ſwell and tranſgreſs againſt man!

And if, my good Lords, you ſhould hear all the paſſages of the cauſe, I ſhould the better conceive your Lordſhips will not be troubled with it; and Mr. Attorney hath already ſet it forth in that faſhion, as it makes much againſt me. But if your Lordſhips will vouchſafe me that favour, I hope I ſhall alter, or at leaſt extenuate your Lordſhips opinions in this Cauſe.

In the year 1606, I preferred a bill in Chancery againſt Edward Fiſher, for defrauding me of a Leaſe of ſixty years: Fiſher forſwears the truſt, and preferred another bill againſt me for debts; both bills came to be heard before Kingloſſe: Fiſher offer'd to purchaſe the Leaſe, and the debts were referred to two Maſters. Theſe took great pains concerning the debts; after which, the Lord-Chancellor referred the whole buſineſs to thoſe two Maſters of the Chancery, and then having examined both Truſt and Debts, they report the Truſt proved; and for the Debts, they think fit that I ſhould give Fiſher 2000 Marks, whereof, 500 Marks were for damages. Fiſher, not ſatisfied, moves my Lord-Chancellor to hear the Cauſe himſelf, and this was in 1608; and my Lord, upon an hearing, decreed, with the conſent of Fiſher and his Counſel, that he ſhould aſſure the Land, and I pay 2000 Marks within ſix Months.

After this, my Lord having made this decree by conſent, I ſerved Fiſher with it; but his contempt was ſuch, that after three commiſſions of Rebellion, I was enforced to take a Serjeant at Arms to attach him, and had a Commiſſion awarded to the Sheriff of Norfolk, to put me in poſſeſſion.

Fiſher

Fiſher perceiving that the hiding of his head could not keep me from having poſſeſſion of the Land; takes another courſe by fraudulent conveyances between him and his brother, and others; and in a motion made in the name of Sir Thomas Challoner, (for they lodge the faſt intereſt in him) they inform that this conveyance was before my bill exhibited, and therefore deſire I might be put out of poſſeſſion; and ſo it was ordered, that the poſſeſſion ſhould remain then as it was.

Then I, to diſcover thoſe frauds, preferred a new Bill againſt Fiſher the deceiver, and three others. They in their anſwer ſet forth matter ſufficient to ſhew the fraud. For Sir Thomas ſaith, that this conveyance from Sir Edward his brother, was made and ſealed when he never thought of it; that 1700 l. was to be paid; but yet he never ſaw the Land, he never bargain'd or condition'd for it, but hearing the trouble of it, aſſured it to Richard, the younger ſon of Fiſher, the deceiver: and ſo becauſe he alſo was unable to go on in the purchaſe, he lodged it in the hands of Sir Thomas Challoner.

Hobart, Attorney, informs my Lord-Chancellor of theſe frauds; my Lord gave them a day, to ſhew cauſe why I ſhould not have the Land till they could make better proofs. Then thoſe witneſſes, which were both Fiſher's men, were examined by my Lord-Chancellor in open Court, and one of them ſwears that the conveyance, which muſt defeat the Decree, was ſealed in the Hall; the other ſwears it was done in the Parlour; one, that it was read; the other, that it was not read: the one, that it was ſigned; the other, that it was not ſigned: one ſwears, that Sir Edward Fiſher was preſent; the other, not preſent; and both, that it was done at ſuch a time, when the Deed bears date twelve months after.

Then what remains after all this, but that I ſhould have a confirmation of the old decree, or elſe a new? but I find it true, Nemo læditur niſi à ſeipſo. For then the Lord-Chancellor made a motion, that Fiſher ſhould buy the Land; againſt which, I not gainſaying, his Lordſhip referred the Mediation of the bargain to the Maſter of the Rolls, where it appeared, that Sir Edward Fiſher had made a Leaſe of half the land for 200 l. the year; and therefore it was agreed, that Fiſher ſhould give 2400 l. out of the which, he was to deduct 2000 Marks for his debts, due by the firſt Decree, and the reſidue about 1066 l. I received, becauſe it did not appear what the Lands were worth. A Commiſſion was awarded out to Sir L'Eſtrange Mordant and three others, to find out the true value of the land, and a bargain was not commanded, but propounded by the Court: And I beſeech your Lordſhips to obſerve, that the Maſter of the Rolls being to conſider of all the Examinations, lawfully taken in the Cauſe, nine Witneſſes were taken by the Commiſſion and duly examined; five Witneſſes more were examined in the Examiners-Office, without my privity or conſent, and contrary to an Order in Court: which Witneſſes being examined, ſwore point-blank in all things, and according to thoſe proofs, the Maſter of the Rolls made his Certificate, and found 200 l. a year to be as much as the lands were worth.

Hereupon the Lord-Chancellor gave a day to ſhew cauſe, why the cauſe ſhould not be decreed, which was the Order, quarto Maij, 1610.

After this, the Lord Hobart, then Attorney, in the preſence of the Maſter of the Rolls himſelf, did ſet down the defects of his own Report:

Lord-Treaſurer. My Lords, this is contrary to all courſe, this muſt not be; for we mean not to enter into the merits of the cauſe.

Mr. Attorney Yelverton. Mr. Wraynham, for you to ſhift it off, doth but aggravate your offence; for when you ſay, you uſed the reſt of your phraſes as ſynonymies to injuſtice, that implieth a taxation of his Lordſhip in point of juſtice; and ſo likewiſe do your words imply, when you ſay, by the greatneſs of his wit and eloquence, he doth palliate the injuſtice of the Cauſe: therefore, tax my Lord particularly with one point of injuſtice.

Here Mr. Wraynham would not inſtance in any one particular.

Wraynham. Had I thought his Majeſty would not have heard my cauſe, I would have ſat down in ſilence, and have devoured my ſorrow. I have formerly ſet down to your Lordſhips, that my Decree was reverſed without a bill.

Mr. Attorney. That is, when the bill is abſolute and conſtant, for there it muſt have a bill of revivor; but when it depends upon ſubſequent acts, and is qualified and conditional, there it may be reverſed without bill.

Wraynham. I humbly ſubmit myſelf in all things to your honourable and clement cenſure: for the manner, I beſeech your Lordſhips pardon; and for the matter, I humbly crave compaſſion.

Mr. Serjeant Crew. May it pleaſe your Lordſhips, the Priſoner at the bar hath made a good ſubmiſſion at the laſt, I would he had begun with it.

My Lords, the Flux of foul mouths muſt be ſtopp'd, otherwiſe the greateſt Magiſtrates will be traduced and ſlandered to Majeſty himſelf; and tho' it be not Treaſon, yet I have heard it from a great and honourable Perſon ſitting in this place, that it is, Crimen læſæ Majeſtatis.

My Lords, for the two Lords, the one that lives, the other that is dead, and their demeanor in this caſe, in honour of him that is dead, and without flattery to him that is alive; I ſay, they both judged according to their conſciences.

The Lord-Chancellor that is dead, gave his judgment according to his conſcience, and not according to the conſcience of another man, but according to the integrity of his own heart: for Judges are to judge ſecundum æquum & bonum in foro conſcientiæ. And this Lord alſo judged out of his noble conſcience and integrity of his heart; for, my Lords, there was no binding decree.

As for the merits of the cauſe, it muſt not be examined of the one ſide, nor of the other, for both Lords have done according to conſcience, coram deo & hominibus. And each hath delivered his own ſenſe according to their conſciences.

The Lord which is dead, when he was alive, was one of the oracles of the wiſdom of the time; and my living Lord attributes very much unto him, whom God hath alſo inriched with great ornaments of Nature; for no Man, no Magiſtrate, hears with more attention, nor no Magiſtrate of Juſtice attends with more underſtanding and patience.

You then, Mr. Wraynham, thus to traduce my Lord, is a foul offence, with that black mouth of yours: you cannot traduce him of corruption; for, thanks be to God, he hath always deſpiſed riches, and ſet honour and juſtice before his eyes; and where the Magiſtrate is bribed, it is a ſign of a corrupted eſtate.

For the juſtice of the Cauſe;

My Lords, I was of Counſel with Fiſher, and I knew the merits of the cauſe; for my Lord-Chancellor ſeeing what recompence Fiſher ought in juſtice to have received, and finding a diſability in Wraynham to perform it, was inforced to take the land from Wraynham to give it to Fiſher, which is hardly of value to ſatisfy Fiſher's true debt and damages. And this, my Lords, was the true courſe of it; ſo it ſtands upon theſe parts your Lordſhips have heard.

I am glad at laſt, to hear Mr. Wraynham's ſubmiſſion, and do humbly crave your Lordſhips cenſure.

Sir Edward Coke. The cauſe before you, my Lords, is a very great cauſe, for a man muſt tread in this courſe upon a very ſlender bridge: I will ſingle out, as near as I can, the ſtate of the queſtion, and then I will ſhew you in others, upon what words, and in what I ſhall ground my ſentence: for a complaint to the King's Majeſty, or a petition by any man that thinks himſelf wrong'd, I hold that regularly to be no offence. God forbid it ſhould be ſo: I can make no hedge between the Sovereign and the Subject; nay, in ſome Kingdoms, Querelas ſubditorum detrahere in principe deferentur capitale eſt: And that would be a derogation from a Monarch, that no ſubject ſhould complain unto him; yet upon the Statute of Weſtminſter, and at Common-Law, I make no queſtion but to ſhew you, that where petitions were made to the King in an unfit manner, they have been ſeverely puniſhed. Our caſe is now particularly in a ſentence given by my Lord-Chancellor, an eminent Judge in this Court, and a ſole Judge in the higheſt Court of Equity that is in this Kingdom; yea, this caſe is after ſentence, and againſt the ſentence, and with many ſuch ſcandalous and opprobrious terms againſt ſo high a Judge; and that not in paper, but in a book preſented to the King: this book in my hand, which the King hath delivered to the Attorney-General, that it might come before us for due puniſhment. Whether this book be juſtifiable, or no; that is the queſtion.

It is a black book, Eſt jam conveniens luctibus iſte color. And it is a ſtrange book for ſome things that I will ſhew you, for it is no petition; and yet I will confirm every word I ſay, by ancient and modern authorities; whereof, I am ſorry, very ſorry in good faith, for the excellent and worthy parts that are in you, Mr. Wraynham. Now mark your own words in your book; you call it a Review, or Revivor of the Report of the Maſter of the Rolls, Phillips, and the Decree of my Lord-Chancellor: the high Commiſſioners have ſometimes a commiſſion of Review, but it is very rare; and that is a Commiſſion of Grace, not of Right: ſuch a Review is preſented unto his Majeſty by Wraynham, in which he deals not like a petitioner, but like a cenſurer, cenſuring every man that deals in the cauſe.

Mark how the Common-Law ſets forth a Petitioner: It gives no ill words, it toucheth not men of injuſtice; for take this from me, that what grief ſoever a man hath, ill words work no good; and learned Counſel never uſe them.

And therefore the petitioner at the Common-Law, is, Si placet majeſtati, &c. & quod juſtitia & rectum fiat, &c. Now in your petition, ſee whether you have behaved yourſelf well: Firſt, you make your major propoſition; The unjuſt ſentence of a Judge, is far worſe than a particular murder: then your minor is, That my Lord-Chancellor hath ſatisfied his Majeſty, that I have informed him falſely; but his Majeſty knoweth, that he that judgeth unjuſtly, muſt, to maintain it, ſpeak untruly; and that your Lordſhips and all Logicians know, the concluſion followeth neceſſarily.

Firſt, he chargeth my Lord-Chancellor with injuſtice, not complaining of any particular to be referred to examination: but ſaith in general, "He "hath done unjuſtly, and is worſe than a mur-"derer; and that he hath informed the King "falſely."

My Lords, You know, if a man put falſe metal into the King's Coin, it is Treaſon; and if my Lord-Chancellor ſhall infuſe poiſon and falſe information into the King's ear, it was an heinous offence. Yet, this contents not Wraynham; but he flieth at all, ſaying, "That the height of autho-"rity maketh Men preſume." And hath a place of ſcripture in his Book, Woe be to them that write wicked Decrees: and in another place, he ſaith, "Oppreſſion is palliated with wit and eloquence."

My Lords, Ought theſe things to be in a petitioner? a petitioner muſt go meekly and humbly to work, without ſhew of touch of any man.

I will not omit a dead man; for, tho' ſpoken of him, it is a living fault.

As for this Maſter of the Rolls, never man in England was more excellent for the Chancery than that man; and for ought I heard, (that had reaſon to hear ſomething of him) I never heard him taxed of corruption, being a man of excellent dexterity, diligent, early in the morning, ready to do Juſtice: for him to be taxed in ſuch a high degree, as to omit ſome of the material proofs, to ſhift off others, to wreſt the equity of the cauſe, and ſuch like: and in another place, "That the Maſter of the Rolls "made an unjuſt and corrupt gloſs upon a falſe "text, &c." And in another place, he ſaith, "That Sir Edward Phillips's report was raiſed ab "inferno."

My Lords, You know that the ſlander of a dead man is puniſhable in this Court, as Lewis Pickering is able to tell you, whom I cauſed here to be cenſured for a ſlander againſt an Archbiſhop that is dead; for Juſtice lives, though the party be dead: and ſuch ſlanders do wrong the living poſterity and alliance of the man deceaſed.

But Mr. Wraynham ſpares not the King himſelf; for in one place of his Book, he ſaith, aſſurgat Rex, &c. as if the King ſlept. And in another place, he ſaith, "That the Decree is reverſed without pre-"cedent." But that is not ſo, as I will ſatisfy you anon.

For Mr. Wraynham's cenſure, I will never judge a man without authority and reaſon. 18 E. 1. in Rotulo Parliament. 3. my Lord-Abbot there complained that Solomon of Wragg, and Hugh Courtney then Chief-Juſtice, had confederated to give judgment againſt the Abbot. And the King anſwered, "Shall we, upon this petition, call a judgment in "queſtion?" And in the end, the anſwer is, Rex rogabit, & aliter facere non poteſt per legem terræ. And my Lord-Abbot, becauſe he was a Lord, eſcaped puniſhment at that time.

Another precedent I will ſhew you, is, Mich. 18 E. 3. Rot. 151. coram Rege. Thomas Wilbraham petitioned againſt the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, "That they had not done according to "law and reaſon." And the petition was delivered to the repreſentative body of the King and his Council;

Council; for the which the ſaid Wilbraham was indicted, convicted, fined, and ranſomed in the King's-Bench.

19 Aſſ. p. 3. Between Sir William Scott and Humphrey Hunney, who complain'd to King Edw. III. "That Sir William Scott, Chief-Juſtice, had awar-"ded an aſſize contrary to law." And the King ſent it to the Judges; whereupon Hunney was impriſoned, judged, fined, and ranſomed: yet he had no remedy but in Parliament.

The Statute hath made a ſharp law againſt ſuch as ſpeak ſcandalous news of the Chancellor, Juſtice of the King's-Bench, &c. And becauſe divers were puniſhed for ſlanders, in petitions to his Majeſty; therefore, 13 R. II. Rot. Parl. numb. 45. the Commons deſired they might not be troubled for any matter that ſhould be contained in petitions to the King: and the King anſwered, "Let every "man complain, ſo it be with law and reaſon."

Wraynham objected a place of ſcripture for himſelf, where the Pſalmiſt ſaith, I have ſaid in my fury that all men are lyars. The text is, Dixi in exceſſu: ſo Wraynham ſaith, "It was not in his fury, "but in his exceſs."

And another thing that Wraynham offered in his defence, was the King's words, where he ſaith, in his Book, Be bold to complain. But of what? of corruption? So likewiſe in Rot. Parl. 24 Edw. III. Parl. 3. numb. 16. If any man mix corruption with his cenſures, Anathema ſit. So likewiſe it is extant in the Rolls of the Parliament de la plbe, that the great de la Pole was convicted of bribery, and put from his place; and Cardinal Wolſey was convicted of a foul corruption.

But if a man, according to ſincerity, give judgment, though he differ from another Judge, this is no Injuſtice. Famous Dyer gave judgment in the Common-Pleas, and this was reverſed in the King's-Bench; yet he diſcharged his conſcience: and altho' it was afterwards reverſed, yet it was no Injuſtice. The like inſtance might be made of Sir Chriſtopher Wray, and others. Now, in this caſe, my Lord-Chancellor that is living, differs from the Lord-Chancellor that is dead. This is not ſtrange, it hath ever been, and ever will be; but if a Judge's conſcience be oiled, and moiſten'd with corruption, then all is nought.

The King hath the pleas of the Crown, and upon every judgment, one of the parties is angry and diſpleaſed: But this muſt not preſently produce a new hearing, for that will hinder all other buſineſſes. For I will put you a great caſe between a Nobleman here, and divers other Noblemen that were truſted by the Counteſs of Southampton, who were all Plaintiffs, and Sir Moyle Finch Defendant: and this was, Mich. 42 & 43 Eliz. The main point that was controverted in the cauſe, was upon an exception of a Mannor (as I remember) in the Habendum of the deed, which my Lord-Chancellor then thought void. And therefore decreed, "That my Lady "of Southampton ſhould have all." Whereupon Sir Moyle Finch petitioned Queen Elizabeth, that ſhe ſhould refer the examination of the Decree to ſome of the Judges; but the Queen would never refer any thing to thoſe that were named unto her, but ſhe referred it to two other Judges not named in the petition, who attended my Lord-Chancellor; and they then reſolved it againſt the Decree, and my Lord reverſed his own Decree.

I know I have held your Lordſhips long; yet I cannot tell, in theſe critical days, whether men will be ſatisfied, which hath made me longer than I would have been. Therefore, to conclude, I agree, in all things, with the ſentence given in Foorth's caſe of 2 Jac.

Sir Folke Grevill, Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Court hath no intent to diſcourage the meaneſt ſubject of his lawful appeal unto his Prince; for that were to diſinherit the people of law, and the King of the intelligence of the oppreſſion that might fall upon his people.

But this caſe I ſuppoſe not to be within the firſt. The matter in ſuch caſes, is but a review of an inferiour ſentence of a ſuperiour Magiſtrate, my Lord-Chancellor of England: and that before he be heard, making the King his ſpeedy executioner.

But examine the nature of theſe accuſations, and you ſhall find them mere ſcandals, and impoſſibilities; as breaking Decrees, rewarding frauds and perjuries, palliating oppreſſions with greatneſs, wit, and eloquence.

Why, my Lords, if this liberty ſhould ſpread, then I deſire the indifferent hearers to ſee in what a miſerable caſe the ſubject ſtands, when the right of every good man ſhall ſtand in the malignity, and unquiet nature of every turbulent ſpirit? And, my Lords the Judges, in what a caſe ſtand they, if by ſuch clamours every delinquent ſhall be made Judge over them? and what privilege ſhall the King my Maſter have? for if this humour ſhould take a little head, will it not carry both him and Juſtice into the field? And therefore I conclude, that this is ſeverely to be puniſhed; and is not a petition, but a preſumptuous challenge, and of ſo far a worſe nature beyond duels, as honour and univerſal Juſtice is beyond particular right? And therefore I agree with him that went before me, leaving his good parts to mercy, and his ill parts to the cenſure of Foorth's caſe.

Lord Chief-Baron, Sir Laurence Tanfield. This cauſe is a cauſe of a high nature, being a ſcandal of a great and principal Officer of the Kingdom, and of one that is an high and eminent perſon: which ſcandal is ſet forth in this Book, which certainly I cannot call a petition; for the petitioner hath preſumed too far, that it is a plain reviſe of a Decree. Every man knoweth, that the Chancellor hath the keeping of the Great Seal, whereby is managed Mercy and Juſtice: and if this great perſon ſo truſted ſhall be thus traduced by every offender, how inſufferable will this miſchief be?

I doubt not but that by a right way, you may, by a petition in an humble courſe, and ſubmiſſive manner, deſire his Majeſty that he would be pleaſed to review a ſentence in Chancery, or elſe grant a commiſſion to others to review the ſame. But doth this man obſerve this courſe? no, but he will be his own Judge, ſentencing his own cauſe. I can call this Book no better, than a ſcandalous and malicious Invective againſt the Lord-Chancellor; and that not without great bitterneſs, as I have heard.

Firſt, He taxeth him with Injuſtice: then mark the circumſtances; he ſaith, "My Lord-Chancellor "hath reverſed the Decree, without cauſe, without "new matter, without legal proceeding, without "precedent, and upon a bare ſuggeſtion."

Then he goeth further, ſaying, "Injuſtice is "worſe than murder; for this Decree hath devour-"ed him, and his whole family."

And, not content with this, chargeth him with oppreſſion, and palliating it with greatneſs, wit, and and eloquence; than which, a greater and heavier ſcandal cannot be!

You ſhall not be barred of acceſs to his Majeſty; but that by a petition you may deſire to have a Decree reviewed, and that his Majeſty would grant a commiſſion to review it. But theſe things muſt be done legally, and then the law protects us, tho' it be againſt a Nobleman. Sir Richard Crofts did ſue an action for forgery of falſe deeds againſt the Lord Beauchamp; whereupon my Lord Beauchamp ſued an action upon the Statute de Scand. Magnat. But that would bear no action, becauſe it was done legally: for a man may ſuppoſe in his Writ ſuch a fact, by the uſe of the ſaid Writ; but he muſt beware that he prove it well, or elſe he ſhall be well fined in the ſame Court. But much more ſhall he deſerve a fine, if he ſhall do it without Writ, or without ground or proof, as Wraynham hath done.

And therefore, becauſe I muſt be ſhort, I think him fully worthy of the cenſure before given, in all points.

Lord Hobart, Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas. Mr. Attorney hath very worthily and like himſelf, according to his place, brought this man into this Court, to give anſwer for the greateſt and moſt outrageous offence, that of this kind hath been committed; in which caſe, I will firſt tell you, what I do not queſtion, and then what I do queſtion.

For the firſt, Petitions may be exhibited to the King without controverſy, nay, in ſome caſes they muſt be exhibited; and God forbid, that any man's way ſhou'd be lock'd up, or that any ſubject ſhou'd be barred of acceſs to his Majeſty; for when appeals fail, and when ordinary remedy is wanting, ſo that there is no Judge above the higheſt Judge; yet, you may ſtill reſort unto your Sovereign for extreme remedy: this is proper to a King, Ceſſas regnare, ſi ceſſas judicare; for it is an inherent quality to his Crown. So that without controverſy a man may petition againſt a ſentence, for God forbid, that we that are Judges, ſhou'd draw that privilege to ourſelves, to give ſentence, and not to hear it examin'd. But it is true, it muſt be preſented as a ſupplication, and you muſt go formally to work: ordinarily you muſt go to the proper Courts of Juſtice; if that fails, the extraordinary courſe is open by the King: and this is no more than to ſhew to his Majeſty, how you find yourſelf grieved, and then remit the cauſe and form to the King's wiſdom.

But now ſee what this man hath done, he hath made neither the matter nor form of a petition.

Firſt for matter, he pretends, that is not ſaying that my Lord-Chancellor hath expreſly infringed two Decrees, when he hath done nothing only croſſed an order, than which, there is nothing more common, for they are but interlocutory, and not definitive.

And for form, this is no Petition, no Book, as he wou'd call it, but an expreſs, peremptory and audacious libel. Then the manner offends yet more: for whereas, a ſupplication imports, that a man ſhou'd ſpeak it upon his knees, for as it is in ſome Realms, men attempt nothing againſt law, but they muſt do it with a rope about their necks; ſo that he that goeth about to attempt any thing againſt a Decree, he doth it with a rope of the King's cenſure about his neck: but mark the carriage of this man, how inſolently he proceeds in this caſe!

Firſt, for the King, as he hath been well obſerved, he ſaith, aſſurgat Rex; as if he ſhou'd bid the King ariſe and take revenge.

Therefore for the Decree, he ſaith, that the foundation of it came from hell; if that be ſo, then this ſentence muſt needs be helliſh, when he falls upon a poor man, the Maſter of the Rolls: I call him poor man, becauſe he is not living to anſwer for himſelf, but yet he was a worthy Miniſter of Juſtice, (for I had much cauſe to know him) and he was of as much dexterity and integrity, as ever man that ſat in his place, and I believe the Chancery will find want of ſuch a man. But not content with this, he ſcorns my Lord-Chancellor's courteſies, and carries himſelf, as if he wou'd trample all under foot.

So much for the manner: as for the matter, it is odious; the perſon with whom he hath to do, is the principal Officer and Magiſtrate of Juſtice in the Kingdom, one that hath the nomination of all the Juſtices of Peace, and the principal that names all the Sheriffs; one that keeps and carries the Seal, and ſits chief Judge in this Court, and ſole Judge in the Chancery.

And ſhall we think that this man is bought and ſold to Corruption, to Injuſtice, to Murder? What more tends to the King's diſhonour, than that he ſhou'd place in the Judicature ſuch an unworthy man? a man infinitely the more wrong'd, becauſe he deſerves his place, as well as any man that went before him; and yet his laſt Predeceſſor was very excellent, and deſerv'd no ſmall commendations. But Wraynham I condemn, as a man barbarous both toward the living and the dead; wherefore, there is a juſtice and tribute due to the Maſter of the Rolls deceaſed. I wou'd have mention made of it in the Decree, and with that addition to the ſentence, I concur in all things with the Preſident of the Court.

Sir Edward Mountague, Lord Chief-Juſtice. My Lords, it is a true ſaying, Judicium non redditur niſi in invitum. For I yet, never ſaw any man ſit down ſatisfied with a ſentence that went againſt him.

I wou'd not ſo far have blamed Wraynham as to have cenſur'd him for complaining to the King; yet this reſtraint I find in law, which any man may ſee in King Edgar's laws. "Let no man complain "to the King in matters of variance, except he "cannot have right at home, or that right be too "heavy for him. Then let him complain to the "King." Whereby it is meant, that if the laws be ſo ſtrict, he ſhall complain in a Court of Equity to the King himſelf. Then, to complain is not deny'd to any man, for all Juſtice comes from the King, and though he diſtribute his Juſtice to be miniſtred in ſeveral Courts, yet the primitive power reſides ſtill in his perſon. Therefore, to the Juſtice of his Majeſty, may any ſubject have reſort; but this muſt be humbly as a Petitioner, not as Mr. Wraynham hath done here, who is not a ſuitor, but a cenſurer; and doth not complain, but proudly rails upon a high Judge.

Can you, Mr. Wraynham, charge your Judge with corruption, through fear or affection? (for I make them both alike:) Spare not the chief Judge nor higheſt Counſellor, I ſay, ſpare us not, whenever you can take us. But a judgment is pronounced from the ſincerity of our conſciences, and warranted ranted by our judgment and learning: ſhall we then undergo the cenſure of every ſuitor? no State, at no time, ever ſuffer'd this.

My Lords, it lies upon us Judges as a duty, to reſtrain this boldneſs; our places as Judges, give us no privileges to do what we liſt, nor have ſuitors liberty to ſpeak as they liſt of Judges: God, and Order, hath ſet bounds to both.

For the matter heretofore handled in the Chancery, it is not a work of this day to deal with that; we meddle not with your Decrees, we cenſure you only for your ſcandals. I ſaw in your Book a ſmooth Pen, and from your Tongue I have heard fair ſpeeches; but in both I ſee a fiery ſpirit.

For you wou'd raiſe up diſſenſion between the two Lord-Keepers of the King's conſcience, him that now is, and him that was, and now is with God: of theſe two Worthies I ſhall not ſay much, I will neither wrong the dead, nor flatter the living. The matter of difference, for any thing I can ſee, or you can ſay, is but an order againſt an order, wherein judgment may be varied by occaſions, and through circumſtances; true attributes are no flatteries.

This honour let me give to theſe two great men of greater parts; better fitted for that place, never ſat in this place: nay, a man may truly ſay, that the World hath ſcarce yielded two ſuch men of ſo excellent gifts, in this latter age of the World.

But you, Mr. Wraynham, wronged both the living and the dead. Of the Maſter of the Rolls that is dead, you ſpake your pleaſure: but all that hear you, and know him, will be ready to give you the lye. You ſay that he ſhould omit ſome of the proofs, and wreſt other-ſome, and ground himſelf upon Witneſſes that ſwore impoſſibilities, and abſurdities, &c. Who ever knew that man, knows him to be a true Reporter, and a judicious Collector upon proofs, as ever was. I will not diſſemble what others thought a fault in him, to be overſwift in judging: but this was the error of his greater experience, and riper judgment, than others had.

Now, for my Lord-Chancellor, by the words you uſe, you lay four of the greateſt Crimes upon him, that can be laid upon a Judge; Preſumption, Oppreſſion, Falſity, and Injuſtice: all theſe you utter, with one breath, charging him with all in one ſentence: for you ſay, "Height of Authority "makes great Men preſume:" there is preſumption and oppreſſion. And in theſe words, "He that "judges unjuſtly, muſt, to maintain it, ſpeak un-"truly:" there you accuſe him of falſity and injuſtice.

Ex ore tuo te judico, ſerve nequam. For in your book you ſay, "Let me ſuffer as a Traitor, if all "that I ſay prove not an intire truth, if I ſhould "dare to ſlander ſo great a Judge to ſo wiſe a King." Therefore, out of your own mouth, I pronounce ſentence againſt you, læſæ Majeſtatis: and tho' not as a Traitor, yet as a great ſcandalizer. And if all were true that is ſaid in your book, yet would I cenſure you for your quarrel with my Lord-Chancellor for form, and yet yourſelf uſe no form, no, not common civility. So that if it were againſt a common man, it were puniſhable, to offer ſuch words to the eye of a King, as here you give to my Lord-Chancellor, calling him a rewarder of frauds and perjuries, an afflicter of the afflicted, a racker of things out of joint, a confounder of your eſtate, and the like.

Theſe are not words fitting a Petitioner, to be ſpoken of a Lord-Chancellor, to be offered to a King.

And, my Lords, this man's fault goeth one ſtep higher, touching the Perſon of Majeſty itſelf. I am a Judge of Crown-matters; and in this Libel, I think he hath ſcandalized the King in four things.

Firſt, he ſaith, "The King is but a Man, and "ſo may err;" implying an error in the King.

Secondly, "That my Lord-Chancellor defends him-"ſelf by ſecret means, and that you are not called "to anſwer." Than which, what greater tax "unto ſo high a Majeſty, to condemn and not to "hear!

Thirdly, "That my Lord-Chancellor doth co-"ver his injuſtice with wit and eloquence." When we all know, that we have a Sovereign of thoſe high and excellent gifts, that it is not rhetorick, or eloquence, that can caſt duſt in the King's eyes, or cauſe him any ways to turn aſide from juſtice.

Laſtly, you ſay, "That a man may diſtaſte truth, and ſuſpect judgment;" applying it unto his Majeſty. Which offences reaching ſo high, my cenſure ſhall be the heavier upon you.

Now it will reſt, what ſhall be done with this man? As I give my ſentence from his own mouth, ſo will I take advice from himſelf; he ſaith, State ſuper viis antiquis, look what our anceſtors have done of old, ſo let us do. In this, then you ſhall ſee what they did in like caſes.

Mich. 13. of the Queen, Rot. 39. Henry Blaunſford, a Counſellor at Law, was committed to the Fleet, and fined, for falſe reporting the opinion of the Lord Leiceſter, and Secretary Cecil, with theſe words, Humanum eſt errare.

So likewiſe, 19 Hen. VIII. my Lord Stourton was committed by the Court, and fined, for ſaying theſe words: "I am ſorry to ſee Rhetorick rule "where Law ſhould."

Sir Rowland Flaxing was committed, and fined, for reporting to the King, "That he could have "no indifferency before the Lords of the Council:" For which he was deeply fined, 7 Feb. 18 H. VIII.

So likewiſe, in the time of Hen. VII. Sir Richard Terres was committed, fined, ſent to the Pillory, and adjudged to loſe both his ears for his ſlanderous complaint exhibited to the King in a written Book. And that againſt the Chief-Juſtice Fitz-James; the puniſhment of him that depraved the good Judge Sir James Dyer, is freſh in memory.

So that party which ſaid Judge Catlyne was an unjuſt Judge, 8 Eliz. Rot. 10. whoſe name was Thomas Welch, of London, who was indicted in the King's-Bench for this, as for an offence againſt the Common Law. His words that were deliver'd, were theſe: "My Lord Chief-Juſtice Catlyne is in-"cenſed againſt me, I cannot have Juſtice, nor can "be heard; for that Court now is made a Court "of Conſcience." This Indictment was found, and the record was, that it was in magnum contempt. Dominæ Reginæ ac cur' ſuæ, ac in magn' ſcandalum, ac ignominiam legis Angliæ, ac in ſcandalum capitalis Juſt. ac in malum exemplum omnium ſubditorum.

So it is that this offence of Wraynham's is againſt the Law, the Commonwealth, and the Juſtice of the Kingdom; and therefore, according to the laſt judgment in law, and with the ſentence that was pronounced againſt Foorth, I concur and pronounce the ſame againſt Wraynham in all things. And this right I would have done to the Lord-Chancellor living, ving, the Lord-Chancellor and Maſter of the Rolls that are dead, that thoſe things be fitly expreſſed to their honours, in the drawing up of the Decree.

Sir Thomas Lake, principal Secretary. My Lords, If I had been the firſt that had ſpoken in this caſe, I ſhould have thought it the greateſt difficulty how to walk evenly between the not diſcouraging the King's ſubjects, and in judging the priſoner at the bar.

But for that, my Lords before me have ſo well ſpoken, that no man may be diſcouraged to come to his Majeſty in a diſcreet manner: And very good learning hath been deliver'd by all my Lords the Judges, ſuch as may ſatisfy every man; yea, and not ſatisfy only, but direct them what to do in ſuch caſes: therefore I may be the ſhorter.

I will not be long in ſpeaking of the honour due unto Magiſtrates; he that wades into that, ſhall have little of his own invention: nor of the offence that is now before us; for the King's Counſel hath ſo fully and perfectly deliver'd it, that perhaps by this time, he knows his own error. And my Lords the Judges have made it appear ſo, whereby I think it as great an offence, as ever was in this nature: and much more deſerveth puniſhment, becauſe it is againſt a man no leſs eminent in virtue, than in place.

Three things the Priſoner urgeth for himſelf.

Firſt, For the word Injuſtice, he ſaith, "That "admitting the thing were unjuſt, then he might "call it unjuſt."

But I anſwer, for a private man to call a publick ſentence, Injuſtice, herein he ſheweth his error.

Secondly, He urgeth, that it cauſeth a great loſs unto him, and therefore he would be the rather excuſed.

It is true, I think that men, by ſentence, have loſs, for Judicium redditur in invitum; but tho' it be a loſs, it is Damnum abſque injuria.

Thirdly, He went the wiſer way, when he urgeth commiſeration unto us. For my own part, I could commiſerate the man, but I commiſerate the Commonwealth much more; for if this ſhould be ſuffer'd, tumults, and a multitude of other inconveniences would ariſe. And therefore I judge him, as the reſt have done before me.

Sir Henry Cary, Comptroller. My Lords before me have ſpoken ſo much, that I ſhall not need to ſpeak, neither do I make any ſcruple of the ſaid ſentence.

When I conſider how foully this man hath behaved himſelf, in Scandal and Invectives againſt ſo high a Magiſtrate, I muſt concur with the reſt of the Lords that have gone before me.

Biſhop of Ely, Dr. Lancelot Andrews. Tho' the ground of the complaint had been juſt, yet I believe, my Lords the Judges, that the complaint being in ſo foul a manner, againſt ſo great a perſon, in ſo high a place, deſerves ſharp puniſhment: and therefore I agree with the former ſentence.

Biſhop of London, Dr. John King. I ſhall borrow a phraſe of him, though ſpoke to another purpoſe: "That in a Senate, where many aſſiſtants "were, after two or three have well ſpoken, and "well agitated a cauſe, there is required nothing of "the reſt, but their aſſent."

It is a worthy ſaying, but when I find here before me an honourable perſon, foully and deſpightfully ſpoke againſt, being one of the three vital parts of this Court, and without which, it cannot have its ſubſiſtence; and of the three vital parts, the principal, and alſo a Judge of another Court: and, (as I learned of my Lords the Judges) of ſuch a temporal Court, where if the edge of the law be too keen, the equity of the Chancery doth abate it:

In regard of this duty, it becometh me to ſpeak, and becauſe the party wrong'd is a great Counſellor and Officer of the State.

The firſt thing I ſay and lay hold of, is this, intereſt reipublicæ, it ſtands not with the honour of the King, with the ſafety and peace of the Kingdom, nor with the quiet of his Majeſty, that Counſellors of State, and Judges in the Seat of Juſtice and Conſcience, ſhou'd be depraved, anima & vita regnorum authoritas, take it away from the Magiſtrate of State, take it away from the King himſelf, & ſubverſa jacet priſtina ſedes ſoliorum.

For the place wherein this honourable perſon ſits, is great, between blood and blood, plea and plea, plague and plague, for the Judge ſhall end the controverſy.

So that the firſt leſſon which I ſhall make, is that which Cambyſes made to another, memento ex quo loco, they ſit in God's ſeat, and execute his, and not their own judgments: It is their art, their faculty, their profeſſion, their learning to judge, and it is not open to every man, but it is peregrina & unuſquiſque in arte ſua artifex; and therefore, for mine own part, I ſhall ever bend the beſt of my thoughts, the favourableſt of my wiſhes, and the moſt of my prayers, that ſitting in ſeats as they do, they may judge as they ought.

I know, that while they carry fleſh about 'em, their faculties and judgments will be unperfect; they are but men, & ſcientia juris infinita: ſo that I know not (amongſt the number of mortal wights) that man that can conceive every particularity of the law.

No marvel then, if one Judge differ from another, when the ſame man differs from himſelf; Socrates puer differt a Socrate ſene. And though the Judges walk not in the ſame way, they tend to the ſame end; and though there be not idem curſus, yet there is the ſame, idem portus, & non mutant, ſed aptant legem, according as the matter comes before them is varied, ſhaped, and faſhion'd.

It is unreaſonable then to complain of a Judge, or unuſual to go to the King with complaints, nay, it muſt be done, with calamo & atramento temperato; and it muſt be done, libello ſupplici, non famoſo, not as a ſycophant and ſlanderer, but as a ſupplicant with a petition; not with a petulant invective declamation againſt a perſon of ſo great and honourable a place. This is a fact ſo unnatural, and unlawful, that all laws are broke both of God and Nations, and civility, and good manners, and all; nay, I know not how the laws of ſpeech are kept, they are but three, quid, de quo, cuique, the matter foul ſpoken of ſo honourable a perſon, and to ſo tranſcendant a Magiſtrate.

Wraynham is a man, that did not only curſe in the bitterneſs of his ſoul, but he comes in Amaritudine linguæ & chartæ. It is not fit, God gives not bleſſing to theſe hiſtrices and porcupine quills: it ſhoots far, it enters deep, it wounds ſore, it is not to be tolerated!

Let him keep his poiſon in his ſurmatico and invective Book.

Wherein

Wherein, let me add for my laſt, the manner of preſenting it, the writing itſelf; and then withal the defence now made, which, when I heard it, I was more offended than with the Book itſelf; and I may juſtly make a queſtion, whether, he were more fooliſh in writing it, or more vain in defending it?

His defence is a two-fold neceſſity: firſt, a neceſſity to induce the King to hear him; like Abſalom, that wou'd needs ſet Tobias's fields on fire, to get his ear.

The other, a neceſſity of Eſtate, proceeding out of the laws of neceſſity; Græviſſimi ſunt morſus irritatæ neceſſitatis. One part of ſpeech was general; in that, he meant not my Lord-Chancellor: but in the general there is a major, and in the particular there is the application; and then, every man can make the concluſion, as hath been well obſerved by Sir Edward Coke.

You are a man of a private and profane ſpirit, and if you know not of what ſpirit you are, I can teach you; I ſay, of that ſpirit, that you compare yourſelf with Apoſtles and Prophets, and you miſapply ſcripture, your dixi in exceſſu & trepidatione, ſheweth a difference between ſinning upon paſſion, and deliberation. It comes fully home into your own boſom, & pulchrum patet guttur in ore.

The beſt part of this anſwer, was the laſt, and I wou'd it had been all in all; and ſo I agree with the ſentence given before me.

Viſcount Wallingford. I am ſorry a man ſhou'd deſerve ſo great a cenſure, as this man's foul fault will make; yet I am very glad in this bold and quick-ſighted age, that other men, by his example, might take heed, not to exceed the bounds of modeſty.

This humour, it ſeemeth ſelf-love (which believes nothing but itſelf) hath begot that, that hath bred this Gentleman up ſo unmannerly, that he ſpares not to accuſe the higheſt and greateſt Judge of the Kingdom, of Oppreſſion, Injuſtice, Murder, nay, of any thing; which is not only ſpoken by ſo ill a tongue, but aggravated by his anſwer.

For it ſeems, he wou'd encourage other men by the King's Book to do the like, wherein we may ſee the malice of this man, that will get poiſon from the faireſt flower; yet every ſubject may take comfort in his Majeſty's Book, and God forbid, that he which is wrong'd, ſhou'd be reſtrained to complain to his Sovereign; yet, this complaint is no Petition, but a very Libel, and deſerves no better name.

The King's will is, that you ſhould be bold, and that you ſhould come to him; but yet you muſt be ſure, that your cauſe muſt be juſt and right. This is a good and gracious ſpeech of a King; but 'tis pity Mr. Wraynham alledges Scripture to maintain an ill cauſe: and I do clear my Lord-Chancellor dead, and alive, to be as worthy men as any in my time, and yet I have lived a long age; and God forbid their Conſciences ſhou'd be led by private mens humours.

I ſay no more, but let every man that hears us this day, take heed, that their humours lead them not into theſe outrageous courſes, but carry themſelves with modeſty. I ſhall not need to inlarge, but conſent with my Lords before me.

Earl of Arundel. I ſhall not need to uſe many words for the matter; in brief, Wraynham hath forgot himſelf foully againſt a great and high inſtrument of Juſtice, renewing complaints upon complaints; after the King had told him in my hearing, that the Lord-Chancellor had done juſtly, as he himſelf would have done; and therefore I think him very much to blame, and well deſerving the cenſure given. And the uſe is (as you ſee by him) for malicious men not to ſuck honey, but venom and poiſon out of the wholeſome flowers: as his preſumpuion is to be hated, ſo his humiliation and ſubmiſſion is to be pitied; yet I agree with my Lords in all things.

Pembroke, Lord-Chamberlain. No man's mouth is ſo ſtopp'd, but in caſe of grief he may ſeek redreſs. I think there is little ſcruple, that either the Maſter of the Rolls that is dead, or this Lord-Chancellor that is living, did proceed without Juſtice; becauſe it is but an order againſt an order, a thing very frequent and uſual in this, and in all other arbitrary Courts.

For the ſentence, I agree with the Court, being ſorry, ſince his laſt ſubmiſſion was humble, that before he hath abuſed this good part, and uſed his wit to his own confuſion.

Duke of Lenox. I am ſorry that Wraynham hath not the grace of God, to make uſe of his Majeſty's Book, which is not to complain without juſt cauſe; and without he cou'd make proof of his complaint. I will not repeat the worth of my Lord-Chancellor living, nor dead: but I am ſorry that a man of ſo great parts, ſhou'd deſerve ſo heavy a ſentence, whereunto, in all things I agree.

Worceſter, Lord Privy-Seal. My Lords, I am of opinion, as formerly my Lords have been; I do hold this a very ſcandalous Libel, being againſt a perſon of ſuch worth; the greater the perſon is, the more ſevere ſhou'd the puniſhment be for the offender: and ſo I concur in opinion with my Lords before me, and do think this offence to have exceeded his puniſhment; and therefore if a great fine had been laid upon him, I ſhou'd have agreed unto it.

Abbot, Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The Lord, the fountain of wiſdom, hath ſet this glorious work of the World in the order and beauty wherein it ſtands, and hath appointed Princes, Magiſtrates, and Judges to hear the cauſes of the people, not ſo much out of authority, as out of juſtice and reaſon: for if no ſuch perſons were to hear and determine other mens cauſes, every man muſt be his own Judge, which wou'd tend to nothing but ruin and prepoſterous confuſion: God therefore, in his wiſdom, order'd and ordain'd their bounds, in the Magiſtrate on the one ſide with inſtruction, and the Subject on the other ſide with protection; which inſtruction when he ſhewed them, the King's Throne is upheld by Juſtice: and David was commanded to rule his people with juſtice and judgment; and the like commandment is given to others in ſubordinate places, not to pity the perſon of the poor, nor to ſtand in awe of the face of the mightieſt: but to weigh the ſimplicity and integrity of Conſcience. For mark the examples of the moſt holy and reverend Judges, Moſes, Samuel, and the reſt, to whom their greateſt comfort was, that they cou'd ſay, Whoſe Ox or Aſs have I taken? From whom have I received a reward? And by the courſe of piety and divinity, we that ſit ſometimes to judge others, are at another time to ſtand at an highert bar, to receive judgment from Heaven.

With the great grace, and benefit of protection, God calls them by his own name, Gods, children of the higheſt; God being preſent amongſt 'em to direct them, and defend them; God ſtandeth in the congregation of Princes, he is amongſt all the people: thou ſhalt not detract nor ſlander the Judge, nor ſpeak evil of the Princes of the people. And in two ſeveral Epiſtles, both in Peter and in Jude, it is ſaid, "That in the latter days there ſhall be "wicked men, that ſhall ſpeak evil of Magiſtates, "and men of authority, blaſpheming 'em;" as if it were blaſphemy, tho' not againſt God, yet againſt thoſe, that are the Image of ſo great a God.

And therefore, ſince Wraynham hath blaſphemed, ſpoken evil, and ſlander'd a chief Magiſtrate as any in the Kingdom; it remaineth, that in honour to God, and in duty and juſtice to the King and Kingdom, that he ſhou'd receive ſevere puniſhment; for it is his cauſe to-day, and it may be ours every day: and have not ſome, for juſtice ſake, been inforc'd to endure the threatning of their heads? Wherefore, if greater puniſhment had been given him, I ſhou'd have aſſented; for Juſtice belongeth to us, but Mercy to our gracious Sovereign. Wherefore I agree in all things with the ſentence before given.

Suffolk, Lord-Treaſurer. I perceive, as the priſoner at the bar was charged at firſt, that he had ſoully offended, and ought to have yielded himſelf at the firſt, and not to have made his offence greater, by defending a bad cauſe.

My Lords who have heard his fault in part laid out, and cenſured him, I think they have done very worthily. For the party himſelf, I would I could come to him with a little better charity than I can, for his anſwer did more diſpleaſe me, than his cenſure; for I ſee his ſpleen and his humour grows, rather to defame a worthy man, than to free himſelf, how unjuſtly, I appeal to the whole World: who came to his place with as much ſatisfaction to all hearts, and applauſe, with as good carriage, as any man I ever heard came before him.

The thing that I would conclude with, is, that I would be glad that all that hear us might take us aright that are Judges; we deſire not to be forborn by any Subject's tongue, that hath cauſe to complain: and therefore do it not for any particular reſpect to ourſelves, but for the publick courſe of juſtice, and for the care we have of the publick good, and for nothing elſe.

For the fault itſelf, it hath been ſo well opened by all the Lords, that I will ſpare to hold you longer in ſpeaking of it. And for the ſentence, I think it very fit and juſt: and therefore agree with the reſt.

XVI. Proceedings on the Habeas Corpus, brought by Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, Nov. 1627. 3 Car. I. at the King's-Bench, in Weſtminſter-Hall.

THE King having deprived himſelf of the proſpect of all parliamentary Aids, by diſſolving the Parliament, and yet reſolving to proſecute the war; it was neceſſary to project all poſſible ways and means of raiſing money, to which end letters were ſent to the Lords-Lieutenants of the Counties, to return the names of the perſons of ability, and what ſums they could ſpare; and the Comptroller of the King's houſhold iſſued forth letters in the King's name, under the Privy-Seal, to ſeveral perſons returned for the Loan-money; ſome were aſſeſſed 20 l. ſome 15 and others 10 l. and Commiſſioners were appointed with private inſtructions how to behave themſelves in this affair, and divers Lords of the Council were appointed to repair into their Counties to advance the Loan *. Collectors were alſo appointed to pay into the Exechequer the ſums receiv'd, and to return the names of ſuch as refus'd, or diſcover'd a diſpoſition to delay the payment of the ſums impos'd. This aſſeſſment of the general Loan, did not paſs currently with the people, for divers perſons refus'd to ſubſcribe or lend at the rate propos'd; the non-ſubſcribers of high rank in all Counties were bound over by recognizances to tender their appearance at the Council-board, and perform'd the ſame accordingly, and divers of them committed to priſon: which caus'd great murmuring. But amongſt thoſe many Gentlemen who were impriſon'd throughout England, for refuſing to

* Sir Randolph Crew ſhewing no zeal for the advancing thereof, was then remov'd from his place of Lord Chief-Juſtice, and Sir Nicholas Hyde ſucceeded in his room: a perſon who for his parts and abilities, was thought worthy of that perferment; yet nevertheleſs came to the ſame with a prejudice, coming in the place of one ſo well-beloved and ſo ſuddenly remov'd. Ruſhworth, Vol. I. to lend upon the commiſſion for Loans, only five of them brought their Habeas Corpus, viz. Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden.

Arguments upon the Habeas Corpus.

Sir Thomas Darnel his Caſe, Michaelis 3° Caroli, Banco Regis.

SIR Thomas Darnel Baronet, being impriſoned in the Fleet, by virtue of a warrant ſigned by the King's Attorney-General, upon the third of November, by Serjeant Bramſton his aſſigned Counſel, moved the Juſtices of the King's-Bench to grant him a Writ of Habeas Corpus cum cauſa, directed to the Warden of the Fleet, to ſhew that Court the cauſe of his impriſonment, that thereupon they might determine whether his reſtraint were legal or illegal; and it was granted by the Court returnable Thurſday following, the 8*th* day of November.

On Thurſday, Sir Thomas Darnel expected that his Writ ſhould be returned, but it was delayed; and it was moved that the return ſhould be on Saturday the 10th of November, which made Sir Thomas Darnel the more remiſs in ſuing out an Alias upon his Habeas Corpus.

On Saturday the Writ was not returned, and thereupon the King's Attorney-General gave order for an Alias upon the Habeas Corpus for Sir Thomas Darnel, returnable upon Thurſday morning the 15th of November; by virtue of which Writ, the Warden of the Fleet brings Sir Thomas Darnel to the King's-Bench, and returneth as followeth:

Executio iſtius Brevis patet in quadam ſchedula annexat' huic brevi.

The return was this:

" Ego Henricus Liloe Miles gardianus priſone " Domini Regis de le Fleet, ſereniſſimo domino " Regi certifico quod dict' Thomas Darnel Baronet' " detentus eſt in priſona prædict' ſub cuſtodia mea " virtute cujuſdam Warranti duorum de privato " Conſilio mihi directi, cujus tenor ſequitur in his " verbis, viz."

" Whereas heretofore the Body of Sir Thomas Darnel hath been committed to your cuſtody, theſe are to require you ſtill to continue him; and to let you know, that he was and is committed by the ſpecial command of his Majeſty, &c."

Et hæc eſt cauſa detentionis prædict' Thomæ Darnel.

Serj. Bramſton. MAY it pleaſe your Lordſhip, I did not expect this cauſe at this time, neither did I hear of it until I came now into the hall; and therefore I ſhall now humbly ſhew you what my Client hath informed me ſince my coming hither. I underſtand by him that he expected not his coming to this place to-day, the Writ by which he was brought hither was not moved for by him, but was procured without his privity; and ſeeing his caſe is ſo, and that he perceives the cauſe of his coming, which before he knew not, his motion to your Lordſhip is, that you would be pleaſed to let him have the copy of the return, and give him time to ſpeak unto it, and that this Writ being not ſent out by his procurement, may not be filed.

Heath, Attorney-General. My Lords, it is true that this Gentleman, Sir Thomas Darnel, being impriſoned in the Fleet, did heretofore move your Lordſhip for a Habeas Corpus, &c. and it was granted him: and his Majeſty being made acquainted therewith, was very willing that he and all his people might have equal juſtice; and when they deſire that which ſeems to accord with the rules of the law, they ſhould have it. But it fell out ſo, that on the day when the Writ ſhould have been returned, the Warden of the Fleet did not return it, as it was his duty to have done; he did forbear to do it upon a commandment, becauſe it was conceived, there being five at that time to appear, the Court would have been ſtraitned for want of time: but I imagined that theſe Gentlemen who did deſire the Writ before, ſhould have again been earneſt to renew them, which it ſeems they did not. This Habeas Corpus was ſent out by ſpecial command, becauſe theſe Gentlemen gave out in ſpeeches, and in particular this Gentleman, That they did wonder why they ſhould be hinder'd from Trial, and what ſhould be the reaſon their Writs were not returned: nay, his Majeſty did tell me, that they reported that the King did deny them the courſe of Juſtice, and therefore he commanded me to renew the Writ, which I did, and think I may do it ex officio.

Sir Tho. Darnel. My Lords, I knew not until now, but that I was committed by Mr. Attorney's Warrant only, and thereupon I did deſire a Habeas Corpus at the bar, which you were pleaſed to grant me; but now I underſtand that my reſtraint is by another means, and therefore I ſhall crave leave to have ſome time to ſpeak to it. And as for the words alledged againſt me, as if I had ſpoken them, I humbly pray they may be no diſparagement to my cauſe; for I do patiently refer myſelf to your grave cenſures, as being accuſed of a fact whereof I am no ways guilty.

Hide, L. C. Juſtice. You give a temperate and fair anſwer; and now you may perceive the upright and ſincere proceedings that have been in this buſineſs. You did no ſooner petition to have Counſel aſſigned you, but you had it granted to you, for indeed we cannot deny it; and I know not but that any Counſel might have moved for you, without having been aſſigned for you, and yet have had no blame; for it is the King's pleaſure his Laws ſhould take place and be executed, and therefore do we ſit here. When you made a motion for a Habeas Corpus, that was likewiſe granted; whether the commitment be by the King or others, this Court is a place where the King doth ſit in perſon, and we have power to examine it; and if it appears that any man hath injury or wrong by his impriſonment, we have power to deliver and diſcharge him; if otherwiſe, he is to be remanded by us to priſon again. Now it ſeems you are not ready to ſpeak to this return; if you deſire a further day, we ought to grant it.

Sir Tho. Darnel. My Lords, I humbly deſire it.

L. C. Juſtice. I know no cauſe why it ſhould be denied.

Serj. Bramſton. My Lords, we ſhall deſire the Writ may not be filed, and that we may have a Copy of the return.

Attorn. Gen. You cannot deny the filing of the Writ, if you desire to have a Copy of the return.

L. C. Justice. Although you be remanded at this time to prison, because you are not ready to speak to the return, we can adjourn you to a new day upon the Writ, and so you may prepare yourself; but if you will not have this filed, there must go out a new Habeas Corpus, and thereupon must be another return.

Serj. Bramston. My Lord, we desire some time, that we may be advised whether we may proceed or not.

L. C. Justice. Will you submit yourself to the King?

Sir Tho. Darnel. My Lord, I desire some time to advise of my proceedings; I have moved many men, and offered to retain them of my Counsel, but they refuse me, and I can get none to be of Counsel with me without your assistance.

L. C. Justice. You shall have what Counsel assigned you, you will have or desire; for no offence will be taken against any man, that shall advise you in your proceedings in Law.

Attorn. Gen. I will pass my word, they that do advise you, shall have no offence taken against them for it; and I shall give consent to any way that you shall desire, either that it may be filed, or that it may not be filed; for if you desire Justice, you shall have it, and the King will not deny it: but if it shall be conceived, as it is rumoured, that there was a denial of Justice on the King's part, you must know that his Majesty is very tender of that. And for the Gentleman now he is brought hither, I conceive, but yet I leave it to your Lordship's judgment, that the Writ must be filed, and you must either deliver him, or remand him, or else it will be an escape in the Warden of the Fleet.

Sir Tho. Darnel. I would not have it thought that I should speak any thing against my Prince, and for those words I do deny them; for upon my conscience they never came into my thought: perhaps you shall find that they have been spoken by some other, but not by any of us.

L. C. Justice. Sir, you have made a fair answer, and I doubt not but Mr. Attorney will make the like relation of it; you move for the not filing of the Writ, if you refuse to have it filed, whereby it should not be of record, you must have no Copy of it; but if you will have it filed, you shall have a Copy of it, and further time to speak to it, choose whether of them you will.

Serj. Bramston. We desire to have the return read once more.

And it was read as before.

Serj. Bramston. So as the Writ may not be filed, we will desire no Copy of the return.

L. C. Justice. Then the Gentleman must return back again into the custody of the Warden of the Fleet; and therefore I ask you whether you desire to come hither again upon this Writ, or will you have a new one?

Sir Tho. Darnel. I desire your Lordship that I may have time to consider of it.

L. C. Justice. Then in God's name take your own time to think of it.

Michaelis 3° Caroli Regis. Thursday, 22 November. 1627.

Sir John Corbet, Baronet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, Sir Edmund Hampden, Knights, were brought to the Bar.

Serj. Bramston. MAY it please your Lordship to hear the return read, or shall I open it?

L. C. Justice. Let it be read.

Mr. Keeling read the return, being the same as that of Sir Thomas Darnel.

Serj. Bramston. May it please your Lordship, I shall humbly move upon this return, in the behalf of Sir John Heveningham, with whom I am of Counsel; it is his petition that he may be bailed from his imprisonment, it was but in vain for me to move that to a Court of Law, which by Law cannot be granted: and therefore in that regard, that upon this return it will be questioned whether as this return is made, the Gentleman may be bailed or not; I shall humbly offer up to your Lordship the case, and some reasons out of mine understanding, arising out of the return itself, to satisfy your Lordship that these prisoners may, and, as their case is, ought to be bailed by your Lordship.

The exception that I take to this return, is as well to the matter and substance of the return, as to the manner and legal form thereof; the exceptions that I take to the matter, is in several respects.

That the return is too general, there is no sufficient cause shewn in special or in general of the commitment of this Gentleman; and as it is insufficient for the cause, so also in the time of the first imprisonment: for howsoever here doth appear a time upon the second Warrant from the Lords of the Counsel to detain him still in prison, yet by the return no time can appear when he was first imprisoned, tho' it be necessary it should be shewn; and if that time appear not, there is no cause your Lordship should remand him, and consequently he is to be delivered.

Touching the matter of the return, which is the cause of his imprisonment, it is expressed to be per speciale mandatum domini Regis: this is too general and uncertain, for that it is not manifest what kind of command this was.

Touching the legal form of the return, it is not, as it ought to be, fully and positively the return of the Keeper himself only, but it comes with a significavit or prout, that he was committed per speciale mandatum domini Regis, as appeareth by Warrant from the Lords of the Council, not of the King himself; and that is not good in legal form.

For the matter and substance of the return, it is not good, because there ought to be a cause of that imprisonment.

This Writ is the means, and the only means that the subject hath in this and such like case to obtain his liberty; there are other Writs by which men are delivered from restraint, as that de homine replegiando, but extends not to this cause, for it is particularly excepted in the body of the Writ de manucaptione & de cautione admittenda, but they lie in other cases: but the Writ of Habeas Corpus is the only means the Subject hath to obtain his liberty, and the end of this Writ is to return the cauſe of the impriſonment, that it may be examined in this Court, whether the parties ought to be diſcharged or not: but that cannot be done upon this return, for the cauſe of the impriſonment of this Gentleman at firſt is ſo far from appearing particularly by it, that there is no cauſe at all expreſſed in it.

This Writ requires that the cauſe of the impriſonment ſhould be returned, and if the cauſe be not ſpecially certified by it, yet ſhould it at the leaſt be ſhewn in general, that it may appear to the Judges of the Court; and it muſt be expreſſed ſo far, as that it may appear to be none of thoſe cauſes for which by law of the kingdom the ſubject ought not to be impriſoned; and it ought to be expreſſed that it was by preſentment or indictment, and not upon petition or ſuggeſtion made to the King and Lords, which is againſt the Statute made in the 25 Edw. III. c. 4. 42 Edw. III. c. 3.

By the Statute 25 Edw. III. cap. 4. it is ordained and eſtabliſhed, That no man from henceforth ſhall be taken by petition or ſuggeſtion made to the King or his Council, but by indictment or courſe of law; and accordingly it was enacted, 42 Edw. III. cap. 3. the title of which Statute is, none ſhall be put to anſwer an accuſation made to the King without preſentment. Then, my Lord, it being ſo, although the cauſe ſhould not need to be expreſſed in ſuch manner as that it may appear to be none of theſe cauſes mentioned in the Statute, or elſe the ſubject by this return loſeth the benefit and advantage of theſe laws, which be their birth-right and inheritance: but in this return there is no cauſe at all appearing of the firſt commitment, and therefore it is plain that there is no cauſe for your Lordſhip to remand him; but there is cauſe you ſhould deliver him, ſince the Writ is to bring the body and the cauſe of the impriſonment before your Lordſhip.

But it may be objected, that this Writ of Habeas Corpus doth not demand the cauſe of the firſt commitment, but of the detaining only; and ſo the Writ is ſatisfied by the return: for though it ſhew no cauſe of the firſt commitment, but of detaining only, yet it declareth a cauſe why the Gentleman is detained in priſon; this is no anſwer, nor can give any ſatisfaction, for the reaſon why the cauſe is to be returned, is for the ſubject's liberty, that if it ſhall appear a good and ſufficient cauſe to your Lordſhip, then to be remanded; if your Lordſhip think and find it inſufficient, he is to be enlarged.

This is the end of this Writ, and this cannot appear to your Lordſhip, unleſs the time of the firſt commitment be expreſſed in the return. I know that in ſome caſes the time is not material, as when the cauſe of the commitment is (and that ſo eſpecially) returned, as that the time is not material, it is enough to ſhew the cauſe without the time, as after a conviction or Trial had by Law; but when it is in this manner, that the time is the matter itſelf: for intend what cauſe you will of the commitment, yea though for the higheſt cauſe of Treaſon, there is no doubt but that upon the return thereof the time of it muſt appear; for it being before Trial and Conviction had by law, it is but an accuſation, and he that is only accuſed, ought by law to be let to bail.

But I beſeech your Lordſhip to obſerve the conſequence of this cauſe. If the law be, that upon this return this Gentleman ſhould be remanded, I will not diſpute whether or no, a man may be impriſoned before he be convicted according to the law: but if this return ſhall be good, then his impriſonment ſhall not continue on for a time, but for ever; and the ſubjects of this kingdom may be reſtrained of their liberties perpetually, and by law there can be no remedy for the ſubject: and therefore this return cannot ſtand with the laws of the Realm, or that of Magna Charta. Nor with the Statute of 28 Edw. III. cap. 3. for if a man be not bailable upon this return, they cannot have the benefit of theſe two laws, which are the inheritance of the ſubject.

If your Lordſhip ſhall think this to be a ſufficient cauſe, then it goeth to a perpetual impriſonment of the ſubject: for in all thoſe cauſes which may concern the King's ſubjects, and are applicable to all times and caſes, we are not to reflect upon the preſent time and government, where juſtice and mercy floweth, but we are to look what may betide us in the time to come, hereafter.

It muſt be agreed on all ſides, that the time of the firſt commitment doth not appear in this return; but by a latter warrant from the Lords of the Council, there is a time indeed expreſſed for the continuing of him in priſon, and that appears; but if this ſhall be a good cauſe to remand theſe Gentlemen to priſon, they may lie there theſe ſeven years longer, and ſeven years after them, nay, all the days of their lives. And if they ſue out a Writ of Habeas Corpus, it is but making a new Warrant, and they ſhall be remanded, and ſhall never have the advantage of the laws which are the beſt inheritance of every ſubject.

And in Edw. VI. fol. 36. the laws are called the great inheritance of every ſubject, and the inheritance of inheritances, without which inheritance we have no inheritance.

Theſe are the exceptions I deſire to offer up to your Lordſhip, touching the return, for the inſufficiency of the cauſe returned, and the defect of the time of the firſt commitment, which ſhould have been expreſſed.

I will not labour in objections till they be made againſt me, in regard the Statute of Weſtminſter primo is ſo frequent in every man's mouth, that at the Common Law thoſe men that were committed in four caſes were not repleviſable; viz. thoſe that were taken for the death of a man, or the commandment of the King, or his Juſtices for the Foreſt. I ſhall ſpeak ſomething to it, though I intend not to ſpend much time about it, for it toucheth not this caſe we have in queſtion.

For that is concerning a caſe of the Common Law, when men are taken by the King's Writs, and not by word of mouth, and it ſhall be ſo expounded, as Mr. Stamford, fol. 73. yet it is nothing to this caſe, for if you will take the true meaning of that Statute, it extends not at all to this Writ of Habeas Corpus; for the words are plain, they ſhall be repleviſable by the Common Writ, that is, by the Writ de homine replegiando, directed to the Sheriff to deliver them if they were bailable: but this caſe is above the Sheriff, and he is not to be Judge in it, whether the cauſe of the commitment be ſufficient or not, as it appears in Fitz-Herbert, de homine replegiando, and many other places, and not of the very words of the Statute: this is clear, for thereby many other cauſes mentioned, as the death of a man, the commandment of the Juſtices, &c. in which the Statute ſaith, men are not repleviſable. But will a man conceive that the meaning is, that they they ſhall not be bailed at all, but live in perpetual impriſonment? I think I ſhall not need to ſpend time, in that it is ſo plain; let me but make one inſtance.

A man is taken de morte hominis, he is not bailable by Writ, ſaith this Statute; that is, by the common Writ: there was a common Writ for this caſe, and that was called de odio & acia, as appeareth, Bracton Coron. 34. This is the Writ intended by the Statute, which is a common Writ, and not a ſpecial Writ; but, my Lord, as this Writ de odio & acia was before this Statute, ſo it was afterwards taken away by the Statute of 28 Edw. III. cap. 9. But before that Statute, this Writ did lie in the ſpecial caſe, as is ſhewn in Coke's 9th report, the Poulterer's caſe; and the end of this Writ was, that the ſubject might not be too long detained in priſon, as till the Juſtices of Eyre diſcharged them. So that the Law intended not that a man ſhould ſuffer perpetual impriſonment, for they were very careful that men ſhould not be kept too long in priſon; which is alſo a liberty of the ſubject; and, my Lord, that this Court hath bailed upon a ſuſpicion of High-Treaſon, I will offer it to your Lordſhip, when I ſhall ſhew you precedents in theſe caſes of a commitment by the Privy-Council, or by the King himſelf: but before I offer theſe precedents unto your Lordſhip, of which there be many, I ſhall by your Lordſhip's favour ſpeak a little to the next exception, and that is to the matter of the return, which I find to be per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis. And what is that? it appears by this Writ, there may be ſundry commands by the King; we find a ſpecial command often in our Books, as in the Statute of Marlb. cap. 8. they who were impriſoned Rediſſ. ſhall not be delivered without the ſpecial command of our Lord the King. And ſo in Bracton, de Actionibus, the laſt chapter, where it appears that the King's commandment for impriſonments is by ſpecial Writ; ſo by Writ again men are to be delivered, for in the caſe of Rediſs' or Poſt Rediſs', if it ſhall be removed by a Certiorari, that is by a ſpecial Writ to deliver parties. So that by this appears, that by the King's commandment to impriſon, and to deliver in thoſe caſes, is underſtood this Writ, and ſo it may be in this caſe which we have heard.

And this return here is a ſpecial Mandatum, it may be underſtood to be under ſome of the King's Seals, 42 Aſſ. and ought to be delivered; and will you make a difference between the King's command under his ſeal, and his command by word of mouth? What difference there is, I leave it to your Lordſhip's judgment; but if there be any, it is the more material that it ſhould be expreſſed what manner of command it was, which doth not here appear; and therefore it may be the King's command by Writ, or his command under his Seal, or his command by word of mouth alone.

And if there is any of theſe commands of an higher nature than the other, doubtleſs, it is that by Writ, or under Seal, for they are of record, and in theſe the perſon may be bailed, and why not in this? As to the legal form, admitting there were ſubſtances in the return, yet there wants legal form; for the Writ of Habeas Corpus is the commandment of the King to the keeper of the priſons, and thereupon they are to make return both of the body, and of the cauſe of the commitment, and that cauſe is to appear of them who are the immediate Officers. And if he doth it by ſignification from another, that return is defective in law, and therefore this return cannot be good, for it muſt be from the Officer himſelf; and if the cauſe returned by him be good, it binds the priſoners.

The Warrant of the Lords was but a direction for him, he might have made his return to have been expreſsly by the King's commandment, there was Warrant for it, I ſhall not need to put you caſes of it; for it is not enough that he returns that he was certified that the commitment was by the King's command, but he muſt of himſelf return this fact as it was done. And now, my Lord, I ſhall offer to your Lordſhip precedents of divers kinds, upon commitments by the ſpecial command of the King, and upon commitments both by the King and the Lords together. And howſoever I conceive, which I ſubmit to your Lordſhip, that our caſe will not ſtand upon precedents, but upon the fundamental Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and though the precedents look the one way or the other, they are to be brought back unto the laws by which the Kingdom is governed. In the firſt of Henry VIII. Rot. Parl. 9. one Harriſon was committed to the Marſhalſea by the command of the King; and being removed by Habeas Corpus into the Court, the cauſe returned was, that he was committed per mandatum Domini Regis, and he was bailed.

In the fortieth of Elizabeth, Thomas Wendon was committed to the Gatehouſe by the commandment of the Queen, and Lords of the Council; and being removed by an Habeas Corpus upon the general return, he was bailed.

In 8 Jacobi, one Cæſar was committed by the King's commandment, and this being returned upon his Habeas Corpus, upon the examination of this caſe it doth appear that it was over-ruled, that the return ſhould be amended, or elſe the priſoner ſhould be delivered.

The precedents concerning the commitment by the Lords of the Council, are in effect the ſame with theſe where the commitment is, by the reaſon why the cauſe of the commitment ſhould not be ſhewn, holds in both caſes, and that is the neceſſity of ſuit; and therefore Mr. Stamford makes the command of the King, and that of the Lords of the Privy-Council, to be both as one, and to this purpoſe, if they ſpeak, he ſpeaks; and if he ſpeaks, they ſpeak.

The precedents that we can ſhew you, how the ſubject hath been delivered upon commitment by the Lords of the Council, as in the times of Hen. VIII. and in the times of Queen Elizabeth, and Queen Mary, are infinite; as in the 9th of Elizabeth, Thomas Lawrence was committed to the Tower by the Lords of the Council, and bailed upon an Habeas Corpus.

In the 43 of Elizabeth, Calvin's caſe.

In the third of Elizabeth, Vernon's caſe.

Theſe were committed for High-Treaſon, and yet bailed; for in all theſe caſes there muſt be a conviction in due time, or a deliverance by law.

There be divers other precedents that might be ſhewn to your Lordſhip. In 12 Jacobi, Miles Renards. In 12 Jacobi, Rot. 155. Richard Beckwith's caſe. In 4 Jacobi, Sir Thomas Monſon was committed for Treaſon to the Tower of London, and afterwards was brought hither, and bailed; and ſince our caſe ſtands upon this return, and yet there is no ſufficient cauſe in law expreſſed in the return of the detaining this Gentleman; and ſince theſe precedents do warrant our proceedings; my humble ſuit unto this Court is, that the Gentleman Sir John Heveningham, who hath petitioned his Majeſty, that he may have the benefit of the law, and his Majeſty hath ſignified it; it is his pleaſure that juſtice according to the law ſhould be adminiſtred at all times in general to all his ſubjects, and particularly to theſe Gentlemen, which is their birth-right: my humble ſuit to your Lordſhip is, that theſe Gentlemen may have the benefit of that law, and be delivered from their impriſonment.

Mr. Noye's Argument, of Council with Sir Walter Earl at that time.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, I am of Council with Sir Walter Earl, one of the priſoners at the bar; the return of this Writ is as thoſe that have been before, they are much of one tenor, and as you have heard the tenor of that, ſo this Gentleman coming hither by an Habeas Corpus, I will by your Lordſhip's favour read the Writ.

My Lord, the firſt Habeas Corpus bears date the 4th of November, then there is an Alias Habeas bears Teſte after that, and the tenor thereof is a command to the Warden of the Fleet, quod Habeas Corpus Walteri Earl, coram nobis ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum ea quæ curia noſtra de eo &c. ordin' conting. And the Warden of the Fleet, he certifies as your Lordſhip has heard. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, I deſire as before was deſired for the other Gentlemen, that Sir Walter Earl may be alſo bailed, if there be no other cauſe of his impriſonment: for if there were a cauſe certified, and that cauſe were not ſufficient to detain him ſtill in priſon, your Lordſhip would bail him; and if a man ſhould be in a worſe caſe, when there is no cauſe certified at all, that wou'd be very hard.

The Writ is, that he ſhould bring the priſoner coram nobis, before the King, the end of that is ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum; now I conceive, that tho' there be a ſignification of the King's pleaſure to have this Gentleman impriſoned, yet when the King grants this Writ to bring the priſoner hither, ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum, his pleaſure likewiſe is, to have the priſoner let go, if by law he be not chargeable; or otherwiſe to detain him ſtill in priſon, if the caſe ſo require it.

I will put your Lordſhip in mind of a caſe, and it was Paſch. 9 Edw. III. M. 3. I will cite by the placita, becauſe my Book is not paged as other Books are; it is in the caſe of a Ceſſavit.

In that caſe there were two things conſiderable, the one that there was a ſignification of the King's pleaſure paſt, and that determined with him: the other, that though there was a ſignification of the King's pleaſure before, yet there comes after that a Writ; and that was another ſignification of the King's pleaſure, that the priſoner ſhall be brought hither ad ſubjiciendum, to ſubmit himſelf to puniſhment, if he have deſerved it; or ad recipiendum, to receive his enlargement, and be delivered, if there be no cauſe of his impriſonment.

And if upon an Habeas Corpus, a cauſe of commitment be certified, that cauſe is to be tried here before your Lordſhip. But if no cauſe be ſhewn, then the proceedings muſt be ut curia noſtra ad mar' contigerit, the Court muſt do that which ſtands with Law and Juſtice, and that is to deliver him.

My Lord, I ſhall be bold to move one word more touching this return: I conceive that every Officer to a Court of Juſtice muſt make his return of his own act, or of the act of another, and not what he is certified of by another.

But in this caſe the Warden of the Fleet doth not certify himſelf, of himſelf, that this Gentleman was commanded to him by the King, but that he was certified by the Lords of the Council, that it was the King's pleaſure that he ſhould detain him. But in our caſe the Warden of the Fleet muſt certify the immediate cauſe, and not the cauſe of the cauſe, as it doth by this return; Detentus eſt ſub cuſtodia mea per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis mibi ſignificatum per Warrantum duorum de Privato Concilio; cilio; that is not the uſe in law, but he ought to return the primary cauſe, and not the ſubſequent cauſe: as in 32 Edw. III. return, Rex vicecom' 87. in a Writ de homine replegiando, againſt an Abbot, the Sheriff returns, that he hath ſent to the Bailiff of the Abbot, and he anſwered him that the party was the Abbot's villain, and ſo he cannot deliver him; that is held an inſufficient return, and a new Alias was granted. But if the Sheriff had returned, that the Abbot did certify him ſo, it had been good; but he muſt not return what is certified him by another.

In one of the precedents that hath been noted, as that of Parker, 22 Hen. VIII. there the Guardian of the priſon certifies that Parker detentus eſt ſub cuſtodia mea per mandatum Domini Regis mihi nunciatum per Robertum Pecke; now our caſe is by the nunciation of many, but in law majus & minus non variant in ſpeciem, the certification of one and of many is of the ſame effect, although in moral underſtanding there may be a difference.

Trin. 2 Edw. III. Rot. 46. in this Court in 21 Edw. III. in the printed Book there is a piece of it: the Abbot of Bury brings a prohibition out of this Court, the Biſhop of Norwich pleadeth in bar of that, Quod mihi teſtificatum, quod continetur in Archivis, that he is excommunicated; there were two exceptions taken to this caſe in this precedent, and they are both in one caſe: the firſt was, that no caſe appeareth, why he was excommunicated; there may be cauſes why he ſhould be excommunicated, and then he ſhould be barred, and there may be cauſes why the excommunication ſhould not bar him: for it may be the excommunication was for bringing the action, which was the King's Writ; and therefore becauſe there was no cauſe of the excommunication returned, it was ruled that it was not good. The other reaſon is that upon the Roll, which is mihi teſtificatum.

Now every man, when he will make a Certificate to the Court, Proprium factum ſuum non alterius ſignificare debet, he muſt inform the Court of the immediate act done, and not that ſuch things are told him, or that ſuch things are ſignified unto him; but that was not done in this caſe, and therefore it was held inſufficient: and ſo in this caſe of ours, I conceive the return is inſufficient in the form. There is another cauſe, my Lord, for which I conceive this return is not good.

But firſt I will be bold to inform your Lordſhip, touching the Statute of Magna Charta 29. Nullus liber homo capiatur vel impriſonetur &c. nec ſuper eum mittimus niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum vel per legem terræ.

That in this Statute theſe words in Carcerem are omitted out of the printed Books: for it ſhould be nec eum in Carcerem mittimus. For theſe words per legem terræ; what Lex terræ ſhould be, I will not take upon me to expound, otherwiſe than I find them to be expounded by Acts of Parliament; and this is, that they are underſtood to be the proceſs of the law, ſometimes by Writ, ſometimes by Attachment of the perſon: but whether ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis, be intended by that or no, I leave it to your Lordſhip's expoſition upon two petitions of the Commons, and anſwer of the King, in 36 Edw. III. n° 9. and n° 20.

In the firſt of them the Commons complain that the great Charter, the Charter of the Foreſt, and other Statutes were broken, and they deſire that for the good of himſelf and of his people, they might be kept and put in execution, and that they might not be infringed by making an arreſt by ſpecial command or otherwiſe: and the anſwer was, that the aſſent of the Lords eſtabliſhed and ordained, that the ſaid Charter and other Statutes ſhould be put in execution according to the petition, and that is without any diſturbance by arreſt by ſpecial command or otherwiſe; for it was granted, as it was petitioned.

In the ſame year, for they were very careful of this matter, and it was neceſſary it ſhould be ſo, for it was then an uſual thing to take men by Writs quibuſdam de cauſis, and many of theſe words cauſed many Acts of Parliament; and it may be ſome of theſe Writs may be ſhewn: and I ſay in the ſame year they complained that men were impriſoned by ſpecial command, and without Indictment or other legal Courſe of law, and they deſired that thing may not be done upon men by ſpecial command againſt the great Charter.

The King makes anſwer, that he is well pleaſed therewith: that was the firſt anſwer; and for the future he hath added farther, if any man be grieved, let him complain, and right ſhall be done unto him. This my Lord is an explanation of the great Charter, as alſo the Statute of 37 Edw. III. ch. 18. is a Commentary upon it, that men ſhould not be committed upon ſuggeſtion made to the King, without due proofs of law againſt them, and ſo it is enacted twice in one year.

We find more printed Books, as in Hen. VI. Mrus de fiacts, Fitz. 182. which is a ſtrong caſe, under favour, in an action of treſpaſs for cutting down trees. The Defendant ſaith, that the place where the trees are cut, is parcel of the Manor of B, whereof the King is ſeized in fee, and that the King did command him to cut them: and the opinion of the Court was, that this was no good plea, without ſhewing the ſpecialty of the command; and they ſaid, if the King command me to arreſt a man, and I arreſt him, he ſhall have an action of falſe impriſonment againſt me, although it were done in the King's preſence.

In 1 Joh. cap. 7. fol. 46. it is in print, and there we leave it.

Huſſey Chief-Juſtice ſaith, that Sir John Markham told King Edw. IV. that he could not arreſt a man upon ſuſpicion of Felony or Treaſon, as any of his ſubjects might; becauſe if he ſhould wrong a man by ſuch arreſt, the parties could have no remedy againſt him, if any man ſhall ſtand upon it. Here is a ſignification of the King's pleaſure, not to have the cauſe of the commitment examined, he hath here another ſignification of his pleaſure by Writ, whereby the party is brought hither ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum, that he hath made your Lordſhip Judge of that, which ſhould be objected againſt this Gentleman, and either to puniſh him, or to deliver him; and if here be no cauſe ſhewn, it is to be intended that the party is to be delivered, and that it is the King's pleaſure it ſhould be ſo: and the Writ is a ſufficient Warrant for the doing of it, there being no cauſe ſhewn of the impriſonment. And now, my Lord, I will ſpeak a word to the Writ of de homine replegiando, and no other Writ, for that was the common Writ; and the four cauſes expreſſed in that Statute, to wit, the death of a man, the command of the King, or his Juſtices, or Foreſt, were excepted in that Writ before that Statute made, as appears Bracton 133. ſo that the Writ was at the Common Law before that Statute.

And it appears by our Books, that if a man be brought hither by an Habeas Corpus, though he were impriſoned de morte hominis, as in the 21 Edw. IV. 7. Winckfield was bailed here, this Court bailed him, for he was brought hither ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum, and not to lie in priſon God knows how long; and if the Statute ſhould be expounded otherwiſe, there were no bailing men outlawed or breakers of priſons, for they are not within this Statute, and yet this Court doth it at pleaſure.

But plainly by the Statute itſelf, it appears that it meant only the common Writ; for the preamble recites, that the Sheriffs and others, have taken and kept in priſon perſons detected of Felony, and let out to plevin ſuch as were not repriſable, to grieve the one party, and to the gain of the other; and foraſmuch as before this time it was not determined what priſoners were repriſable, and what not, but only in certain caſes were expreſſed, therefore it is ordained, &c.

Now this is no more than for direction to the keepers of the priſons, for it leaves the matter to the diſcretion of the Judges, whether bailable or not; for when the Statute hath declared who are repleviable, who are not, as men outlawed, thoſe who have abjured the Realm, breakers of priſons, burners of houſes, makers of falſe money, counterfeiting of the King's Seal, and the like; it is then ordained, that if the Sheriff or any other, let any go at large by ſurety, that is not repriſable, whether he be Sheriff, Conſtable, or any other that hath the keeping of priſons, and thereof be attainted, he ſhall loſe his Office and Fee for ever; ſo that it extends to the common Goalers and Keepers of priſons, to direct them in what caſes they ſhall let men to bail, and in what caſes not: and that they ſhall not be Judges whom to let to replevin, and whom to keep in priſon; but it extends not to the Judges, for if the makers of the Statute had meant them in it, they ſhould have put a pain or penalty upon them alſo.

So then, I conclude under your Lordſhip's favour, that as this caſe is, there ſhould have been a cauſe of the commitment expreſſed, for theſe Gentlemen are brought hither by Writ ad ſubjiciendum; if they be charged: and ad recipiendum if they be not charged; and therefore in regard there is no charge againſt them, whereupon they ſhould be detained in priſon any longer, we deſire that they may be bailed or diſcharged by your Lordſhip.

Mr. Selden's Argument at the King's-Bench Bar the ſame day.

MY Lords, I am of Counſel with Sir Edmund Hampden, his caſe is the ſame with the other two Gentlemen: I cannot hope to ſay much, after that that hath been ſaid; yet if it ſhall pleaſe your Lordſhip, I ſhall remember you of ſo much as is befallen my lot. Sir Edmund Hampden is brought hither by a Writ of Habeas Corpus, and the Keeper of the Gatehouſe hath returned upon the Writ, that Sir Edmund Hampden is detained in priſon per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, mihi ſignificatum per Warrantum duorum Privati Concilii dicti domini Regis. And then he recites the warrant of the Lords of the Council, which is, that they do will and require him to detain this Gentleman ſtill in priſon, letting him know that his firſt impriſonment, &c.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, I ſhall humbly move you that this Gentleman may alſo be bailed; for under favour, my Lord, there is no cauſe in the return, why he ſhould be any farther impriſoned and reſtrained of his liberty.

My Lord, I ſhall ſay ſomething to the form of the Writ, and of the return; but very little to them both, becauſe there is a very little left for me to ſay.

My Lord, to the form, I ſay it expreſſeth nothing of the firſt caption, and therefore it is inſufficient; I will add one reaſon, as hath been ſaid: the Habeas Corpus hath only theſe words, quod habeas corpus ejus una cum cauſa detentionis, & non captionis. But, my Lord, becauſe in all impriſonment, there is a cauſe of caption and detention, the caption is to be anſwered as well as the detention.

I have ſeen many Writs of this nature, and on them the caption is returned, that they might ſee the time of the caption, and thereby know whether the party ſhould be delivered or no, and that in regard of the length of his impriſonment.

The next exception I take to the form is, that there is much uncertainty in it, ſo that no man can tell when the writ came to the Keeper of the priſon, whether before the return or after; for it appears not when the King's command was for the commitment, or the ſignification of the Council came to him. It is true, that it appears that the Warrant was dated the 7th of November; but when it came to the Keeper of the priſon, that appears not at all: and therefore as for want of mentioning the ſame time of the caption, ſo for not expreſſing the ſame time when this warrant came, I think the return is faulty in form, and void.

And for apparent contradiction alſo, the return is inſufficient; for in that part of the return which is before the Warrant, it is ſaid, Quod detentus eſt per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis. The Warrant of the Lords of the Council, the very ſyllables of that Warrant are, that the Lords of the Council do will and require him ſtill to detain him, which is contrary to the firſt part of the return.

Beſides, my Lord, the Lords themſelves ſay in another place and paſſage of the Warrant, that the King commanded them to commit him, and ſo it is their commitment; ſo that upon the whole matter, there appears to be a clear contradiction in the return, and there being a contradiction in the return, it is void.

Now, my Lord, I will ſpeak a word or two to the matter of the return; and that is touching the impriſonment, per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, by the Lords of the Council without any cauſe expreſſed, and admitting of any, or either, of both of theſe to be the return: I think that by the conſtant and ſettled Laws of this Kingdom, without which we have nothing, no man can be juſtly impriſoned by either of them, without a cauſe of the commitment expreſſed in the return. My Lord, in both the laſt Arguments the Statutes have been mentioned and fully expreſſed: yet I will add a little to that which hath been ſaid.

The Statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29. that Statut i f i t were fully executed as it ought to be, every man would enjoy his liberty better than he doth.

The Law ſaith expreſsly, no Freeman ſhall be impriſoned without due proceſs of the law; out of the very body of this Act of Parliament, beſides the explanation of other Statutes, it appears, Nullus liber homo capiatur vel impriſonatur niſi per legem terræ. My Lord, I know theſe words legem terræ, do leave the queſtion where it was, if the interpretation of the Statute were not. But I think under your Lordſhip's ſhip's favour, there it muſt be intended by due courſe of law to be either by preſentment or by indictment.

My Lords, if the meaning of theſe words, per legem terræ, were but, as we uſe to ſay, according to the laws, which leaves the matter very uncertain; and per ſpeciale mandatum, &c. be within the meaning of theſe words, according to the law; then this Act had done nothing. The Act is, No Freeman ſhall be impriſoned but by the law of the land; if you will underſtand theſe words, per legem terræ, in the firſt ſenſe, this Statute ſhall extend to Villeins as will as to Freemen; for if I impriſon another man's Villein, the Villein may have an action of falſe impriſonment. But the Lords and the King (for then they both had Villeins) might impriſon them; and the Villein could have no remedy. But theſe words in the Statute per legem terræ, were to the Freeman, which ought not to be impriſoned, but by due proceſs of law: and unleſs the interpretation ſhall be this, the Freeman ſhall have no privilege above the Villein.

So that I conceive, my Lord, theſe words, per legem terræ, muſt be here ſo interpreted, as in 42 Eliz. The Bill is worth obſerving, it reciteth that divers perſons without any writ or preſentiment were caſt into priſon, &c. that it might be enacted, that it ſhould not be ſo done hereafter. The anſwer there is, that this is an Article of the great Charter, this ſhould be granted. So that it ſeems the Statute is not taken to be an explanation of that of Magna Charta, but the very words of the Statute of Magna Charta.

I will conclude with a little obſervation upon theſe words, nec ſuper eum mittimus; which words of themſelves ſignify not ſo much, a man cannot find any fit ſenſe for them.

But, my Lord, in the 7th year of King John, there was a great Charter, by which this Statute in the 9th of Henry III. whereby we are now regulated, was framed, and there the words are, nec eum in carcerem mittimus, we will not commit him to priſon; that is, the King himſelf will not: and to juſtify this, there is a ſtory of that time in Matthew Paris, and in that Book this Charter of King John is ſet down at large, which Book is very authentick, and there it is entred: and in the 9th of Henry III. he ſaith, that the Statute was renewed in the ſame words with the Charter of King John. And, my Lord, he might know it better than others, for he was the King's Chronologer in thoſe times: and therefore, my Lord, ſince there be ſo many Reaſons, and ſo many Precedents, and ſo many Statutes, which declare that no Freeman whatſoever ought to be impriſoned, but according to the laws of the land; and that the liberty of the ſubject is the higheſt inheritance that he hath; my humble requeſt is, that according to the ancient laws and privileges of this Realm, this Gentleman, my Client, may be bailed.

The Argument of Mr. Calthrop, at the King's-Bench Bar, 22 Novembris, Mich. 3 Caroli Regis.

SIR John Corbet being brought to the King's-Bench Bar, with Sir Edmund Hampden, Sir Walter Earl, and Sir John Heveningham, who were alſo brought thither by ſeveral writs of Habeas Corpus, with the ſame return; I being aſſigned by the Court of King's-Bench, upon a petition delivered, to be of Counſel with Sir John Corbet, did move that Sir John Corbet might be diſcharged of his impriſonment, and put in bail; for I did conceive that the return of this Habeas Corpus was inſufficient, both in the matter of the return, and in the manner of the return, and ſo there ought not to be a longer detaining of Sir John Corbet in priſon. For as to the manner of the return, it is not laid down preciſely, that Sir John Corbet is detained in priſon by the ſpecial commandment of the King, ſignified by the warrant of the Lords of the Council; the which is not a direct affirmation that he is detained by the ſpecial command of the King, but that the Lords of the Council by their warrant have ſignified unto him that he was committed and ſtill detained by the ſpecial command of the King.

And howſoever the Lords of the Council had ſignified that he was detained by the commandment of the King, yet it may be he was not detained by the commandment of the King; for their ſignification of the ſame by warrant may be untrue, and the warrant of the Lords of the Council that is returned in hæc verba, importeth that the Keeper of the Gatehouſe rather took upon him to return, that it was ſignified unto him by the warrant of the Lords of the Council, that Sir John Corbet was committed and detained by the ſpecial commandment of the King; becauſe if the Keeper had taken upon him to affirm it upon his return, then needed he not to have returned the warrant of the Lords of the Council: and the warrant itſelf ſheweth that he had only his information from the Lords of the Council. For their warrant is to let the Keeper know, that both the firſt commitment, and this direction for the continuing him in priſon, were and are by his Majeſty's ſpecial commandment; and I do not ſee, as this return is made, that an accord upon the caſe can lie upon the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, if Sir John Corbet was not committed nor detained by the ſpecial commandment of the King, ſo long as the warrant of the Lords of the Council be returned as it was made, becauſe he doth return the ſame as the Significavit of the Lords by their warrant. Regiſter 65. the writ of Excommunicat' Capiend' goeth, Rex vicecom' Lincoln' S. ſignificavit nob' venerabilis pater Henricus Lincolnienſis Epiſcopus per Literas ſuas Patentes quod R. ſuus Parochial' propter ſuam manifeſtam contumac' authoritate ipſius Epiſc. ordin' excom' eſt, nec ſe vult per cenſuram Eccleſiaſticam juſtic'ar' &c. tibi præcipimus quod prædict' R. per corpus ſuum ſecundum conſuetud' Angliæ juſtic' &c. And yet no man will ſay that there is an information of the King, that R. is excommunicated, but only that the Biſhop of Lincoln had ſignified unto him that R. was excommunicated. And in Fitz. Nat. Br. 663. and Regiſter 65. it appears that the form of the writ of Excommunication deliberand' is, Rex Vicecom' London Salut'. Cum Thom' Jay allutar' Londin' qui nuper ad denuntiat. venerabil' patris Archiep' Eborum pro contumaciis ſuis ratione contractus in civitate noſtra Eborum habit' ut dicebat. tanquam excom' & claves Eccleſiæ contemnent' per corp' ſuum ſecundum conſuetud' Angliæ per te juſtic' præcepimus, donec &c. eſſet ſatisfact' eid' Archiepiſcop. ad ſatisfaciendum Deo et ſanctæ eccleſiæ, ſufficientem expoſuit cautionem, per quod eidem Archiepiſcopus offic. Archidiac, London. mutuæ viciſſitudin' obtentu ſcripſit ut ipſum abſolvat ab excom' ſenten' memorata ſicut idem Archiepiſcopus per Literas ſuas patentes nob' ſignificavit, tibi præcipimus quod præd' Thom. cum tibi conſtare poterit ipſum ab excom' prædict' per prædict' Official' abſolvi a Priſon' qua detinetur ſi ea occaſione & non alia detineat' in eadem ſine dilatione deliberari fac'. And yet it can-cannot be ſaid, that although the King recited in his writ that the Archbiſhop had ſignified unto him that he had written unto the Official of the Archdeacon, that the King ſaid, that the Archbiſhop had written; for he doth not affirm ſo much preciſely, but only referreth himſelf unto the Certificate of the Archbiſhop.

Plowden 122. Buckley and Rivers's caſe, it is put, that if a man will bring an action of debt upon an obligation, and declare that it appears by the obligation that the defendant ſtood bound to the plaintiff in twenty pounds, the which he hath not paid, this declaration is not good; inſomuch as it is not alledged by matter in fact, that he was bound unto him in twenty pound, but the deed is alledged by recital only, 21 Ed. 4. 43.

Plowden Com' 126. & 143. Browning and Beeſton's caſe.

The Abbot of Waltham being appointed collector of a Diſme granted unto the King, in diſcharge of himſelf, in the Exchequer, pleadeth, Quo inter recordat' Ter. Paſc. anno 15. domini Regis Edwardi I. inter alia continetur quod R. 2. had granted unto the predeceſſors of the ſaid Abbot, that he nor any of his ſucceſſors ſhould be any collectors of any Diſmes to be granted afterwards, and it was adjudged that this plea was ill.

For the ſaying [it was contained among the Records,] it is no preciſe affirmation that the King had granted to his predeceſſors, that they ſhould be diſcharged of the collecting any Diſmes, but it is only an allegation by way of recital, and not by preciſe affirmation, the plea may not be good.

2 & 3 Mar. Dyer 117. & 118. the plaintiff's reply in bar of all pleadeth, that John Abbot of W. was ſeized of his lands in right of his Church, and ſo ſeized by the aſſent of the tenant by indenture, 14 Hen. 4. teſtat' quod prædict' Abbat' & convent' demiſerunt & tradiderunt unto the plaintiff; and ruled, that this form of pleading was ill, inſomuch as it was not alledged by preciſe affirmation, quod demiſerunt, ſed indentura teſtatur, quod demiſerunt; which is not ſufficient, inſomuch as it is only an allegation by way of recital, that the indenture doth witneſs, and the ſame indenture may witneſs ſo much, and yet not be a demiſe.

And if in pleading there muſt be direct affirmation of the matter alledged, then à fortiori in a return, which muſt be more preciſe than in pleading, and ſo by all the caſes I have formerly touched, it appeareth that this return is no expreſs affirmation of the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, that Sir John Corbet is detained in priſon by the ſpecial commandment of the King, but only an affirmation of the Lords of the Council, who had ſignified unto him that his detainment in priſon was by ſpecial command of the King.

The return which ought to be certain, and punctual, and affirmative, and not by the way of information out of another man's mouth, may not be good, as appeareth by the ſeveral books of our Law.

23 Ed. 3. Rex vic' 181. upon a Homine replegiando, againſt the Abbot of C. the Sheriff returneth that he had ſent to the Bailiff of the Abbot, that anſwered him, that he was the Villain of the Abbot, by which he might not make deliverance, and a Sicut alias was awarded, for this return was inſufficient; inſomuch that he had returned the anſwer of the Bailiff of the Abbot, where he ought to have returned the anſwer of the Abbot himſelf out of his own mouth.

Trin. 22 Ed. 2. Rot. 46. parent. vill' & Burg. Eveſque de Norwich, repl' 68. Nat. Br. Caſe 34. Fitz. Nat. Br. 65. & 34 Ed. 3. Excom' 29. the caſe appeareth to be ſuch in a treſpaſs; the defendant pleadeth, the plaintiff is excommunicate, and ſheweth forth the letter of the Biſhop of Lincoln, witneſſing that for divers contumacies, &c. and becauſe he had certified no excommunic' done by himſelf, but by another, the letter of Excommunication was annulled, for the Biſhop ought to have certified his own act, and not the act of another.

Hillarii 21 Hen. 8. Rot. 37. it appeareth by the return of an Habeas Corpus, that John Parker was committed to priſon for ſecurity of the peace, and for ſuſpicion of felony, as per mandatum domini Regis nunciatum per Robertum Peck, de Cliffords-Inn; and upon his return, John Parker was bailed: for the return Commiſſ. fuit per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, nunciatum per Robertum Peck, was not good, inſomuch that it was not a direct return that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis.

And for the firſt point, I conclude, that this return is inſufficient in form, inſomuch that it doth not make a preciſe and direct return, that he was committed and detained by the ſpecial command of the King, but only as it was ſignified by the warrant of the Lords of the Council, which will not ſerve the turn. And upon the book of 9 Hen. 6. 44. the return of the cauſe of a man's impriſonment ought to be preciſe and direct upon the Habeas Corpus, inſomuch as thereby to be able to judge of the cauſe, whether it be ſufficient or not: for there may not any doubt be taken to the return, be it true or falſe, but the Court is to accept the ſame as true; and if it be falſe, the party muſt take his remedy by action upon the caſe.

And as concerning the matter of the return, it will reſt upon theſe parts.

Firſt, Whether the return, that he is detained in priſon by ſpecial commandment of our Lord the King, be good or not, without ſhewing the nature of the commandment, or the cauſe whereupon the commitment is grounded in the return.

The ſecond is, Whether the time of the firſt commitment by the comandment of the King, not appearing to the Court, is ſufficient to detain him in priſon.

Thirdly, Whether the impriſonment of the ſubjects without cauſe ſhewed, but only by the commandment of the King, be warrantable by the Laws and Statutes of this Realm.

As to the firſt part, I find by the books of our law, that commandments of the King are of ſeveral natures, by ſome of which the impriſonment of a man's body is utterly unlawful: and by others of them, although the impriſonment may be lawful, yet the continuance of him without bail or mainpriſe, will be utterly unlawful.

There is a verbal command of the King, which is by word of mouth of the King's only; and ſuch commandment by the King, by the books of our law, will not be ſufficient either to impriſon a man, or to continue him in priſon, 16. 6. Monſtrans de fait ſi, upon an action of treſpaſs brought for cutting of trees, the defendant pleadeth that the place where he cut them is parcel of the Manor of D. whereof the King is ſeized in fee, and the King com-commanded him to cut the trees, and the opinion of the Court there is, that the plea in bar was ill, becauſe he did not ſhew any ſpecial commandment of the King; and there it is agreed by the whole Court, that if the King commandeth one to arreſt another, and the party commanded did arreſt the other, an action of treſpaſs or falſe impriſonment is maintainable againſt the party that arreſted him, although it were done in the preſence of the King. 39 H. VI. 17. where one juſtifieth the ſeizure of the goods of a perſon that is outlawed by the commandment of the King, ſuch a party being no Officer, may not in an action brought againſt him have any aid of the King; for ſuch a commandment given to one that is not an Officer, will not any ways avail him, that is to juſtify himſelf by the return of that commandment.

37 Hen. VI. 10. If the King give me a thing, and I take the ſame by his commandment by word of mouth, it is not juſtified by law; nothing may paſs without matter of Record.

10 Hen. VII. 7. & 17. 18. it is agreed, that Juſtices may command one to arreſt another that is in their view or preſence, but not one that is out of their view or preſence. (1 Croke. Holliday V. Oxenbridge.)

And Keble 10 Hen. VII. 13. ſaid, that where one is arreſted by a parol command in their view or preſence, it is fitting that a record may be made of it, inſomuch that without ſuch a record there can hardly be a juſtification in another Term.

Secondly, There is a commandment of the King by his Commiſſion, which according to Calvin's caſe in Coke's ſeventh Report, it is called by him, breve mandatum non remediabile; and by virtue of ſuch a commandment, the King may neither ſeize the goods of his ſubject, nor impriſon his body, as it is reſolved in 42 Aſſ. pl. 5. where it is agreed by all the Juſtices, that a Commiſſion to take a man's goods, or impriſon his body without indictment or ſuit of the party, or other due proceſs, is againſt the Law.

Thirdly, There is a commandment of the King, which is grounded upon a ſuggeſtion made to the King or to his Council; and if a man be committed to priſon by ſuch a ſuggeſtion, by commandment of the King, it is unlawful, and not warranted by the Law of the Realm.

The 25 of Edward III. cap. 4. de Proviſionibus, whereas it is contained in the great Charter of the Franchiſes of England, that none ſhall be impriſoned or arreſted of his Freehold or of his Franchiſes, nor of his free Cuſtoms but by the law of the land:

It is awarded, conſented and eſtabliſhed, that from henceforth none ſhall be taken by petition or ſuggeſtion made to our Sovereign Lord the King, or to his Council, until it be by indictment or preſentment of his good and lawful neighbours, where ſuch deeds are done in due manner, or by proceſs made by writ original at the common law; nor that none ſhall be arreſted of his Franchiſes, nor of his freehold, unleſs he be duly brought in, and anſwer, and forejudged of the ſame by way of law: and if any thing be done againſt the ſame, it ſhall be redreſſed and holden for nought.

37 Ed. III. cap. 10. although it be contained in the great Charter, that no man be taken or impriſoned or put out of his freehold, without due proceſs of the law; nevertheleſs divers perſons make falſe ſuggeſtions to the King himſelf, as well for malice as otherwiſe, whereby the King is often greived, and divers of the Realm put in great damages, contrary to the form of the ſame Statute.

Wherefore it is ordained, that all they that make ſuch ſuggeſtions, be ſent with their ſuggeſtions to the Chancellor or Treaſurer, and they and every of them find ſureties to purſue their ſuggeſtions, and endure the ſame pain as the other ſhould have had, in caſe that his ſuggeſtion be found untrue; and that then proceſs of the law be made againſt them, without being taken or impriſoned againſt the form of the ſame Charter, and other Statutes.

So that it appears by theſe ſeveral Statutes, that ſuch commandments of the King as are grounded upon ſuggeſtion, either made to himſelf or to his Council, for the impriſonment of a man, are againſt the law.

Fourthly, I find that there is a commandment of the King which is made under his hand, with his ſignet; for in the fourth and the fifth of Philip and Mary, Dyer. 162. where the Statute of 1 Ric. 2. cap. 11. reſtraineth the Warden of the Fleet for letting any man at large that is in upon judgement at the ſuit of any man, except it be by Writ or other commandment of the King; it was doubted, whether the Queen by letter under her hand and privy-ſignet doth give commandment to the Warden of the Fleet to ſuffer a man that is there in execution to go about his buſineſs, or the affairs of the Queen; whether this be a warrantable command or not within the Statute: and the Law hath always been conceived upon that book, that ſuch a commandment is not warrantable by Law. And if ſuch a command will not ſerve the turn, to give unto a man his liberty, which the law favoureth, and had the countenance of an Act of Parliment for the doing of it; then I conceive it ſhould be a more ſtrong caſe, the King ſhould not have power by his commandment to impriſon a man without due proceſs of the Law, and reſtrain him of his liberty when there had been ſo many Acts of Parliment made for the liberty of the ſubjects.

Fifthly, I do find that there is the commandment of the King, which is by his Writ under the Great-Seal, or the Seal of the Court out of which it iſſueth, Regiſt. f. 69, & 70. In the Writ de cautione admittenda, I find the words, mandatum Regis expounded to be breve Regis, for the Writ goeth: *Rex vic' ſalutem. Cum nuper ad requiſitionem S. de Iſle Canonici Lincolne venerabilis Patris H. Lincoln. Epiſcopi ipſo in remotis agente Vicarii general. per Literas ſuas Patentes nobis ſignificantes Nicho. B. dict. Stamf. 72. 5 E. III. c. 8. 1 E. III. c. 9. saith, that every Capias in a personal action is a commandment of the King, for it is Præcipimus tibi quod capias &c. and yet the defendant, as there it is said, is repleviſable by the Common Law. 7 R. 20. a. Calvin's case, saith that there are two kind of Writs, viz. brevia mandatoria & remedialia, & brevia mandatoria & non remedialia. Brevia mandatoria & remedialia, are Writs of right, formedon, &c. debts, treſpaſſes, and ſhortly all Writs real and perſonal, whereby the party wronged is to recover ſomewhat, and to be remedied for that wrong which is done unto him.

Sixthly, I do find by our Books of Law, and by the Regiſter, that this ſpecial mandatum domini Regis, is expounded to be this Writ, and that the law taketh no notice of any other ſpeciale mandatum, than by this Writ. The which being ſo, when the return is made, that he is impriſoned and detained in priſon by the ſpecial commandment of the King, how can the Court adjudge upon this return, that Sir John Corbet ought to be kept in priſon, and not to be bailed; when the nature of the ſpecial commandment is not ſet forth in the return, whereby it may appear unto the Court that he is not bailable? In Bracton, c. 12. 112. you ſhall ſee a Writ reciting, Præcipimus tibi quod non implacites nec implacitari permittas talem de libero tenemento ſuo in tali villa, ſine ſpeciali præcepto noſtro vel Capitalis Juſticiar' noſtri.

And the reaſon of it there is given, quia nemo de libero tenemento ſine brevi ſive libello conventionali niſi gratis voluerit reſpondebit. So as the exception of ſpecial commandment by the very book, appeareth to be breve ſive libellus conventionalis, Regiſt. 271. the Writ of Manucaption goeth in this manner: Rex vic. Salut. Cum nuper aſſignaverimus dilectos & fideles noſtros A. B & C. D. ad inquiſitiones de forſtallariis & tranſgreſſionibus contra formam ſtatuti dudum apud Winton. editi in com. tuo faciend. & ad illos quos inde culpabiles invenirent. capiend. & in Priſona noſtra ſalvo cuſtod. faciend. donec aliud inde præcepiſſemus quod C. D. & E. pro hujuſmodi forſtallamentis & tranſgreſſionibus unde coram præfat. A. B. & C. indict. fuerint, capt. & in priſona de L. detent. exiſt. à qua deliberari non poſſunt, ſine mandato noſtro ſpeciali, nos volentes eiſdem C. D. & E. gratiam in hac parte facere ſpecialem, tibi præcipimus quod ſi prædict. C. D. & E. occaſione prædict. & non alia in Priſona prædict. detineantur, & pro tranſgreſſionibus illis ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem Regni noſtri Angliæ replegiabiles exiſtunt &c. tunc impos' C. D. & E. à Priſona prædict. ſi ea occaſione & non alia detineantur in eadem interim deliberari facias per manucapt. ſupradict. & habeas ibi hunc coram præfat. Juſticiar. nomina manucapt. illorum & hoc breve.

And the expoſition of this ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, mentioned in the Writ, is expounded to be breve domini Regis, and thereupon is this Writ directed unto the Sheriff for the delivery of them.

And ſo much for the firſt branch of the firſt part: I conclude, that the ſpecial command of the King without ſhewing the nature of the commandment of the King, is too general, and therefore inſufficient; for he ought to have returned the nature of the commandment of the King, whereby the Court might have adjudged upon it, whether it were ſuch a commandment that the impriſonment of Sir John Corbet be lawful or not; and whether it were ſuch a commandment of the King, that although the impriſonment were lawful at the firſt, yet he might be bailed by law.

And as for the general return of ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, without ſhewing the cauſe of the impriſonment either ſpecial or general, I hold, that for that cauſe alſo the return is inſufficient.

Firſt, in regard of the Habeas Corpus, which is the commandment of the King only, made the 15th of November.

According to the Teſte of the Writ, commanding the Keeper of the Gatehouſe to have the body of Sir John Corbet, una cum cauſa detentionis, & ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum ea quæ curia noſtra de eo ad tunc ibid. ordinar. contingat'. So as the commandment of the Writ being to ſhew the cauſe of his detaining in priſon, the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, doth not give a full anſwer unto the Writ; unleſs the cauſe of the detainment in priſon be returned; and the Court doth not know how to give their judgment upon him, either for his impriſonment, or for his diſcharge, according to the purport of the Writ, when there is not a cauſe returned. And foraſmuch as upon an Excommengement certified, it hath been adjudged oftentimes that Certificates were inſufficient, where the cauſe of the commitment hath not been certified; that the Court might adjudge whether the Eccleſiaſtical Judges, who pronounced the excommunication had power over the original cauſe according to the Book of 14 Hen. IV. 14. 8. Rep. 68. Trollop's caſe, and 20 Edw. III. Excommengement 9.

So upon an Habeas Corpus in this Court, where a man hath been committed by the Chancellor of England, by the Council of England, Marches of Wales, Warden of the Stanneries, High-Commiſſion, Admiralty, Dutchy, Court of Requeſt, Commiſſion of Sewers or Bankrupts; it hath ſeveral times been adjudged that the return was inſufficient, where the particular cauſe of impriſonment hath not been ſhewn, to the intent that it might appear, that thoſe that committed him had juriſdiction over the cauſe, otherwiſe he ought to be diſcharged by the law: and I ſpare to recite particular cauſes in every kind of theſe, becauſe there are ſo many precedents of them in ſeveral ages of every King of this Realm: and it is an infallible maxim of the law, That as the Court of the King's-Bench, and Judges, ought not to deny an Habeas Corpus unto any priſoner that ſhall demand the ſame, by whomſoever he be committed; ſo ought the cauſe of his impriſonment to be ſhewn upon the return, ſo that the Court may adjudge of the cauſe, whether the cauſe of the impriſonment be lawful or not. And becauſe I will not trouble the Court with ſo many precedents, but ſuch as ſhall ſuit with the cauſe in queſtion, I will only produce and vouch ſuch precedents, where the party was committed either by the commandment of the King, or otherwiſe by the commandment of the Privy-Council, which Stamford. fol. 72. termeth the mouth of the King; ſuch Acts as are done by the Privy-Council, being as Acts done by the King himſelf.

And in all theſe cauſes you ſhall find that there is a cauſe returned as well as a ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis &c. or mandatum Privati Concilii domini Regis, whereby the Court may adjudge of the cauſe, and bail them if they ſhall ſee cauſe.

In the 8th of Hen. VII. upon return of an Habeas Corpus awarded for the body of one Roger Sherry, it appeareth that he was committed by the Mayor of Windſor for ſuſpicion of felony, and ad ſectam ipſius Regis pro quibuſdam feloniis & tranſgreſſionibus ac per mandatum domini Regis. 21 Hen. VII. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus ſent for the body of Hugh Pain, it appeared that he was committed to priſon, per mandatum dominorum Privati Concilii domini Regis pro ſuſpicione feloniæ.

Primo Henrici Octavi, Rot. 9. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus ſent for the body of one Thomas Harriſon and others, it appears that they were committed to the Earl of Shrewsbury, being Marſhal of the houſhold, per mandatum domini Regis, & pro ſuſpicione feloniæ, & pro homicidio facto ſuper Mare.

3 & 4 Philip. & Mariæ, upon a return of an Habeas Corpus, ſent for the body of one Peter Man, it appeareth that he was committed pro ſuſpicione feloniæ, ac per mandatum domini Regis & Reginæ.

4 & 5 Philipti & Mariæ, upon the return of an Habeas Corpus ſent for the body of one Thomas Newport, it appeared that he was committed to the Tower, pro ſuſpicione contrafact' monetæ per privatum Concilium domini Regis & Reginæ.

33 Elizabethæ upon the return of an Habeas Corpus for the body of one Laurence Brown; it appeareth that he was committed, per mandatum Privati Concilii dominæ Reginæ pro diverſis cauſis ipſam Reginam tangent' ac etiam pro ſuſpicione proditionis.

So as by all theſe precedents it appeareth where the return is either, per mandatum domini Regis, or per mandatum dominorum Privati Concilii domini Regis; there is alſo a cauſe over and beſides the mandatum returned. As to that which may be objected, that per mandatum domini Regis, or Privati Concilii domini Regis, is a good return of his impriſonment, I anſwer, Firſt, That there is a cauſe: for it is not to be preſumed that the King or Council would commit one to priſon without ſome offence; and therefore this mandatum being occaſion'd by the offence or fault, the offence or fault muſt be the cauſe, and not the command of the King or Council, which is occaſioned by the cauſe.

Secondly, It appears that the juriſdiction of the Privy-Council is a limited juriſdiction, for they have no power in all cauſes, their power being reſtrained in certain cauſes by ſeveral Acts of Parliament, as it appeareth by the Statute of 20 E. III. c. 11. 25 E. III. c. 1. Stat. 4. (vide 4 Inſtit. p. 53.) the private petition in Parliament permitted in the 1 R. II. where the Commons petition that the Privy-Council might not make any ordinance againſt the Common Law, Cuſtoms or Statutes of the Realm; the 4 Hen. IV. cap. 3. 13 Hen. IV. 7. 31 Hen. VI. And their juriſdiction being a limited juriſdiction, the cauſe and grounds of their commitment ought to appear, whereby it may appear if the Lords of the Council did commit him for ſuch a cauſe as was within their juriſdiction: for if they did command me to be committed to priſon for a cauſe whereof they had not juriſdiction; the Court ought to diſcharge me of this impriſonment. And howſoever the King is Vicarius Dei in terra, yet Bracton, cap. 8. fol. 107. ſaith, quod nihil aliud poteſt Rex in terris cum ſit Miniſter Dei & Vicarius, quam ſolum quod de jure poteſt, nec obſtat, quod dicitur quod principi placet, legis habet vigorem, quia ſequitur in fine legis cum lege Regia quæ de ejus imperio lata eſt; id eſt, non quicquid de voluntate Regis temere præſumptum eſt, ſed animo condendi Jura, ſed quod concilio Magiſtratuum ſuorum Rege author. præſtant & habita ſuper hoc deliberatione & tract. rect. fuer. definit. Poteſtat. itaque ſua juris eſt, & non injuriæ. The which being ſo, then alſo it ought to appear upon what cauſe the King committeth one to priſon; whereby the Judges which are indifferent beween the King and his Subjects, may judge whether his commitment be againſt the Laws and Statutes of this Realm or not.

Thirdly, It is to be obſerved, that the King's command by his Writ of Habeas Corpus, is ſince the commandment of the King for his commitment; and this being the latter commandment, ought to be obeyed: wherefore that commanding a return of the body cum cauſa detentionis, there muſt be a return of ſome other cauſe than per mandatum domini Regis, the ſame commandment being before the return of the Writ.

Paſch. 9 E. III. pl. 30. fol. 56. upon a Writ of Ceſſavit brought in the County of Northumberland, the Defendants plead, That by reaſon of the Country being deſtroyed by wars with the Scots, King Ed. II. gave command that no Writ of Ceſſavit ſhould be brought during the wars with Scotland, and that the King had ſent his Writ to ſurceaſe the plea, and he averreth that the wars with Scotland did continue.

Hearle that giveth the rule ſaith, That we have command by the King that now is, to hold this plea, wherefore we will not ſurceaſe for any Writ of the King that is dead. And ſo upon all theſe reaſons and precedents formerly alledged, I conclude, that the return that Sir John Corbet was committed and detained in priſon, per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, without ſhewing the nature of the commandment, by which the Court may judge whether the commandment be of ſuch a nature as he ought to be detained in priſon, and that without ſhewing the cauſe upon which the commandment of the King is grounded, is not good. As to the ſecond part, which is, whether the time of the commitment by the return of the Writ, not appearing unto the Court, the Court ought to detain him in priſon or no? I conceive that he ought not to be continued in priſon, admitting that the firſt commitment by the command of the King were lawful; yet when he hath continued in priſon by ſuch reaſonable time, as may be thought fit for that offence for which he is committed, he ought to be brought to anſwer, and not to continue ſtill in priſon without being brought to anſwer.

For it appears by the books of our laws, that liberty is a thing ſo favoured by the law, that the law will not ſuffer the continuance of a man in priſon, for any longer time than of neceſſity it muſt; and therefore the law will neither ſuffer the Party, Sheriffs or Judges to continue a man in priſon by their power and their pleaſure, but doth ſpeed the delivery of a man out of priſon, with as reaſonable expedition as may be.

And upon this reaſon it is reſolved in 1 & 2 El. Dyer 175. & 8 Ed. IV. 13. That howſoever the law alloweth that there may be no term between the teſte of an original Writ and the return of the ſame, where there is only a ſummons, and no impriſonment of the body; yet it will not allow that there ſhall be a term between the teſte of a Writ of Capias, and the return of the ſame, where the body of a man is to be impriſoned: inſomuch that it will give no way, that the party ſhall have any power to continue the body of a man impriſoned any longer time than needs muſt. 39 E. III. 7. 10 H. VII. 11. 6 E. IV. 69. 11 E. IV. 9. 48 E. III. 1. 17 E. III. 1 & 2 Hen. VII.

Keilwey's

Keilawey's reports do all agree, that if a Capias ſhall be awarded againſt a man for the apprehending of his body, and the Sheriff will return the Capias, that is awarded againſt the party, a non eſt inventus, or that languidus eſt in priſona, yet the law will allow the party againſt whom it is awarded, for the avoiding of his corporal penance and dureſs of impriſonment, to appear gratis, and for to anſwer.

For the law will not allow the Sheriff by his falſe return to keep one in priſon longer than needs muſt, 38 Aſſ. pl. 22. Brooks impriſonment 100. ſaith, That it was determined in Parliament that a man is not to be detained in priſon, after he hath made tender of his fine for his impriſonment; therefore I deſire your Lordſhip that Sir John Corbet may not be longer kept in durance, but be diſcharged according to the law.

L. C. Juſtice. Mr. Attorney, you have heard many learned arguments, if you be provided to anſwer preſently, we will hear you; but if you will have a longer day, for that you are not provided to argue, you may, we will give it you.

Doderidge. If you will, you may ſee the precedents; it may be you have not ſeen ſome of them, and we muſt ſee them too.

Attorn. Gen. Heath. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, the Gentlemen that be of Counſel with the Knights at the Bar, they have ſaid much, and ſpoken very long for their Clients, and to good purpoſe and pertinently. It is a cauſe that carrieth with it a great deal of weight, both towards the King and his Subjects alſo, and I am not ſo haſty to put myſelf upon the main point of this cauſe, when it is almoſt time for your Lordſhip to riſe.

My Lord, the Gentlemen have ſeverally ſpoken, and given and inſiſted upon ſeveral reaſons, and they have cited many precedents. I could ſay ſomething of them at this preſent, and that ſome of them have been miſtaken; and therefore I beſeech your Lordſhip, that I may have time to anſwer, that I may not wrong the cauſe of the King's part, or ſlight the cauſe on the ſubjects part.

But that which I deſire to ſay now, is, that theſe Gentlemen have all of them gone in one form, to divide the cauſe into two parts:

The firſt, the form of the return.

The ſecond, the matter of the return.

For the form, methinks we may put an end to that now, if your Lordſhip pleaſe, that we may have no return to that another day, but I may apply myſelf unto the matter of the return.

To the form of the return they have taken divers exceptions, but they eſpecially inſiſted upon two main heads:

Firſt, That the return is not good, becauſe it is not an abſolute return. I confeſs the ground is well laid, and the major is good, that if this return be not poſitively the return of the Warden of the Fleet himſelf, but the relation of another, it is no good return, therefore I need ſpend no time in that, the ground being well laid. But under your Lordſhip's favour, the major propoſition I deny, we differ only in that; for I ſay that this return is certain, and that it is not the words of any man elſe, but the expreſs words of the Warden himſelf, and that this is added ex abundanti to give ſatisfaction to the Court, that he had order to make the return: therefore I deſire your Lordſhip to caſt your eyes upon the ſubſtance of the return, and diſtinguiſh it into parts.

The words are, Detentus eſt in priſona ſub cuſtodia mea per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, mihi ſignificatum per Warrantum duorum Privati Concilii dicti domini Regis, &c. If he had turned theſe words, and ſaid, Detent' eſt prout mihi ſignificat' per Warrantum duorum Privati Concilii per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, then it might be taken to be the words of the Lords of the Council: but the firſt words being poſitive, Detentus eſt per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, that is ſufficient, and the reſt is ſurpluſage, and he doth not ſay, prout mihi ſignificat' but mihi ſignificat' only; which is abſolute, and the reſolution thereof reſteth more in your Lordſhip's expounding of the words, than in putting any caſe upon them.

The ſecond exception is taken to the form of the return, for that there is not the cauſe of the impriſonment returned, but of the detaining alone.

My Lord, I ſay no more at preſent to that, but this, no man is bound to anſwer more than that which is the contents of the Writ. But the Writ it may be to know ſpecially the cauſe of the detaining, or what the cauſe of the caption is only, and if the Officer make anſwer to that which is required of him in the Writ, it is ſufficient. It may be, there be precedents both ways, I am ſure there are for detentions, and there is no cauſe why the Officer ſhould ſhew the time of his commitment: but if the priſoner ſhall deſire it, your Lordſhip may grant him a Writ, to ſhew the cauſe both of his caption and detention alſo.

Thirdly, They ſay that this return is uncertain, and that it is the Warrant of the Lords of the Council, and not of the King, by which he is committed.

For that, my Lord, I ſay, that if it had all been left out, and he had only ſaid, Detentus fuit per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, it had been ſufficient: but when he doth more, it is ſuperfluous, and not neceſſary, for it appeared before by whom he was committed; and when he returns the Warrant of the Lords of the Council, it is not their words that commit him: But they being the repreſentative body of the King, they do expreſs what the King's command is, but they ſignify nothing of their own; and therefore I deſire your Lordſhip to deliver your opinion in that point of the return, whether it be poſitive or no.

This cauſe, as it greatly concerns the Subjects, ſo it much concerns the King too. I am ſorry there ſhould be any occaſion to bring theſe things in queſtion; but ſince it is now here, I hope I ſhall give ſatisfaction to your Lordſhip, and to the parties too, and I deſire that I may have till Monday for it.

L. C. Juſtice. I think it is not beſt for us to declare our opinions by piece-meals, but upon all the caſe together, and as you are a ſtranger to the return, ſo are we; and there be many Precedents and Acts of Parliament not printed, which we muſt ſee.

Doderidge. This is the greateſt cauſe that ever I knew in this Court, our judgments that we give between party and party, between the King and the meaneſt ſubject, ought to be maturely adviſed on, for ſo are the entries of our judgments, Quod matura deliberatione habita, It was judged, &c. And we muſt ſee the Precedents and Acts of Parliament, that we hear mentioned.

Juſtice Jones. Mr. Attorney, if it be ſo that the Law of Magna Charta and other Statutes be now in force, and the Gentlemen be not delivered by this Court, how ſhall they be delivered? Apply yourſelf to ſhew us any other way to deliver them.

Doderidge. Yea, or elſe they ſhall have a perpetual impriſonment.

Per Curiam, Monday was appointed for the Attorney's argument, and in the interim the Counſel for the Gentlemen, were by order appointed to attend the Judges with all the precedents, and unprinted Statutes which they mentioned, and that they ſhould let the Attorney ſee them alſo.

And the Gentlemen being asked if they deſired to come again, anſwered they did, and a rule was entered for it.

Monday, 26 November 1627. Tertio Michaelis 3° Caroli Regis in Banco Regis.

Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, Sir Edmund Hampden, Knights, were brought to the Bar.

Attorn. Gen. Heath. MAY it pleaſe your Lordſhip, theſe Gentlemen, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, upon their motion to this Court to have their Habeas Corpus, and that themſelves and the cauſe of their detaining them in their ſeveral priſons, might be brought before your Lordſhip, had it granted to them.

My Lord, at the firſt motion of it, the knowledge thereof coming, and that they had ſuch a deſire, his Majeſty was very willing to grant unto them (as to all his ſubjects) this common caſe of Juſtice; and tho' it be a caſe which concerns himſelf in a high degree, yet he hath been ſo gracious and ſo juſt, as not to refuſe to leave the examination and determination thereof to the laws of this kingdom.

My Lord, it is very true that this is a very great cauſe, and hath raiſed a great expectation, and for the manner of it, more than was neceſſary; but, my Lord, I am afraid theſe Gentlemen whom it concerns, have rather adviſed their Counſel, than their Counſel them: but I ſhall take the caſe as now I find it, and as the Gentlemen's Counſel, on the other ſide, have led me the way to it.

My Lord, the exceptions that have been taken by the Counſel on the other ſide, to the return made by the Warden of the Fleet, and the reſt of the Guardians of ſeveral priſons, have been two. For renewing of your Lordſhip's memory, we will read one of the returns, they are all alike.

Then the return was read for Sir John Heveningham, by Mr. Keeling.

Attorn. Gen. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, againſt this return, the Counſel of the Gentlemen have taken ſome exceptions, and have divided their objections into two main points, the one the form, the other the matter. To the form they have objected four ſeveral things.

Firſt, That the return is not poſitive, but referred to the ſignification made by another, as the Lords of the Council.

Secondly, That the keepers of the priſons have not returned the cauſe of the commitment, but the cauſe of the cauſe, which is not good.

Thirdly, That the return is imperfect, for that it ſhews only the cauſe of the detaining in priſon, and not the cauſe of the firſt commitment.

And laſtly, That the return is contradictory in itſelf, for that in the firſt part thereof there is a certification that the detaining of theſe Gentlemen in priſon, is per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; and when the Warrant of the Lords of the Council is ſhewed, it appears that the commitment is by the command of the King, ſignified by the Lords of the Council: and by your Lordſhip's favour, I will give a ſeveral anſwer to every of theſe ſeveral objections. And for the firſt, that the return is not poſitive and affirmative, but depends upon and hath relation to ſome other, and therefore it is not good; I do agree that the ground is true, that if the return be not poſitive, it is not good: we differ only in the minor, that the return is not poſitive and affirmative; for I agree that theſe Book caſes, that have been put, are good law: as 27 Aſſ. pl. 65. that if the Sheriff return that he hath ſent to the Bailiff of the Hundred, and he gives him that anſwer, that is no good return; for the Sheriff ought to make the return as of his own act without naming of the Bailiff of the Hundred in his return: for if he return, Quod mandavi Ballivo itineranti qui habet retorn' omnium brevium & executionem eorund. per Cartam domini Regis qui mihi dedit nullum reſponſum; this is not good, if he were not Bailiff of a franchiſe or ſigniory, for ſo is 21 H. VII. fol. 4.

There hath been cited to maintain theſe objections, 20 Ed. III. The record I have peruſed, and there I find that the Biſhop ſaid, that it is found in Archivis in the record, &c. that he was excommunicated; but it was found to be in Archivis, &c. and that is no poſitive return that it is ſo. I will oppugn what hath been ſaid by the Counſel on the other ſide; it muſt be granted that if the return here be not poſitive, it is imperfect, and in 5 H. VII. 28. it is ſaid that an imperfect return is no return at all, it is all one; but if the return was ſo, that was not much material, for then it were but temporary, and it might be amended: but, my Lord, they have miſtaken the minor propoſition, for they have taken it as granted that there is an imperfect return from the Lords of the Council. My Lord, I ſhall intreat you to caſt your eyes upon the return, and you ſhall find the firſt words poſitive and affirmative: the words are, Quod detentus eſt ſub cuſtodia mea per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis: the other words, mihi ſignificatum, follow after, but are not part of the affirmation made before it. But if they will have it as they ſeem to underſtand it, then they muſt return the words thus: Quod teſtificatum, or ſignificatum eſt mihi per dominos Privati Concilii quod detentus eſt per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; and then indeed it had not been their own proper return, but the ſignification of another, the Lords of the Council: the turning of the ſentence will reſolve this point, the thing itſelf muſt ſpeak for itſelf. I conceive, by your Lordſhip's favour, that it is plain and clear, here is a poſitive return, that the detaining is by the commandment of the King: and the reſt of the return is rather for ſatisfaction to myſelf and the Court, than otherwiſe any part of the return.

The

The ſecond objection hath dependance upon this, as that he hath returned the cauſe of the cauſe, and not the cauſe of itſelf: wherein under your Lordſhip's favour they are utterly miſtaken; for the return is affirmative, Ego Johannes Liloe teſtifico, &c. I know that among the Logicians there are two cauſes, there is Cauſa cauſans, and Cauſa cauſata: the Cauſa cauſans here in this caſe is not the warrant from the Lords of the Council, for that is Cauſa cauſata: but the primary and original cauſe, which is Cauſa cauſans, is ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; the other is but the Council's ſignification or teſtification, or warrant for him that made the return.

To the third objection, that the return is imperfect, becauſe it ſhews only the cauſe of the detaining in priſon, and not the cauſe of the firſt commitment:

My Lords, for that I ſhall not inſiſt much upon it, for that I did ſay the laſt day, which I muſt ſay again, it is ſufficient for an Officer of the Law to anſwer that point of the Writ which is in command.

Will your Lordſhip pleaſe to hear the Writ read, and then to ſee whether the Wardens of the priſons have not made anſwer to ſo much as was in command? Then the Writ was read by Mr. Keeling.

Attorn. Gen. My Lord, the Writ itſelf clears the objection, for it is to have the Party mentioned in it, and the cauſe of his detention returned into this Court; and therefore the anſwer to that is ſufficient. Only, my Lord, the Warden of the Fleet, and the reſt of the keepers of the priſons, had dealt prudently in their proceedings, if they had only ſaid, that they were detained per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, and it had been good, and they might have omitted the reſt: but becauſe if they ſhould make a falſe return they were liable to the actions of the Party, they did diſcreetly to have the certification of the Lords of the Council in ſuſpicion, that if this return was not true they were liable to the actions of theſe Gentlemen.

In 9 H. VI. 40, 44. it is ſaid, that whatſoever the cauſe be that is returned, it muſt be accepted by the Court; they muſt not doubt of the truth of the return, and the Officer that ſhall return it, is liable to an action if the return is falſe; and therefore the Guardian of the priſons did wiſely, becauſe they knew this was a caſe of great expectation to ſhew from whom they had their Warrant, and ſo to ſee whether the cauſe returued be true or not.

The laſt objection to the return is, that it is contradictory in itſelf, as that the firſt part of it is, that they are detained in priſon, per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; but in this relation of it, it ſhews that they are detained by the command of the Lords of the Council, for the words of their Warrant are, to require you ſtill to detain him, &c.

But, my Lord, if they will be pleaſed to ſee the whole Warrant together, they ſhall find that the Lords of the Council ſpeak not their own words or command in that Warrant, but they ſay that you are to take notice of it, as the words and command of the King; for, my Lord, the Lords of the Council are the ſervants to the King, they ſignify his Majeſty's pleaſure to your Lordſhip; and they ſay, it is his Majeſty's pleaſure you ſhould know that the firſt commitment, and this preſent detaining him in priſon, are by his Majeſty's ſpecial commandment.

And this, my Lord, is all that I will ſay for the ſufficiency of the form of the return, to prove that it is ſufficient.

Touching the matter of the return, the main point thereof, it is but a ſingle queſtion, and I hope, my Lord, of no great difficulty; and that is, whether they be repleviſable, or not repleviſable? It appears that the commitment is not in a legal and ordinary way, but that it is per ſpeciale mandatum domini regis; which implies, not only the fact done, but ſo extraordinarily done, that it is notorious to be his Majeſty's immediate Act and Will, it ſhould be ſo; whether in this caſe they ſhould be bailable or not in this Court, which I acknowledge to be the higheſt Court of Judicature for ſuch a caſe as is in queſtion.

The Counſel on the other ſide deſire, that they may be bailed, and have concluded that they may not be remanded; their grounds of argument (though they were many that did ſpeak) I have in my collection divided into five points:

The firſt was, reaſons that they muſt be ſo, ariſing from the inconveniences that would fall to the ſubjects, if it ſhonld not be ſo in the main points of their liberty.

The ſecond was, they ſhewed divers Authorities out of their Law-books, which they endeavorued to apply.

The third was, The Petition of the Commons anſwered by ſeveral Kings in Parliament.

The fourth was, Acts of Parliament in print.

The laſt was, Precedents of divers times, which they alledged to prove, that men committed by the King's commandment, and by the commandment of the Lords of the Privy-Council, (which I conceive to be all one, for the body of the Privy-Council repreſents the King himſelf,) that upon ſuch commitment in ſuch cauſes men have been bailed.

In the courſe of my arguments, I will follow their method: firſt, to anſwer their reaſons, and then thoſe Books which they have cited, which I conceive to be pertinent to this queſtion, and then the Petition and Anſwer made in Parliament, and then their Acts of Parliament, next their Precedents; and laſtly, I will give your Lordſhip ſome reaſons of my own, which I hope ſhall ſufficiently ſatisfy your Lordſhip and all others, but the parties themſelves, for I except them.

My Lord, the great and mighty reaſon that they inſiſted upon, was the inconveniences that might come to the ſubjects in their liberties, if this return ſhould be good; and this reaſon they inferred out of records and books of the Common Law, which gives the liberty of the ſubjects; I do acknowledge that the liberty of the ſubject is juſt, and that it is the inheritance of the ſubject, but yet it is their inheritance ſecundum legem terræ.

My Lords, they put many caſes likewiſe to enforce it, 1 & 2 Eliz. Dyer, fo. 175. that the continuance of a Capias ſhall be from term to term, without a term betwixt, becauſe otherwiſe the party defendant may be kept too long in priſon; and 38 Aſſ. pl. 22. Broke tit. Impriſonment 100. that impriſonment is but to detain the party till he have made fine to the King, and therefore the King cannot juſtly detain him in priſon after the fine tendred; and 16 H. VI. monſtrans de faict 182. if the King command me to arreſt a man, and thereupon I do arreſt him, he may have an action of falſe impriſonment, or of treſpaſs againſt me, though it be done in the King's preſence: and 1 H. VII. 4. the diſcourſe of Huſſey, where he ſaith that Sir John Markham delivered unto King Edward the fourth, that he ſhould not arreſt upon treaſon or felony any of his ſubjects, becauſe he could not wrong his ſubjects by ſuch arreſt, for they could not have remedy againſt him.

Theſe, my Lord, are the cauſes that they inſiſted upon for this purpoſe.

To the two firſt, I ſhall give but one anſwer; which is, that the reſtraint in theſe two caſes, and moſt of the other caſes before cited, appears to be in the ordinary courſe of Judicature fit for Weſtminſter-Hall, and not for the King's Council-Table. A Writ of Capias was the firſt original of it, and therefore not to be applied to the cauſe of ours.

And for the other two caſes, the law preſumeth that the active part of them is not ſo proper for the Majeſty of a King, who ever doth theſe things by his ſubordinate Officers; but that the ſubject ſhould not be committed by the King, was never heard of, for the King may commit any man at his pleaſure, but that is not our caſe: but whether when the King hath committed one, he muſt render a cauſe of that commitment, that it may appear whether the party be bailable or not, or elſe the party muſt be delivered.

The Book 9 E. III. fol. 16. pl. 30. cited of a Ceſſavit, the King having by Proclamation commanded that in the County of Northumberland, no Ceſſavit ſhould be brought, &c. during the war; the tenant pleadeth this command, and it was denied him, and he, notwithſtanding that, was commanded to plead; but the reaſon thereof was, becauſe the commandment thereof was given by E. II. who being dead, the commandment was determined.

The Book of Edward the third, 4. fol. 16. is indeed, where the commandment was given by the ſame King, and that was likewiſe denied him; for the King cannot command your Lordſhip or any other Court of Juſtice, to proceed otherwiſe than according to the Laws of this Kingdom; for it is part of your Lordſhip's oath, to judge according to the Law of the Kingdom. But, my Lord, there is a great difference between thoſe legal commands, and that abſolute Poteſtas, that a Sovereign hath, by which a King commands; but when I call it abſoluta poteſtas, I do not mean that it is ſuch a power as that a King may do what he pleaſeth, for he hath rules to govern himſelf by, as well as your Lordſhips, who are ſubordinate Judges under him. The difference is, the King is the head of the ſame fountain of Juſtice, which your Lordſhip adminiſters to all his ſubjects; all Juſtice is derived from him, and what he doth, he doth not as a private perſon, but as the head of the Commonwealth, as Juſticiarius Regni, yea, the very eſſence of Juſtice under God upon earth, is in him: and ſhall not we generally, not as ſubjects only, but as Lawyers, who govern themſelves by the rules of the Law, ſubmit to his commands, but make inquiries whether they be lawful, and ſay that the King doth not this or that in courſe of Juſtice?

If your Lordſhip ſitting here ſhall proceed according to Juſtice, who calleth your actions in queſtion, except there are ſome errours in the proceeding, and then you are ſubject to a Writ of Errour.

But who ſhall call in queſtion the Actions or the Juſtice of the King, who is not to give any account for them? as in this our caſe, that he commits a ſubject, and ſhews no cauſe for it.

The King commits and often ſhews no cauſe, for it is ſometimes generally, Per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, ſometimes Pro certis cauſis ipſum dominum Regem moventibus; but if the King do this, ſhall it not be good? It is all one when the commitment is Per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, and when it is Pro certis cauſis ipſum dominum Regem moventibus; and it is the ſame if the commitment be Certis de cauſis ipſum dominum Regem tangentibus.

And, my Lord, unleſs the Return to you doth open the ſecrets of the commitment, your Lordſhip cannot judge whether the party ought by Law to be remanded, or delivered: and therefore if the King allow and give warrant to thoſe that make the return, that they ſhall expreſs the cauſe of the commitment, as many times he doth, either for ſuſpicion of felony, or making money, or the like; we ſhall ſhew your Lordſhip that in theſe cauſes this Court in its Juriſdiction were proper to try theſe criminal cauſes, and your Lordſhip doth proceed in them although the commitment be Per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, which hath not a ſecret in it in theſe cauſes, for with the warrant he ſendeth your Lordſhip the cauſe of the committing; and when theſe warrants are made and brought into this Court, your Lordſhip may proceed: but if there be no cauſe expreſſed, this Court hath always uſed to remand them; for it hath been uſed, and it is to be intended a matter of State, and that it is not ripe nor timely for it to appear.

My Lord, the main fundamental grounds of Arguments upon this caſe begins with Magna Charta, from thence have grown ſtatutes for explanation thereof, ſeveral Petitions of Parliament, and Precedents for expedition; I ſhall give anſwers to them all.

For Magna Charta, in the 29th Chapter, hath theſe words; No Freeman ſhall be taken nor impriſoned or diſſeiſed of his freehold, liberties, nor free cuſtoms, nor be outlawed, or exiled, nor any other way deſtroyed, nor we will not paſs upon him nor condemn him, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Realm.

My Lord, this Statute hath been many times confirmed, the Lord Coke numbred up the number to be about twenty; and we are to conclude on this, it is the foundation of our liberties.

No Freeman can be impriſoned but by legale judicium Parium ſuorum, aut per legem terræ. But will they have it underſtood that no man ſhould be committed, but firſt he ſhall be indicted or preſented? I think that no learned man will offer that, for certainly there is no Juſtice of Peace in a County, nor Conſtable within a Town, but he doth otherwiſe, and might commit before an Indictment can be drawn or a Preſentment can be made: what then is meant by theſe words, Per legem terræ? If any man ſhall ſay, this doth not warrant that the King may for reaſons moving him commit a man, and not be anſwerable for it, neither to the party, nor (under your Lordſhip's favour) unto any Court of Juſtice, but to the High Court of Heaven; I do deny it, and will prove it by our Statutes.

My Lord, it was urged by the Counſel on the other ſide, that our printed Magna Charta, which ſaith, nec ſuper eum mittimus, is miſtaken; and that in divers Manuſcripts it is expreſly ſet down to be, nec eum in carcerem mittimus. I cannot judge of the Manuſcripts that I have not ſeen; but, my Lord, I have one here by me, which was written many Ages ago, and the words in print are word for word as that which is here written.

Then they ſay that Matthew Paris ſets it down ſo in his hiſtory: my Lord, we do not govern ourſelves by Chronicle, but to anſwer that of Matthew Paris, he reports a thing done in King John's time, but it was then but thought on, and it was enacted in the time of Henry the third; and there be many things ſaid to be done in Matthew Paris which were not, and many things omitted by him which were done.

This Charter was but in election in the time of King John, and then it might be, nec eum in carcerem mittimus; but it was not enacted till the time of Henry the third, and then that was omitted, and the Charter granted as now we have it.

But if they do ſee no more than I in this clauſe, I know not why we ſhould contend about theſe words, ſeeing the firſt part of this Statute ſaith, Nemo impriſonetur, why then may not I ſay as well, nec eum in carcerem mittimus? I ſee no difference in the words, and therefore, my Lord, I ſhall not inſiſt any longer upon the literal expoſition of the words of Magna Charta, but I will reſort to the reſt of it which is expreſt in the ſubſequent Statute and in common practice.

The Counſel on the other ſide ſaid, that the Statute of 28 E. III. c. 3. expreſſeth and giveth life to this Charter; I ſhall deſire to have that Statute read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, Whereas it is contained in the great Charter, &c. Vide all theſe Statutes in Littleton's Argument in Parliament poſtea.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, the reading of this Statute will give anſwer to it; for it is apparent by the words thereof, none ſhall be taken by petition, &c. and that the Court be extended to the firſt arreſt, but they are to be underſtood that none ſhall be condemned, but he ſhall be brought to anſwer, and be tried.

And if it be expounded otherwiſe, it will be contrary to that practice which was then in uſe.

But it is utterly forbidden by this Statute, that any man ſhould be condemned upon ſuggeſtions or petitions made to the King or Council, without due trial by law.

The next Statute they cited was 25 E. III. cap. 4. My Lord, I deſire that that may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, That no man, of what eſtate or condition ſoever he be, ſhall be put out of land or tenement, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of Law.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, this Statute is intended to be a final proſecution; for if a man ſhall be impriſoned without due proceſs, and never be brought to anſwer, that is unjuſt, and forbidden by this Statute; but when a man is taken in cauſes that are unknown to us, (who walk below ſtairs) we are not privy to the circumſtances which may cauſe the trial to be delayed; and peradventure it is not time to bring the matter to trial, becauſe it is not yet come to maturity, and therefore this is not within the meaning of the Statute.

Another Statute that they mention, is in the ſame year, and it is pag. 9. chap. 9. I deſire it may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, Becauſe the people of the Realm, &c. Vide Littleton's argument poſtea.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, it is very clear, that this Statute had no manner of thought of this cauſe in queſtion; but whereas Sheriffs did procure Commiſſions to be awarded to themſelves for their private gain to the prejudice of the ſubject, the Statute condemneth thoſe Commiſſions, but it maketh nothing to this queſtion which we have now in hand. The next Statute which they cited, was 37 Ed. III. cap. 18. I beſeech it may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, Though it be contained in the great Charter, &c. Vide as aforeſaid.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, this Statute ſeems to be a Commentary and Light to the other Statutes, the ſcope whereof is againſt private ſuggeſtions made to the King or his Council, and not in a legal way, and therefore it condemns them; and this is more fully expreſſed in the Statute of 38 Ed. III. cap. 9. which they likewiſe mentioned: by which Statute direction is given what ſecurity, thoſe perſons which make ſuch ſuggeſtions are to give, that they ſhould proſecute their ſuggeſtions, and what puniſhment they ſhall undergo, if their ſuggeſtions be found falſe.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, As to the Article made at the laſt Parliament, &c. Vide as before ſaid.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, this and the laſt Statute ſeem to conduce both to one purpoſe, that they that in their accuſations went not in a legal way, to bring the party to his anſwer, it was directed by this Statute, that they ſhould go a legal way.

The laſt Act of Parliament in print, the Counſel on theother ſide produced, was the Statute of 1 R. II. chap. 12. which I deſire may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, Whereas divers people at the ſuit of parties were committed to the Fleet, &c. Vide as before.

Attorney Gen. My Lord, it appeareth that the ſcope of this Statute is againſt the Wardens of the Fleet, for ſome miſcarriages in them; but there is one thing in this Statute which I ſhall deſire your Lordſhip to obſerve: and that is, for thoſe miſdemeanors he ſhall forfeit his office, except it be by Writ from the King, or his commandment; ſo that it was no new doctrine in thoſe times, that the King might then give ſuch commandment for committing. The ſcope of this Statute had two hands: firſt, that the Warden ſhould forfeit his office; and ſecondly, that he ſhould recompence the party.

In the fourth and fifth of Phil. & Mar. Dyer 162. it was reſolved, that if the Warden ſhall deliver a man out of priſon without command, he forfeiteth his office, and damage unto the party; but if he have the command of the King, that ſhall excuſe the forfeiture of his office: but he muſt bring the party hither, and here theſe Gentlemen are now, for that commandment of the King is no exception for him not to obſerve.

If he receives a Writ from this Court, to ſhew the Court from whence he receives his Warrant, it may excuſe the forfeiture of his office, but notwithſtanding he is ſubject to the action of the party.

But, I deſire your Lordſhip to obſerve that part of the Statute, which the other Party would not make uſe of, which is, that the King may command by Writ or otherwiſe; theſe were all the printed Statutes cited by the Counſel on the other ſide.

But becauſe I would not miſinterpret theſe Statutes, I thought it equal to deſire your Lordſhip that they might be read.

Beſides the printed Statutes, they mentioned petitions by the Commons, and the anſwers to them of ſeveral Kings in Parliament. The firſt is, Rot.

pl. 6 Ed. III. numero primo & numero viceſimo: beſides theſe two, there is one other of 28 Ed. III. num. 18.

My Lord, of theſe three petitions and their anſwers, the two firſt were mentioned by the Counſel on the other ſide; and that in 28 Ed. III. 28. I have produced, all of them even to one purpoſe.

The Commons then petitioned the King, that all the Statutes made in expoſition of Magna Charta, and of the Foreſt, may be kept and obſerved: the King makes anſwer, that it ſhall be done. And in one of the anſwers it is ſaid, if any man be grieved, he may complain. But what is all this to the point in queſtion? Could there be any other anſwer to give life to theſe requeſts?

The King he is petitioned that ſome are injured; he anſwers, that if they complain they ſhall be relieved.

And now, my Lord, we are where we were, to find out the true meaning of Magna Charta, for there is the foundation of our caſe; all this that hath been ſaid, concerneth other things, and is nothing to the thing in queſtion.

There is not a word either of the commitment of the King, or commandment of the Council in all the Statutes and Records.

And now, my Lord, I am at an end of thoſe Statutes, and come to that that was alledged and mentioned to be in 3 H. VI. 46. and if I could have found it, I would have brought it, but I could not find it; therefore if they have it, I deſire that they will ſhew it, but I think they have it not, and therefore I will let that go.

My Lord, I come to that which I inſiſted upon; the queſtion as it was at firſt, not whether the King, or the Lords of the Council can commit a man, and ſhew no cauſe wherefore they do commit him, but whether the ordinary Courts of Juſtice have power to bail him or no; for that I will inſiſt upon the Statute of Weſtm. primo, which I deſire your Lordſhip may be read, and then I will apply. Vide Weſtm. primo.

My Lord, this Statute, if I miſunderſtand it not, is a full expreſſion to the purpoſe of Magna Charta; the ſcope whereof is to direct us in what caſes men impriſoned were to be bailed.

It was eſpecially for direction to the Sheriffs and others; but to ſay Courts of Juſtice are excluded from this Statute, I conceive it cannot be.

It recites, that whereas heretofore it was not reſolved in what caſes men were repleviſable, and in what caſes not, but only in theſe four caſes; for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the King, or of his Juſtices, or of the Foreſt.

My Lord, I ſay that this Statute expreſſeth not the Law was made by this Statute, that in theſe caſes men were not repleviſable; but it expreſſeth that the Law was clear in theſe caſes; in theſe four caſes it was clearly reſolved before.

I pray you, my Lord, obſerve the time of the making of this Statute; that of Magna Charta was made in the time of Hen. III. and this of Weſtminſter in the time of Edw. I. ſo that it was made in the time of the ſame.

And, my Lord, if they had underſtood the Statute of Magna Charta in another ſenſe, would they not have expreſſed it ſo in this Statute? Was it not fitter for them than for us, they being nearer the firſt making of Magna Charta than we are? But certainly the Statute of Magna Charta was expounded at the time, as I have ſhewed before; if not, without all doubt at the time of making of Weſtm. primo.

The Parliament would not have been ſo careful to provide for things of leſſer moment, and omit this of ſo great conſequence, if there had been any queſtion of it. In all times and ages Magna Charta hath been confirmed, but they ſhew not any one Law, that doth except againſt this poſitive Law of Weſtminſter the firſt, or any Acts of Parliament; nay more, in any printed Books, that in this caſe men ſhould be repleviſable.

My Lord, if you know nothing printed or unprinted, if any will deſire to alter a courſe that always hath been held, you will ſeek for precedents, for the conſtant uſe and courſe is the beſt expoſition of the law; it is not enough for me to ſay, this it is, unleſs I make it good.

Firſt then, I ſay, they on the other ſide cannot cite one Book, Statute, or other thing, to prove, that they that have been committed per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, are bailable.

But, my Lord, I find ſome to the contrary, that they are not bailable, and I will cite ſome of them, and read of others; for I would not in a caſe of that expectation, that it ſhould be thought that any thing ſhould be miſ-interpreted.

In the 33 Hen. VI. folio viceſimo tertio, Robert Poyning's caſe, he was committed pro diverſis cauſis ipſum dominum Regem tangent; this alters not the caſe, for it was as good as no cauſe, for it was the Warrant domini Regis, and there is no queſtion upon this: but, my Lord, I know this is not the point in queſtion.

The next thing, I ſhall ſhew unto your Lordſhip, is Paſch. 21 Edvardi primi, Rot. cla. ſecund. and this, my Lord, was near the time of making of the Statute of Weſtm. prim. and this precedent is to this purpoſe.

The Sheriff of Leiceſterſhire and Warwickſhire, (for then there was but one Sheriff to both thoſe Shires) did receive commandment by letters from the King, That whereas the Earl of Warwick had commanded divers perſons to the cuſtody of the ſaid Sheriff, the King ſent a letter to the ſaid Sheriff, commanding that tothoſe who were committed to his cuſtody by the Earl of Warwick, he ſhould ſhew no grace to them; that is, they ſhould not be bailed.

The Sheriff notwithſtanding this command, lets ſome of thoſe priſoners to bail; whereupon he was complained of in Parliament, that he had done againſt the King's commandment, and he was condemned for it.

This was in Parliament; I wonder this ſhould be done in Parliament, and that it was not ſaid there, that this commitment being done by the King's commandment, was not good; no, he was condemned in Parliament, for it was one that did break the Statute of Weſtm. primo.

My Lord, the uſe that I make of this record is this; it recites, that the Earl of Warwick committed divers, it might be that he did commit them by direction from the King; but the record mentioneth not ſo much, but it ſhews, that the King by letters commanded the Sheriff, that he ſhould ſhew thoſe perſons no grace, and yet he did; he was examined upon this, and by Parliament committed.

The next matter, I will offer to your Lordſhip's judgment for the true expoſition of the law in this caſe, is the Book we call the Regiſter, an authority reſpected, it is the foundation of all our Writs at the Common Law; I bring not the Book.

In this Book there is one Writ ſaith thus, Rex, &c. Quod replegiar' fac' A. niſi fuerit per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis.

Juſtice Doderidge. In what Writ is that, de homine replegiando?

Attorn. Gen. Yes, in the Writ de homine replegiando; and there is another Writ directed to the Conſtable of Dover, in the very ſame words; by which it appears, that they that are impriſoned by the King's command, non ſunt replegiabiles.

Mr. Fitzherbert, a grave Judge, and is in authority with us, peruſing theſe Writs, expreſſed it in theſe words plainly; "There are ſome caſes wherein "a man cannot have this Writ, altho' he be taken "and detained in priſon; as if he be taken by the "death of a man, or if he be taken by the com-"mandment of the King's Juſtices;" and mentions not Chief Juſtice: which I believe is to be intended not of the Chief of the Court of Judicature, but of the Chief Juſtice of England, for there was ſuch a one in thoſe days. Thus, my Lord, you ſee the opinion of Mr. Fitzherbert in this caſe.

The next thing, that I will ſhew your Lordſhip, is the opinion of Mr. Stamford, in his Pleas of the Crown, fol. 72. where he ſets down the Statute of Weſtminſter primo, and then he adds, that by this it appears, that in four caſes at the Common Law a man is not repleviſable; in thoſe that were taken for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the King, or of his Juſtices, or of the Foreſt: and there he ſaith, that the commandment of the King is to be intended, either the commandment of his mouth, or of his Council, which is incorporated to him, and ſpeak with the mouth of the King.

My Lord, I ſhall deſire no better Commentaries upon a Law, than theſe reverend grave Judges, who have put Books of Law in print, and ſuch Books as none, I believe, will ſay their judgments are weak.

The next thing, I ſhall offer unto your Lordſhip is this, that I cannot ſhew with ſo great authority as I have done the reſt, becauſe I have not the thing itſelf by me; but I will put it to your Lordſhip's memory, I preſume you may well remember it; it is the reſolution of all the Judges, which was given in the four and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth, it fell out upon an unhappy occaſion, which was thus: the Judges they complain that Sheriffs and other Officers could not execute the proceſs of the law as they ought; for that the parties on whom ſuch proceſs ſhall be executed were ſent away by ſome of the Queen's Council, that they could not be found: the Judges hereupon petitioned the Lord-Chancellor, that he would be a ſuitor to her Majeſty that nothing be done hereafter. And thereupon the Judges were deſired to ſhew in what caſes men that were committed were not bailable, whether upon the commitment of the Queen or any other.

The Judges make anſwer, that if a man ſhall be committed by the Queen, by her command, or by the Privy-Council, he is not bailable: if your Lordſhip ask me what authority I have for this, I can only ſay, I have it out of the Book of the Lord Anderſon, written with his own hand.

My Lord, I pray you give me leave to obſerve the time when this was done; it was in a time, and we may truly call it a good time, in the time of good Queen Elizabeth, and yet we ſee there was then cauſe of complaint: and therefore I would not have men think that we are now grown ſo bad (as the opinion is we are) for we ſee that then in thoſe times there was cauſe of complaint, and it may be more than is now.

This, my Lord, was the reſolution of all the Judges and Barons of the Exchequer, and not by ſome Great one.

Now I will apply myſelf to that, which has been enforced by the Counſel on the other ſide, which was the reaſon that the ſubject hath intereſt in this caſe.

My Lord, I do acknowledge it, but I muſt ſay that the Sovereign hath great intereſt in it too. And ſure I am, that the firſt ſtone of Sovereignty was no ſooner laid, but this power was given to the Sovereign; if you ask me whether it be unlimited, my Lord, I ſay it is not the queſtion now in hand: but the Common Law, which hath long flouriſhed under the Government of our King and his progenitors Kings of this Realm, hath ever had that reverend reſpect of their Sovereign, as that it hath concluded the King can do no wrong: and as it is in the Lord Berkley's caſe in Plowden's Com. 246. b. it is part of the King's prerogative that he can do no wrong.

In the fourth of Edw. IV. fol. 25. the King cannot be a Diſſeiſor; and ſo it is alſo in the Lord Berkley's caſe in 32 Hen. VIII. Dyer, fol. 8.

The King cannot uſurp upon a Patron, for the Common Law hath that reverend reſpect to him, as that it cannot conceive he will do any injury.

But the King commits a ſubject, and expreſſeth no cauſe of the commitment; what then? ſhall it be thought that there is no cauſe why he ſhould be committed?

Nay, my Lord, the courſe of all times hath been, to ſay there is no cauſe expreſſed, and therefore the matter is not ripe, and thereupon the Courts of Judicature have ever reſted ſatisfied therewith, they would not ſearch into it.

My Lords, there be Arcana Dei, & Arcana Imperii; and they that ſearch too far into them, and make themſelves buſier with them, than their places do require, they will make themſelves, &c. I will ſay no more; but I ſhall be able to ſhew that there ſhall as much prejudice come to the Kingdom, if God direct not the heart of the King, which is in the hand of God, as the rivers of waters: I ſay, there may as much hazard come to the Commonwealth in many other things, with which the King is truſted, as in this particular there can accrue to the ſubject.

If a Treaſon be committed, as it was not long ago, nor far removed from our memories; ſince there was a Treaſon, and the actors thereof fled, ſome to the Court of Rome, ſome to Bruſſels, when it was to be put in execution; the Treaſon being diſcovered, one is apprehended upon ſuſpicion of it, and is put into the Tower, and there he lieth and thinketh the time very long, and I cannot blame him.

It may be he is innocent, and thereupon he brings a Habeas Corpus, and by virtue of that Writ he is brought hither; and will your Lordſhip think it fit or convenient to bail him, when the accuſation againſt him muſt come from beyond the ſea? I think you will rather ſo reſpect the proceedings of the State, as that you will believe theſe things are done with a cauſe, than inquire further of them.

Peradventure ſome great miſdemeanor may be committed, and ſome of the parties make away, ſo as Proclamation cannot overtake them, and ſome are taken; is it fit that they that are in priſon ſhould be tried before the principal be taken?

I will give you an inſtance, that lately was put into my mind; there be ſome priſoners in the Tower at this preſent, which were put in thither when they were very young: if they ſhould bring an Habeas Corpus, they were impriſoned for State-matters, will your Lordſhip deliver them? No, in that the State doth not think it fit to ſend them back into their own Countries, you will eſteem ſo reverendly of the State for committing children, that you will believe that there is great reaſon of State ſo to do, or elſe they would not do it: many inconveniences may follow, if it ſhould be otherwiſe. It may be, divers men do ſuffer wrongfully in priſon, but therefore ſhall all priſoners be delivered? that were a great miſchief.

No doubt but the King's power is abſolute over his coins; if then he ſhall command his coin ſhall be turned to braſs or leather, I confeſs it were inconvenient; but if the King would do it, the anſwer that I can make is, that he would not undo the kingdom: but can your Lordſhip hinder it, as being an inconvenience if he would do it? The Cinque Ports are free for traffick for all his ſubjects; but the King in his Cabinet underſtands there is danger of War to come upon this Kingdom, thereupon he ſhuts the ports, that no man can go out; ſhall the Merchant ſay this is injuſtice in the King? And as in this, ſo in many other particulars this may appear, but I will not go too high: and therefore we are too wiſe, nay, we are too fooliſh, in undertaking to examine matters of State, to which we are not born. Now, my Lord, I come to our Book-Caſes, by which it appears what our King may do, and nothing can be ſo againſt it, but he will not do it; the King may pardon all Traitors and Felons, and if he ſhould do it, may not the ſubjects ſay, if the King do this, the bad will overcome the good? but ſhall any ſay, the King cannot do this? no, we may only ſay, he will not do this?

The King may exempt men from the office of Sheriff, is not this inconvenient? and may it not be ſaid, he may exempt ten in a Shire, and then the burden of the Country ſhall reſt upon the meaner ſort of people? Can any man ſay more to this, than that he will not do it?

Inheritances are to be decided upon Trial, the King may exempt private men from being of a Jury; but if he exempt all men, who ſhall try our cauſes? for it is to be preſumed, that he will not do it.

But to our caſe: By the Statute of Magna Charta, no man ſhall be put out of his freehold, &c. But if the King will do it, muſt not the party that is ſo put out go to the King by petition? But you will ſay, it is a petition of right, and it may be theſe Gentlemen's is ſo; admit it be, yet when ſuch a petition comes to the King, muſt it not be anſwered with theſe words, Soit droit fait al parte? and when the King will give that Warrant for it, then they muſt have it done, and not before.

And this may anſwer a perpetual impriſonment, and God forbid that this ſhould be ſo: and now, my Lord, I will trouble you no longer, but I will go to precedents. Precedents I know prevail much, and rule in many caſes; and if the precedents they cite were not miſ-interpreted, I ſhould think they had ſaid a great deal.

But, my Lord, I will anſwer their precedents with precedents; nay, I will ſhew your Lordſhip that the precedents which they have cited are no precedents for them.

And, my Lord, it is a dangerous thing for men in matters of weight to avouch precedents with confidence, when they make nothing for them: for, my Lord, precedents are now become almoſt proclamations, for they already run up and down the Town; and yet they know but part of them, and not all, and I think if they knew all, men would be more modeſt.

But, my Lord, I will now come to theſe precedents, where I may ſay they have not dealt freely with me, for they have ſhewed me many precedents more than they mentioned here, and it may be they have done the like unto your Lordſhip.

They alledged but eight precedents before your Lordſhip, but they have brought ſixteen unto me: for theſe eight mentioned here, I will take them in order as they were cited, and anſwer.

The firſt precedent they cited was in Hen. VIII. Rot. 9. of one Harriſon: we have the Record here to ſhew your Lordſhip, that he was committed for ſuſpicion of Felony, which was expreſſed in the Warrant; and then, my Lord, this is clear, if the King, or the Lords of the Council, will expreſs any thing within your Lordſhip's juriſdiction, there is good ground for your proceedings: but when there is nothing expreſſed, whether you will judge what the cauſe of the Warrant is, I will leave to your Lordſhip's judgment; but it appears this was the cauſe, and that he was delivered.

The next precedent was 22 H. VIII. Rot. 57. and it was Parker's caſe; and it is true that his commitment appeared to be per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, but it was alſo propoſed to be pro pace & ſuſpicione feloniæ; and the ſignification of the command was given by Mr. Peck of Clifford's-Inn: but there the Warrant ſhews the cauſe of the commitment was for the peace and ſuſpicion of Felony, and therefore he was bailed.

The next was in 40 Eliz. Wendon's caſe; but, my Lord, that commitment was out of the Star-Chamber by an ordinary courſe: then they cited 8 Jac. Thomas Cæſar's caſe, he indeed was committed by ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, and brought his Habeas Corpus, but the Roll ſaith remittitur: and is that a Warrant for them to ſay that he was delivered?

Then Sir Thomas Vernon's caſe was cited; and, my Lord, when we looked into the Records, we found that he was committed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon; and he was tried for it and diſcharged.

The next precedent was Sir Thomas Monſon's caſe; I wonder that they did cite that, for he was committed by the Lords of the Council indeed; but the ground of it was the ſuſpicion of the death of Sir Thomas Overbury, and he was diſcharged again by the Lords of the Council. Certainly if they had known this, they would not have named this as a precedent.

The next was Reynor's caſe; he, my Lord, was one of the Gun-Powder-Treaſon, and yet there was a Warrant to diſcharge him too. And therefore what theſe precedents are, I ſhall ſubmit to your Lordſhip: I muſt confeſs, when they are cited together, they make a great noiſe; but when they are examined ſeverally, they prove nothing.

My Lord, there is one more precedent that was cited here before your Lordſhip, and I hope that one ſhall be as none.

It was mentioned to be Laurence Brown's caſe, 30 Eliz. I know not what it is, but it is like to be of the ſame value as the reſt, Pro certis cauſis eos moventibus, &c.

And thus, my Lord, I have gone through thoſe precedents that were alledged here before your Lordſhip; and now I will come to thoſe precedents that were brought to me, and not mentioned here.

The firſt was John Browning's caſe, in 21 H. VIII. My Lord, theſe precedents came not to me before Saturday laſt, about candle-lighting; and yeſterday was no time fitting to ſearch out precedents, and how could I then ſearch for this?

The next was William Rogers's caſe, of the ſame time. But the cauſe is expreſſed to be for ſuſpicion of Felony, which is a cauſe within the juriſdiction of this Court.

Newport's caſe was the like, in 4 & 5 Phil. & Mar. and ſo was Thomas Laurence's caſe, 9 Eliz. and Edw. Harcourt's caſe, 5 Eliz. which was for ſuſpicion of Felony. Richard Beckwith, and not Barkwith, as was cited, for they have miſtaken both names and matters, was committed per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; and the Record ſaith he was bailed. But it was by reaſon of a letter from the Lords of the Council.

The cauſe of Peter Man's commitment in the 4 and 5 of Philip and Mary, appears to be for ſuſpicion of Felony and Robbery.

For Reynor's caſe, it is the ſame with Beckwith, and were both for one thing.

In the 8 Hen. VII. one Roger Cherry was committed per mandatum domini Regis, and it was for a criminal caſe; and he was afterwards indicted, and acquitted and delivered.

And there is another precedent thereof, that ſaith, he was afterwards arraigned, condemned, and hanged; we have the Record of it.

And now, my Lord, I will ſhew ſome precedents on the other ſide, where men have been committed by the commandment of the King; and by the commandment of the Council, and have been delivered again by their directions: and of this kind there be two in the Tower, that as they were committed by Warrant, ſo by Warrants again for their bailing they were delivered; the offences were againſt the Foreſt, and for Murder.

In the 4 Edw. III. M. 4. Edmund de Newport in Eſſex was indicted for an offence committed by him in the Foreſt. And M. 7. John Fox was likewiſe indicted for an offence by him done in the Foreſt: and there be two Warrants to bail them.

M. 20. John Cobb was the like, and there was a letter from the King, Quod ponatur in Ballium uſque ad proximam Aſſiſam.

Theſe were offences within Weſtminſter primo, and there be ſeveral Warrants to bail them.

The Clerk of this Court hath many Records, by which it appeareth, that many have been committed by the command of the King and of the Queen, and of the Council, and brought their Habeas Corpus; and the ſucceſs was, that many of them were committed to the ſame priſons, and divers were committed to the Marſhal of this Court: the reaſon was, for that many of them were to appear here, their cauſes being triable here; and it would have been a great trouble to ſend them back ſo far to priſon as into the Countries, and therefore they were delivered to the Marſhal of the King's houſhold: again, many had their Trials in this Court, and ſome ſuffered, and ſome were delivered by ſpecial command, as they were committed by ſpecial command.

The number of theſe of this nature are infinite that have been in our times; we have found ſome forty precedents of men committed out of the Chancery, and by the High-Commiſſion, for contempts, and ſome by the Barons of the Exchequer, and ſome in London, that have been brought hither by Habeas Corpus.

Of this I ſhall obſerve, that in the 11 Jacobi, there was a private conſtitution in London, made between the white Bakers, that they might live one by another, and the one not to invade the others liberties; and for contempt againſt this ordinance, ſome were committed to priſon; as Thomas Heanning, and Littlepage: they had a Habeas Corpus, and the cauſe was ſhewn to be by reaſon of the ſaid conſtitution, and thereupon the priſoners were ſent back to London, to abide the order of the Mayor. For, my Lord, this Court hath been ever careful not to examine the Decrees of the Chancery, or Court of Requeſts, but have only looked whether the cauſe returned, be within the juriſdiction of this Court; nor have they called in queſtion the by-laws and conſtitutions of London, but they ſend them back to the Court of Juſtice that committeth them.

And hath this Court been ſo careful of theſe inferiour Courts to this which is the chief; and when the King, who is the head of Juſtice, ſhall commit a man, ſhall not they be as careful to do the like Juſtice to him? But when the King ſaith to them, the commitment was by my Warrant and Commandment, will you queſtion this? and whether this commitment be good or no? I hope you will not.

And now, my Lords, touching ſome precedents which have been taken out of their own ſhewing, I ſhall make it appear, that as they have been committed by the King or Council, ſo they had Warrants alſo to diſcharge them: and they, my Lords, are two ancient Records, the firſt is 7 H. VII. Rot. 6. the other Rot. 73. The firſt was Thomas Brown, he was committed to the Marſhalſea, per mandatum domini Regis, & aliis certis de cauſis: and afterwards the Records ſay, Dominus Rex quoad Chaſe relaxavit mandatum ſuum, and he was bailed, and the reſt lay by it.

My Lords, I will conclude; I could be infinite in this caſe in precedents, but enough is enough, your Lordſhip knoweth the weight of precedents; it is not enough to ſhew this was done, but alſo to ſhew the reaſon why it was done. I will trouble your Lordſhip no longer, but if any man ſhall doubt whether that or any part thereof be truly recited, which hath been ſaid touching the Records or Statutes, I can ſay no more but that the Statutes have been read, and the Records are ready ſorted out to be ſeen by your Lordſhip.

I ſhall conclude (what I ſhall ſay) in this caſe, to anſwer the fear rather than the juſt ground of them that ſay, this may be a cauſe of great danger, with the words of Bracton, who ſpake not to flatter the preſent age; lib. 1. cap. 8. in the end, ſpeaking of a writ for wrong done by the King to the Subject touching land, he hath theſe words, Si judicium a Rege teſtatur (cum breve non currat contra ipſum) locus erat ſupplicationi quod factum ſuum corrigat & emendet, quod quidem ſi non fecerit, ſatis ſufficit ei ad pœnam quod dominum expectet ultorem, nemo quidem de factis ſuis præſumat diſputare, multo fortius contra factum ſuum venire.

My Lords, I engliſh it not, for I apply it not, any man may make uſe of it as he pleaſeth; and ſo I conclude both for the point of exception, and matter of the return, which I refer to your Lordſhip's judgment, whether all in the return but theſe words per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, be not ſuperfluous. And for the matter, whether theſe Gentlemen be bailable or not bailable, I have ſhewed your Lordſhip, that by the practice of all ages they are not bailable, but have been remanded back.

And therefore I pray your Lordſhip, that theſe Gentlemen may be remitted, and left to go the right way for their delivery, which is by a Petition to the King. Whether it be a Petition of right or of grace, I know not; it muſt be I am ſure to the King, from whom I do perſonally underſtand that theſe Gentlemen did never yet preſent any Petition to him that came to his knowledge.

L. C. Juſtice. Mr. Attorney, thus much we muſt ſay to you, you have taken a great deal of pains, you having had ſo ſhort a time to conſider of this caſe; it is a caſe of very great weight and expectation, and we do not intend that you ſhall expect long for our reſolution, for that theſe Gentlemen are in priſon, and deſire no doubt to know where they muſt truſt; I hope we ſhall reſolve according to the reaſon of former times, and according to our conſciences: but this I muſt tell you, as I did thoſe that argued, you muſt bring in your precedents, for though we have ſeen ſome of them, yet ſome of them we have not ſeen, therefore we deſire that your ſervants or yourſelves do attend, and bring unto us after dinner thoſe precedents you have mentioned on the King's part, for we intend to meet this afternoon, and you ſhall have our opinions to-morrow: and I muſt tell you on the other ſide, that this cauſe being of ſuch weight, Counſel ſhould be wary, how they ſpeak any thing to inveigle the Court.

Touching ſuch precedents as you urged in ſome of them, we know there is ſomething urged which makes not for you, ſo you have omitted ſome material things to be ſhewn; I ſpeak it to this purpoſe, not to prejudice the cauſe or to deliver my opinion, which becomes me not, but to ſhew, that Counſellors ſhould be careful: and this I dare ſay, there is matter in ſome of the precedents themſelves that leads to another caſe, if they were intirely cited.

The Term grows away, you ſhall not be long in expectation, we will meet this afternoon, and give you our opinions to-morrow morning.

Mr. Noye. We deſire that Mr. Attorney may bring the precedents of 34 Elizabeth with him.

Mr. Attorney. I will ſhew you any thing; but, my Lord, I ſhall be bold to claim the privilege of my place, as the King's Counſel, when the King's Attorney hath ſpoken, there ought to be no Arguments after that; but if you aſk to ſee any thing, you ſhall have it.

L. C. Juſtice. It is that we aim at, that truth and right may appear, and not to ſatisfy the one or the other part; but it is not deſired to make uſe of it by way of reply, but for ſatisfaction only.

Serj. Bramſton. My Lord, for the precedents I cited, I did think they ſhould have been brought and read in the Court, that your Lordſhip might ſee them.

L. C. Juſtice. You ſhall need no Apology, the Records and Precedents ſhall be brought to the Court, and read openly, for the Court will not wrong you, and you ſhall ſee the difference between them, and your relation of them; nor you muſt not wrong us, with your written verities.

ON Thurſday the twenty-eighth of November, Michaelis 3 Caroli Regis, Chief Juſtice Hyde, Juſtice Doderidge, Juſtice Jones, and Juſtice Whitlock on the Bench: Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden at the Bar.

L. C. Juſtice. I am ſure you here expect the reſolution of the whole Court, as accordingly yeſterday we told you you ſhould have.

This is a caſe of very great weight and great expectation, and it had been fit we ſhould have uſed more ſolemn arguments of it than now for the ſhortneſs of the time we can do; for you have been long in priſon, and it is fit you ſhould know whereunto you ſhould truſt: I am ſure you expect juſtice from hence, and God forbid we ſhould ſit here but to do Juſtice to all men according to our beſt ſkill and knowledge, for it is our oaths and duties ſo to do, and I am ſure there is nothing elſe expected of us. We are ſworn to maintain all the Prerogatives of the King, that is one branch of our oath; and we are likewiſe ſworn to adminiſter Juſtice equally to all people.

We cannot, I tell you, deliver in ſolemn arguments, and give the judgments of every one of us touching this caſe, as the weight thereof requireth; but we have met together, and we have duly and ſeriouſly conſidered of it, and of all that which has been ſpoken of on either ſide, and we are grown to a reſolution, and my Brothers have enjoined me to deliver to you the reſolution of the whole Court; and therefore though it be delivered by my mouth, it is the reſolution of us all: I hope I ſhall not miſtake any thing of their intention in my delivery; but if I do, they ſit here by me, and I ſhall not take it ill if they right me.

Therefore I muſt tell you, there hath been many points learnedly argued at the Bar, which we ſhall not touch, or give our reſolution upon, but bend ourſelves to the point in judgement here.

Theſe three Statutes, as for example, the Statute of Magna Charta, 25 E. III. and 36 E. III. and the Statute of Weſtminſter primo, and divers other Statutes that have been alledged, and particularly diſputed of, we all acknowledge and reſolve, that they are good Laws, and that they be in force; but the interpretation of them at this time belongs not to us, for we are driven to another point: and though the meaning of them belongs to the one way or the other, yet our judgement muſt be the ſame; for that which is now to be judged by us is this, Whether one that is committed by the King's authority, and no cauſe declared of his commitment, according as here it is upon this return, whether we ought to deliver him by bail, or to remand him back again? Wherein you muſt know this which your Counſel will tell you, we can take notice only of this return; and when the caſe appears to come to us no otherwiſe than by the return, we are not bound to examine the truth of the return, but the ſufficiency of it, for there is a great difference between the ſufficiency and the truth.

We cannot judge upon rumors nor reports, but upon that which is before us on record; and therefore fore the Return is examinable by us, whether it be ſufficient or not.

The exceptions which have been taken to this Return were two: the one for the form, the other for the ſubſtance.

For the form, whether it be formally returned or no, for it is not returned (as it is ſaid) poſitively and abſolutely, that they were committed by the King, but as it appears by a warrant from the Lords of the Council, and then there ſeems to be a contradiction in the Return.

For firſt it ſaith, they were committed by the King's command, and afterwards it alledgeth it to be by a warrant of the Lords of the Council, and ſo it is repugnant.

Now we conceive that this is a poſitive and an abſolute return, and ſo the reaſon is, that he firſt returns that they are detained by the ſpecial command of the King, and if he had ceaſed there, it had been poſitive; now there follows, that this was ſignified to them by the Lords of the Council. This is returned, to aſcertain the Court that he returned the cauſe truly, and to ſhew us that we ſhould not doubt the verity of this return; and not to ſhew to us that he hath no knowledge of the cauſe but by the ſignification of the Lords of the Council: according to that caſe of the Biſhop of Norwich, touching the excommunication, he muſt teſtify his own knowledge, and not continetur in Archivis: ſo a Sheriff muſt not return quod mandavi ball' &c. and he gives this anſwer, unleſs it be a Bailiff of a Liberty that hath return of Writs.

And ſo here if the Warden of the Fleet had returned that the Lords of the Council had ſignified unto him that his priſoner was detained by the King's commandment, that had been ſufficient: but when he returns poſitively at the firſt, that it is done by the King's direction, he ſhews afterwards that which ſhould make it appear that he deals not falſely; which might have been omitted, but being mentioned that that is the ſcope of it, and not otherwiſe, the return is good and poſitive.

Now then to the other objections, becauſe he ſpeaks nothing of the caption why they were taken, you know it is the uſual return of all Officers to anſwer the point in queſtion; there is not one word in the Writ that demands the cauſe why they were taken, but why they are detained: ſo that the point in the Writ is ſufficiently anſwered; for though ſometimes it is neceſſary that the cauſe of the caption ſhould be certified, yet ſometimes it is ſuperfluous: but in our caſe the cauſe of the detention is ſufficiently anſwered, which is the demand of the Writ, and therefore we reſolve that the form of this return is good. The next thing, is the main point in Law, whether the ſubſtance or matter of the return be good or no, wherein the ſubſtance is this, he doth certify that they are detained in priſon by the ſpecial command of the King, and whether this be good in Law or no, that is the queſtion.

To this purpoſe, if you remember this point, I ſay you did not cite any Book or Caſe in print, but many precedents, which, I confeſs, are as ſtrong as any Book-Caſes; for Book-Caſes, I confeſs, are taken and ſelected out of the Records and Reſolution of Judges, and that is it which is in our Books, though they be not ſo obvious for every eye, but are found out by pains and diligent ſearch, and being produced, are of the ſame and equal authority with our Book-Caſes; but this muſt be when Records are brought faithfully and entirely, ſo that the Court may judge of them.

Now the precedents, you urged them to be ſo many, and ſo fully to the point, that we may thereby ſee that it is good to hear what can be ſaid on both ſides, and for to hear all, and view the Records themſelves; and therefore we required you to bring the Records to us, and you did ſo, and you brought us more than you mentioned here; and we have peruſed them all, that thereby we might ſee whether the Court be faithfully dealt withall or no, for though Counſellors may urge a Book for their own advantage, yet it is the duty of the Court to ſee and diſtinguiſh of their allegations as the truth may appear.

This I told you yeſterday, when I told you your precedents warranted not ſo much as you urged them for; for if you remember, you urged ſome precedents to be, that where men were committed by the King, or by the Lords of the Council, and no cauſe expreſſed why they were committed, they were delivered.

This is in effect our caſe, if the precedents affirm that when a man is committed by the King's command, and no juſt cauſe is ſhewn, that upon ſuch a general return the party ſhall ipſo facto be delivered; for if the return be not amended, then he ſhall be diſcharged.

For altho' men come with prepared minds, yet the preparation of every man's heart ought to ſubmit to the truth, and by the precedents, you ſhall ſee if it be ſo as you have alledged; but this I dare affirm, that no one of the Records that you have cited, doth inforce what you have concluded out of them, no not one; and therefore as you have cited Records and Precedents, Precedents ſhall judge this caſe.

I will ſhew you how they differ from the Records: you have concluded, when the King hath committed one, and expreſſeth not the cauſe, the Court hath delivered the party; but you ſhall ſee the contrary concluded, in every caſe that you have put: where the cauſe of the commitment hath been expreſſed, there the party hath been delivered by the Court, if the caſe ſo required; but where there hath been no cauſe expreſſed, they have ever been remanded, or if they have been delivered, they have been delivered by the King's direction, or by the Lords of the Council: If this fall now in proof, you ſee you have gathered fair concluſions out of the Records; and that you may ſee that this is ſo, I have brought the Records with me of your own propounding, and I will go through them from point to point, and then judge yourſelves of the caſe.

It is not material whether I call for them in that order as you produced them or no, and therefore I will take them as they are, firſt or laſt in the King's Reign. They are in number many, in the time of Henry VII. Henry VIII. Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, and King James's time.

I will ſhew you Sir Thomas Monſon's Caſe in 14 Jacobi, which was in all our memories.

I will begin with Hill. 8 H. VII. R. Cherry's caſe; you vouched it to this purpoſe, That Cherry being committed by the Mayor of Windſor, was brought hither by a Habeas Corpus, and the Mayor returns that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis, and that thereupon he was delivered; but you ſhall find by the Record, that he was committed by the Mayor at the ſuit of the King for Felony, for which he was afterwards indicted, brought to a trial, and then discharged.

Vide this Record in Mr. Selden's Argument in the Parliament, 3 & 4 Caroli Regis, and so all the rest postea.

The next was 19 H. VII. Urswick's case; and you say he was brought hither by the Warden of the Fleet, who, as you said, returned that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis, and you said he was discharged, but he was bailed upon the Lords Letter, and brought hither to record his return, for he was bound to appear here, and then he was discharged; but that was the cause of his bringing hither. Vide the Records as aforesaid.

The next was Hugh Pain's case, in 21 H. VII. and that you urged thus: You say that he was brought hither by a Habeas Corpus by the Warden of the Fleet, who returned that he was committed by the King's Council, and he was bailed: now we find that he was committed by them for suspicion of felony; and that cause was declared, and he was bailed: so that you see there was a cause expressed. Vide the Records aforesaid.

The next is 2 H. VIII. Thomas Beckley and Robert Harrison's case; these you said were brought in hither by George Earl of Shrewsbury, and Thomas Earl of Surrey; and the return was, that they were committed by the command of Hen. VII. and that they were bailed; but you shall find that they were committed for suspicion of felony; and that Harrison was committed by Hen. VII. but it was for Homicide upon the Sea, and so the cause is expressed, and afterwards he was bailed. The next was in 22 H. VIII. John Parker's case: you urged it to this purpose, That he was brought hither by a Habeas Corpus by the Sheriffs of London, and they you said returned, that he was committed per speciale mandatum domini Regis nunciatum, &c. by Robert Peck, &c. The cause why you urged this was twofold; first, that he was committed by the King's command, and yet he was bailed: secondly, that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis nunciat' per such a one: but you shall find by the Record that he was committed for the security of the peace, and for suspicion of felony, and that was the cause for which he was bailed, for he is bailable by Law when such a cause appears. Vide the Record as afore.

Go on to the next, and that is Peter Man's case, in the 3 & 4 Philip and Mary; you urged that to this purpose, you say, that he was brought by the Keeper of the Gate-House, and you say, that he returned, that he was committed by the command of the King and Queen's Council, and thereupon he was bailed; but you shall find that he was committed for suspicion of felony and robbery, and thereupon he was bailed.

The next is in the 4 & 5 Phil. & Mar. Edward Newport's case; you said that the Constable of the Tower brought him hither, and returned that he was committed by the Council of the King and Queen, and that he was bailed: but you see by the Records, that he was committed for suspicion of coining, which is bailable only in this Court, and therefore it was removed hither. Yet this I must tell you, that it is true, in one Record it appears not, but as you have cited it; but you may see how it is supplied by another Record, and the cause, and he was delivered by a proclamation. Vide both Records in Mr. Selden's argument.

Doderidge. He could not be delivered by proclamation, unless it was for a criminal cause.

L. C. Justice Hyde. Observe another thing in the Book, he is brought hither by the special command of the Council; so that although it appears not in the Record, yet if the King or Lords mean to have him tried for his life, he is brought hither. Then you cited Robert Constable's case, 9 Eliz. and you said he was brought hither by the Lieutenant of the Tower, who returned that he was committed by the Lords of the Council, and thereupon he was bailed; but you shall find that he came hither to plead his pardon, and he was pardoned. Vide the Record as aforesaid.

Thomas Laurence's case in 9 Eliz. is the same with Constable's, for it appears that he was brought hither to plead his pardon, and he was pardoned, and that was the cause he was brought hither.

The next was in the 21 Eliz. John Browning's case; it is true he was committed by the Lords of the Council, and he was brought by a Habeas Corpus to the Chamber of Sir Christopher Wray, Chief-Justice, and he was there bailed.

The next was 33 Eliz. William Rogers; and he, you said, was brought hither by the Keeper of the Gatehouse, who returned, that he was committed to him by the Lords of the Council, yet there was a cause expressed, and that was for suspicion of coining of money.

The next was in 39 Eliz. Laurence Broome; you say that he was brought hither by the Keeper of the Gatehouse, who returned that he was committed for divers causes, moving the Lords of the Council, and thereupon he was delivered; but the Record is, that the return also was for suspicion of Treason, and although the suspicion of Treason appears not in one Record, yet there is another for it. Here you see the cause of his commitment, and that he was bailed, but it was by the King's command, usque Oct. Michaelis. Vide the Record.

I blame not you that are of Counsel with these Gentlemen for urging this Record, for this cause is not expressed in your Record, but that he was committed by the command of the Council only; but he was committed for suspicion of Felony with Sir Thomas Smith. Vide the Record.

The next is in 40 Eliz. Edward Harcourt's case, and Thomas Wenden's case; I bring them together, because they are both in one year. In the 40 of Eliz. Edward Harcourt, you say, was committed to the Gatehouse by the Lords of the Council; and the return was, that he was committed by them, Certis de causis ipsos moventibus ignotis, and he was bailed.

Here is another in the same time committed to the same prison by the Lords in the Star-Chamber, it was Thomas Wenden's case; and he you say was committed by them certis de causis, (as the other was) and that he was bailed; but you shall find in the margin of the Roll, Traditur in ball' ex assensu Concilii dominæ Reginæ; and that was the relation of the Queen's Attorney, so that you see how the precedent fits you.

The next are two more Commitments to the Gatehouse, Beckwith and Reyner; they, you said, were committed to the Gatehouse, brought their Habeas Corpus, and the Keeper of the Gatehouse returned, that they were committed by virtue of a Warrant from the Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Earl of Northampton, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and others of the Privy-Council; requiring the said

Keeper

Keeper to receive the ſaid Beckwith and Reyner into his charge, until they ſhould have further order from them in that behalf; and you ſay they were bailed.

Vide the Record in Mr. Selden aforeſaid.

Now you ſhall ſee the direction to bail him; he was bailed by the direction from the Lords of the Council, as appears by their letter. Vide as aforeſaid.

Now we come to Cæſar's caſe, in 8 Jacobi; you urged that to this purpoſe: you ſay he was committed to the Marſhalſea, who upon a Habeas Corpus returned, that he was committed per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, and you ſay, becauſe the return was ſo general, the rule of the Court was, that it ſhould be amended, or elſe he ſhould be diſcharged. I will open to you what the reaſon of that rule was, for that notice was taken, that the Keeper of the priſon had uſed a falſe return, and had uſurped the name of the King; I know not how, but the commitment was not by the King's command; and that was the cauſe that he had a day given him to amend his return, but his body was remanded to priſon, as you ſhall ſee by the Record. Vide the Record, &c.

The laſt precedent that you uſed, was that of Sir Thomas Monſon; and that was ſo notorious, and ſo late, that I marvel that was offered at all, it made me jealous of all the reſt, that was ſo notorious; and now I have omitted none you brought me. Vide the Record.

By this Record you may ſee that he was committed by divers Lords of the Council; and it was for the ſuſpicion of the death of Sir Thomas Overbury; and it is notoriouſly known, that he was brought hither to plead his pardon.

I will not tell you that you read all theſe precedents, for you read none, but urged them here before us; but we required you to bring them to us, and they were brought to us, Mr. Corbet brought them all but one, and that Mr. Noye brought, it was in the 22 Hen. VIII. Parker's caſe: and one Mr. Holborn, a man whoſe face I never ſaw before, nor is he now in mine eye, did yeſterday bring us one precedent to this purpoſe; and it was Sir John Brocket's caſe in 1 Jac. he was committed to the Gatehouſe, and upon a Habeas Corpus, the Keeper returned that Commiſs' fuit per Warrantum Dominorum de Privat' Concilio, cujus tenor ſequitur in hæc verba, viz. To the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, &c. vide Mr. Selden's precedents; but ſee upon what ground he was bailed, it was a ſpecial command of the Lords of the Council. Vide the Record.

Theſe are all the Records and Precedents that you miniſtred unto us in your argument, and that were delivered unto us, for I have dealt faithfully with you; and now you have ſeen them in the caſes, I would have any man judge of the concluſion which you made the laſt day, that when a man is committed, and the caſe not known, but it is certified to be by the King's ſpecial commandment, and the Habeas Corpus is procured by yourſelves and ſpeeded by the King, that we can diſcharge or bail them.

Then the precedents are all againſt you every one of them, and what ſhall guide our judgments, ſince there is nothing alledged in this caſe but precedents? that if no cauſe of the commitment be expreſſed, it is to be preſumed to be for matter of State, which we cannot take notice of; you ſee we find none, no not one, that hath been delivered by bail in the like caſes, but by the hand of the King or his direction.

If we ſhould ceaſe here, you ſee you have ſhewn nothing to ſatisfy us, and we know that you that be of their Counſel, will ſatisfy your Clients therein.

But you ſhall ſee that we have taken a little pains in this caſe, and we will ſhew you ſome precedents on the other ſide; and I believe there be five hundred of this nature, that may be cited to this purpoſe. I ſhall go retrograde, and go backwards in citing the years of the precedents that I ſhall mention.

I will begin with 7 H. VIII. Edward Page, he was brought hither by the Steward of the Marſhalſea, who returned that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis, and he was remitted, ſo that he was not delivered upon this general return, but he was remanded.

The next was 12 H. VII. there you ſhall ſee a precedent where one was committed, his name was Thomas Yew, he was committed for felony, and alſo per mandatum domini Regis, and the King's Attorney came hither and releaſed the King's command, and thereupon he was bailed.

Mr. Noye. It is all one with Parker's caſe.

L. C. Juſtice. No, for here were two cauſes of the commitment, Hobart was then the King's Attorney, and he ſignified in open Court that he was diſcharged by the King's command, and Poſtea traditur in ball' pro ſuſpicione feloniæ.

The next was Humphrey Broch, 9 H. VII. Rot. 14. you ſhall find it much to that purpoſe as the other was before; he was impriſoned for an outlawry, and by the commandment of the King alſo, and after that the releaſe of the King's commandment was certified to the Chief-Juſtice, he was thereupon diſcharged. Vide the Record.

The next is 7 H. VII. Thomas Brown, John Rawlings, Robert Sherman and others, were committed per mandatum domini Regis, and for felony, outlawry, and other cauſes, as appears by the Records, and after the King releaſeth his commandment, and that the outlawry ſhould be reverſed, and for the felony he was bailed. Vide the Record.

So that you may ſee the offences mentioned in the Warrant for the commitment were triable here, and when the King releaſes his commandment they were bailed for the reſt, but they that were committed by the commandment of the King were releaſed by the King.

In 7 H. VII. the caſes of William Bartholomew, Henry Carre, William Chaſe, and others, is to the ſame effect, by all which you may ſee, that when the King releaſeth his commandment, they were bailed for the reſt, and as they were committed by the King's commandment, ſo they were releaſed by the King's command.

Now here I ſhall trouble you with no more precedents, and you ſee your own what concluſion they produce. And as to thoſe ſtrong precedents alledged on the other ſide, we are not wiſer than they that went before us; and the common cuſtom of the law is, the Common Law of the land, and that hath been the continual common cuſtom of the law, to which we are to ſubmit, for we come not to change the law, but to ſubmit to it.

We have looked upon that precedent that was mentioned by Mr. Attorney; the reſolution of all the Judges of England, in 34 Eliz. We have conſidered of the time, and I think there were not before, nor have been ſince, more upright Judges than they were, Wray was one, and Anderſon another: in Eaſter Term this was certified under the hands of all the Judges of England; and Barons of the Exchequer in a duplicate, whereof the one was delivered to the Lord-Chancellor, and the other to the Lord-Treaſurer, to be delivered to the Queen. We have compared our copies, not taking them the one from the other, but bringing them: we have long had them by us together, and they all agree word for word, and that which Mr. Attorney ſaid, he had out of Judge Anderſon's Book, and it is to this purpoſe, to omit other things, that if a man be committed by the commandment of the King, he is not to be delivered by a Habeas Corpus in this Court, for we know not the cauſe of the commitment. Vide this at the latter end of the firſt part of Mr. Selden's argument, as aforeſaid.

But the queſtion now is, whether we may deliver this Gentleman or not; you ſee what hath been the practice in all the King's times heretofore, and your own Records; and this reſolution of all the Judges teacheth us, and what can we do but walk in the ſteps of our fore-fathers? If you ask me which way you ſhould be delivered, we ſhall tell you, we muſt not counſel you.

Mr. Attorney hath told you that the King hath done it, and we truſt him in great matters, and he is bound by Law, and he bids us proceed by Law, as we are ſworn to do, and ſo is the King; and we make no doubt but the King, if you ſeek to him, he knowing the cauſe why you are impriſoned, he will have mercy, but we leave that. If in Juſtice we ought to deliver you, we would do it; but upon theſe grounds, and theſe Records, and the precedents and reſolutions we cannot deliver you, but you muſt be remanded. Now if I have miſtaken any thing, I deſire to be righted by my brethren, I have endeavoured to give the reſolutions of us all *.

They continu'd in cuſtody till the 29th of January following, when his Majeſty in Council order'd all the impriſon'd Gentlemen to be releas'd; and Writs being iſſued about this time for electing Members of Parliament, to meet March the 17th, thoſe Gentlemen who ſuffer'd for the Loan, were elected in many places. On the 17th of March the Houſe met, and Sir John Finch was choſen Speaker. On the 20th, the Houſe ſettled their Committees; and the 22d was ſpent in opening the Grievances, as Billeting of Soldiers, Loans by Benevolences and Privy-Seal, and the impriſoning certain Gentlemen who refus'd to lend upon that Account, who afterwards bringing their Habeas Corpus, were notwithſtanding remanded to priſon; nor did the Houſe incline to ſupply his Majeſty till theſe Grievances were redreſſed.

To which purpoſe Sir Francis Seymour ſpoke thus: THIS is the great Council of the Kingdom, and here (if not here alone) his Majeſty may ſee as in a true glaſs the State of the Kingdom; we are called hither by his Majeſty's Writs to give him faithful counſel, ſuch as may ſtand with his honour; but this we muſt do without flattery: we are ſent hither by the Commons to diſcharge that truſt repoſed in us, by delivering up their juſt grievances, and this we muſt do without fear: let us not therefore be like Cambyſes's Judges, who being demanded of their King whether it were not lawful for him to do what in itſelf was unlawful; they rather to pleaſe the King, than to diſcharge their own conſciences, anſwered, That the Perſian Kings might do what they liſted. This baſe flattery tends to miſchief, being fitter for reproof than imitation; and as flattery, ſo fear taketh away the judgment: let us not then be poſſeſſed with fear or flattery, of corruptions the baſeſt. For my own part, I ſhall ſhun both theſe, and ſpeak my conſcience with as much duty to his Majeſty as any man, but not neglecting the Publick, in which his Majeſty and the Commonwealth have an Intereſt: but how can we ſhew our affections, whilſt we retain our fears? or how can we think of giving of Subſidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or no? For if his Majeſty be perſuaded by any to take from his ſubjects what he will, and where it pleaſeth him; I would gladly know what we have to give? It's true, it is ill with thoſe ſubjects that ſhall give laws to their Princes, and as ill with thoſe Princes which ſhall uſe force with thoſe Laws; that this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of Soldiers, a thing no way advantageous to his Majeſty's ſervice, but a burden to the Common-wealth; this alſo appeareth by the laſt Levy of Money againſt an Act of Parliament. Again, Mr. Speaker, what greater proof can there be of this, than the impriſonment of divers Gentlemen for the Loan, who if they had done the contrary for fear, their fault had been as great as theirs that were the projectors in it; and to countenance theſe proceedings, hath it not been preached (or rather prated) in our pulpits, that all we have is the King's, Jure Divino, ſay theſe time-ſervers; they forſake their own function, and turn ignorant Stateſmen: we ſee how willing they will be to change a good Conſcience for a Biſhoprick, and (Mr. Speaker) we ſee how eaſy it is for a Prince, how juſt and good ſoever, to be abuſed, in regard he muſt ſee with other mens eyes, and hear with other mens ears. Let us not flatter his Majeſty, it is too apparent to all the World, the King and People ſuffer more now than ever; his Majeſty in his affairs abroad, and his People in their eſtates at home: but will you know the reaſon of all this, let us look back to the actions of former Princes, and we ſhall find that thoſe Princes have been in greateſt want and extremity that exacted moſt of their ſubjects, and moſt unfortunate in the choice of their miniſters, and to have failed moſt in their undertakings; happy is that Prince that hath thoſe that are faithful of his Council. That which his Majeſty wanted in the management of his affairs concerning France and Spain, I am clear, was his want of faithful Council to adviſe: the reaſon is plain, a Prince is ſtrongeſt by faithful and wiſe Council; I would I could truly ſay, ſuch have been imployed abroad. I will confeſs,

* Mr. Whitlock in his Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, Page 8. (Edit. 1732.) ſays, "Five of the impriſon'd Gentlemen, by Habeas Corpus were brought to the King's-Bench; and (by their Counſel aſſign'd) took exceptions to the Return, For that it had not the cauſe of their Commitment, but of their Detainor in Priſon, per ſpeciale mandatum Regis, which is no particular cauſe; and the Law being moſt tender of the ſubjects liberty." Noy, Selden, Bramſton, Calthrope and others, who were of Counſel for the Priſoners, prayed they might be releas'd and diſcharg'd.

Heath, the King's Attorney, at another day argued in maintenance of the Return. Hyde Chief-Juſtice declar'd the opinion of the Court, That the Return was poſitive and abſolute, by the King's ſpecial command, and the ſignification of it by the Lords of the Council is only to inform the Court: And that the Habeas Corpus is not to return the cauſe of the Impriſonment, but of the detention in Priſon; that the matter of this Return is ſufficient, and the Court is not to examine the truth of the Return, but muſt take it as it is. So the Priſoners were remanded.

ſeſs, and ſtill ſhall from my heart, he is no good ſubject, nor well affected to his Majeſty and the State, that will not willingly and freely lay down his life, when the end may be the ſervice of his Majeſty, and the good of the Common-weal. But on the contrary, when againſt a Parliament-Law, the ſubject ſhall have taken from him his goods againſt his will, and his liberty againſt the laws of the land; ſhall it be accounted want of duty in us to ſtand upon our privileges, hereditary to us, and confirmed by ſo many Acts of Parliament?

In doing this we ſhall but tread the ſteps of our forefathers, who ever preferred the publick Intereſt before their own right, nay, before their own lives; nor can it be any wrong to his Majeſty to ſtand upon them, ſo as thereby we may be the better enabled to do his Majeſty ſervice. But it will be a wrong to us and our poſterity and our conſciences, if we willingly forego that which belongs unto us by the law of God, and of the Land, and this we ſhall do well to preſent to his Majeſty; we have no cauſe to doubt of his Majeſty's gracious acceptation.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

THIS debate carries a double aſpect towards the Sovereign and the Subject; though both be innocent, both are injured and both to be cured. Surely, in the greateſt humility I ſpeak it, theſe illegal ways are puniſhment and marks of indignation, the raiſing of Loans ſtrengthned by commiſſion, with unheard of inſtructions and oaths; the billetting of Soldiers by the Lieutenants, and Deputy-Lieutenants, have been as if they could have perſuaded Chriſtian Princes, yea Worlds, that the right of Empires had been to take away by ſtrong hands, and they have endeavoured, as far as poſſible for them, to do it. This hath not been done by the King (under the pleaſing ſhade of whoſe Crown I hope we ſhall ever gather the fruits of Juſtiee) but by projectors, who have extended the prerogative of the King beyond the juſt ſymmetry, which maketh a ſweet harmony of the whole: they have brought the Crown into greater want than ever, by anticipating the Revenues; and can the ſhepherd be thus ſmitten, and the ſheep not ſcattered? They have introduced a Privy-Council, raviſhing at once the ſpheres of all ancient Government, impriſoning us without either bail or bond; they have taken from us, what? what ſhall I ſay indeed, what have they left us? all means of ſupplying the King and ingratiating ourſelves with him, taking up the root of all propriety, which if it be not ſeaſonably ſet again into the ground by his Majeſty's own hands, we ſhall have, inſtead of beauty, baldneſs. To the making of thoſe whole, I ſhall apply myſelf, and propound a remedy to all theſe diſeaſes. By one and the ſame thing have King and People been hurt, and by the ſame muſt they be cured; to vindicate, what, new things? no, our ancient vital liberties, by re-inforceing the ancient laws made by our anceſtors, by ſetting forth ſuch a character of them, as no licentious ſpirit ſhall dare to enter upon them; and ſhall we think this is a way to break a Parliament? no, our deſires are modeſt and juſt, I ſpeak truly, both for the Intereſt of the King and People; if we enjoy not theſe, it will be impoſſible for us to relieve him.

Therefore let us never fear they ſhall not be accepted by his goodneſs; wherefore I ſhall ſhortly deſcend to my motions, conſiſting of four parts, two of which have relation to our perſons, two to the propriety of goods. For our perſons; firſt, the freedom of them from impriſonment. Secondly, from employment abroad, contrary to the ancient cuſtoms: for our goods, that no Levies be made, but by Parliament. Secondly, no billeting of Soldiers. It is moſt neceſſary that theſe be reſolved, that the ſubject may be ſecured in both.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard.

THIS is the criſis of Parliaments; we ſhall know by this if Parliaments live or die, the King will be valued by the ſucceſs of us, the Counſels of this houſe will have operations in all, 'tis fit we be wiſe; his Majeſty begins to us with affection, proclaiming, that he will rely on his People's love. Preſervation is natural, we are not now on the bene eſſe, but on the eſſe; be ſure England is ours, and then prune it. Is it no ſmall matter that we have provoked two moſt potent Kings? we have united them, and have betrayed ourſelves more than our Enemies could. Men and Brethren, what ſhall we do? Is there no Balm in Gilead? If the King draw one way, and the Parliament another, we muſt all ſink. I reſpect no particular, I am not ſo wiſe to contemn what is determined by the major part, one day tells another, and one Parliament inſtructs another. I deſire this Houſe to avoid all conteſtations, the hearts of Kings are great, 'tis comely that Kings have the better of their ſubjects. Give the King leave to come off, I believe his Majeſty expects but the occaſion. 'Tis lawful, and our duty to adviſe his Majeſty, but the way is to take a right courſe to attain the right end; which I think may be thus: by truſting the King, and to breed a truſt in him; by giving him a large ſupply according to his wants, by proſtrating our grievances humbly at his feet, from thence they will have the beſt way to his heart, that is done in duty to his Majeſty. And to ſay all at once, let us all labour to get the King on our ſide, and this may be no hard matter, conſidering the near ſubſiſtence between the King and People.

Sir Edward Coke.

DUM tempus habemus, bonum operemur. I am abſolutely for giving a ſupply to his Majeſty; yet with ſome caution. To tell you of foreign dangers and inbred evils, I will not do it; the State is inclining to a Conſumption, yet not incurable; I fear not foreign Enemies, God ſend us peace at home: for this diſeaſe I will propound remedies, I will ſeek nothing out of mine own head, but from my heart, and out of Acts of Parliament. I am not able to fly at all grievances, but only at Loans. Let us not flatter ourſelves; who will give Subſidies, if the King may impoſe what he will? and if, after Parliament, the King may inhaunce what he pleaſeth? I know the King will not do it, I know he is a religious King, free from perſonal vices; but he deals with other mens hands, and ſees with other mens eyes. Will any give a Subſidy that will be taxed after Parliament at pleaſure? the King cannot tax any by way of Loans, I differ from them, who would have this of Loans go amongſt Grievances, but I would have it go alone.

I'll begin with a noble Record, it chears me to think of it, 25 E. III. it is worthy to be written in letters of gold; Loans againſt the will of the Subject, are againſt Reaſon, and the Franchiſes of the Land, and they deſire reſtitution: what a word is that Franchiſe? The Lord may tax his Villein high or low, but it is againſt the Franchiſes of the Land, for Freemen to be taxed but by their conſent in Parliament. Franchiſe is a French word, and in Latin it is Libertas. In Magna Charta it is provided, that, Nullus liber homo capiatur vel impriſonetur aut diſſeiſietur de libero tenemento ſuo, &c. niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum vel per legem terræ; which Charter hath been confirmed by good Kings above thirty times.

When theſe Gentlemen had ſpoken, Sir John Cook, Secretary of State, took up the matter for the King, and concluded for redreſs of Grievances, ſo that ſupplies take the precedency; and ſaid:

Mr. Secretary Cook.

I Had rather you would hear any than me; I will not anſwer what hath been already ſpoken; my intent is not to ſtir, but to quiet; not to provoke, but to appeaſe: my deſire is, that every one reſort to his own heart to reunite the King and the State, and to take away the ſcandal from us; every one ſpeaks from the abundance of his heart: I do conclude out of every one's concluſion, to give to the King, to redreſs grievances; all the difference is about the manner. We all are Inhabitants in one Houſe, the Commonwealth, let every one in ſomewhat amend his Houſe, ſomewhat is amiſs: but if all the Houſe be on fire, will we then think of mending what is amiſs? will you not rather quench the fire? the danger all apprehend. The way that is propounded, I ſeek not to decline, illegal courſes have been taken, it muſt be confeſſed, the redreſs muſt be by Laws and Puniſhment: but withal, add the Law of neceſſity; neceſſity hath no law, you muſt abilitate the State to do, what you do by petition require. It is wiſhed we begin with grievances, I deny not that we prepare them, but ſhall we offer them firſt? will not this ſeem a condition with his Majeſty? Do we not deal with a wiſe King, jealous of his honour? all Subſidies cannot advantage his Majeſty ſo much, as that his ſubjects do agree to ſupply him; this will amaze the Enemy more than ten Subſidies: begin therefore with the King, and not with ourſelves.

Sir Robert Phillips.

THIS day's debate makes me call to mind the cuſtom of the Romans, who had a ſolemn Feaſt once a year for their Slaves, at which time they had liberty (without exception) to ſpeak what they would, whereby to eaſe their afflicted minds; which being finiſhed, they ſeverally returned to their former ſervitude. This may, with ſome reſemblance and diſtinction, well ſet forth our preſent ſtate; where now, after the revolution of ſome time, and grievous ſufferings of many violent oppreſſions, we have (as thoſe Slaves had) a day of liberty of ſpeech; but ſhall not, I truſt, be herein Slaves, for we are free, we are not Bondmen, but Subjects: theſe, after their Feaſts, were Slaves again; but it is our hope to return Freemen. I am glad to ſee this morning's work, to ſee ſuch a ſenſe of the Grievances under which we groan. I ſee a concurrence of grief from all parts, to ſee the Subject wronged, and a fit way to ſee the Subject righted: I expected to ſee a diviſion, but I ſee an honourable conjunction, and I take it a good omen. It was wiſhed by one, that there were a forgetfulneſs of all; let him not proſper that wiſheth it not. No, there is no ſuch ways to perfect remedy, as to forget injuries; but not ſo to forget, as not to recover them. It was uſual in Rome to bury all injuries, on purpoſe to recover them. It was ſaid by a Gentleman, that ever ſpeaks freely, We muſt ſo govern ourſelves, as if this Parliament muſt be the Criſis of all Parliaments, and this is the laſt. I hope well, and there will be no cauſe for the King, our Head, to except againſt us, or we againſt him. The dangers abroad are preſented to us, he is no Engliſhman that is not apprehenſive of them.

We have provoked two potent Kings (the one too near) who are too ſtrongly joined together; the dangers are not chimerical, but real, I acknowledge it, but it muſt be done in proportion of our dangers at home: I more fear the violation of publick Rights at home, than a foreign Enemy. Muſt it be our duties and direction to defend foreign dangers, and eſtabliſh ſecurity againſt them, and ſhall we not look at that which ſhall make us able and willing thereunto? We ſhall not omit to confide and truſt his Majeſty, otherwiſe our Counſels will be with fears, and that becomes not Engliſhmen. The unaccuſtomed violences (I have nothing but a good meaning) trench into all we have. To the four particulars already mentioned, wherein we ſuffer, one more may be added, leſt God forbear to hear me in the day of my trouble; our Religion is made vendible by Commiſſions: Alas! now a toleration is granted (little leſs) and men for pecuniary annual rates diſpenſed withal, whereby Papiſts without fear of Law, practiſe Idolatry, and ſcoff at Parliaments, at Laws, and all. It is well known, the people of this State are under no other ſubjection, than what they did voluntarily conſent unto, by the original contract between King and People; and as there are many Prerogatives and Privileges conferred on the King, ſo there are left to the Subject many neceſſary Liberties and Privileges, as appears by the common Laws and Acts of Parliament, notwithſtanding what theſe two Sycophants (Sibthorp and Manwaring) have prated in the Pulpit to the contrary. Was there ever yet King of England that directly violated the Subjects Liberty and Property, but their actions were ever complained of in Parliament, and no ſooner complained of, than redreſſed? 21 E. III. there went out a Commiſſion to raiſe money in a ſtrange manner; the ſucceeding Parliament prayed redreſs, and, till H. VIII. we never heard of the ſaid Commiſſions again.

Another way was by Loan, a Worm that canker'd the Law, the Parliament did redreſs it, and that money was paid again. The next little Engine was Benevolence; what the force of that was, look into the Statute of R. III. which damned that particular way, and all other indirect ways.

Since the Right of the Subject is thus bulwark'd by the Law of the Kingdom, and Princes upon complaint have redreſſed them, I am confident we ſhall have the like cauſe of joy from his Majeſty.

I will here make a little digreſſion: The County (Somerſetſhire) I ſerve for were pleaſed to command me to ſeek the removal from them of the greateſt burthen that ever people ſuffered. It was excellently ſaid, Commiſſionary Lieutenants do deprive us of all Liberty; if ever the like was ſeen of the Lieutenancy that now is, I will never be believed more: They tell the people, they muſt pay ſo much upon warrant from a Deputy-Lieutenant, or be bound to the good behaviour, and ſent up to the Lords of the Council; it is the ſtrangeſt Engine to rend the liberty of the Subject that ever was: There is now a Decemviri in every County, and amongſt that Decemviri, there is ſome Claudius Appius that ſeek their own revenges. We complain of Loans and Impoſitions, but when Deputy-Lieutenants may ſend Warrants to impriſon our perſons at plea-ſure, if we pay not what they ſent for, it concerns us to preſerve the Country in freedom, and to conſider of this kind of people. There is now Neceſſity brought in for an argument; all know that Neceſſity is an armed man, and that Neceſſity is an evil Counſellor, I would we had never known that Counſel; we are almoſt grown like the Turks, who ſend their Janizaries, who place the Halbert at the door, and there he is Maſter of the houſe. We have Soldiers billetted, and Warrants to collect money, which if they do not, the Soldiers muſt come and riſle. The Romans ſending one into Spain, found no greater complaint, than the diſcontent that did ariſe from Soldiers placed amongſt them. I would you would look into Forteſcue, where he puts the Prince in mind, what miſery he ſaw, where Soldiers were put upon the people: But, ſaith he, no man is forced to take Soldiers but Inns, and they are to be paid by them. I deſire we reſort to his Majeſty for redreſs, and to reduce all into bounds.

The other way of Grievance is a Judgment in a legal courſe of proceeding; we have had three Judgments of late times, all exceeding one another in prejudice of the Subject: The firſt was, that which was judged in all formality, the Poſtnati (Scots) caſe, which People I honour; for we find many of them love us more than we do ourſelves: I do not complain of it, but only mention it.

The other Judgment was for Impoſitions, which was given in the Exchequer, and this Houſe twice afterwards damned that Judgment: How remiſs our eyes are upon that, I grieve to ſee.

There is a Judgment, if I may ſo call it, a fatal Judgment againſt the Liberty of the Subject, Mich. 3 Car. in Sir John Heveningham's caſe, argued at the Bar, and pronounced but by one alone. I can live, although another without Title be put to live with me; nay, I can live, although I pay Exciſes and Impoſitions for more than I do: but to have my liberty, which is the ſoul of my life, taken from me by power, and to be pent up in a Goal without remedy by Law, and this to be ſo adjudged to periſh in Goal; O improvident Anceſtors! Oh unwiſe Forefathers! to be ſo curious in providing for the quiet poſſeſſion of our Lands and Liberties of Parliament, and to neglect our Perſons and Bodies, and to let them die in priſon, and that durante beneplacito, remedileſs. If this be Law, what do we talk of our Liberties? why do we trouble ourſelves with the diſpute of Law, Franchiſes, Propriety of Goods? It is the Summa totalis of all miſeries; I will not ſay it was erroneous, but I hope we ſhall ſpeak our minds, when that Judgment comes here to be debated. What may a man call this? if not Liberty. Having paſſed in ſome confuſion in the faſhion of my delivery, I conclude: We will conſider two particulars, his Majeſty, and his People. His Majeſty calls to us, and craves our aſſiſtance to revive again his honour, and the honour of the Nation: The People ſend us, as we hope, with that direction, that we ſhall return to them with that Olive-branch, that aſſurance of being free from thoſe calamities, under which they can hardly breath. Our ſins have brought on us thoſe miſeries, let us all bring our Portion to make up the wall: we come with loyal hearts; his Majeſty ſhall find, that it is we that are his faithful Counſellors; let all Sycophants be far removed from his Majeſty, ſince we cannot help his Majeſty without opening our grievances; let us diſcharge our duties therein: yet while we ſeek Liberty, we will not forget Subjection. All things a State can be capable of, either bleſſings or puniſhments, depend on this meeting: if any think the King may be ſupplied, and the Commonwealth preſerved without redreſs of Grievances, he is deceived. The Kings of England were never more glorious than when they truſted their Subjects; let us make all haſte to do the Errand for which we came; let the Houſe conſider to prepare our Grievances fit for his Majeſty's view, not to make a Law to give us new Liberties, but declaratory, with reſpective Penalties; ſo that thoſe which violate them, if they would be vile, they ſhould fear infamy with men; and then we ſhall think of ſuch a Supply as never Prince received, and with our money we ſhall give him our hearts, and give him a new people rais'd from the dead: Then I hope this Parliament will be entitled, the Parliament of Wonders, and God's judgments diverted, and theſe beams of goodneſs ſhall give us life, and we ſhall go home to our own Countries, and leave our Poſterities as free as our Anceſtors left us.

But this day, as alſo the two next days Debate, produced no Reſolutions.

Monday, 24 March, Secretary Cook renewed the motion of Supplies for his Majeſty, yet ſo, that Grievances be likewiſe taken into conſideration.

Then he made a motion, That the ſame Committee may hear Propoſitions of general heads of Supply, and afterward go to other buſineſſes of the day for Grievances. Others preferred the conſideration of Grievances, as a particular root that invaded the main Liberty of the Subject. It is the Law (ſaid they) that glorious fundamental Right, whereby we have power to give; we deſire but that his Majeſty may ſee us have that Right therein, which, next to God, we all deſire; and then we doubt not, but we ſhall give his Majeſty all ſupply we can. The time was, when it was uſual to deſire favours for ſowing of diſcords, as Gondomar did for Raleigh's head. But the debates of this day came to no Reſolution.

The day following, being the 25th, Mr. Secretary Cook tendred the Houſe certain Propoſitions from the King, touching Supply; and told them, That his Majeſty finding time precious, expects that they ſhould begin ſpeedily, leſt they ſpend that time in deliberation, which ſhould be ſpent in action; that he eſteems the Grievances of the Houſe his own, and ſtands not on Precedence in point of Honour. Therefore to ſatisfy his Majeſty, let the ſame Committee take his Majeſty's Propoſitions into conſideration, and let both concur, whether to ſit on one in the forenoon, or the other in the afternoon, it is all one to his Majeſty.

Hereupon the Houſe turned themſelves into a Committee, and commanded Edward Littleton Eſq; unto the Chair, and ordered the Committee to take into conſideration the Liberty of the Subject, in his Perſon, and in his Goods; and alſo to take into conſideration his Majeſty's Supply. In this Debate the Grievances were reduced to ſix Heads, as to our Perſons.

1. Attendance at the Council-board.
2. Impriſonment.
3. Confinement.
4. Deſignation for foreign Imployment.
5. Martial Law.
6. Undue Proceedings in matter of Judicature.

The

The firſt matter debated, was the Subject's Liberty in his perſon; the particular inſtance was in the caſe of Sir John Heveningham, and thoſe other Gentlemen who were impriſoned about Loan-money, and thereupon had brought their Habeas Corpus, had their Caſe argued, and were nevertheleſs remanded to Priſon, and a Judgment, as it was then ſaid, was entred.

Then Sir Edward Coke ſpoke as follows.

IT is true that the King's Prerogative is a part of the Law of this Kingdom, and a ſupreme part, for the Prerogative is highly tendred and reſpected of the Law; yet it hath bounds ſet unto it by the Laws of England. But ſome worthy Members of this Houſe have ſpoken of foreign States, which I conceive to be a foreign Speech, and not able to weaken the ſide I ſhall maintain.

That Mr. Attorney (Sir Robert Heath) may have ſomething to anſwer unto, I will ſpeak, without taking another day, to the body of the Cauſe, yet keeping ſomething in ſtore for another time. I have not my Vade mecum here, yet I will endeavour to recite my Authorities truly. I ſhall begin with an old Authority, for Errorem ad ſua principia referre, eſt refellere.

The ground of this error was the Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. which ſaith, That thoſe are not repleviable, who are committed for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the King, or his Juſtices, or for the Foreſt (for ſo it was cited;) and Stamford 72. expounding hereof, the commandment of the King to be the commandment of the King's mouth, or of his Council: but it is clear that by præceptum is underſtood the commandment of the Juſtices of the King's-Bench and Common-Pleas; and this is contemporanea expoſitio, quæ eſt fortiſſima in lege.

To this purpoſe vide Weſtm. 1. cap. 9. the Book of 2 R. II. item cap. 20. de malefactoribus in parc. the Book of 8 Hen. IV. 5. item 25. 26. 29. cap. ejuſdem ſtatuti. whereby it may appear that the commandment here ſpoken of to be the commandment of the King, is his commandment by the Judges, Præceptum Domini Regis in Curia, non in Camera. So it is likewiſe taken 1 R. II. cap. 12. in a Statute made in the next King's Reign, and expreſsly in Dyer, fol. 162. §. 50. & fol. 192. §. 24. Shall I further prove it by matter of Record? Fac hoc & vives; it is 18 E. III. Rot. 33. coram Rege, John Bilſton's caſe; who being committed and detained in priſon by the commandment of the King, was diſcharged by Habeas Corpus, eo quod Breve Domini Regis non fuit ſufficiens cauſa.

All the Acts of Parliament in title of Accuſation are direct to the point, and alſo the 16 Hen. VI. Brooke and Littleton, 2. 8. monſtrans de fait 182. per Cur. The King cannot command a man to be arreſted in his preſence: the King can arreſt no man, becauſe there is no remedy againſt him, 1 Hen. VII. 4. likewiſe prædict. ſtat. cap. 18. the King's pleaſure is not binding without the aſſent of the Realm.

I never read any opinion againſt what I have ſaid, but that of Stamford, miſtaken (as you ſee) in the ground: yet I ſay not that a man may not be committed without preciſe ſhewing the cauſe in particular; for it is ſufficient if the cauſe in general be ſhewed, as for Treaſon, &c. 1 E. II. ſtat. de frangend. priſon. nullus habeat judicium, &c. there the cauſe of impriſonment muſt be known, elſe the Statute will be of little force; the words ther of do plainly demonſtrate the intent of the Statute to be accordingly.

I will conclude with the higheſt authority, that is, 25 chap. of the Acts of the Apoſtles, the laſt verſe, where Saint Paul ſaith, It is againſt reaſon to ſend a man to priſon without ſhewing a Cauſe.

Thus, Mr. Attorney, according to the rules of Phyſick, I have given you a Preparative, which doth precede a Purge. I have much more in ſtore *.

Mr. Creſwell's Speech:

I Stand up to ſpeak ſomewhat concerning the point of the Subjects grievances by impriſonment of their Perſons without any declaration of the cauſe, contrary unto, and in derogation of the fundamental Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom.

I think I am one of the Puiſnes of our profeſſion, which are of the Members of this Houſe; but howſoever ſure I am in that reſpect of my own inabilities, I am the Puiſne of all the whole Houſe; therefore according to the uſual courſe of Students in our profeſſion, I (as the Puiſne) ſpeak firſt in time, becauſe I can ſpeak leaſt in matter.

In purſuance of which courſe I ſhall rather put the caſe than argue it: and therefore I ſhall humbly deſire firſt of all, of this honourable Houſe in general, that the goodneſs of the cauſe may receive no prejudice by the weakneſs of my Argument; and next of all, of my Maſters here of the ſame profeſſion in particular, that they by their learned judgements will ſupply the great defects I ſhall diſcover by declaring of my unlearned opinion.

Before I ſpeak of the Queſtion, give me leave, as an entrance thereunto, to ſpeak firſt of the occaſion.

You ſhall know, Juſtice is the life and the heart's-blood of the Commonwealth; and if the Commonwealth bleed in the maſter-vein, all the balm in Gilead is but in vain to preſerve this our body of policy from ruin and deſtruction. Juſtice is both Columna & Corona Reipublicæ, ſhe is both the Column and the Pillar, the Crown and the Glory of the Commonwealth. This is made good in Scripture by the judgment of Solomon, the wiſeſt King that ever reigned on earth. For firſt, ſhe is the Pillar; for he ſaith, that by Juſtice the Throne ſhall be eſtabliſhed: Secondly, ſhe is the Crown; for he ſaith, that by Juſtice a Nation is exalted.

Our Laws, which are the rules of this Juſtice, they are the ne plus ultra to both the King and the Subject: and as they are the Hercules Pillar, ſo are they the Pillar to every Hercules, to every Prince, which he muſt not paſs.

Give me leave to reſemble her to Nebuchadnezzar's tree: for ſhe is ſo great, that ſhe doth ſhade not only the Palace of the King, and the Houſe of the Nobles,

* I riſe not to make an argument in this point, the greateſt that ever was in this place, or elſewhere. This Liberty, which all men, as well Lawyers as others, believe, as I hope, hath been violated, tho' not without complaint: but except in this late courſe, I am confident, was never adjudged before. The Habeas Corpus was brought, the Cauſe was returned by command of the King, intimated by the Lords of the Council; Argument was made; ſeven Acts of Parliament were mentioned, and all were paſſed over, and only commended; and upon that a Declaration of Judgement given, and ſo adjudged; That upon any commitment by the King or the Council, no enlargement can be. I ever obſerved, in any great cauſe, ſolemn arguments uſed to be made. We ſee his Majeſty and his Council are both intereſted in this. I do deſire that ſome of the King's Council may ſpeak what they can to ſatisfy us of this great power.

MSS. Pymmii apud virum honoratum Thomam Hales Baronettum. See Selden's Life, in his Works, Vol. I. p. 12.

Nobles, but doth alſo ſhelter the cottage of the pooreſt Beggar.

Wherefore, if either now the blaſts of indignation, or the unreſiſtable violator of laws, Neceſſity, hath ſo bruiſed any of the branches of this tree, that either our perſons, or goods, or poſſeſſions have not the ſame ſhelter as before; yet let us not therefore neglect the root of this great tree, but rather with all our poſſible endeavour and unfeigned duty, both apply freſh and fertile mould unto it, and alſo water it even with our own tears, that ſo theſe bruiſed branches may be recover'd, and the whole tree again proſper and flouriſh. For this I have learned from an ancient Father of the Church, that though preces Regum ſunt armatæ, yet arma ſubditorum are but only preces & lachrymæ.

I know well that Cor Regis inſcrutabile; and that Kings, although they are but men before God, yet are they Gods before men. And therefore to my gracious and dread Sovereign, (whoſe virtues are true qualities ingenerate both in his judgment and nature) let my arm be cut off, nay, let my ſoul not live that day, that I ſhall dare to lift up my arm to touch that forbidden fruit, thoſe flowers of his princely Crown and Diadem.

But yet in our Eden, in this garden of the Commonwealth, as there are the flowers of the Sun, which are ſo glorious that they are to be handled only by royal Majeſty; ſo are there alſo ſome daiſies and wholeſome herbs, which every common hand that lives and labours in this garden may pick and gather up, and take comfort and repoſe in them. Amongſt all which this oculus dei, this bona libertas is one, and the chief one.

Thus much in all humbleneſs I preſume to ſpeak for the occaſion. I will now deſcend to the queſtion: wherein I hold, (with all dutiful ſubmiſſion to better Judgments) that theſe Acts of power in impriſoning and confining of his Majeſty's Subjects in ſuch manner, without any declaration of the cauſe, are againſt the fundamental Laws and liberties of this Kingdom.

And for theſe reaſons thus briefly drawn, I conclude,

1. The firſt, from the great favour which the Law doth give unto, and the great care which it hath ever taken of the Liberty and Safety of this Kingdom.

I ſhould not need to take the queſtion in pieces, nor handle it in parts dividedly, but as one entire; becauſe I hold no other difference between impriſonment and confinement than only this, that one hath a leſs and ſtreighter, the other a greater and larger priſon. And this word confinement not being to be found in any one caſe of our Law, if therefore it is become the language of State, it is too difficult for me to define.

To proceed therefore in maintenance of my firſt reaſon; I find our Law doth ſo much favour the Subject's Liberty of his perſon, that the body of a man was not liable to be arreſted or impriſoned for any other cauſe at the Common-Law, but for force, and things done againſt the peace. For the Common-Law (being the preſerver of the land) ſo abhorreth force, that thoſe that commit it ſhe accounts her capital enemies, and therefore did ſubject their bodies to impriſonment. But by the Statute of Marlebridge, Cap. 24. which was made 35 Hen. III. who was the eighth King from the Conqueſt, becauſe Bailiffs would not render accounts to their Lords, it was enacted, that their bodies ſhould be attached: And afterwards by the Statute 23 Ed. III. 17. who was the eleventh King after the Conqueſt, becauſe men made no conſcience to pay their debts; it was enacted that their bodies ſhould likewiſe be attached. But before thoſe Statutes no man's body was ſubject to be taken or impriſoned otherwiſe than as aforeſaid. Whereby it is evident, how much the Common-Law favoured the Liberty of the Subject and protected his body from impriſonment.

I will inforce the reaſon further by a rule in Law, and ſome caſes in Law upon that rule.

The rule is this, That Corporalis injuria non recipit æſtimationem è futuro: So as if the queſtion be not for a wrong done to the perſon, the Law will not compel him to ſuſtain it, and afterwards accept a remedy; for the Law holds no damage a ſufficient recompence for a wrong which is corporal.

The caſes in Law to prove this, ſhall be theſe.

If one menace me in my goods, or that he will burn the evidence of my land, which he hath in his cuſtody, unleſs I make unto him a bond; there I cannot avoid the bond, by pleading of this menace. But if he reſtrains my perſon, or threatens me with battery, or with burning my houſe, which is a protection for my perſon, or with burning an inſtrument of manumiſſion, which is an evidence of my enfranchiſement; upon theſe menaces or dares, I ſhall avoid the bond by plea.

So if a Treſpaſſer drives my beaſt over an other man's ground, and I purſue to reſcue it, there I am a Treſpaſſer to him on whoſe ground I am. But if a man aſſault my perſon, and I for my ſafety fly over into another man's ground, there I am no Treſpaſſer to him, for Quod quis in tuitione ſui corporis fecerit, jure id feciſſe exiſtimatur.

Nay, which is more, the Common Law did favour the Liberty not only of Freemen, but even of the perſons of Bondmen and Villeins, who have no propriety either in Lands or Goods, as Freemen have; and therefore by the Law, the Lord could not maim his Villein; nay, if the Lord commanded another to beat his Villein, and he did it, the Villein ſhould have his action of battery againſt him for it.

If the Lord made a leaſe for years to his Villein, if he did plead with his Villein, if he tendred his Villein to be Champion for him in a Writ of Right; any of thoſe Acts, and many other, which I omit, were in Law enfranchiſements, and made theſe Villeins Freemen. Nay, in a ſuit brought againſt one, if he by Attorney will plead that he is a Villein, the Law is ſo careful of Freedom, that it diſallows this Plea by Attorney, but he muſt do it propria perſona, becauſe it binds his poſterity and blood to the Villein's alſo. And thus much in the general for my firſt reaſon.

2. My next reaſon is drawn by an argument à majori ad minus; I frame it thus: If the King have no abſolute power over our lands or goods, then à fortiori not over our perſons, to impriſon them without declaring the cauſe, for our perſons are much more worth than either lands or goods; which is proved by what I have ſaid already, and Chriſt himſelf makes it clear, where he ſaith, An non eſt corpus ſupra veſtimentum? Is not the body of more worth than the raiment? Where the Canoniſts ſay, that veſtimentum comprehendeth all outward things which are not in the ſame degree with that which is corporal. And our Law maketh it alſo plain; for if a Villein purchaſeth frank-land, this makes it Villein-land according to the nature of his perſon; but it holds not not è converſo, frank-land ſhall not free the perſon. Now that the King hath no abſolute power either over our lands or goods, I will only at this time but put a caſe or two: for without proof of the premiſſes, my concluſion would not follow.

Firſt for land; The King cannot by his Letters-Patent make the ſon of an Alien heir to his father, nor to any other, for he cannot diſinherit the right heir, ſaith the book, nor do no prejudice to the Lord of his Eſcheat. The King by his Prerogative ſhall pay no toll for things bought in fairs and markets; but a cuſtom for paying toll to go over the ſoil and freeholds of another ſhall bind the King, for this toucheth the inheritance of the Subject; and therefore the King ſhall not have ſo much as a way over his lands without paying; and if not a way, then certainly not the land itſelf.

Next for goods; If a man hath a jewel in gage for ten pound, &c. and is attainted for Treaſon, the King ſhall not have this jewel, if he pays not the ten pound. So if Cattel be diſtreined, and the owner of them afterwards be attainted, yet the King ſhall not have them until he have ſatisfied that for which they were diſtreined. And if in theſe caſes, where the owners of the goods are ſuch capital offenders, the King cannot have them; much leſs ſhall he have them when the owner is innocent, and no offender.

Nay, I may well ſay that almoſt every leaf and page of all the volumes of our Common Law prove this right of propriety, this diſtinction of meum and tuum, as well between King and Subject, as one Subject and another: and therefore my concluſion follows, that if the prerogative extend not neither to lands nor to goods, then à fortiori not to the perſon, which is more worth than either lands or goods, as I ſaid. And yet I agree, that by the very law of nature, ſervice of the perſon of the ſubject is due to his Sovereign; but this muſt be in ſuch things which are not againſt the law of nature: but to have the body impriſoned without any cauſe declared, and ſo to become in bondage, I am ſure is contrary unto and againſt the law of nature, and therefore not to be inforced by the Sovereign upon his Subjects.

3. My next reaſon is drawn ab inutili & incommodo. For the Statute de frangentibus priſonam made 1 E. II. is, quod nullus qui priſonam fregerit, ſubeat judicium vitæ vel membrorum pro fractione priſonæ tantum, niſi cauſa pro qua captus impriſonetur tale judicium requirat. Whence this concluſion is clearly gathered, That if a man be committed to priſon without declaring what cauſe, and then if either Malefactor do break the priſon, or the Goaler ſuffer him to eſcape, albeit the priſoner ſo eſcaping had committed Crimen læſæ majeſtatis, yet neither the Goaler nor any other that procured his eſcape, by the Law ſuffer any corporal puniſhment for ſetting him at large; which, if admitted, might prove in conſequence a matter of great danger to the Commonwealth.

4. My next reaſon is drawn ab Regis honore, from that great honour the Law doth attribute unto ſovereign Majeſty: and therefore the rule of law is, that Solum Rex hoc non poteſt facere, quod non poteſt injuſte agere. And therefore if a ſubject hath the donation, and the King the preſentation to a Church, whereunto the King preſents without the ſubject's nomination, here the quare impedit lies againſt the Incumbent, and the King is in law no diſturber.

And Huſſey Chief-Juſtice in 1 Hen. VII. fol. 4. ſaith, that Sir John Markham, told King Edw. IV. he could not arreſt a man either for Treaſon or Felony, as a ſubject might, becauſe that if the King did wrong, the party could not have his action againſt him.

What is the reaſon that an action of falſe impriſonment lies againſt the Sheriff, if he doth not return the King's Writ, by which he hath taken the body of the ſubject, but this, becauſe the Writ doth breviter enarrare cauſam captionis, (which if it doth not, it ſhall abate, and is void in law) and being returned, the party when he appears may know what to anſwer, and the Court upon what to judge? And if the King's Writ under his great Seal cannot impriſon the ſubject, unleſs it contains the cauſe, ſhall then the King's warrant otherwiſe do it without containing the cauſe; that his Judges upon return thereof may likewiſe judge of the ſame, either to remain, or judge the party impriſoned?

I ſhould argue this point more cloſely upon the Statute of Magna Charta 29. quod nullus liber homo impriſonetur; the Statute of Weſt. 1. cap. 15. for letting perſons to bail; and the judgments lately given in the King's-Bench: but the latter of theſe Statutes having been by that honourable Gentleman Sir Edward Coke (to whom the profeſſors of the law both in this and all ſucceeding ages, are, and will be much bound) already expounded unto us, and that alſo fortified by thoſe many contemporary expoſitions and judgments by him learnedly cited; and there being many learned Lawyers here, whoſe time I will not waſte, who were preſent; and ſome of them perhaps of Counſel in the late cauſe adjudged in the King's-Bench, where you (to whoſe perſon I now ſpeak) do well know I was abſent, being then of Counſel in a cauſe in another Court, and my practice being in the Country, far remote from the treaſure of Antiquity, and Records conducing to the clearing of this point; therefore the narrowneſs of my underſtanding commends unto me ſober ignorance, rather than preſumptuous knowledge, and alſo commands me no further to trouble your patience.

But I will conclude with that which I find reported by Sir John Davis, who was the King's Serjeant, and ſo, by the duty of his place, would no doubt maintain to his uttermoſt the prerogatives of the King his royal Maſter; and yet it was by him thus ſaid in thoſe reports of his upon the caſe of Taniſtry Cuſtoms, p. 29. That the Kings of England always have had a monarchy-royal, and not a monarchy-ſeignoral: where, under the firſt (ſaith he) " the ſubjects " are freemen, and have propriety in their goods, " and free-hold, and inheritance in their lands; " but under the latter they are as Villeins and Slaves, " and have propriety in nothing. And therefore " (ſaith he) when a Royal Monarch makes a new " Conqueſt, yet if he receives any of his Nation's " ancient Inhabitants into his protection, they and " their heirs after them ſhall enjoy their lands and " liberties according to the law. And there he " voucheth this precedent and judgement following, " given before William the Conqueror himſelf, viz.

" That one Sherborn a Saxon, at the time of the " Conqueſt being owner of a caſtle and lands in " Norfolk, the Conqueror gave the ſame to one " Warren a Norman; and Sherborn dying, the " heir claiming the ſame by deſcent according to " the law, it was before the Conqueror himſelf ad-

" judged

" judged for the heir, and that the gift thereof by " the Conqueror was void."

If then it were thus in the Conqueror's time, and by his own ſentence and judgment, and hath ſo continued in all the ſucceſſions of our Kings ever ſince, what doubt need we have, but that his moſt excellent Majeſty upon our humble petition proſtrated at his feet, (which, as was well ſaid, is the beſt paſſage to his heart) will vouchſafe unto us our ancient liberties and birth-rights, with a thorough reformation of this and other juſt grievances? And ſo I humbly crave pardon of this honourable Houſe, that I have made a ſhort leſſon long.

Upon this and other arguments made in this caſe of the Habeas Corpus, the Houſe referred the whole buſineſs to a Committee, to examine all the proceedings: concerning which, Mr. Selden afterwards made report to the Houſe, that Mr. Waterhouſe, a Clerk in the Crown-Office, being examined before the Committee, did confeſs, that by direction from Sir Robert Heath, the King's Attorney-General, he did write the draught of a judgment in the caſe before-mention'd, which was delivered to Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Keeling being examined before the Committee, did confeſs, that after Mich. term laſt, the Attorney-General wiſhed him to make a ſpecial entry of the Habeas Corpus: to which he anſwered, he knew no ſpecial entry in thoſe caſes, but only a Remittitur: but ſaid to Mr. Attorney, that if he pleaſed to draw one, and the Court after aſſented to it, he would then enter it. The Attorney did accordingly make a draught, and the Copy thereof Mr. Keeling produced to the Committee. And further ſaid, that he carried this draught to the Judges, but they would not aſſent to a ſpecial entry: nevertheleſs, the Attorney-General divers times ſent to him, and told him there was no remedy, but he muſt enter it. Yet a week before the Parliament met, the Attorney-General called for the draught again, which accordingly he gave unto him, and never heard of it more.

Sir Robert Philips, upon this report, gave his opinion, " That this intended judgment in the " Habeas Corpus, was a draught made by ſome man " that deſired to ſtrike us from all our liberties: " but the Judges juſtly refuſed it. But if the Judg- " es did intend it, we ſit not here (ſaid he) to an- " ſwer the truſt we are ſent for, if we preſent not " this matter to his Majeſty. Let this buſineſs be " further ſearched into, and ſee how this judgment " lies againſt us, and what the Judges do ſay con- " cerning the ſame."

Mar. 27. The Houſe proceeded in further debate of the liberty of the ſubject. When

Mr. Hackwel reſumed the debate of the matter concerning the Habeas Corpus.

" The late judgment (ſaid he) which lies in bar, " is only an award, and no judgment; and in the " Lord Chief-Juſtice's argument, there was no " word ſpoken, that the King might commit " or detain without cauſe.

" For the King to commit a man, is indignum " Regi: Mercy and Honour flow immediately " from the King, Judgment and Juſtice are his too, " but they flow from his Miniſters; the ſword is " carried before him, but the ſcepter in his hands. " Theſe are true emblems of a good King.

" The Law admits not the King's power of de- " taining in priſon at pleaſure. In ancient times " priſons were but pro cuſtodia, carceres non ad pœ- " nam, ſed ad cuſtodiam. Admit the King may " commit a man, yet to detain him as long as he " pleaſeth, is dangerous, and then a man ſhall be " puniſhed before his offence: Impriſonment is a " maceration of the body, and horror to the mind; " it is vita pejor morte."

Then the Houſe commanded that caſe in the Lord Chief-Juſtice Anderſon's Book, all of his own hand-writing, to be openly read. The words of the Report were theſe:

" Divers perſons fueront committes a ſeveral " temps a ſeveral priſons, ſur pleaſure ſans bon cauſe " parte de queux eſtiant ameſnes en banck le Roy. " Et parte en le Commune banck fueront accor- " dant a le ley de la terre miſe a large & diſcharge " de le impriſonment, pur que aucuns grants fue- " ront oſtendus & procure un commandment a les " Judges que ils ne fera iſſent apres. Ceo nient " meens les Judges ne ſurceaſe mes per adviſe enter " eux ils feſoint certain Articles le tenour de queux " enſue, & deliver eux al ſeigneurs Chauncelor & " Treaſurer & eux ſubſcribe avec toute lour maines, " les Articles ſont come enſuont."

[We her Majeſty's Juſtices of both Benches, and Barons of the Exchequer, deſire your Lordſhips, that by ſome good means ſome order may be taken, that her Highneſs's Subjects may not be committed or detain'd in priſon by commandment of any Nobleman or Counſellor againſt the laws of the Realm; either elſe help us to have acceſs to her Majeſty, to the end to become ſuitors to her for the ſame: for divers have been impriſoned for ſuing ordinary actions and ſuits at the Common-Law, until they have been conſtrained to leave the ſame againſt their wills, and put the ſame to order, albeit judgment and execution have been had therein, to their great loſſes and griefs: for the aid of which perſons, her Majeſty's Writs have ſundry times been directed to ſundry perſons, having the cuſtody of ſuch perſons unlawfully impriſoned, upon which Writs, no good or lawful cauſe of impriſonment hath been returned or certified. Whereupon, according to the laws, they have been diſcharged of their impriſonment; ſome of which perſons ſo delivered, have been again committed to priſon in ſecret places, and not to any common or ordinary priſon, or lawful Officer or Sheriff, or other lawfully authorized, to have or keep a Goal; ſo that upon complaint made for their delivery, the Queen's Courts cannot tell to whom to direct her Majeſty's Writs; and by this means Juſtice cannot be done. And moreover, divers Officers and Serjeants of London have been many times committed to priſon for lawful executing of her Majeſty's Writs, ſued forth of her Majeſty's Courts at Weſtminſter; and thereby her Majeſty's Subjects and Officers are ſo terrified, that they dare not ſue or execute her Majeſty's Laws, her Writs and Commandments: divers others have been ſent for by Purſivants, and brought to London from their dwellings, and by unlawful impriſonment have been conſtrained, not only to withdraw their lawful ſuits, but have alſo been compelled to pay the Purſivants, ſo bringing ſuch perſons great ſums of money. All which, upon complaint, the Judges are bound by office and oath to relieve and help, by and according to her Majeſty's laws. And when it pleaſeth your Lordſhips to will divers of us to ſet down in what caſes a priſoner ſent to cuſtody by her Majeſty or her Council, are to be detained in priſon, and not to be delivered by her Majeſty's Court or Judges; we think, that if any perſon be committed by her Majeſty's command, from her perſon, or by order from the Council-board; and if any one or two of her Council commit one for High-Treaſon, ſuch perſons ſo in the caſes before committed, may not be delivered by any of her Courts, without due trial by the law, and judgment of acquittal had: Nevertheleſs the Judges may award the Queen's Writ, to bring the bodies of ſuch priſoners before them; and if upon return thereof, the cauſes of their commitment be certified to the Judges, as it ought to be; then the Judges in the caſes before, ought not to deliver him; but to remand the priſoner to the place from whence he came, which cannot be conveniently done, unleſs notice of the cauſe in general, or elſe in ſpecial, be given to the Keeper or Goaler that ſhall have the cuſtody of ſuch priſoner. All the Judges and Barons did ſubſcribe their names to theſe Articles, Ter. Paſchæ 34 Eliz. and delivered one to the Lord-Chancellor, and another to the Lord-Treaſurer: after which time there did follow more quietneſs than before, in the cauſe before-mentioned.]

After the reading of this Report, Sir Edward Coke ſaid, That of my own knowledge this Book was written with my Lord Anderſon's own hand, it is no flying report of a young Student. I was Solicitor then, and Treaſurer Burleigh was as much againſt commitment as any of this kingdom; it was the White Staves that made this ſtir. Let us draw towards a concluſion: the queſtion is, Whether a Freeman can be impriſoned by the King, without ſetting down the cauſe? I leave it as bare as Æſop's Crow, they that argue againſt it, Humores moti & non remoti corpus deſtruunt. It is a maxim, the Common Law hath admeaſured the King's Prerogative, that in no caſe it can prejudice the Inheritance of the ſubjects; had the Law given the Prerogative to that which is taken, it would have ſet ſome time to it, elſe mark what would follow. I ſhall have an Eſtate of Inheritance for life, or for years in my land, or propriety in my goods, and I ſhall be a tenant at will for my liberty: I ſhall have propriety in my own houſe, and not liberty in my perſon, Perſpicue vera non ſunt probanda. The King hath diſtributed his Judicial Power to Courts of Juſtice, and to Miniſters of Juſtice; it is too low for ſo great a Monarch as the King is, to commit men to priſon; and it is againſt law, that men ſhould be committed, and no cauſe ſhewed. I would not ſpeak this, but that I hope my gracious King will hear of it; yet it is not I Edward Coke that ſpeaks it, but the records that ſpeak it; we have a national appropriate Law to this Nation, diviſis ab orbe Britannis.

Mr. Selden.

I Was ſent hither, and truſted with the lives and liberties of them that ſent me. Since I came, I took here an oath to defend the King's prerogatives and rights. I profeſs, tho' once I was of Counſel, and then I ſpoke for my fee, for the Gentlemen in their Habeas Corpus; yet now I ſpeak according to my knowledge and conſcience.

The queſtion is, whether any ſubject or freeman, that is committed to priſon, and the cauſe not ſhewn in the Warrant, he ought to be bailed, or delivered? I think, confidently, it belongs to every ſubject, that is not a Villein, that he ought to be bailed, or delivered.

I ſhall ſpeak in this courſe. 1. I will ſhew the reaſons. 2. Acts of Parliament. 3. Precedents. 4. Anſwer objections.

I. Reaſons drawn from three heads;

1. From remedies provided by the Common Law againſt impriſonment. For that precious thing of liberty there are divers remedies, by which it appears, if no known cauſe be of further detainment, he is to be delivered. I will not mention the action of falſe impriſonment, but the Writ de odio & atia, which is not taken away, for that it is in Magna Charta. That Writ was ſent to know, if the party impriſoned were committed for any cauſe of malice and hatred, and this was to be enquired of in Jury. For the Writ de homine replegiando, if one be impriſoned under the Sheriff, he muſt be delivered, if he be not detained for a cauſe for which he is not repleviſable. For the Habeas Corpus, the Keeper is to bring the body ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum. If there be no cauſe, how can the Court conſider of the cauſe? For appeal, by the old law in the time of Hen. I. one impriſoned might have his appeal, as appears by Bracton, c. 25. lib. de corona. Fleta, c. 42.

2. The ſecond reaſon is from the conſideration of Freemen and Villeins. All admit we are liberi homines; but do but conſider the difference of Villeins and Freemen, and I know no difference in their perſons, but only the one cannot be impriſoned, as the other may. Whoever can ſay I can impriſon him, I will ſay he is my Villein. It is the ſole diſtinction of Freemen, that they cannot be impriſoned at pleaſure.

In old time none but Jews and Villeins could be impriſoned, and confined. The Jews were as demeſne Villeins of the King; he could ſend to them to lend money, and if they did not, he impriſoned them.

3. From matter of puniſhment. When any thing is declared by any new Statute to be an offence, it goes, that he ſhall be fined and impriſoned. To what end were this in any Act of Parliament, if impriſonment was at the King's will.

II. For Acts of Parliament, Magna Charta, c. 19. In that Act when it was firſt made, it was nec eum in carcere mittemus, 17 Joh. that Statute was made, and then it had thoſe words. The courſe then was to ſend down all Acts of Parliament and Charters to the Abbeys to be enrolled. Matthew Paris. 345. & 342. recites that Charter of 17 John.

They object in Magna Charta, there is lex terræ, and by the law one may be impriſoned.

Lex terræ is the proceſs of law, for the law impriſons no man at all, but it is meant the proceſs of law. 5 Edw. III. Upon ſome occaſion it was enacted, That none be attached contrary to the great Charter and the law of the land. 25 Edw. III. divers were committed to the Tower, and no man knew wherefore, whereupon was 25 Edw. III. made. 28 Edw. III. c. 3. 36 Edw. III. n. 9. is againſt impriſonment, per ſpeciale mandatum.

III. For precedents, 18 Edw. III. rot. 33 H. I. Hen. VIII. rot. 9. 12 Jac. rot. 153.

IV. Objections againſt it. Firſt, Againſt the reaſon; a man may be committed for a point of State that may not be known; I underſtand not matters of State; I expected not the objection in a Court of Juſtice; and it may be a word for any King to try the courage of his Judges, and to ſuppoſe there is a cauſe of State, when perhaps there is no cauſe appears to them. It is as if they ſent him back to priſon, they knew not wherefore; which cannot be in a Court of Juſtice, where they are ſworn to do juſtice. Secondly,

Secondly, As to the Acts of Parliament, the Judges gave no anſwer, but only commended them; but the Attorney anſwered them with one blow to ſtrike them all: that they are to be conſidered for common and ordinary cauſes, that happen in Weſtminſter-hall only. But do but conſider Magna Charta, which reflects upon the King; nec ſuper eum ibimus. By the law, if I bring an Appeal of Murder againſt a Nobleman, which is my ſuit, he ſhall not be tried by his Peers; but if he be indicted for that murder, which is the King's ſuit, he ſhall; which ſhews, that that which is in Magna Charta is meant of the King, though it be not in the third perſon.

Third Objection is againſt the Statute of Weſtminſter, 1. c. 15. But the King's command, is the command of the King by his Juſtices; and alſo the word repleviſable, never ſignifies bailable: bailable, is in a Court of Record, by the King's Juſtices; but repleviſable, is by the Sheriff. The Statute is to the Sheriff, and it ſhews the particular cauſes, and concludes that the Sheriff ſhall loſe his Bailiwick. The Sheriff could never replevy one for Murder, or matters of the Foreſt; but in the King's-Bench for Murder, or matters of the Foreſt they may, 3. aſſiſ. 19. 21 Edw. IV. 25. 22 Hen. VI. 48. Newton. If any man be taken by our command, or by the command of the King, if the Sheriff take the party, he muſt come to us, we will grant a Superſedeas.

Fourthly, They object againſt the precedents cited; they are all of this kind, they were impriſoned, per mandatum domini Regis, or concilii, without cauſe, or the cauſe is expreſſed. When the cauſe is expreſſed, and is within the cognizance of the Court, there they bailed them; but when it is for Felony or Treaſon, it may be done beyond the ſeas, and then the Court has no cognizance of them. When no cauſe is ſet, yet bailment is alledged; then they anſwer, divers were ſo bailed, but the cauſe appears by Paper-Books; but I never ſaw theſe Books to be Records, and Judges of Record made their judgment in Records, and the cauſe only appears by Record.

For the reſolution cited 34 Eliz. all precedents were read, Acts of Parliament indeed were paſſed over, and yet that was not read. As we have that liberty here, ſo I dare ſay, no Prince in Chriſtendom doth aſſume this power to impriſon any without any cauſe. I find no ſteps or veſtigium of any ſuch power *.

Saturday, March 29. 1628. Mr. Sollicitor ſpake as followeth:

My care when I ſpake laſt was to give ſatisfaction that the judges did not err in their late reſolutions; but if they did, it was cum patribus: the Judges knew nothing of the cauſe of the Gentlemens impriſonment; if they had known the cauſe of their Impriſonment in private, they would have appealed to his Majeſty for his Grace; for to reiterate all the authorities I will not, I have ſomething to ſay in the point, to put into the ſcale, which might have been then ſaid, had it not been for the unhappy difference that might have been between the two Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall, the King's-Bench and the Chancery-Court.

In 13 Jac. divers were committed for diſobedience to the Decree of the Court of Chancery, as namely Roſſwel and others, and it was reſolved, That the Judges could not deliver ſuch; and at the ſame time ſome were committed by Warrant from the King and the Lords of the Council, and this came in Queſtion, Mich. 13. Jac. and ſo continued divers Terms. There was then recourſe had to thoſe arguments, and I have a report here of that time what the Judges did then, part whereof I will read.

It was reſolved by † Coke, Crook, Dodderidge and Houghton, that the return was good, and that the cauſe need not to be diſcloſed, being per mandatum concilii, as Arcana Regni (and the report further ſaith, that in 34 Eliz. it was reſolved accordingly) and by Coke 'twas ſaid, That if the Privy-Council commit one, he is not bailable by any Court of Juſtice, and Stamford's opinion is ſo, fol. 72. See what opinion the Judge had of the reſolution in 34 Eliz. and of Stamford.

To this Sir Edward Coke replied: This report moves not me at all; that report is not yet twenty one years old, but under age, being in 13 Jac. In truth, when I read Stamford, I was of his opinion at the firſt, but ſince, looking into thoſe Records before mentioned, I was of another mind. He brings in an ill time 13 Jac. when there was claſhing between the Court of King's-Bench and Chancery, as alſo there were then many of the Traytors that were of the Powder-Treaſon, committed per mandatum Concilii.

Upon Monday, April 1. the debate being reaſſumed, Sir Robert Philips moved, That conſidering the Houſe was now ready for the Queſtion, they might hear the reſolution read of all the Judges in 34 Eliz. about this matter.

Then Sir Edward Coke ſtood up and ſaid, The Glaſs of Time runs out, and ſomething caſt upon us hath retarded us; when I ſpake againſt the Loans and this matter, I expected blows, and ſomewhat was ſpoken, though not to the matter.

Concerning that (that hath been objected) I did when I was a Judge, I will ſay ſomewhat. Indeed a motion was made, but no argument or debate, or reſolution upon advice; I will never palliate with this Houſe, there is no Judge that hath an upright heart to God, and a clear heart to the world, but he hath ſome Warrant for every thing that he doth. I confeſs when I read Stamford then, and had it in my hands, I was of that opinion at the Council-Table; but when I perceived that ſome Members of this Houſe were taken away, even in the face of this Houſe, and ſent to priſon, and when I was not far off from that place my ſelf, I went to my book, and would not be quiet till I had ſatisfied myſelf.

Stam-

* Die Veneris, Mar. 28. I riſe to make a Motion. Yeſterday a learned Argument was made by Mr. Solicitor, and 21 Edw. I. was cited by him, which makes clearly for the Subject, alſo for that ſalus populi. I am ſure that libertas populi eſt ſalus populi. And Feſtus himſelf that ſent Paul to Agrippa was a Lawyer of the Empire; and to ſend a Priſoner without ſignifying the Crimes laid againſt him, ſeem'd unreaſonable to Feſtus to do. By the Law of the Empire none were to be committed above thirty days, and the Goaler is under a penalty to certify the cauſe of the Priſoners commitment: and if the Goaler be ſlack, he is to be fined. When they ſpeak here of the Judgment given in the King's-Bench, they ſay the Precedents were miſ-recited. Let a Sub-committee ſearch into thoſe Judgments and Precedents. I heard here a quouſque, and there is nothing but a remittitur. The courſe of the Officer is to enter quouſque, &c. and that is till they be delivered by Law, and is all the Judgment that can be. Ex MSS. Pymmii. See Selden's Life in his Works.

† Coke was then a Judge, and in favour at Court.

 Coke of one mind, when a Judge, and in favour; of another, when out of Court, and diſcontented.

Stamford at the firſt was my guide, but my guide had deceived me, therefore I ſwerved from it: I have now better guides, Acts of Parliament and other precedents, theſe are now my guides. I deſire to be free from the imputation that hath been laid upon me.

As for the copy of the intended Judgement, I fear, had it not been for this Parliament, it had been entred e'er this time; a Parliament brings Judges and all other men into good order: if any Clerk had drawn this draught, he would have done it by a precedent, and there can be no precedent found that warrants it, and therefore I believe that ſome other did it.

This draught of the judgment, ſhould it be entred, will ſting us to death, quia nulla cauſa juit oſtenta, ideo ne fuit baileabile, and that it appears to be ſo by the Records. I perſuade myſelf Mr. Attorney drew it; I had a copy of my Lord Anderſon's report of the Judges reſolution, 34 Eliz. long ago; but I durſt not vouch it (and it was ſo in that copy) for that it was Apocrypha, and did not anſwer his gravity that made it, and yet it was cited in the King's-Bench, That all the Judges of England ruled it ſo.

Then the Houſe of Commons came to the following Reſolutions.

Reſolved upon the queſtion, Nemine contradicente,

I. That no Freeman ought to be detained or kept in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unleſs ſome cauſe of the commitment, detainer or reſtraint be expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained or reſtrained.

II. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, though it be by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, he praying the ſame.

III. That if a Freeman be committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, no cauſe of ſuch commitment, detainer, or reſtraint being expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained, and the ſame be returned upon an Habeas Corpus, granted for the ſaid party; then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

And then taking into conſideration the Property of the Subject in his goods, they came to this reſolution, to which there was not a negative; viz.

That it is the ancient and undubitable Right of every Freeman, that he hath a full and abſolute property in his goods and eſtate; that no Tax, Tallage, Loan, Benevolence, or other like charge ought to be commanded, or levied by the King, or any of his Miniſters, without common conſent by Act of Parliament.

The Commons having ſhewed their care of the Subjects in the Liberty of their Perſon, and Propriety in their Goods, did now prepare to tranſmit their reſolutions to the Lords for their concurrence; and ſeveral Members were appointed to manage a conference with the Lords concerning the ſame: and Monday, April the 7th, the conference was held, and opened by Sir Dudley Diggs.

A Conference deſired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houſes, concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subjects.

Sir Dudley Diggs.

My Lords,

I Shall, I hope, auſpiciouſly begin this conference this day, with an obſervation out of Holy Story, in the days of good King Joſiah, (2 Chron. 34.) when the land was purged of Idolatry, and the great men went about to repair the Houſe of God; while money was ſought for, there was found a Book of the Law which had been neglected, and afterwards being preſented to the good King, procured the bleſſing, which your Lordſhips may read in the Scriptures. (2 Kings 22.)

My good Lords, I am confident your Lordſhips will as chearfully join with the Commons, in acknowledgement of God's great bleſſing in our good King Joſiah, as the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, by me their unworthieſt ſervant, do thankfully remember your moſt religious and truly honourable invitation of them to the late petition, for cleanſing this land from Popiſh abominations; which I may truly call a neceſſary and a happy repairing of the houſe of God. And, to go on with the parallel, whilſt we the Commons, out of our good affections, were ſeeking for money, we found, I cannot ſay a book of the Law, but many, and thoſe fundamental points thereof neglected and broken, which hath occaſioned our deſire of this conference: wherein I am firſt commanded to ſhew to your Lordſhips in general, that the Laws of England are grounded on reaſon, more ancient than books, conſiſting much in unwritten cuſtoms, yet ſo full of juſtice and true equity, that your moſt honourable Predeceſſors and Anceſtors many times propugned them with a nolumus mutari; and ſo ancient, that from the Saxon days, notwithſtanding the injuries and ruins of time, they have continued in moſt parts the ſame, as may appear in old remaining monuments of the Laws of Ethelbert, the firſt Chriſtian King of Kent, Ina the King of the Weſt-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred the great Monarch, who united the Saxon Heptarchy, whoſe Laws are yet to be ſeen, publiſhed, as ſome think by Parliament, as he ſays to that end, Ut qui ſub uno rege, ſub una lege regerentur. And though the Book of Litchfield ſpeaking of the troubleſome times of the Danes, ſays that then Jus ſopitum erat in regno, leges & conſuetudines ſopitæ ſunt, and prava voluntas, vis, & violentia magis regnabant quam judicia vel juſtitia; yet by the bleſſing of God, a good King, Edward, commonly called St. Edward, did awaken thoſe Laws, and as the old words are, Excitatas reparavit, reparatas decoravit, decoratas confirmavit. Which confirmavit, ſhews that good King Edward did not give thoſe Laws, which William the Conqueror, and all his Succeſſors, ſince that time have ſworn unto.

And here, my Lords, by many caſes frequent in our modern Laws, ſtrongly concurring with thoſe of the ancient Saxon Kings, I might, if time were not precious, demonſtrate that our Laws and Cuſtoms were the ſame.

I will only intreat your Lordſhips leave to tell you, that as we have now, even in thoſe Saxon times they had their Courts-Baron, and Courts-Leet, and Sheriffs-Courts, by which, as Tacitus ſays of the Germans their Anceſtors, Jura reddebant per pagos & vicos; and I do believe, as we have now, they had their Parliaments, where new Laws were made cum conſenſu prælatorum, magnatum & totius communitatis; or as another writes, cum conſilio prælatorum, nobilium, & ſapientum laicorum. I will add nothing out of Glanvile that wrote in the time of H. II. or Bracton that wrote in the days of H. III. only give me leave to cite that of Forteſcue, the learned Chancellor to H. VI. who writing of this kingdom, ſays, Regnum illud in omnibus nationum, & Regum temporibus, eiſdem quibus nunc regitur legibus & conſuetudinibus, regebatur. But, my good Lords, as the Poet ſaid of Fame, I may ſay of our Common-Law;

Ingrediturque ſolo caput inter nubila condit.

Wherefore the cloudy part being mine, I will make haſte to open way for your Lordſhips to hear more certain arguments, and ſuch as go on more ſure grounds.

Be pleaſed then to know, that it is an undoubted and fundamental point of this ſo antient Common-Law of England, that the Subject hath a true property in his Goods and Poſſeſſions, which doth preſerve, as ſacred, that meum & tuum, that is the nurſe of induſtry, and mother of courage, and without which there can be no juſtice, of which meum & tuum is the proper object. But the undoubted birthright of free Subjects, hath lately not a little been invaded and prejudiced by preſſures, the more grievous, becauſe they have been purſued by impriſonment, contrary to the Franchiſes of this land; and when, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, redreſs hath been ſought for in a legal way, by demanding Habeas Corpus from the Judges, and a diſcharge or trial according to the Law of the land, ſucceſs hath failed; that now inforceth the Commons, in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, to examine by Acts of Parliament, precedents and reaſons, the truth of the Engliſh Subjects Liberty, which I ſhall leave to learned Gentlemen, whoſe weighty arguments, I hope, will leave no place in your Lordſhips memories, for the errours and infirmities of your humbleſt ſervant, that doth thankfully acknowledge the great favour of your honourable and patient attention.

Mr. Littleton's Argument, made by the command of the Houſe of Commons out of Acts of Parliament, and Authorities of Law, expounding the ſame, at the firſt Conference with the Lords, concerning the Liberty of the perſon of every Freeman.*

My Lords,

UPON the occaſions delivered by the Gentleman that laſt ſpake, your Lordſhips have heard the Commons have taken into their ſerious conſideration, the matter of perſonal Liberty, and after long debate thereof on divers days, as well by ſolemn arguments, as ſingle propoſitions of doubts and anſwers, to the end no ſcruple might remain in any man's breaſt unſatisfied, they have upon a full ſearch, and clear underſtanding of all things pertinent to the queſtion, unanimouſly declared; That no Freeman ought to be committed or detained in priſon by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unleſs ſome cauſe of the commitment, detainer, or reſtraint be expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained. And they have ſent me, with other of their Members, to repreſent unto your Lordſhips the true grounds of ſuch their reſolution, and have charged me particularly, leaving the reaſons of Law, and precedents, for others, to give your Lordſhips ſatisfaction, that this Liberty is eſtabliſhed and confirmed by the whole State, the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, by ſeveral Acts of Parliament; the authority whereof is ſo great, that it can receive no anſwer ſave by interpretation or repeal by future Statutes. And thoſe that I ſhall mind your Lordſhips of, are ſo direct in point, that they can bear no other expoſition at all, and ſure I am they are ſtill in force.

The firſt of them is the Grand Charter of the Liberties of England, firſt granted in the ſeventeenth year of King John, and renewed in the ninth year of Henry the third, and ſince confirmed in Parliament above thirty times. The words are theſe, ch. 29. Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel impriſonetur, aut diſſeiſietur de libero tenemento ſuo, vel libertatibus, vel liberis conſuetudinibus ſuis, aut utlageretur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo deſtruatur, nec ſuper eum ibimus, nec ſuper eum mittemus, niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum, vel per legem terræ.

Theſe words nullus liber homo, &c. are expreſs enough, yet it is remarkable, that Matthew Paris, an Author of ſpecial credit, doth obſerve, fol. 432. that the Charter of 9 Hen. III. was the very ſame as that of 17 King John, in nullo diſſimilis are his words; and that of King John he ſetteth down verbatim, fol. 342. and there the words are directly, Nec eum in Carcerem mittemus: and ſuch a corruption as is now in the print, might eaſily happen 'twixt 9 Hen. III. and 28 Edw. I. when this Charter was firſt exemplified, but certainly there is ſufficient left in that which is extant to decide this queſtion. For the words are, that no Freeman ſhall be taken or impriſoned, but by the lawful judgment of his Peers; which is by a Jury of Peers, ordinary Jurors for others, who are their Peers, or by the law of the land: which words, law of the land, muſt of neceſſity be underſtood in this Nation, to be by due proceſs of the law, and not the law of the land generally, or otherwiſe it would comprehend Bondmen (whom we call Villeins) who are excluded by the word liber; for the general law of the land doth allow their Lords to impriſon them at their pleaſure without cauſe, wherein they only differ from the Freemen in reſpect of their perſons, who cannot be impriſoned without a cauſe. And that this is the true underſtanding of theſe words per legem terræ, will more plainly appear by divers other Statutes that I ſhall uſe, which do expound the law accordingly. And though the words of this grand Charter be ſpoken in the third perſon, yet they are not to be underſtood of ſuits betwixt party and party, at leaſt not of them alone, but even of the King's ſuits againſt his ſubjects, as will appear by the occaſion of getting of that Charter, which was by reaſon of the differences betwixt thoſe Kings and their people, and there-

* This Argument of Mr. Littleton is printed in Cottoni Poſthuma; as if made by Sir Robert Cotton Bart. But whoever conſults the Hiſtorians of thoſe times, will find, that Digges, Littleton, Selden, and Coke, were the four Lawyers appointed by the Houſe of Commons to manage that memorable Conference.

therefore properly to be applied unto their power over them, and not to ordinary queſtions betwixt ſubject and ſubject.

Secondly, The words per legale judicium parium ſuorum, immediately preceding the other of per legem terræ, are meant of Trials at the King's ſuit, and not at the proſecution of a ſubject. And therefore, if a Peer of the Realm be arraigned, at the ſuit of the King, upon an Indictment of murder, he ſhall be tried by his Peers, that is, Nobles; but if he be appealed of murder by a ſubject, his Trial ſhall be by an ordinary Jury of 12 Freeholders, as appeareth in 10 Edw. IV. 6. 33 Hen. VIII. Brooke Title, Trials 142. Stan. Cor. li. 3. ca. 1. fol. 152. and in 10 Edw. IV. 6. it is ſaid, ſuch is the meaning of Magna Charta, for the ſame reaſon; therefore as per judicium parium ſuorum, extends to the King's ſuit, ſo ſhall theſe words per legem terræ.

And in 8 Ed. II. rot. parliament. numb. 7. there is a petition that a Writ under the Privy-Seal went to the Guardians of the great Seal, to cauſe lands to be ſeized into the King's hands, by force of which there went a Writ out of the Chancery to the Eſcheator, to ſeize, againſt the form of the grand Charter, that the King nor his Miniſters ſhall out no man of his Freehold without reaſonable judgment, and the party was reſtored to his land; which ſheweth the Statute did extend to the King.

There was no invaſion upon this perſonal liberty, till the time of King Edw. III. which was ſoon reſented by the ſubject, for in 5 Edw. III. cap. 9. it is ordained in theſe words; It is enacted that no man from henceforth ſhall be attached by any accuſation, nor fore-judged of life or limb, nor his lands, tenements, goods nor chattels ſeized into the King's hands, againſt the form of the great Charter, and the law of the land. 25 Edw. III. cap. 4. it is more full, and doth expound the words of the grand Charter, and is thus; Whereas it is contained in the grand Charter of the Franchiſes of England, that no Freeman ſhall be impriſoned, nor put out of his Freehold, nor free cuſtom, unleſs it be by the law of the land; it is awarded, aſſented, and eſtabliſhed, that from hence none ſhall be taken by petition or ſuggeſtion, made to our Lord the King, or to his Council, unleſs it be by Indictment, or preſentment of his good and lawful people of the ſame neighbourhood; which ſuch deeds ſhall be done in due manner, or by proceſs made by Writ original at the Common Law, nor that none be outed of his Franchiſes, nor of his Freehold, unleſs he be duly brought in to anſwer, and fore-judged of the ſame by the courſe of the law, and if any thing be done againſt the ſame; it ſhall be redreſſed and holden for nought.

Out of this Statute I obſerve, that what in Magna Charta, and the preamble of the Statute is termed by the Law of the Land, is in the body of the Act expounded to be by proceſs made by the Writ original at the Common Law, which is a plain interpretation of the words (law of the land) in the grand Charter. And I note that this law was made upon the commitment of divers to the Tower, no man yet knoweth for what.

28 Edw. III. cap. 3. It is more direct, this liberty being followed with freſh ſuit by the ſubject, where the words are not many, but very full and ſignificant; that no man of what ſtate or condition ſoever he be, ſhall be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſinherited, nor put to death, without he be brought in to anſwer by due proceſs of law.

Here your Lordſhips ſee the uſual words, the law of the land, are rendred by due proceſs of the law.

36 Edw. III. rot. parliament. numero 9. Amongſt the petitions of the Commons, one of them being tranſlated into Engliſh out of French, is thus; firſt, that the great Charter, and the Charter of the Foreſt, and other Statutes made in his time, and the time of his Progenitors, for the profit of him, and his Commonalty, be well and firmly kept; and put in due execution, without putting diſturbance, or making arreſt contrary to them by ſpecial command, or in other manner.

The anſwer to the petition, which makes it an Act of Parliament, is, 'Our Lord the King, by the 'aſſent of the Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and 'the Commonalty, hath ordained and eſtabliſhed, 'that the ſaid Charters and Statutes be held and put 'in execution, according to the ſaid petition.' It is obſervable that the Statutes were to be put in execution according to the ſaid petition, which is, that no arreſt ſhould be made contrary to the Statutes, by ſpecial command. This concludes the queſtion, and is of as great force, as if it were printed, for the Parliament-Roll is the true Warrant of an Act, and many are omitted out of the Books, that are extant in the Roll.

36 Edw. III. Rot. Parliamenti, num. 22. explaineth it further; for there the petition is, whereas it is contained in the grand Charter and other Statutes, that no man be taken or impriſoned by ſpecial command without Indictment, or other due proceſs to be made by the law; and oftentimes it hath been, and yet is, many are hindred, taken and impriſoned without Indictment, or other proceſs made by the law upon them, as well of things done out of the Foreſt of the King, as for other things; that it would therefore pleaſe our ſaid Lord to command thoſe to be delivered, which are ſo taken by ſpecial command, againſt the form of the Charter and Statutes as aforeſaid.

The Anſwer is,

The King is pleaſed, that if any man find himſelf grieved, that he come and make his complaint, and right ſhall be done unto him. 37 Edw. III. cap. 18. agreeth in ſubſtance with them; it ſaith, though it be contained in the great Charter, that no man be taken nor impriſoned, nor put out of his Freehold without proceſs of the law; nevertheleſs divers people make falſe ſuggeſtions to the King himſelf, as well for malice as otherwiſe, whereat the King is often grieved, and divers of the Realm put in damage againſt the form of the ſame Charter; wherefore it is ordained, that all they which make ſuch ſuggeſtions, ſhall be ſent with the ſame ſuggeſtions to the Chancellor, Treaſurer, and his grand Council, and that they there find ſurety to purſue their ſuggeſtions, and incur the ſame pain that the other ſhould have had, if he were attainted, in caſe that the ſuggeſtion be found evil; and that then proceſs of law be made againſt them without being taken or impriſoned, againſt the form of the ſaid Charter, and other Statutes. Here the law of the land in the grand Charter is explained to be without proceſs of law.

42 Edw. III. cap. 13. At the requeſt of the Commons by their petition put forth in this Parliament, to eſchew miſchief and damage done to divers of his Commons by falſe accuſers, which oftentimes have made their accuſations, more for revenge and ſingular benefit, than for the profit of the King, or of his people; of which accuſed perſons, ſome have been taken and cauſed to come before the King's Council by Writ, and otherwiſe upon grievous pains againſt the law; it is aſſented and accorded for the good governance of the Commons, that no man be put to anſwer without preſentment before Juſtices or matter of record, or by due Proceſs and Writ original, according to the old law of the land; and if any thing from hence be done to the contrary, it ſhall be void in the law, and holden for error.

But this is better in the Parliament Roll, where the Petition and Anſwer, which make the Act, are ſet down at large; 42 Edw. III. Rot. Parliamenti, numero 12.

The Petition.

" Item, Becauſe that many of your Commons " are hurt and deſtroyed by falſe accuſers, who " make their accuſations more for their revenge " and particular gain, than for the profit of the " King, or of his people: And thoſe that are ac- " cuſed by them, ſome are taken, and others are " made to come before the King's Council by Writ, " or other commandment of the King, upon grie- " vous pains contrary to the law: That it would " pleaſe our Lord the King, and his good Council, " for the juſt government of his people, to ordain, " that if hereafter any accuſer propoſe any mattter " for the profit of the King, that the ſame matter " be ſent to the Juſtices of the one Bench or of the " other, or the Aſſizes, to be enquired and deter- " mined according to the law; and if it concern " the accuſer or party, that he take his ſuit at the " Common Law; and that no man be put to an- " ſwer without preſentment before the Juſtices or " matter of record, and by due Proceſs and original " Writ, according to the ancient law of the land. " And if any thing henceforward be done to the " contrary, that it be void in law, and held for " error."

Here by due Proceſs and original Writ, according to the ancient law of the land, is meant the ſame thing, as per legem terræ, in Magna Charta; and the abuſe was, they were put to anſwer by the commandment of the King.

The King's Anſwer is thus.

" Becauſe that this Article is an Article of the " grand Charter, the King willeth that this be " done, as the petition doth demand." By this appeareth that per legem terræ, in Magna Charta, is meant, by due proceſs of the law.

Thus your Lordſhips have heard Acts of Parliament in the point. But the Statute of Weſtminſt. 1. cap. 15. is urged to diſprove this opinion, where it is expreſsly ſaid, that a man is not repleviable, who is committed by the command of the King; therefore the command of the King, without any cauſe ſhewed, is ſufficient to commit a man to priſon. And becauſe the ſtrength of the Argument may appear, and the anſwer be better underſtood, I will read the words of the Statute, which are thus.

And foraſmuch as Sheriffs and others, which have taken and kept in priſon perſons detected for felony, and oftentimes have let out by replevin ſuch as were not repleviable, and have kept in priſon ſuch as were repleviable, becauſe they would gain of the one party, and grieve the other; and foraſmuch as before this time it was not certainly determined what perſons were repleviable, and what not, but only thoſe that were taken for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the King, or of his Juſtices, or for the Foreſt; it is provided, and by the King commanded, that ſuch priſoners as were before outlawed, and they which have abjured the Realm, Provers, and ſuch as be taken with the mannor, and thoſe which have broken the King's priſon, Thieves openly defamed and known, and ſuch as be appealed by approvers; ſo long as the approvers are living, if they be not of good name, and ſuch as be taken for burning of houſes felonioufly done, or for falſe money, or for counterfeiting the King's Seal, or perſons excommunicate taken at the requeſt of the Biſhop, or for manifeſt offences, or for treaſon touching the King himſelf, ſhall be in no wiſe repleviable by the common Writ, or without Writ.]

But ſuch as be indicted of Larceny by inqueſts taken before Sheriffs or Bayliffs by their office, or of light ſuſpicion, or of petty Larceny, that amounteth not above the value of twelve pence, if they were not guilty of ſome other Larceny aforetime, or guilty of receipt of Felons, or of commandment or of force, or of aid of felony done, or guilty of ſome other treſpaſs, for which one ought not to loſe either life or member: and a man appealed by an approver, after the death of the approver; if he be no common thief or defamed, ſhall from henceforth be let out by ſufficient ſurety, whereof the Sheriff will be anſwerable, and that without giving aught of their goods. And if the Sheriff, or any other, let any go at large, by ſurety, that are not repleviable, if he be Sheriff or Conſtable, or any other Bailiff, or ſuch as hath a fee; which hath keeping of priſons, and thereof be attainted, he ſhall loſe his Office and Fee for ever. And if the Under-Sheriff, Conſtable or Bailiff, or ſuch as hath fee for keeping of priſons, do it contrary to the will of his Lord, or any other Bailiff being not of fee, they ſhall have three years impriſonment, and make a fine at the King's pleaſure; and if any man with-hold priſoners repleviable, after that they have offered ſufficient ſurety, he ſhall pay a grievous amercement to the King; and if he take any reward for the deliverance of ſuch, he ſhall pay double to the priſoner, and alſo ſhall pay a grievous amercement to the King.

The Anſwer.

It muſt be acknowledged, that a man taken by the commandment of the King is not repleviable, for ſo are the expreſs words of this Statute: but this maketh nothing againſt the declaration of the Houſe of Commons; for they ſay not, the Sheriff may replevy ſuch a one by ſureties, ſcilicet manucaptores, but that he is bailable by the King's Court of Juſtice: for the better apprehending whereof, it is to be known, that there is a difference between repleviable, which is always by the Sheriff upon pledges or ſureties given, and bailable, which is by a Court of Record, where the priſoner is delivered to his bail, and they are his Goalers, and may impriſon him, and ſhall ſuffer for him body for body, as appeareth 33 & 36 Edw. III. titulo Mainprize 12 & 13. where the difference betwixt bail and mainprize is expreſsly taken.

[And if the words of the Statute themſelves be obſerved, it will appear plainly that it extends to the Sheriff and other inferior Officers, and doth not bind the hands of the Judges.

The preamble, which is the key that openeth the entrance into the meaning of the makers of the law, is; "Forasmuch as Sheriffs and others have taken "and kept in prison persons detected of Felony." Out of these words I observe that it nominateth Sheriffs, and then if the Judges should be included, they must be comprehended under that general word, others; which doth not extend to those of an higher rank, but to inferiors, for the best by all courses is first to be named. And therefore if a man bring a Writ of customs and services, and name rents and other things, the general shall not include homage, which is a personal service, and of an higher nature, but it shall extend to ordinary annual service, 31 Edw. I. Droit. 67. So the Statute of 13 Eliz. cap. 10. which beginneth with Colleges, Deans and Chapters, Parsons, Vicars, and concludes with these words, "and others having spiritual promotions," shall not comprehend Bishops that are of an higher degree, as appeareth in the Archbishop of Canterbury's case, reported by Sir Edward Coke, lib. 2. fol. 46. B.

And thus much is explained in the very Statute towards the end, when it doth enumerate those who were meant by the word, others, namely Under-Sheriffs, Constables, Bailiffs, &c.

Again, the words are, Sheriffs and others which have taken and kept in prison. Now every man knoweth, Judges do neither arrest, nor keep men in prison; that is the office of Sheriffs and other inferior Ministers. Therefore this Statute meant such only, and not Judges.

The words are further, that they let out by replevin such as are not repleviable, that is the proper language for a Sheriff; nay, more express afterward in the body of the Statute, that such as are there mentioned, shall in no wise be repleviable by the common Writ, which is de homine replegiando, and is directed to the Sheriff, nor without Writ which is by the Sheriff ex officio. But that which receives no answer is this, that the command of the Justices, who derive their authority from the Crown, is there equal as to this purpose with the command of the King. And therefore by all reasonable construction, it must needs relate to Officers that are subordinate to both, as Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Constables, and the like. And it were a harsh exposition to say that the Justices might not discharge their own command, and yet that reason would conclude as much; and that this was meant of the Sheriff and other ministers of Justice, appears by the recital 27 Edw. I. cap. 3. and likewise by Fleta, a manuscript so called, because the Author lay in the Fleet when he made the Book: for he, lib. 2. cap. 52. in his Chapter of Turns, and the Views of the Hundred Courts in the Country, setteth down the articles of the charges that are there to be inquired of; amongst which, one of them is de replegiabilibus injuste detentis & irreplegiabilibus dimissis; which cannot be meant of not bailing by the Justices, for what have the inferior Courts in the Country to do with the acts of the Justices?

And to make that more plain, he setteth down in that chapter, that concerneth Sheriffs only, the very Statute of Westminster I. which he translates verbatim out of the French into the Latin; save that he renders taken by the command of the Justices, thus, per judicium Justiciariorum; and his preface to the Statute plainly sheweth, that he understood it of replevin by Sheriffs; for he saith, Qui debent per plegios dimitti, qui non, declarat hoc Statutum; and per plegios is before the Sheriff.

But for direct authority, it is the opinion of Newton, Chief-Justice, 22 Hen. VI. 46. where his words are these: "It cannot be intended that the "Sheriff did suffer him to go at large by main-"prize, for where one is taken by the Writ of the "King, or the Commandment of the King, he is "irrepleviable; but in such case his friends may "come to the Justices from him if he be arrested, "and purchase a Supersedeas." This Judge concludes, that the Sheriff cannot deliver him that is taken by the command of the King, for that he is irrepleviable, which is the very word of the Statute: but, saith he, his friends may come to the Justices, and purchase a Supersedeas. So he declares the very question, that the Sheriff had no power, but the Justices had power to deliver him that is committed by the King's command; and both the ancient and modern practice manifest as much: for he that is taken for the death of a man, or for the Forest, is not repleviable by the Sheriff, yet they are ordinarily bailed by the Justices, and were by the King's Writs directed to the Sheriffs in the times of Edw. I. and II. as appears in the close Rolls, which could not be done if they were not bailable. And it is every day's experience, that the Justices of the King's-Bench do bail for murder, and for offences done in the Forest, which they could not do, if the word irrepleviable, in Westmin. 1. were meant of the Justices, as well as of the Sheriffs.

For authorities that have been offered to prove the contrary, they are in number three. The first is 21 Edw. III. Rot. 2. which also is in the Book of Pleas in Parliament at the Tower, upon an action there brought, fol. 44. It is not an Act of Parliament, but a Resolution in Parliament upon an action there brought, which was usual in those times. And the case is, that Stephen Rabez, the Sheriff of the Counties of Leicester and Warwick, was questioned, for that he had let at large by surety, amongst others, one William, the son of Walter le Pesons, against the will and command of the King, whereas the King had commanded him by letters under the Privy-Seal, that he should do no favour to any man that was committed by the Earl of Warwick, as that man was; whereunto the Sheriff answered, that he did it at the request of some of the King's household upon their letters; and because the Sheriff did acknowledge the receipt of the King's letters, thereupon he was committed to prison according to the form of the Statute.

To this I answer, the Sheriff was justly punished, for that he is expressly bound by the Statute of Westminst. 1. which was agreed from the beginning; but this is no proof, that the Judges had no power to bail this man.

The next authority is 33 Hen. VI. in the Court of Common Pleas, fol. 28. b. 29. where Robert Poynings, Esquire, was brought to the bar upon a Capias, and was returned, that he was committed per Duos de Concilio, (I believe it is misprinted for Dnos de Concilio, i. e. Dominos de Concilio, which is strongest against what I maintain) pro diversis causis regem tangentib. And he made an Attorney there in an action, whence it's inferred, that the return was good, and the party could not be delivered.

To this the answer is plain. 1. No opinion is delivered in that Book, one way or other, upon the return, neither is there any testimony whether he were delivered, or bailed, or not. 2. It appears expressly, that he was brought thither, to be charged ged in an action of debt, at another man's ſuit, and no deſire of his own to be delivered, or bailed; and then if he were remanded, it is no way material to the queſtion in hand. But that which is moſt relied upon, is the opinion of Stanf. in his Book of Pleas of the Crown, lib. 2. cap. 18. fol. 72, 73. in his Chapter of Mainprize, where he reciteth the Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. and then ſaith thus; "By this "Statute it appears, that in four caſes at the Com-"mon Law a Man was not repleviable; to wit, thoſe "that were taken for the death of a man, by the com-"mand of the King, or his Juſtices, or for the Fo-"reſt;" thus far he is moſt right. Then he goeth on, and ſaith, "As to the command of the King, that "is underſtood by the command of his own mouth, "or his counſel, which is incorporated unto him, "and ſpake with his mouth, or otherwiſe every "Writ or Capias to take a man, which is the King's "command, would be as much; and as to the "command of the Juſtices, that is meant their ab-"ſolute commandment, for if it be by their ordi-"nary commandment, he is repleviable by the "Sheriff, if it be not in ſome of the caſes prohibi-"ted by the Statute."

The anſwer that I give unto this is, that Stanford had ſaid nothing whether a man may be committed without cauſe by the King's command, or whether the Judges ought not to bail him in ſuch caſe, only that ſuch a one is not repleviable; which is agreed, for that belongs to the Sheriff. And becauſe no man ſhould think he meant any ſuch thing, he concludes the whole ſentence touching the command of the King and the Juſtices, that one committed by the ordinary command of the Juſtice, is repleviable by the Sheriff; or at leaſt it appears not that he meant, that a man committed by the King, or by the Privy-Counſel without cauſe, ſhould not be bailable by the Juſtices, and he hath given no opinion in this caſe; what he would have ſaid, if he had been asked the queſtion, cannot be known, neither doth it appear, that by any thing that he hath ſaid, he meant any ſuch thing as would be inferred out of him. And now, my Lords, I have performed the commands of the Commons, and as I conceive ſhall clear the declaration of perſonal liberty, an ancient and undoubted truth, fortified with ſeven Acts of Parliament, and not oppoſed by any Statute or Authority of Law whatſoever. See Littleton's Precedents after Mr. Selden's.

Mr. Selden's Argument.

My Lords,

YOUR Lordſhips have heard from the Gentleman that laſt ſpake, a great part of the grounds, upon which the Houſe of Commons, upon mature deliberation, proceeded to that clear reſolution touching the right of the Liberty of their perſons. The many Acts of Parliament, which are the written Laws of the land, and are expreſsly in the point, have been read and opened, and ſuch objections as have been by ſome made to them, and ſome Objections alſo made out of another Act of Parliament, have been cleared and anſwered. It may ſeem now perhaps (my Lords) that little remains needful to be further added, for the inforcement and maintenance of ſo fundamental and eſtabliſhed a right and liberty belonging to every Freeman of the Kingdom. But in the examination of queſtions of Law of Right, beſides the Laws or Acts of Parliament, that ought chiefly to direct and regulate every man's judgement, whatſoever hath been put in practice to the contrary, there are commonly uſed alſo former Judgments or Precedents, and indeed have been ſo uſed ſometimes, that the weight of Reaſon, of Law, and of Acts of Parliament, hath been laid by, and reſolutions have been made, and that in this very point, only upon the interpretation and apprehenſion of precedents. Precedents, my Lords, are good media, or proofs of illuſtration or confirmation where they agree with the expreſs Law; but they can never be proof enough to overthrow any one Law, much leſs ſeven ſeveral Acts of Parliament, as the number of them is for the point. The Houſe of Commons therefore taking into conſideration, that in this queſtion, being of ſo high a nature, that never any exceeded it in any Court of Juſtice whatſoever, all the ſeveral ways of juſt examination of the truth ſhould be uſed, have alſo moſt carefully informed themſelves of all former judgments and precedents concerning this great point either way, and have been no leſs careful of the due preſervation of his Majeſty's juſt Prerogative than of their own Rights. The precedents here are of two kinds, either meerly matter of Record, or elſe the former reſolutions of the Judges, after ſolemn debate in the point.

This point that concerns precedents, the Houſe of Commons have commanded me to preſent to your Lordſhips, which I ſhall as briefly as I may, ſo I do it faithfully and perſpicuouſly. To that end, my Lords, before I come to the particulars of any of thoſe precedents, I ſhall firſt remember to your Lordſhips, that which will ſeem as a general key for the opening and true apprehenſion of all them of Record, without which key, no man, unleſs he be vers'd in the entries and courſe of the King's-Bench, can poſſibly underſtand them.

In all caſes, my Lords, where any Right or Liberty belongs to the Subjects by any poſitive Law written or unwritten, if there were not alſo a remedy by Law, for the enjoying or regaining this Right or Liberty, when it is violated or taken from him, the poſitive Law were moſt vain, and to no purpoſe; and it were to no purpoſe, for any man to have any Right in any land or other inheritance, if there were not a known remedy, that is, an Action or Writ, by which in ſome Court of ordinary Juſtice, he might recover it. And in this caſe of Right of Liberty of Perſon, if there were not a remedy in the Law for regaining it, when it is reſtrained, it were of no purpoſe to ſpeak of Laws, that ordain it ſhould not be reſtrained. Therefore in this caſe alſo, I ſhall firſt ſhew you the remedy, that every Freeman is to uſe for the regaining of his Liberty, when he is againſt Law impriſoned, that ſo upon the legal courſe and form to be held in uſing that remedy, the precedents or judgments upon it, for all Judgments of Record riſe out of this remedy, may be eaſily underſtood. There are in Law divers remedies for inlarging of a Freeman impriſoned, as the Writs of Odio & atia, and of Homine replegiando, beſides the common or moſt known Writs of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum cauſa, as it is called alſo.

The firſt two Writs are to be directed to the Sheriff of the County, and lie in ſome particular caſes, with which it would be untimely for me to trouble your Lordſhips, becauſe they concern not that which is committed to my charge. But that Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum cauſa, is the higheſt remedy in Law, for any man that is impriſoned, and the only remedy for him, that is imimpriſoned by the ſpecial command of the King, or the Lords of the Privy-Council, without ſhewing cauſe of the commitment: neither is there in the Law any ſuch thing, nor was there ever mention of any ſuch thing in the Laws of this land, as a Petition of Right to be uſed in ſuch caſes for Liberty of the Perſon, nor is there any legal courſe for inlargement to be taken in ſuch caſes, howſoever the contrary hath upon no ground or colour of Law been pretended. Now, my Lords, if any man be ſo impriſoned by any ſuch command, or otherwiſe, in any priſon whatſoever through England, and deſire by himſelf, or any other in his behalf, this Writ of Habeas Corpus for the purpoſe in the Court of King's-Bench, the Writ is to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied him, no otherwiſe than another ordinary original Writ in the Chancery, or other common proceſs of Law may be denied; which amongſt other things the Houſe reſolved alſo, upon mature deliberation, and I was commanded to let your Lordſhips know ſo much. This Writ is directed to the Keeper of the priſon, in whoſe cuſtody the priſoner remains, commanding him that, after a certain day, he bring in the body of the priſoner, ad ſubjiciend. & recipiend. juxta quod curia conſideraverit, &c. una cum cauſa captionis, & detentionis; and oftentimes una cum cauſa detentionis only, captionis being omitted.

The keeper of the priſon thereupon returns by what Warrant he detains the priſoner, and with his return filed to his Writ, brings the priſoner to the Bar at the time appointed; when the return is thus made, the Court judgeth of the ſufficiency or inſufficiency of it, only out of the body of it, without having reſpect to any other thing whatſoever; that is, they ſuppoſe the return to be true whatſoever it be: if it be falſe, the priſoner may have his action on the Caſe againſt the Goaler that brought him. Now, my Lords, when the priſoner comes thus to the Bar, if he deſire to be bailed, and that the Court upon the view of the return think him in Law to be bailable, then he is always firſt taken from the Keeper of the priſon that brings him, and committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, and afterwards bailed, and the entry perpetually is Committitur Mariſcallo & poſtea traditur in Ball'; for the Court never bails any man, until he firſt becomes their own priſoner, and be in Cuſtodia Mariſcall' of that Court. But if upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, it appear to the Court, that the priſoner ought not to be bailed, nor diſcharged from the priſon whence he is brought, then he is remanded or ſent back again there to continue, until by courſe of Law he may be delivered; and the entry in this caſe is Remittitur quouſque ſecundum legem deliberatus fuerit, or Remittitur quouſque, &c. which is all one, and the higheſt award or judgment that ever was or can be given upon an Habeas Corpus. But if the Judges doubt only whether in Law they ought to take him from the priſon whence he came, or give a day to the Sheriff to amend his Writ, as often they do, then they remand him only, during the time of their doubt, or until the Sheriff hath amended his return, and the entry upon that is Remittitur only, or Remittitur priſonæ præd. without any more. And ſo remittitur generally is of far leſs moment in the award upon the Habeas Corpus, than remittitur quouſque &c. howſoever the vulgar opinions raiſed out of the late Judgment be to the contrary. All theſe things are of moſt known and conſtant uſe in the Court of King's-Bench, as it cannot be doubted but your Lordſhips will eaſily know from the grave and learned, my Lords the Judges.

Theſe two courſes, the one of the entry of Committitur Mareſcall. & poſtea traditur in Ballium, and the other remittitur quouſque, &c. & remittitur generally, or remittitur priſonæ præd. together with the nature of the Habeas Corpus, thus ſtated; it will be eaſier for me to open, and your Lordſhips to obſerve, whatſoever ſhall occur to the purpoſe in the precedents of Record, to which I ſhall come now in the particular. But before I come to the precedents, I am to let you know the reſolutions of the Houſe of Commons touching the enlargement of a man committed by the command of the King, or the Privy Council, or any other, without cauſe ſhewed of ſuch commitment: it is thus; That if a Freeman be committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, and no cauſe of ſuch commitment, detainer, or reſtraint, be expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained; and the ſame be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the party, then he ought to be delivered and bailed.

This reſolution, as it is grounded upon the Acts of Parliament already ſhewn, and the reaſon of the Law of the Land, which is committed to the charge of another, and anon alſo to be opened to you, is ſtrengthened alſo by many Precedents of Record.

But the precedents of Record that concern this point, are of two kinds, for the Houſe of Commons hath informed itſelf of ſuch as concern it either way. The firſt, ſuch as ſhew expreſsly, that Perſons committed by the command of the King, or of the Privy-Council, without other cauſe ſhewed, have been enlarged upon bail when they prayed it; whence it appears clearly, that by the Law, they are bailable, and ſo by Habeas Corpus to be ſet at liberty: for though they ought not to have been committed without a cauſe ſhewed of the commitment, yet it is true that the reverend Judges of this Land did pay ſuch reſpect to ſuch commitments, by the command of the King, or of the Lords of the Council, (as alſo to the commitment ſometimes of inferior perſons) that upon the Habeas Corpus, they rarely uſed abſolutely to diſcharge the perſons inſtantly, but only to enlarge them upon bail; which ſufficiently ſecures and preſerves the Liberty of the Subject, according to the Laws that your Lordſhips have already heard, nor in any of the caſes is there any difference made between ſuch commitments by the Lords of the Council, that are incorporated with him. The ſecond kind of precedents of Record are, ſuch as have been pretended to prove the Law to be contrary, and that perſons ſo committed ought not to be ſet at liberty upon bail, and are in the nature of objections out of Record.

I ſhall deliver them ſummarily to your Lordſhips with all faith, and alſo true copies of them; out of which it ſhall appear clearly to your Lordſhips, that of thoſe of the firſt kind, there are no leſs than twelve, moſt full and directly in the point, to prove that perſons ſo committed are to be delivered upon bail: and amongſt thoſe of the other kind, there is not ſo much as one, not one, that proves at all any thing to the contrary. I ſhall firſt, my Lords, go through them of the firſt kind, and ſo obſerve them to your Lordſhips, that ſuch ſcruples as have been made upon them by ſome that have excepted againſt them, ſhall be cleared alſo, according as I ſhall open them ſeverally.

The firſt of the firſt kind is of Ed. IIId's time, it is in Paſche 18 Ed. III. Rot. 33. The caſe was thus.

King Ed. III. had committed by Writ, and that under his great Seal (as moſt of the King's commands in thoſe times were) one John de Bildeſton, a Clergyman, to the priſon of the Tower, without any cauſe ſhewed of the commitment. The Lieutenant of the Tower is commanded to bring him to the King's-Bench, where he is committed to the Marſhal; but the Court aſks of the Lieutenant, if there were any cauſe to keep this Bildeſton in priſon, beſides that commitment of the King; he anſwered no: whereupon the Roll ſays, Quia videtur cur. bre. præd. ſufficient. non eſſe cauſam præd. Johan. de Bildeſton in priſona Dom. Regis hic detinend' idem Johannes admittitur per manucaptionem Willielmi de Wakefield, and ſome others, where the Judgement of the point is fully declared in the very point.

The ſecond, in the firſt kind of Precedents of Record, is in the time of H. VIII. one John Parker's Caſe, who was committed to the Sheriff of London, pro ſecuritate pacis, at the ſuit of one Brinton, ac pro ſuſpicione feloniæ committed by him in Glouceſterſhire, ac per mandatum Dom. Rs. he is committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, & poſtea iſto eodem termino traditur in Ball'. Here were other cauſes of the commitment, but plainly one was by the command of the King, ſignified to the Sheriffs of London, of which they took notice; but ſome have interpretedthis, as if the commitment had been for ſuſpicion of felony by the command of the King, in which caſe it is agreed of all hands, that the priſoner is bailable; but no man can think ſo of this precedent, that obſerves the context, and underſtands the Grammar of it, wherein moſt plainly ac per mandatum dom. Regis hath no reference to any other cauſe whatſoever, but is a ſingle cauſe enumerated in the return by itſelf, as the Record clearly ſheweth; it is in 22 H. VIII. Rot. 37.

The third is of the ſame King's time, it is 35 H. VIII. Rot. 33. John Binck's Caſe; he was committed by the Lords of the Council pro ſuſpicione feloniæ ac pro aliis cauſis illos moventibus, qui committitur Mariſcallo & immediate ex gratia curiæ ſpeciale traditur in Ball' They committed him for ſuſpicion of felony, and other cauſes them thereunto moving, wherein there might be matter of State, or whatſoever elſe can be ſuppoſed, and plainly the cauſe of their commitment is not expreſſed; yet the Court bailed him without having regard to theſe unknown cauſes that moved the Lords of the Council. But it has indeed ſome difference from either of thoſe other two that precede, and from the other nine alſo that follow; for it is agreed, that if a cauſe be expreſſed in the return, inſomuch that the Court can know why he is committed, that then he may be bailed, but not if they know not the cauſe. Now if a man is committed for a cauſe expreſſed, & pro aliis cauſis Dominos de Concilio moventibus; certainly the Court can no more know in ſuch a caſe what the cauſe is than any other.

The fourth of theſe is in the time of Queen Mary, it is Paſch. 2 & 3 P. & Mar. Rot. 58. Overton's caſe: Richard Overton was returned upon an Habeas Corpus, directed to the Sheriffs of London, to have been committed and detained per mandatum prænobilium Dominorum honorabilis Concilii Dominorum Regis & Reginæ, qui committitur Marr. & immediatè traditur in Ball'. In anſwer to this precedent, or by way of objection to the force of it, it hath been ſaid, that this Overton at this time ſtood indicted of High Treaſon. It is true, he was ſo indicted, but that appears in another Roll, that hath no reference to the Return, as the Return hath no reference to that Roll; yet they that object this againſt the force of this precedent, ſay, that becauſe he was indicted of Treaſon, therefore though he was committed by the command of the Lords of the Council, without cauſe ſhewed, yet he was bailable for the Treaſon, and upon that was here bailed: than which objection nothing is more contrary, either to law or common reaſon. It is moſt contrary to Law, for that clearly every Return is to be adjudged by the Court out of the body of itſelf, and not by any other collateral or foreign Record whatſoever. Therefore the matter of the indictment here, cannot in Law be cauſe of bailing of the priſoner; and ſo it is adverſe to all common reaſon, that if the objection be admitted, it muſt of neceſſity follow, that whoſoever ſhall be committed by the King, or Privy-Council, without cauſe ſhewed, and be not indicted of Treaſon, or ſome other Offence, may not be inlarged, by reaſon of ſuppoſition of matter of State. But that whoſoever is ſo committed, and withal ſtands ſo indicted, though in another Record, may be enlarged, whatſoever the matter of State be for which he was committed. The abſurdity of which aſſertion needs not a word for further confutation, as if any of the Gentlemen in the laſt judgment, ought to have been the ſooner delivered, if he had been alſo indicted of Treaſon; if ſo, Traytors and Felons have the higheſt privilege in perſonal liberty, and that above all other Subjects of the Kingdom.

The fifth of this kind, is of Queen Mary's time alſo, it is Paſch. 4 & 5 P. & Mar. Rot. 45. the caſe of Edward Newport: he was brought into the King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower of London, Cum cauſa, viz. quod commiſſus fuit per mandatum concilii Dominæ Reginæ qui committitur Marr. & immediatè traditur in Ballium.

To this the like anſwer hath been made, as to that other caſe of Overton's next before cited; they ſay that in another Roll of another Term of the ſame year, it appears he was in queſtion for ſuſpicion of coining, and it is true he was ſo; but the return, and his commitment mention'd in it, have no reference to any ſuch offence, nor hath the bailment of him relation to any thing, but to the abſolute commitment by the Privy-Council: So that the anſwer to the like objection made againſt Overton's caſe, ſatisfies this alſo.

The ſixth of theſe, is of Queen Elizabeth's time, Mich. 9 El. Rot. 35. the caſe of Tho. Laurence; this Laurence came in by Habeas Corpus, returned by the Sheriffs of London, to be detained in priſon per mandat. Concilii Dominæ Reginæ, qui committitur Marr. & ſuper hoc traditur in Ballium.

An objection hath been invented againſt this alſo; it hath been ſaid that this man was pardoned, and indeed it appears ſo in the margin of the Roll, where the word pardonatur is entred: but clearly his enlargement by bail was upon the body of the Return only, unto which, that note of pardon in the margin of the Roll hath no relation at all; and can any man think, that a man pardoned (for what offence ſoever it be) might not as well be committed for ſome Arcanum, or matter of State, as one that is not pardoned, or out of his innocency wants no pardon?

The ſeventh of theſe is in the ſame year, and of Eaſter-Term following; it is P. 9. Rot. 68. Rob. Conſtable's caſe: he was brought by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower, and in the return it appeareth he was committed there, per mandatum privati Concilii Dominæ Reginæ qui committitur Marr. & poſtea iſto eodem ter' traditur in Ball'. The like objection hath been made to this, as that before of Laurence, but the ſelf-ſame anſwer clearly ſatisfies for them both.

The eighth is of the ſame Queen's time in Paſ. 20 El. Rot. 72. John Browning's caſe. This Browning came by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower, whither he had been committed, and was returned to have been committed, per privat. Concil. Dominæ Reginæ, qui committitur Marr. & poſtea iſto eodem termino traditur in Ball. To this it hath been ſaid, that it was done at the Chief-Juſtice Wray's Chamber, and not in the Court: and thus the authority of the precedent hath been leſſen'd or ſlighted. If it had been done at his Chamber, it would have proved at leaſt this much, that Sir Chriſtopher Wray, then Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench, being a grave, learned and upright Judge, knowing the Law to be ſo, did bail this Browning, and enlarge him, and even ſo far the precedent were of value enough; but it is plain, that though the Habeas Corpus were returnable, as indeed it appears in the Record itſelf, at his Chamber in Serjeants-Inn, yet he only committed him to the King's-Bench preſently, and referred the conſideration of inlarging him to the Court, who afterward did it: For the Record ſays, Et poſtea iſto eodem termino traditur in Ball. which cannot be of an enlargement at the Chief-Juſtice's Chamber.

The ninth of this firſt kind is Hill. 40 El. Rot. 62. Edward Harecourt's caſe; he was impriſoned in the Gatehouſe, and that per Dominos de privato Concilio Dominæ Reginæ pro certis cauſis eos moventibus et ei ignotis: and upon his Habeas Corpus was returned to be therefore only detained, Qui committitur Marr. & poſtea iſto eodem termino traditur in Ball. To this never any colour of anſwer hath been yet offered.

The tenth is Cateſbie's caſe in the vacation after Hill. Term 43. El. Rot. Robert Cateſbie was committed to the Fleet per warrantum diverſor. prænobilium viror. de privato concilio Dominæ Reginæ; he was brought before Juſtice Fenner, one of the then Juſtices of the King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus at Winchester-houſe Southwark, Et commiſſ. fuit Marr. per præfat. Edwardum Fenner, & ſtatim traditur in Ball.

The eleventh is Rich. Beckwith's caſe, which was in Hill. twelfth of King James, Rot. 153. He was returned upon his Habeas Corpus to have been committed to the Gatehouſe by divers Lords of the Privy-Council; Qui committitur Marr. et poſtea iſto eodem termino traditur in Ball.

To this it hath been ſaid by ſome, that Beckwith was bailed upon a letter, written by the Lords of the Council to that purpoſe to the Judges; but it appears not that there was ever any letter written to them to that purpoſe: which though it had been, would have proved nothing againſt the authority of the Record; for it was never heard of, that Judges were to be directed in point of Law by letters from the Lords of the Council, although it cannot be doubted, but that by ſuch letters, ſometimes they have been moved to bail men, that would or did not aſk their enlargement without ſuch letters, as in ſome examples I ſhall ſhew your Lordſhips among the precedents of the ſecond kind.

The twelfth and laſt of theſe, is that of Sir Tho. Monſon's caſe; it is Mich. 14 Jac. Rot. 147. He was committed to the Tower per warrantum à diverſis Dominis de privato Concilio Domini Regis locum tenenti directum; and he was returned by the Lieutenant to be therefore detained in priſon, qui committitur Marr. & ſuper traditur hoc in Ball.

To this it hath been anſwered, that every body knows by common fame, that this Gentleman was committed for ſuſpicion of the death of Sir Tho. Overbury, and that he was therefore bailable; a moſt ſtrange interpretation, as if the body of the Return, and the Warrant of the Privy-Council, ſhould be underſtood, and adjudged out of fame only. Was there not as much a fame, why the Gentlemen, that were remanded in the laſt judgment, were committed, and might not the ſelf-ſame reaſon have ſerved to enlarge them, their offence (if any were) being I think much leſs than that for which this Gentleman was ſuſpected?

And thus I have faithfully opened the number of twelve precedents, moſt expreſs in the very point in queſtion, and cleared the objections that have been made againſt them.

And of ſuch precedents of Record as are of the firſt kind, which prove plainly the practice of former ages, and judgement of the Court of King's-Bench, in the very point, on the behalf of the Subject, my Lords, hitherto.

I come next to thoſe of the ſecond kind, or ſuch as are pretended, that perſons ſo committed are not to be enlarged by the Judges upon the Habeas Corpus brought, but to remain in priſon ſtill at the command of the King or Privy-Council.

Theſe are of two natures; the firſt of theſe are, where ſome aſſent of the King or the Privy-Council appears upon the enlargement of a priſoner ſo committed; as if, that becauſe ſuch aſſent appears, the enlargement could not have been without ſuch aſſent.

The ſecond of this kind, are thoſe which have been urged as expreſs teſtimonies of the Judges denying bail; and in ſuch caſes, I ſhall open theſe alſo to your Lordſhips: which being done, it will moſt clearly appear, that there is nothing at all in any of theſe, that makes any thing at all againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, touching this point; nay, it is ſo far from their making any thing againſt it, that ſome of them add good weight alſo to the proof of that reſolution.

For thoſe of the firſt nature of this ſecond kind of precedents, they begun in the time of H. VII. Tho. Brugge, and divers others were impriſoned in the King's-Bench ad mandatum Dom. Regis, they never ſought remedy by Habeas Corpus, or otherwiſe, for ought appears: But the Roll ſays, that Dominus Rex relaxavit mandatum, and ſo they were bailed. But can any man think, that this is an Argument either in Law or common reaſon, that therefore they could not have been bailed without ſuch aſſent? It is common in caſes of common perſons, that one being in priſon for ſurety of the peace or the like, at the ſuit of another, is bailed upon the releaſe of the party plaintiff; can it follow, that therefore he could not have been bailed without ſuch releaſe? nothing is more plain than the contrary. It were the ſame thing to ſay, that if it appear, that if a plaintiff be non-ſuit, therefore unleſs he had been non-ſuit, he could not have been barr'd in the ſuit. The caſe laſt cited is Mich. 7 H. VII. rot. 6.

The very like is in the ſame year, Hill. 7 H. VII. Rot. 13. The caſe of Will. Bartholomew, Will. Chaſe, and divers others, and the ſelf-ſame anſwer, that is given to the other, clears this.

So in the ſame year, Paſch. 7 H. VII. Rot. 18. John Beomond's caſe is the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe other two, and the ſelf-ſame anſwer alſo ſatisfies, that clears them.

The next caſe is, Mich. 12 H. VII. Rot. 8. Tho. Yew's caſe; he was committed ad ſec. pacis, for the ſecurity of the peace, at the ſuit of one Freeman, and beſides, ad mandatum Dom. Regis. And firſt, Freeman relaxavit ſec. pacis, and then Sir James Hobbart, the then King's Attorney-General relaxavit mandatum Dom. Regis; and hereupon he is bailed. The releaſe of the King's Attorney, no more proves that he could not have been enlarged, without ſuch releaſe or aſſent, than that he could not have been bailed, without releaſe of ſurety of the peace by Freeman.

The very like is in Hill. 9 H. VII. Rot. 14. The caſe of Humphry Broch, which proves no more here than the reſt of this kind already cited.

Then for this point alſo, Broome's caſe of Queen Elizabeth's time, is Trin. 39 El. Rot. 128. Laurence Broome was committed to the Gatehouſe per mandatum Dom. Concilii Dominæ Reginæ, and being returned ſo upon the Habeas Corpus, is firſt committed to the Marſhalſea as the courſe is, and then bailed by the Court; which indeed is an expreſs precedent, that might perhaps well have been added to the number of the firſt twelve: which ſo plainly ſhews the practice of enlarging priſoners in this caſe, by judgment of the Court upon the Habeas Corpus. But it is true, that in the Scrolls of that year, where the bails are entred, but not in the Record of the Habeas Corpus, there was a note, that this Broome was bailed per mandatum privati Concilii; but plainly this is not any kind of Argument, that therefore in Law he might not have been otherwiſe bailed.

The ſelf-ſame is to be ſaid of another of this kind, in Mich. 40 El. Rot. 37. Wenden's caſe. Tho. Wenden was committed to the Gatehouſe by the Queen and the Lords of the Council pro certis cauſis generally; he is brought by Habeas Corpus into the King's-Bench, and bailed by the Court. But it is ſaid, that in the Scrolls of that year, it appers that his enlargement was per conſenſum Dom. privati Concilii; and it is true that the Queen's Attorney did tell the Court, that the Lords of the Council did aſſent to it. Follows it therefore, that it could not have been without ſuch aſſent?

Next is Hill. 43 El. Rot. 89. When divers Gentlemen of ſpecial quality were impriſoned by the command of the Privy-Council; the Queen being graciouſly pleaſed to enlarge them, ſends a commandment to the Judges of the King's-Bench, that they ſhould take ſuch a courſe, for delivering them upon bail as they ſhould think fit: and they did ſo, and enlarged them upon Writs of Habeas Corpus. Follows it therefore, that this might not have been done by Law, if the parties themſelves had deſired it?

So in Trin. 1 Jac. rot. 30. Sir John Brocket being committed to the Gatehouſe, is returned to ſtand committed per mandatum privati Concilii, and he is inlarged virtute warranti a Concilio prædicto. But the ſame anſwer that ſatisfies for the reſt before cited, ſerves for this alſo.

The laſt of theſe, is Reynar's caſe, in Mich. 12 Jac. rot. 119. He was committed to the Gatehouſe, by the Lords of the Council, and being brought into the King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus, is inlarged upon bail; but this they ſay was upon a letter written from one of the Lords of the Council to the Judges. It is true, that ſuch a letter was written, but the anſwer to the former precedents of this nature, are ſufficient to clear this alſo.

And in all theſe obſerve,

1. That it appears not, that the party ever deſired to be inlarged by the Court, or was denied it.

2. Letters either from the King or Council cannot alter the law in any caſe: ſo that hitherto, nothing hath been brought on the contrary part, that hath any force or colour of reaſon in it.

We come now, my Lords, to thoſe precedents of the other nature cited againſt the liberty of the ſubject: that is, ſuch as have been uſed to miſlike that perſons ſo committed may not be inlarged by the Court.

They are in number eight, but there is not one of them that proves any ſuch thing, as your Lordſhips will plainly ſee upon opening them.

The firſt four of them are exactly in the ſame words, ſaving that the names of the perſons and the priſons differ; I ſhall therefore recite them all one after another, and then clear them together.

The firſt is Richard Everard's caſe, Hill. 7. Hen. VII. rot. 18. He and others were committed to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold, per mandatum domini Regis, and ſo returned upon a Habeas Corpus into the King's-Bench; whereupon the entry is only Qui committitur Marr. &c.

The ſecond is Hill. 8 Hen. VII. Richard Cherry's caſe; he was committed to the Mayor of Windſor, per mandatum domini Regis, and ſo returned upon a Habeas Corpus; and the entry is only, Qui committitur Marr. &c.

The third is Hill. 9 Hen. VII. rot. 14. Chriſtopher Burton's caſe, who was committed to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold, per mandatum domini Regis, and ſo returned upon his Habeas Corpus; and the entry is likewiſe, Qui committitur Marr. &c.

The fourth is George Urſwick's caſe, Paſ. 19 Hen. VII. rot. 19. he was committed to the Sheriffs of London, per mandatum domini Regis, and returned ſo upon his Habeas Corpus, Qui committitur Marr. &c.

Theſe four have been uſed principally, as expreſs precedents, to prove that a priſoner ſo committed cannot be inlarged; and perhaps at the firſt ſight, to men that know not, and obſerve not the courſe and entries of the Court of King's-Bench, they may be apprehended to prove as much: but in truth they rather prove the contrary, at leaſt there is no colour in them of any ſuch matter as they have been uſed for. To which purpoſe I beſeech your Lordſhips to call to your memories, that which I firſt obſerved to you touching the courſe of that Court. Where a priſoner is brought in by Habeas Corpus, he is (if he be not to be remanded) firſt committed to the Marſhal of the Court, and then bailed as his caſe requires. This is ſo certain, as it can never be otherwiſe. Now theſe men being thus committed by the expreſs command of the King, are firſt, you ſee, taken from the priſons whither they were firſt committed; wherein you may obſerve, my Lords, that if a general ſuſpicion of matter of State were of force in ſuch a caſe, it might be as needful in point of State, to have the priſoner remain in the priſon, where the King by ſuch an abſolute command committed him, as to have him at all committed. When they have taken them from the priſons where before they were, they commit them to the Marſhal of their own Court, which is but the firſt ſtep to bailing them. Now it appears not indeed that they were bailed, for then Traditur in Ball. had followed, but nothing at all appears that they were denied it; perhaps they never asked it, perhaps they could not find ſuch as were ſufficient to bail them. And in truth, whenſoever any man is but removed from any priſon in England (though it be for debt or treſpaſs only) into that Court, the entry is but in the ſelf-ſame ſyllables as in theſe four caſes.

And in truth if theſe proceedings did prove, that any of the priſoners named in them were not bailable, or had been thought by the Court not to have been bailable; it will neceſſarily follow, that no man living that is ordinarily removed from any priſon into the King's-Bench; or that is there upon any ordinary action of debt, or action of treſpaſs, could be bailed, for every man that is brought thither, and not remanded, and every man that is arreſted but for a debt or treſpaſs, and was returned into that Court, is likewiſe committed to the Marſhal of that Court, and by the ſelf-ſame entry, and not otherwiſe; yet theſe four have been much ſtood on, and have ſtrangely miſled the judgment of ſome that did not, or would not ſeem to underſtand the courſe of that Court.

The fifth of this nature is, Edward Page's caſe; it is Tr. 7 Hen. VIII. This might have been well reckoned with the former four, had not the miſ-entry of the Clerk only made it vary from them. Edward Page was committed to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold, and that per mandatum domini Regis, and returned to be therefore detained, and the entry is Qui committitur Marr. Hoſpitii Dom. Regis. This word Marr. is written in the margin of the roll; this hath been uſed to prove, that the Judges remanded this priſoner; if they had done ſo, the remanding had been only while they adviſed, and not any ſuch award which is given when they adjudge him not bailable. But in truth the word Committitur ſhews, that there was not any remanding of him, nor doth that Court ever commit any man to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold: and beſides, the word Marr. for Mareſcallo in the margin, ſhews plainly that he was committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, and not remanded to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold; for ſuch entry of that word in the margin, is perpetually in caſes of that nature, when they commit a man to their own priſon, and ſo give him the firſt ſtep to bailment, which he may have if he ask it, and can find bail. And doubtleſs theſe words of Hoſpitii præd. were added by the error of the Clerk for want of diſtinction in his underſtanding from the Marr. of the King's-Bench, to the Marſhal of the houſhold.

The ſixth of theſe is Thomas Cæſar's caſe; it is 8 Jac. rot. 99. This Cæſar was committed to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold, per mandatum domini Regis, and returned to be therefore detained, and indeed a remittitur is in the roll, but not a remittitur quouſque, but only that kind of remittitur which is only uſed while the Court adviſes. And in truth this is ſo far from proving any thing againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, that it appears that the opinion of the reverend Judges of that time was, that the return was inſufficient, and that if it were not amended, the priſoner ſhould be diſcharged. For in the Book of rules in the Court of Mich. Term (when Cæſar's caſe was in queſtion) they expreſsly ordered, that if the Steward's Marſhal did not amend their return, the priſoner ſhould be abſolutely diſcharged: the words of the rule are, Niſi Seneſchallus & Mareſcal. Hoſpitii domini Regis ſufficienter returnaverint breve de Habeas Corpus Thomæ Cæſar dier. mercur. prox. poſt quindenam ſcilicet Martin. def. exonerabitur. And this is alſo the force of that precedent, but yet there hath been an interpretation upon this rule. It hath been ſaid that the Judges gave this rule, becauſe the truth was, that the return was falſe, and that it was well known, that the priſoner was not committed by the immediate command of the King, but by the command of the Lord-Chamberlain, and thence (as it was ſaid) they made this rule: but this kind of interpretation is the firſt that ever was ſuppoſed, that Judges ſhould take notice of the truth or falſhood of the return, otherwiſe than the body of the return could inform them. And the rule itſelf ſpeaks plainly of the ſufficiency only, and not of the truth or falſhood of it.

The ſeventh of theſe, is the caſe of James Deſmaiſtres, Edward Emerſon, and ſome others that were Brewers, and were committed to the Marſhalſea of the houſhold, per mandatum domini Regis, and ſo returned upon Habeas Corpus: and it is true, that the roll ſhews that they were remanded, but the remanding was only upon adviſement. And indeed the grave and upright Judges of that time were ſo careful, leſt upon the entry of the remanding, any ſuch miſtake might be, as might perhaps miſlead poſterity in ſo great a point, that they would expreſsly have this word (immediatè) added to the Remittitur, that ſo all men that ſhould meet with the roll might ſee, that it was done for the preſent only, and not upon any debate of the queſtion. And beſides, that there is no quouſque to it, which is uſually added; when the higheſt award upon debate or reſolution of this kind is given by them.

The eighth of theſe is, the caſe of Saltonſtall; it is Hill. 12 Jac. Sir Samuel Saltonſtall was committed to the Fleet, per mandatum domini Regis; and beſides, by the Court of Chancery, for diſobeying an order of that Court, and is returned upon his Habeas Corpus, to be therefore detained. And it is true that a Remittitur is entered in the roll, but it is only a remittitur priſonæ prædict', without quouſque ſecundum legem deliberatus fuerit: and in truth it appears on the Record, that the Court gave the Warden of the Fleet, three ſeveral days at ſeveral times, to amend his return, and in the interim remittitur priſonæ præd'. Certainly if the Court had thought that the return had been good, they would not have given ſo many ſeveral days to have amended it; for if that mandatum domini Regis had been ſufficient in the caſe, why need it to have been amended?

The ninth and laſt of theſe is, Tr. 13 Jac. Rot. 71. the caſe of the ſame Sir Samuel Saltonſtall: he is returned by the Warden of the Fleet, as in the caſe before, and generally, remittitur is in the roll, which proves nothing at all, that therefore the Court thought he might not by law be inlarged; and beſides, in both caſes he ſtood committed alſo for diſobeying an order in the Chancery.

Theſe are all that have been pretended to the contrary in this great point, and upon the view of them them thus opened to your Lordſhips, it is plain, that there is not one, not ſo much as one at all; that proveth any ſuch thing, as that perſons committed by the command of the King, or the Lords of the Council without cauſe ſhewed, might not be enlarged; but indeed the moſt of them expreſsly prove rather the contrary.

Now, my Lords, having thus gone through the precedents of Record, that concern the point of either ſide, before I come to the other kind of precedents, which are the ſolemn reſolutions of Judges in former times; I ſhall (as I am commanded alſo by the Houſe of Commons) repreſent unto your Lordſhips ſomewhat elſe they have thought very conſiderable; with which they met, whilſt they were in a moſt careful enquiry of whatſoever concerned them in this great queſtion.

It is, my Lords, a draught of an entry of a judgment in that great caſe lately adjudged in the Court of King's-Bench, when divers Gentlemen impriſoned per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, were by the award and order of the Court, after ſolemn debate, ſent back to priſon, becauſe it was expreſsly ſaid, they could not in Juſtice deliver them, though they prayed to be bailed. The caſe is famous, and well known to your Lordſhips, therefore I need not further to mention it: as yet indeed there is no judgment entered upon the roll, but there is room enough for any kind of judgment to be entered. But, my Lords, there is a form of a judgment, a moſt unuſual one; ſuch a one as never was in any ſuch caſe before (for indeed there was never before any caſe ſo adjudged) and thus drawn on by a chief Clerk of that Court (by direction of Mr. Attorney-General) as the Houſe was informed by the Clerk, in which the reaſon of the judgment, and remanding of thoſe Gentlemen, is expreſſed in ſuch ſort, as if it ſhould be declared upon Record for ever, that the laws were, that no man could ever be inlarged from impriſonment that ſtood committed by ſuch an abſolute command.

The draught is only in Sir John Heveningham's caſe, being one of the Gentlemen that was remanded, and it was made for a form for all the reſt. The words of it are after the uſual entry of a Curia adviſare vult for a time; That viſis retur. prædict. nec non diverſis antiquis recordis in Curia hic remanent. conſimiles caſus continentibus, maturaq; deliberatione, inde prius habita, eo quod nulla ſpecialis cauſa captionis ſive detentionis præd. Johannis exprimitur, ſed generaliter quod detentus eſt in priſona præd'. per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, ideo præd'. Johannes remittitur prefat. cuſtodi Marr. Hoſpitii præd. ſalvo cuſtodiend. quouſq; &c. that is quouſque ſecundum legem deliberatus fuerit. And if that Court, that is the higheſt for ordinary Juſtice, cannot deliver him ſecundum legem; what law is there, I beſeech you, my Lords, that can be ſought for in any other inferior Court to deliver him. Now, my Lords, becauſe this draught, if it were entered in the roll, (as it was prepared for no other purpoſe) would be as great a declaration, contrary to the many Acts of Parliament already cited, contrary to all precedents of former times, and to all reaſon of law; to the utter ſubverſion of the higheſt liberty and right belonging to every Freeman of this Kingdom, and for that eſpecially alſo it ſuppoſes that divers ancient records had been looked into by the Court in like caſes, by which records their judgments were directed; whereas in truth, there is not any one record at all extant that with any colour (not ſo much indeed as with any colour) warrants the judgment: therefore the Houſe of Commons thought fit alſo, that I ſhould with the reſt that hath been ſaid ſhew this draught alſo to your Lordſhips.

I come now to the other kind of precedents, that is, ſolemn reſolutions of Judges, which being not of record, remain only in authentick copies: but of this kind there is but one in this caſe, that is the reſolution of all the Judges in the time of Queen Elizabeth. It was in the 34th of her reign, when divers perſons had been committed by abſolute command, and delivered by the Juſtices of the one Bench or the other; whereupon it was deſired, that the Judges would declare in what caſes perſons committed by ſuch command were to be inlarged, which hath been variouſly cited, and variouſly apprehended.

The Houſe of Commons therefore deſiring with all care, to inform themſelves as fully of the truth of it, as poſſibly they might, got into their hands from a member of their Houſe, a Book of ſelected caſes; collected by a reverend and learned Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, that was one of them that gave the reſolution, which is entred at large in that Book: I mean the Lord Chief-Juſtice Anderſon, it is written in the Book with his own hand, as the reſt of the Book is, and howſoever it hath been cited, and was cited in that great judgment upon the Habeas Corpus in the King's-Bench, as if it had been, that upon ſuch commitments the Judges might not bail the priſoners; yet it is moſt plain that in the reſolution itſelf, no ſuch thing is contained, but rather expreſſed the contrary. I ſhall better repreſent it to your Lordſhips by reading it, than by opening it.

Then it was read here. [See ante 147, 148.]

If this reſolution doth reſolve any thing, it doth indeed upon the enquiry reſolve fully the contrary to that which hath been pretended, and enough for the maintenance of the ancient and fundamental point of liberty of the perſon, to be regained by Habeas Corpus when any is impriſoned. And I the rather thought it fit now to read it to your Lordſhips, that it might be at large heard; becauſe in the great judgment in the King's-Bench, though it was cited at the bar, as againſt this point of perſonal liberty, as alſo at the Bench, yet though every thing elſe of record that was uſed, were at large read openly, this was not read either at Bar or Bench: for indeed if it had, every hearer would eaſily have known the force of it, to have been indeed contrary to the judgment.

My Lords, having thus gone through the charge committed to me by the Houſe of Commons, and having thus mentioned to your Lordſhips, and opened the many precedents of records, and that draught of the judgment in this like caſe, as alſo this reſolution; I ſhall now (as I had leave and direction given me, leſt your Lordſhips ſhould be put to much trouble, and expence of time in finding or getting Copies at large of thoſe things which I have cited) offer alſo to your Lordſhips authentick Copies of them all, and ſo leave them, and whatſoever elſe I have ſaid, to your Lordſhips further conſideration.

The true Copy of the Precedents of Record.

Sir Edward Coke took up the Argument, as to the rational part of the Law, and began with this Introduction *.

YOUR Lordſhips have heard ſeven Acts of Parliament in point, and thirty-one precedents ſummarily collected, and with great underſtanding delivered; which I have peruſed, and underſtand them all thoroughly, and that there was not one of them againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons. Twelve of the precedents are in terminis terminantibus, a whole Jury of precedents, and all in point; and to my underſtanding, they admit of no anſwer: but I am perſuaded in my conſcience, that a number of them was never ſhewed at the King's-Bench, becauſe I know out of whoſe quiver two of them came, and that they were not known before. I am much tranſported with joy, becauſe of the hopes to proceed with good ſucceſs in this weighty buſineſs, your Lordſhips being ſo full of Juſtice, and the very theme and ſubject doth promiſe ſucceſs, which which was, Corpus cum cauſa, the freedom of an Engliſhman, not to be impriſoned without cauſe ſhewn; which is my part to ſhew, and the reaſon and the cauſe why it ſhould be ſo. And I doubt not but we ſhall go on happily, and, my Lords, it wou'd be unſeaſonable to be prolix and copious, becauſe, quod intempeſtum injucundum. I would ſpeak here a little to ſome points which are not ſo clear and obvious, for otherwiſe perſpicua vera non ſunt probanda, and to gild gold were idle and ſuperfluous; therefore ſhall briefly clear to your Lordſhips, ſome doubts made of the Statute of Weſtminſter, which ſays, Sheriffs and others may not replevy men in priſon for four cauſes.

* The Lord-Preſident, who reported the Conference to the Houſe, begun thus: The Conference upon Monday laſt with the Lower-Houſe, was about the Liberty of the Subject; to ſet this forth, they employed four Speakers: the firſt was Sir Dudley Diggs, a Man of a voluble and eloquent Speech, his part was the Introduction; the ſecond was Mr. Littleton, a grave and learned Lawyer; whoſe part was to repreſent the reſolution of the Houſe, and their Grounds whereupon they went; the third was Mr. Selden, a great Antiquary and a pregnant Man, his part was to ſhew the Law, and the precedents in point; the fourth was the Lord Coke, that famous reporter of the Law, whoſe part was to ſhew the reaſon of all that the others had ſaid, and all that which was ſaid was but an affirmance of the Common-Law. From a MS. belonging to the late Peter Le Neve, Eſq; and wrote at that time, wherein the Conference is related.

1. For Death of a man.
2. Commandment of the King.
3. Abſolute command from the Juſtices.
4. For Matters of the Foreſt.

I was once a Judge of the King's-Bench, and did wonder how the Judges of theſe times thus interpret the Statute. The Statute only ſhews what Sheriffs can only do, by way of replevin; the Sheriffs Court is a petty and baſe Court, and not of Record, where the Sheriff is not the Judge, but the Jurors, that is, John a Noke, and John a Stiles, William Roe, and John Doe, and ſuch worthies as theſe. Again, the Statute ſaith there, he cannot be replevied if he be taken for the death of a man; and no marvel, who ever thought it? for the Scripture ſaith, Sanguis nullo modo expiari poteſt niſi Sanguine. But if he cannot be there replevied, at the King's-Bench he may, it is there done every day. Mr. Sheriff, you ſhould replevy a man in ſuch a caſe, Ergo, not bail him, my Lords the Judges, (non ſequitur :) what not Judges bail? what not the King's-Bench, the higheſt Court of Record of ordinary juriſdiction, for the King's-Bench is higher than the Chancery. And this he prov'd by Heraldry, Additio probat minoritatem, that addition proves the younger Brother. Now the Teſte of the King's-Bench, is coram Dom. Rege, without any addition, but that of the Chancery, coram Dom. Rege in Cancellaria, with that addition of a Cadet, a younger Brother. I am very ſorry I am ſo much ſtraitned for want of time, for I am much delighted with theſe things. What, may not the Judges meddle with any thing in the Foreſt? if that were ſo, I would never dwell in a Foreſt, to be wholly under the juriſdiction of the Wardens and Regarders. Theſe gloſſes and interpretations are very ſtrange to me, and others who have been Judges. My Lords, all thoſe arguments offered unto your Lordſhips in this laſt conference, are of a double nature. 1. Acts of Parliament. 2. Judicial Precedents. For the firſt, I hold it a proper argument for your Lordſhips, becauſe you, my Lords Temporal, and you, my Lords Spiritual, gave your aſſent unto thoſe Acts of Parliament; and therefore if theſe cannot perſuade you, nothing can. For the ſecond, which are judicial precedents, it is Argumentum ab authoritate, and Argumentum ab authoritate valet affirmativè; that is, I conceive, tho' it be no good argument to ſay negatively, the Judges have given no opinion in the point, Ergo, that is not law; yet affirmatively it concludes well: the Judges have clearly delivered their opinions in the point, Ergo, it is good law; which I fortify with a ſtrong axiom, Neminem oportet ſapientiorem eſſe legibus, as long as theſe laws ſtand unrepealed. Now theſe two arguments being ſo well preſſed to your Lordſhips by my Colleagues, I think your Lordſhips may wonder what my part may be; it is ſhort, but ſweet: it is the reaſon of all thoſe laws and precedents, and reaſon muſt needs be welcome to all men; for all men are not capable of the underſtanding of the law, but every man is capable of reaſon. And thoſe reaſons I offer to your Lordſhips, in affirmance of the ancient laws and precedents made for the liberty of the ſubject, againſt impriſonment without cauſe expreſſed, and ſhall ſhew them in order and method, to confirm the ſame.

1. A re ipſa.
2. A minori ad majus.
3. From the remedies provided.
4. From the extent and univerſality of the ſame.
5. From the infiniteneſs of the time.
6. A Fine.

The firſt general reaſon is, à re ipſa, even from the nature of impriſonment, ex viſceribus cauſæ; for I will ſpeak nothing but ad idem, be it cloſe or other impriſonment: and this argument is threefold, becauſe an impriſoned man upon will and pleaſure is,

1. A Bondman.
2. Worſe than a Bondman.
3. Not ſo much as a man; for mortuus homo non eſt homo, a priſoner is a dead man.

1. No man can be impriſoned upon will and pleaſure of any, but he that is a Bondman and Villein, for that impriſonment and bondage are propria quarto modo to Villeins *. Now propria quarto modo, and the ſpecies, are convertible; whoſoever is a Bondman, may be impriſoned upon will and pleaſure; and whoſoever may be impriſoned upon will and pleaſure, is a Bondman.

2. If a Freeman of England might be impriſoned at the will and pleaſure of the King or his commandment, then were they in worſe caſe than Bondmen or Villeins; for the Lord of a Villein cannot command another to impriſon his Villein without cauſe, as of diſobedience, or refuſing to ſerve, as it is agreed in the year-books. And here he ſaid, that no man ſhould reprehend any thing that he ſaid out of the Books or Records: he ſaid †, he would prove a Freeman impriſonable upon command or pleaſure, without cauſe expreſſed, to be abſolutely in worſe caſe than a Villein; and if he did not make this plain, he deſired their Lordſhips not to believe him in any thing elſe: and then produced two Book-caſes, 7 E. III. fol. 50. in the new print, 348 old print. " A Prior had commanded " one to impriſon his Villein, the Judges were rea- " dy to bail him, till the Prior gave his reaſon, " that he refuſed to be Bailiff of his Manor; and " that ſatisfied the Judges. 2*d* Caſe, 33 Ed. III. " title Treſp. 253. in Faux impriſonment, it was of " an Abbot, who commanded one to take and " detain his Villein, but demanded his cauſe; he " gives it, becauſe he refuſed, being thereunto re- " quired, to drive his Cattle.

" Ergo, Freemen impriſoned without cauſe " ſhewn, are in worſe caſe than Villeins, that muſt " have a cauſe ſhewn them why they are impri- " ſoned.

" A

* Vide the Writ de Nativo habendo.
† Fitz-Herbert fait un non de ceo,

" 3. A Freeman impriſoned without cauſe, is ſo " far from being a Bondman, that he is not ſo much " as a man, but is indeed a dead man, and ſo no " man: Impriſonment is accounted in law a civil " death, perdit domum, familiam, vicinos, patriam, " and is to live amongſt wretched and wicked men, " malefactors and the like." And that death and impriſonment was the ſame, he proved by an argument ab effectis, becauſe they both produce the like immediate effects; he quoted a Book for this: If a man be threatned to be killed, he may avoid a feoffment of lands, gifts of goods, &c. 39 H. I. 65, &c. ſo it is if he be threatned to be impriſoned; the one is an actual, the other is a civil death. And this is the firſt general argument, drawn à re ipſa, from the nature of impriſonment, to which res ipſa conſilium dedit.

The ſecond general reaſon he took alſo from his Books, for he ſaid he had no law, but what by great pains and induſtry he learnt at his Book, for at ten years of age, he had no more law than other men of like age: and this ſecond reaſon is, à minori ad majus; he takes it from Bracton, fol. 105. minima pœna corporalis, eſt major qualibet pecuniaria.

But the King himſelf cannot impoſe a Fine upon any man, but it muſt be done judicially by his Judges, per Juſticiarios in Curia, non per Regem in Camera; and ſo it hath been reſolved by all the Judges of England: he quoted 3 R. II. fol. 11.

The third general reaſon is taken from the number and diverſity of remedies, which the laws give againſt impriſonment, viz.

Breve de homine replegiando.
De odio & atia.
De Habeas Corpus.
An Appeal of impriſonment.
Breve de manucaptione.

Two of theſe are antiquated, but the Writ de odio & atia is revived, for that was given by the Statute of Magna Charta, chap. 26. and therefore though it were repealed by the Statute of 28 E. III. cap. 9. yet it is revived again by Statute 42 E. III. cap. 1. by which it is provided, that all Statutes made againſt Magna Charta are void. Now the law would never have given ſo many remedies, if the Freemen of England might have been impriſoned at free will and pleaſure.

The fourth general reaſon is from the extent and univerſality of the pretended power to impriſon: for it ſhould extend not only to the Commons of this Realm, and their poſterities, but to the Nobles of the Land, and their Progenies, to the Biſhops and Clergy of the Realm, and their Succeſſors. And he gave a cauſe why the Commons came to their Lordſhips, Commune periculum commune requirit auxilium. Nay, it reacheth to all perſons, of what condition, or ſex, or age ſoever; to all Judges and Officers, whoſe attendance is neceſſary, &c. without exception; and therefore an impriſonment of ſuch an extent, without reaſon, is againſt reaſon.

The fifth general reaſon is drawn from the indefiniteneſs of time, the pretended power being limited to no time, it may be perpetual during life; and this is very hard: to caſt an old man into priſon, nay, to cloſe priſon, and no time allotted for his coming forth, is a hard caſe, as any man would think that had been ſo uſed. And here he held it an unreaſonable thing, that a Man had a remedy for his Horſe or Cattle, if detained, and none for his Body thus indefinitely impriſoned; for a priſon without a prefixed time, is a kind of hell.

The ſixth and laſt argument is à Fine; and ſapiens incipit à Fine, and he wiſh'd he had begun there alſo; and this Argument he made threefold.

Ab honeſto. This being leſs honourable.
Ab utili. This being leſs profitable.
A tuto. This Impriſonment by will and pleaſure, being very dangerous for the King and Kingdom.

1. Ab honeſto. It would be no honour to a King or Kingdom, to be a King of Bondmen or Slaves, the end of this would be both dedecus & damnum, both to King and Kingdom, that in former times hath been ſo renowned.

2. Ab utili. It would be againſt the profit of the King and Kingdom, for the execution of thoſe laws before remembred, Magna Charta, 5 Edw. III. 25 Edw. III. 28 Edw. III. whereby the King was inhibited to impriſon upon pleaſure: you ſee (quoth he) that this was vetus querela, an old queſtion, and now brought in again, after ſeven Acts of Parliament; I ſay, the execution of all theſe laws are adjudg'd in Parliament to be for the common profit of the King and People; (and he quoted the Roll) this pretended power being againſt the profit of the King, can be no part of his prerogative.

He was pleaſed to call this a binding-reaſon, and to ſay that the wit of man could not anſwer it; indeed the great men kept this roll from being printed, but that it was equivalent in force to the printed rolls.

3. A reaſon à tuto. It is dangerous to the King for two reſpects; firſt, of loſs; ſecondly, of deſtroying the endeavours of men. Firſt, if he be committed without the expreſſion of the cauſe, though he eſcape, albeit in truth it were for Treaſon or Felony, yet this eſcape is neither Felony nor Treaſon; but if the cauſe be expreſſed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon or Felony, then the eſcape, though it be innocent, is Treaſon or Felony. [The Act, which is in Latin, is niſi cauſa pro qua captus, & impriſonat. fuit tale judicium requirat, ſi de illa pro legem & conſuetudinem terræ fuiſſet convictus.] He quoted a cauſe in print like a reaſon of the law, not like remittitur at the riſing of the Court; for there the priſoner traditur in Ballium quod breve Regis non fuit ſufficiens cauſa: the King's command. He quoted another famous cauſe; the Commons in Parliament incenſed againſt the Duke of Suffolk, deſire he ſhould be committed: The Lords and all the Judges, whereof thoſe great worthies, Preſcot and Forteſcue, were two, delivered a flat opinion, that he ought not to be committed without an eſpecial cauſe. He queſtioned alſo the name and etymology of the Writ in queſtion, Corpus cum cauſa; Ergo, the cauſe muſt be brought before the Judge, elſe how can he take notice hereof?

Laſtly, he preſſed a place in the Goſpel, Acts 25. laſt verſe, which Feſtus conceives is an abſurd and unreaſonable thing, to ſend a priſoner to a Roman Emperor, and not to write along with him the cauſe alledged againſt him: Send therefore no man a priſoner, without his cauſes along with him, hoc fac & vives. And that was the firſt reaſon, à tuto, that it was not ſafe for the King in regard of loſs, to commit men without a cauſe.

The ſecond Reaſon is, that ſuch commitments will deſtroy the endeavours of all men. Who will endeavour to employ himſelf in any profeſſion, either of War, Merchandiſe, or of any Liberal Knowledge, if he be but a tenant at will of his liberty? For no tenant at will, will ſupport or improve any thing, becauſe he hath no certain eſtate; Ergo, to make men tenants at will of their liberties, deſtroys all induſtry and endeavours whatſoever. And ſo much for theſe ſix principal reaſons: taken,

1. A re ipſa.
2. A minori ad majus.
3. A remediis.
4. From the extent and univerſality.
5. From the infiniteneſs of the time.
6. A fine.

Loſs of { Honour. Profit. Security. Induſtry.

Theſe were his Reaſons.

Here he made another proteſtation, That if a remedy had been given in this caſe, they would not have meddled therewith by no means; but now that remedy being not obtain'd in the King's-Bench, without looking back upon any thing that hath been done or omitted, they deſire ſome proviſion for the future only. And here he took occaſion to add four Book-caſes and Authorities, all in the point; ſaying, that if the learned Counſel on the other ſide could produce but one againſt the Liberties, ſo pat and pertinent, oh! how they could hug and cull it! 16 H. VI. tit. monſtrance de fait 82. by the whole Court, the King in his preſence cannot command a man to be arreſted, but an action of falſe impriſonment lieth againſt him that arreſteth: If not the King in his royal preſence, then none others can do it. Non ſic itur ad aſtra. 1 Hen. VII. 4. Huſſey reports the opinion of Markham, Chief-Juſtice to Edw. IV. that he could not impriſon by word of mouth; and the reaſon, becauſe the party hath no remedy; for the law leaves every man a remedy of cauſe of impriſonment. He added, that Markham was a worthy Judge, though he fell into adverſities at laſt by the Lord Rivers's means. Forteſcue, chap. 8. Proprio ore nullus Regum uſus eſt, to impriſon any man, &c. 4 Eliz. Times bleſſed and renowned for Juſtice and Religion, in Plowden, 235. the Common Law hath ſo admeaſured the King's prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance; and the greateſt inheritance a man hath, is the liberty of his perſon, for all others are acceſſary to it; for thus he quoteth the Orator Cicero, Major hæreditas venit unicuique noſtrum à Jure legibus quam à parentibus.

And theſe are the Authorities he cited in this point.

Now he propounded and anſwered two objections; Firſt, in point of State; Secondly, in the courſe held by the Houſe of Commons.

May not the Privy-Council commit, without cauſe ſhewed in no matter of State where ſecrecy is required? Would not this be an hindrance to his Majeſty's ſervice?

It can be no prejudice to the King by reaſon of matter of State, for the cauſe muſt be of higher or lower nature. If it be for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, miſpriſion of Treaſon, or Felony, it may be by general words couched; if it be for any other thing of ſmaller nature, as contempt, and the like, the particular cauſe muſt be ſhewed, and no individuum vagum, or uncertain cauſe to be admitted.

Again, if the law be ſo clear as you make it, why needs the declaration and remonſtrance in Parliament?

The ſubject hath in this caſe ſued for remedy in King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus, and found none; therefore it is neceſſary to be cleared in Parliament. And here ended his diſcourſe. And then he made a recapitulation of all that had been offered unto their Lordſhips, that generally their Lordſhips had been adviſed by the moſt faithful Counſellors that can be; dead men, theſe can't be daunted by fear, nor miſled by affection, reward or hope of preferment, and therefore your Lordſhips might ſafely believe them: particularly their Lordſhips had three ſeveral kinds of proofs.

1. Acts of Parliament, judicial Precedents, good Reaſons. Firſt, you have had many ancient Acts of Parliament in the point, beſides Magna Charta; that is, ſeven Acts of Parliament, which indeed are thirty-ſeven, Magna Charta being confirmed thirty times, for ſo often have the Kings of England given their Royal Aſſent thereto.

2. Judicial Precedents of grave and reverend Judges, in terminis terminantibus, that long ſince departed the World, and they were many in number. Precedents being twelve, and the Judges four of a Bench made four times twelve, and that is forty-eight Judges.

3. You have, as he termed them, vividas rationes, manifeſt and apparent reaſons: towards the concluſion he declareth to their Lordſhips, that they of the Houſe of Commons have, upon great ſtudy and ſerious conſideration, made a great manifeſtation unanimouſly, Nullo contradicente, concerning this great liberty of the ſubject, and have vindicated and recovered the body of this fundamental liberty, both of their Lordſhips and themſelves, from ſhadows, which ſome times of the day are long, ſome times ſhort, and ſome times long again; and therefore we muſt not be guided by ſhadows: and they have tranſmitted to their Lordſhips, not capita rerum, heads or briefs, for theſe compendia are diſpendia; but the Records at large, in terminis terminantibus. And ſo he concluded, that their Lordſhips are involved in the ſame danger, and therefore ex congruo & condigno, they deſired a conference, to the end their Lordſhips might make the like declaration as they had done; Commune periculum requirit commune auxilium; and thereupon take ſuch further courſe, as may ſecure their Lordſhips and them, and all their poſterity, in enjoying of their ancient, undoubted and fundamental liberties.

The ſubſtance of the Objections made by Mr. Attorney-General (Sir Robert Heath) before a Committee of both Houſes, to the argument that was made by the Houſe of Commons, at the firſt conference with the Lords.

AFter the firſt conference, which was deſired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houſes in the Painted Chamber, touching the Reaſons, Laws, Acts of Parliament, and Precedents concerning the Liberty of the perſon of every Freeman; Mr. Attorney-General being heard before the Committee of both Houſes, as it was aſſented to by the Houſe of Commons, that he might be, before they went up to the conference; after ſome preamble made, wherein he declined the anſwering all Reaſons of Law, and Acts of Parliament, came only to the precedents uſed in the argument before delivered; and ſo endeavoured to weaken the ſtrength of them, that had been brought in behalf of the ſubjects, and to ſhew that ſome other were directly contrary to the Law, comprehended in the reſolutions of the Houſe of Commons, touching the bailing of priſoners, returned upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus to be committed by the ſpecial command of the King, or the Council, without any cauſe ſhewed, for which by Law they ought to be committed. And the courſe which was taken (it pleaſed the Committee of both Houſes to allow of) was, that Mr. Attorney ſhould make his objections to every particular precedent, and that the Gentlemen appointed, and truſted herein by the Houſe of Commons, by ſeveral Replies ſhould ſatisfy the Lords touching the Objections made by him, againſt, or upon every particular, as the order of the precedents ſhould lead them. He began with the firſt twelve precedents that were uſed by the Houſe of Commons at the conference deſired by them, to prove that priſoners returned to ſtand ſo committed, were delivered upon bail by the Court of King's-Bench.

The firſt was that of Bildeſton's caſe in the 18 Edw. III. Rot. 33.

To this he objected; firſt, that in the return of him into the Court, it did not appear, that this Bildeſton was committed by the King's command; and ſecondly, that in the Record it did appear alſo that he had been committed for ſuſpicion of counterfeiting the great Seal, and ſo by conſequence was bailable by the Law, in regard there appeared a cauſe why he was committed: in which caſe it was granted by him (as indeed it was plain and agreed of all hands) that the priſoner is bailable though committed by command of the King. And he ſaid that this part of the Record, by which it appeared he had been committed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, was not obſerved to the Lords in the Argument before uſed; and he ſhewed alſo to the Lords, that there were three ſeveral kinds of Records, by which the full truth of every award, or bailing upon an Habeas Corpus, is known Firſt, the Remembrance-Roll, wherein the award is given; ſecondly, the File of the Writ and the Return; and thirdly, the Scruet-Roll or Scruet finium, wherein the bail is entred, and that only the Remembrance-Roll of this caſe was to be found: and that if the other two of it were extant, he doubted not but that it would appear alſo, that upon the return itſelf, the cauſe of the commitment had been expreſſed. And ſo he concluded, that this proved not for the Reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, touching the matter of bail, where a priſoner was committed by the King's ſpecial command without cauſe ſhewed.

To theſe objections the reply was, Firſt, that it was plain that Bildeſton was committed by the King's expreſs command. For ſo the very words of the Writ are to the Conſtable of the Tower, quod cum teneri & cuſtodiri facias, &c. than which nothing can more fully expreſs a commitment by the King's command. Secondly, however it be true, that in the latter part of the Record it doth appear, that Bildeſton had been committed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, yet if the times of the proceeding, expreſſed in the Record, were obſerved, it would be plain that the objection was of no force; for this one ground, both in this caſe and in all the reſt, is infallible, and never to be doubted of in the Law, That Juſtices of every Court adjudge of the force and ſtrength of a Return out of the body of itſelf only, and as therein it appears. Now in Eaſter Term in the 18 Edward III. he was returned and brought before them, as committed only by the Writ; wherein no cauſe is expreſſed, and the Lieutenant and the Conſtable of the Tower, that brought him into the Court, ſays, that he had no other Warrant to detain him niſi breve predictum, wherein there was no mention of any cauſe; and the Court thereupon adjudged, that breve predictum or that ſpecial command, was not ſufficient cauſe to detain him in priſon, and thereupon he is by judgment of the Court in Eaſter-Term let to Mainpriſe. But that part of the Record wherein it appears, that he had indeed been committed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, is of Trinity-Term following, when the King, after the letting of him to mainpriſe, ſent to the Judges that they ſhould diſcharge his Mainpriſe, becauſe no man proſecuted him. And at that time it appears (but not before) that he had been in for ſuſpicion of Treaſon; ſo that he was returned to ſtand committed by the King's ſpecial command only, without cauſe ſhewed, in Eaſter-Term, and then by judgment of the Court let to mainpriſe, (which to this purpoſe is but the ſame with bail, though otherwiſe it differ.) And in the Term following upon another occaſion the Court knew, that he had been committed for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, which has no relation at all to the letting of him to Mainpriſe, nor to the judgment of the Court then given; when they did not, nor could poſſibly know any cauſe, for which the King had committed him. And it was ſaid, in behalf of the Houſe of Commons, that they had not indeed in their Argument expreſly uſed this latter part of the Record of Bildeſton's caſe, becauſe it being only of Trinity-Term following, could not concern the reaſon of an award given by the Court in Eaſter-Term next before; yet notwithſtanding that they had moſt faithfully, at the time of their argument, delivered in to the Lords, as indeed they had a perfect copy at large of the whole Record of this caſe; as they had done alſo of all other precedents whatſoever cited by them; inſomuch as in truth there was not one precedent of Record on either ſide, the copy whereof they had not delivered in likewiſe, nor did Mr. Attorney mention any one beſides thoſe that were ſo delivered in by them. And as touching thoſe three kinds of Records, the Remembrance-Roll, the Return and File of the Writ, and Scruets; it was anſwered by the Gentlemen imployed by the Houſe of Commons, that it was true, that the Scruet and the Return of this caſe of Bildeſton was not to be found; but that did not leſſen the weight of the precedent, becauſe always in the award or judgment drawn up in the Remebrance-Roll, the cauſe (whatſoever it be) when any is ſhewed, upon the return is always expreſſed, as it appears clearly by the conſtant entries of the King's-Bench-Court. So that if any cauſe had appeared unto the Court, it muſt have appeared plainly in that part of the Roll, which belongs to Eaſter-Term, wherein the judgment was given: but the return of the commitment by the King's command without cauſe ſhewed, and the judgment of the Court, that the priſoner was to be let to mainpriſe, appears therein only. And ſo notwithſtanding any objection made by Mr. Attorney, the cauſe was maintained to be a clear proof among many others, touching that reſolution of the Houſe of Commons.

To the ſecond of theſe twelve, which is Parker's caſe, in the 22 H. VIII. Rot. 37. his objections were two; firſt, that it is true, that he was returned to be committed per mandatum Domini Regis; but it appeared that this command was certified to the Sheriffs of London by one Robert Peck gentleman, and that in regard that the command came no otherwiſe, the return was held inſufficient, and that therefore he was bailed. Secondly, that it appears alſo in the Record, that he was committed pro ſuſpicione feloniæ ac per mandatum Domini Regis: ſo that in regard that the expreſſion of the cauſes of his commitment, ſuſpicion of felony, precedes the command of the King, therefore it muſt be intended that the Court took the cauſe why the King committed him to be of leſs moment than felony, and therefore bailed him. For he objected, that even the Houſe of Commons themſelves, in ſome arguments uſed by them, touching the interpretation of the Statute of Weſtminſter the firſt, cap. 15. about this point, had affirmed, that in enumeration of particulars, thoſe of greateſt nature were firſt mentioned, and that it was ſuppoſed, that ſuch as followed were uſually of leſs nature or moment.

But the reply was to the firſt objection, that the addition of the certifying of the King's command by Robert Peck, altered not the caſe: Firſt, becauſe the Sheriffs in their return took notice of the command as what they were aſſured of; and then howſoever it came to them, it was of equal force, as if it had been mentioned without reference to Peck. Secondly, as divers Patents paſs the great Seal by Writ of Privy-Seal, and are ſubſcribed per breve de privato ſigillo; ſo diverſe per ipſum Regem, are ſo ſubſcribed; and oftentimes in the Roll of former times, to the words per ipſum Regem, are added nuneiante A. B. So that the King's command generally, and the King's command related or certified by ſuch a man, is to this purpoſe of like nature. Thirdly, in the late great caſe of Habeas Corpus, where the return of the commitment was per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis mihi ſignificatum per Dominos de privato Concilio; the Court of King's-Bench did agree, that it was the ſame, and of like force as if mihi ſignificatum, &c. had not followed, and that thoſe words were void. According whereunto, here alſo per mandatum Dom. Regis nunciatu m per Robert. Peck, had been wholly omitted and void likewiſe. And in truth in that late caſe, this caſe of Parker was cited both at the Bar and Bench: and at the Bench it was interpreted by the Judges no otherwiſe, than if it had been only per mandatum Domini Regis in place of it: but the objection there was made of another kind, as was delivered in the firſt argument, made out of precedents in behalf of the Houſe of Commons. Therefore to the ſecond objection touching the courſe of enumeration of the cauſes in the return, it was ſaid, that howſoever in ſome Acts of Parliament, and elſewhere in the ſol mn expreſſions uſed in the Law, things of greater nature preceded, and the leſs follow; yet in this caſe, the contrary was moſt plain, for in the return it appears that there were three cauſes for detaining the priſoners: Surety of the peace, ſuſpicion of felony, and the King's command: and Surety of the peace is firſt mentioned, which is plainly leſs than felony. And therefore it is plain, if any force of argument be taken from this enumeration, that the contrary to that which Mr. Attorney inferred is to be concluded; that is, that as Felony is a greater cauſe than Surety of the peace, ſo the matter whereupon the King's command was grounded, was greater than Felony. But in truth this kind of argument holds neither way here, and whatſoever the cauſe were, why the King committed him, it was impoſſible for the Court to know it: and it alſo might be of very high moment in matter of State, and yet of far leſs nature than felony. All which ſhews, that this precedent hath its full force alſo, according as it was firſt uſed in argument by the Houſe of Commons.

To the third of theſe, which is Bincks's caſe in the 35 H. VIII. Rot. 33. the objection was, that there was a cauſe expreſſed, pro ſuſpicione feloniæ: and though pro aliis cauſis illos moventibus were added in the return, yet becauſe in the courſe of enumeration, the general name of aliis coming after particulars, includes things of leſs nature than the particular doth, therefore in this caſe ſuſpicion of felony being the firſt, the other cauſes afterwards generally mentioned muſt be intended of leſs nature, for which the priſoner was bailable, becauſe he was bailable for the greater, which was ſuſpicion of felony. Hereunto it was replied, that the argument of enumeration in theſe caſes is of no moment, as is next before ſhewed: and that altho' it were of any moment, yet aliæ cauſæ, though leſs than felony, might be of very great conſequence in matter of State, which is pretended uſually upon general returns of command, without cauſe ſhewed; and it is moſt plain, that the Court could not poſſibly know the reaſons, why the priſoner here was committed, and yet they bailed him, without looking further after any unknown thing under that title of matter of State which might as well have been in this caſe as in any other whatſoever.

To the 4th of theſe, which is Overton's caſe, in Paſch. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 58. And to the 5th, which is Newport's caſe, Paſch. Phil. & Mar. 4 & 5 Rot. 45. only theſe objections were ſaid over again by Mr. Attorney, which are mentioned in the argument made out of the precedents in behalf of the Houſe of Commons at the firſt conference; and in the ſame argument are fully and clearly ſatisfied, as they were in like manner now again.

To the 6th of theſe, which was Lawrence's caſe, 9 Eliz. Rot. 35. and the 7th, which is Conſtable's Paſch. 9 Eliz. Rot. 68. the ſame objections were likewiſe ſaid over again by Mr. Attorney, that are mentioned, and are clearly and fully anſwered in the argument made at the conference out of precedents in behalf of the Houſe of Commons; the force of the objection being only, that it appeared in the margin of the Roll, that the word Pardon was written: but it is plain that the word there hath no reference at all to the reaſon why they were bailed, nor could it have reference to the cauſe why they were committed, in regard the cauſe why they were committed is utterly unknown, and was not ſhewed.

To the 8th of theſe precedents, which was Browning's caſe, Paſch. 20 Eliz. Rot. 72. it was ſaid by Mr. Attorney, that he was bailed by a letter from the Lords of the Council, directed to the the Judges of the Court; but being aſked for that letter, or any teſtimony of it, he could produce none at all; but ſaid, he thought the teſtimony of it was burnt, among many other things of the Council-table at the burning of the Banquetting Houſe.

To the 9th, being Harecourt's caſe, Paſch. 40 Eliz. Rot. 62. The ſelf-ſame objection was made by him, but no Warrant was ſhewed to maintain his objection.

To the 10th, which is Catesby's caſe, in vacatione Hill. 43 Eliz. he ſaid that it was by direction of a Privy-Seal from the Queen; and to that purpoſe he ſhewed the Privy-Seal of 43 Eliz. which is at large among the tranſcripts of the Records concerning bails taken in caſes, where the King or the Lords aſſented. But it was replied, that the Privy-Seal was made only for ſome particular Gentlemen mentioned in it, and for none other, as indeed appears in it: and then he ſaid, that it was likely that Catesby here had a Privy-Seal in this behalf, becauſe thoſe other had ſo; which was all the force of his objection.

To the 11th of theſe, which is Beckwith's caſe in Hill. 12 Jac. Rot. 153. he ſaid, that the Lords of the Council ſent a letter to the Court of King's-Bench to bail him. And indeed he produced a letter, which could not by any means be found when the arguments were made at the firſt conference: and this letter, and a copy of an obſcure report made by a young ſtudent (which was brought to another purpoſe, as is hereafter ſhewed) were the only things written of any kind that Mr. Attorney produced, beſides the particulars ſhewed by the Houſe of Commons at the firſt conference. To this it was replied, that the letter was of no moment, being only a direction to the Chief-Juſtice, and no matter of Record, nor any way concerning the reſt of the Judges: and beſides, either the priſoner was bailable by the Law, or not bailable: if bailable by the Law, then was he to be bailed without any ſuch letter; if not bailable by the Law, then plainly the Judges could not have bailed him upon the letter, without breach of their oath, which is, That they are to do juſtice according to the Law, without having reſpect to any command whatſoever. So that the letter in this caſe, or the like in any other caſe, is for point of Law to no purpoſe, nor hath any weight at all by way of objection againſt what the Record and the Judgment of the Court ſhew us.

To the 12th and laſt of theſe, which is Sir Thomas Monſon's caſe in the 14 Jac. Rot. 147. the ſame objection only was ſaid over by him, which was mentioned and clearly anſwered in the argument; and that one ground which is infallible, That the judgment upon a return is to be made only out of what appears in the body of the Return itſelf, was again inſiſted upon in this caſe, as it was alſo in moſt of the reſt. And indeed that alone which is moſt clear Law, fully ſatisfies almoſt all kind of objections, that have been made to any of theſe precedents; which thus rightly underſtood, are many ample teſtimonies of the Judgment of the Court of King's-Bench, touching this great point, in the ſeveral ages, and reigns of the ſeveral Princes under which they fall.

After his objections to the twelve, and the replies and ſatisfactions given to theſe objections, he came next to thoſe wherein the aſſent of the King and Privy-Council appears to have been upon the enlargement: but he made not to any of theſe any other kind of objections whatſoever, than ſuch as are mentioned and clearly anſwered (as they were now again) in the argument made at the firſt conference. And for ſo much as concerns letters of aſſent or direction, the ſame was here ſaid again by way of reply to him, as is before ſaid touching the letter in Beckwith's caſe.

After theſe were diſpatched, he came to urge the eight precedents, which ſeemed to make for the other ſide againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons: which eight were uſed, and copies of them alſo were given in to the Lords at the firſt conference.

Of theſe eight the firſt four were urged by him, as being of one kind; the difference of them only being ſuch, that, ſave only in the names of priſons and of perſons, they are but the ſelf-ſame.

To the force of theſe four he objected thus; that Richard Everard (for the purpoſe) in the firſt of them, which is 5 H. VII. Rot. 18. Roger Cherry in the ſecond of them, which is 8 H. VII. Rot. 12. Chriſtopher Burton, in the third of them, which is 9 H. VII. Rot. 14. and George Urſewick in the fourth of them, which is 19 H. VII. Rot. 13. were returned into the King's-Bench upon ſeveral Writs of Habeas Corpus, to have been committed and detained in the ſeveral priſons whence they came per mandatum Domini Regis, and that upon that return they were committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench; and that however it had been objected againſt thoſe precedents, that this kind of commitment was by the courſe of that Court, always done before the bailing of the priſoner, yet that it did not appear that they were bailed.

The Reply to this objection was, That by conſtant courſe of King's-Bench, whoſoever came in upon Habeas Corpus, or otherwiſe upon any Writ in that Court, cannot be bailed until he be firſt committed to the Marſhal of that Court; and that thence it was, that all thoſe four were committed to the Marſhal, as appears by the entry Qui committitur Mareſcallo, &c. which is the uſual entry in ſuch a caſe, and that the Clerks of that Court acknowledge this courſe and entry to be moſt conſtant. So that all the inference, that can be made out of theſe four is, that four priſoners being brought from four ſeveral priſons by Habeas Corpus into the King's-Bench, and returned to ſtand committed per mandatum Domini Regis, were ſo far from being remanded by the Law, that in all theſe four caſes, they were firſt taken from the ſeveral priſons, wherein they had been detained, by ſuch a general command (which could not have been, if they had not been adjudged in every one of the caſes to have been bailable by the Court) and that this commitment of them to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, was the firſt ſtep towards the bailing of them, as in all other caſes. But that it appears not, that either they ever demanded to be bailed, or that they were able to find ſufficient bail: and if they did not the one, or could not do the other, it may follow indeed that they were not bailed. But this commitment to the King's-Bench being the firſt ſtep to the bailing of them, (as by the conſtant courſe it is) ſhews moſt plainly that they were bailable by the Law, which is the only thing in queſtion. So that altho' theſe four precedents were ranked among them, that may ſeem to make againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, which was done, both becauſe they have this ſmall colour in them for the other ſide, to any man that is not acquainted with the nature and reaſons of the entries, and courſes of the Court of King's-Bench, and alſo becauſe all or ſome of them had been uſed in the late great caſe in the King's-Bench, as precedents that made againſt the Liberty claimed by the ſubject; yet in truth, all four of them do fully prove their reſolution: that is, they plainly ſhew that the Court of King's-Bench in every one of them reſolved, that the priſoners ſo committed were bailable, otherwiſe they had been remanded, and not committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench. And this was the anſwer to the objection made by Mr. Attorney upon thoſe four precedents, being all of the time of King Henry the ſeventh.

To the fifth of theſe eight, being Edward Page's caſe, in 7 H. VIII. Rot. 23. Mr. Attorney objected thus: He ſaid that Edward Page was committed to the Marſhalſea of the Houſhold, per mandatum Domini Regis ibidem ſalvo cuſtodiend. &c. Qui committitur Mareſcallo, &c. Hoſpitii Domini Regis. By which it appeareth, as he ſaid, that the Court remanded him back to the priſon of the Marſhalſea of the Houſhold: and he ſaid, that whereas it had been objected at the firſt conference, that there was ſome miſtaking in the entry; he conceived indeed that there was a miſtaking, but it was that the Clerk had entred committitur for remittitur, and that it ſhould have been Qui remittitur Mareſcallo hoſpitii Domini Regis: for when ever they remanded the priſoner, remittitur, and not committitur ſhould be entred. And that miſtaking, being ſo rectified and underſtood, he conceived it was a direct precedent againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons.

To this it was anſwered by the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, That there was no doubt indeed, but that a miſtake was in the entry by the Clerk, but that the miſtaking was quite of another nature. The addition of thoſe words, hoſpitii Dom. Regis, was the miſtaking, and the entry ſhould have been, qui committitur Mareſcallo, &c. only; that is, he was committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench; and ſo indeed the force of this precedent ſhould be but juſt the ſame with the firſt four: but the ignorance of the Clerk that entred it, knowing not how to diſtinguiſh between the Marſhal of the Houſhold and the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, was the cauſe of the addition of theſe words hoſpitii Dom. Regis.

And to confirm fully this kind of interpretation of that precedent, and of the miſtaking of it, it was obſerved by the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, that there is in the margin of the Roll an infallible character that juſtifies ſo much. For by the courſe of that Court, whenſoever a priſoner is committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench and not remanded, the word Mareſcallo is written in the margin ſhort by Marr' turned up; and that is never written there, but when the meaning and ſenſe of the entry is, that the priſoner is committed to the priſon of the ſame Court. Now in this caſe Marr' in the Margin is likewiſe written: which moſt clearly ſhews that the truth of this caſe was, that this Page was committed to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench and not remanded; which if it had been, neither could the entry have been committitur, nor ſhould the margin of the Roll have had Marr' written in it.

And thus they have anſwered Mr. Attorney's objection touching this precedent, and concluded that now, beſides the firſt four of the eight, they had another, and ſo five to prove that a priſoner committed per mandatum Domini Regis, generally was bailable by the judgment of the Court. However, it appears not in theſe particulars that they were bailed; which perhaps they were not, either becauſe they prayed it not, or becauſe they could not find ſufficient bail.

The ſixth of theſe precedents, being the caſe of Thomas Cæſar in the 8 Jac. Regis Rot. 99. Mr. Attorney objected to it thus; That Cæſar being committed per mandatum Domini Regis to the Marſhalſea of the Houſhold, was returned upon Habeas Corpus to be ſo committed, and therefore detained in priſon, and that the entry is, Qui committitur priſonæ Mareſcal. predict. by which it appears clearly, that he was remanded to the ſame priſon from whence he came.

To this the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons gave this anſwer: They ſaid, that the uſual entry of a remittitur, when it is to ſhew that the Court by way of judgment, or award upon a reſolution, or debate, remands the priſoner, is, remittitur quouſque ſecundum legem deliberatus fuerit: but when they adviſe, or give way to the Keeper of the priſon to amend his return or the like, then the entry is only remittitur generally, or remittitur priſonæ predict. But it was indeed affirmed by Mr. Keeling, a Clerk of great experience in that Court, that the entry of a Remittitur generally, or remittitur priſonæ predictæ was indifferently uſed for the ſame as remittitur quouſque, &c. Yet it was expreſly ſhewed by the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, that there was ſometimes a difference, and that ſo it might well be in this caſe. For in the laſt of theſe eight precedents, which is Saltonſtall's caſe, they obſerved that remittitur priſonæ predictæ is often uſed; and that it is twice uſed only for a remanding, during the time that the Court gave leave to the Warden of the Fleet to amend his return; which ſhews plainly, that tho' ſometimes remittitur generally, and remittitur quouſque, &c. may mean the ſame, yet ſometimes it doth not. And that in this caſe of Cæſar it doth not mean any other, but only ſo much as it doth twice in that of Saltonſtall's caſe, was proved alſo by a rule of the Court, which was cited out of the rule-book of the Court of King's-Bench, by which rule the Court expreſsly ordered, that unleſs the Steward and Marſhal of the Houſhold did ſufficiently return the Writ of Habeas Corpus for Cæſar, that he ſhould be diſcharged. The words of the rule are, Niſi predicti Seneſcallus & Mareſcallus hoſpitii Domini Regis ſufficienter returnaverint breve de Habeas Corpus, Tho. Cæſar die Mercurii proximæ poſt quindenam Sancti Martini de priſona exonerabitur. And this was the opinion of the Court; which ſhews that the Court was ſo far from remanding him upon the return, that they reſolved, that unleſs ſome better return were made, the priſoner ſhould be diſcharged of his firſt impriſonment, though it appeared to them out of the body of the return (upon which they were only to judge) that he was committed per mandatum Domini Regis only. And the rule not only ſhews the opinion of the Court then to have been agreeable with the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, but alſo proves that Remittitur generally, or Remittitur priſonæ predictæ, doth not always imply a remanding upon judgment or debate. And this anſwer was given to this of Cæſar's caſe, that is the ſixth of this number.

The

The ſeventh is the caſe of James Demetrius. It was 12 Jac. Rot. 153. Mr. Attorney objected that this Demetrius and divers others being Brewers, were committed per concilium Domini Regis to the Marſhalſea of the Houſhold, and that upon the commitment ſo generally returned, they were remanded, and that the entry was immediatè remittitur præfato Mareſcallo hoſpitii prædicti; where he obſerved, that immediatè ſhews that the Judges of that time were ſo reſolved of this Queſtion, that they remanded them preſently, as men that well knew what the Law was herein.

Hereunto the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons gave theſe anſwers. Firſt, that the Remittitur in this caſe is but as the other in Cæſar's, and ſo proves nothing againſt them. Secondly, that immediatè being added to it, ſhews plainly that it was done without debate, or any argument or conſideration had of it, which makes the authority of the precedents to be of no force in point of Law; for judgments and awards given upon deliberation only and debate, are proofs and arguments of weight, and not any ſudden Act of the Court without debate or deliberation. And the entry of immediatè being propoſed to Mr. Keeling, it was confirmed by him, that by that entry it appears by this courſe, that the remanding of him was the ſelf-ſame day he was brought, which as it was ſaid by the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, might be at the riſing of the Court, or upon adviſement, and the like. And this anſwer was given to this precedent of the Brewers.

The laſt of the eight, to which Mr. Attorney objected, is Saltonſtall's caſe in the 13 Jac. Regis. He was committed per mandatum Dominorum Regis de privato Concilio: and being returned by the Warden of the Fleet to be ſo, remittitur priſonæ prædictæ; and in the 13 Jac. in the ſame caſe there is remittitur generally in the Roll. And theſe two make but one caſe, and are as one precedent.

To this the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons anſwered, That it is true, the Rolls have ſuch entries of remittitur in them generally, but that proves nothing upon the reaſon before uſed by them in Cæſar's caſe. But alſo Saltonſtall was committed for another cauſe, beſides per mandatum Dom. Regis, a contempt againſt an order in the Chancery, and that was in the return alſo. And beſides the Court, as it appears in the Record, gave ſeveral days to the Warden of the Fleet to amend his return, which they would not have done, if they had conceived it ſufficient, for that which is ſufficient needs not amendment.

To this Mr. Attorney replied, that they gave him a day to amend his return, in reſpect of that part of it which concerns the order in Chancery, and not in reſpect of that which was per mandatum Dom. Regis. But the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons anſwered, that that appeared not any where, nor indeed is it likely at all, nor can be reaſonably ſo underſtood; becauſe if the other return per mandatum Dom. Regis had been ſufficient by itſelf, then doubtleſs they would have remanded him upon that alone; for then they needed not at all to have ſtood upon the other part of the return in this caſe. So that out of the Record itſelf it appears fully, that the Court conceived the return to be inſufficient.

So the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons concluded, that they had a great number of precedents beſides divers Acts of Parliament, and Reaſons of Common Law, agreeable to their reſolution; and that there was not one precedent at all that made againſt them, but indeed, that almoſt all that were brought, as well againſt them as for them, if rightly underſtood, made fully for the maintenance of their reſolution: and that there was not one example or precedent, of a Remittitur in any kind upon the point before that of Cæſar's caſe, which is before cleared with the reſt, and is but of late time, and of no moment againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons.

And thus, for ſo much as concerned the precedents of Record, the firſt day of the conference deſired by the Lords ended.

The next day they deſired another conference with the Houſe of Commons, at which it pleaſed the Committee of both Houſes to hear Mr Attorney again make what objections he could againſt other parts of the argument formerly delivered from the Houſe of Commons. He then objected againſt the Acts of Parliament, and againſt the Reaſons of Law; and his objections to thoſe parts were anſwered, as it appears by the anſwers by order given into the Houſe of Commons by the Gentlemen that made them. [Vide poſtea, p. 180.] He objected alſo upon the ſecond day againſt the ſecond kind of precedents, which are reſolutions of Judges in former times, and not of Record, and brought alſo ſome other teſtimonies of the opinions of Judges in former times touching this point.

Firſt, for that reſolution of all the Judges of England in 34 Eliz. mentioned and read in the arguments at the firſt conference, he ſaid, That it was directly againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, and obſerved the words of it in one place to be, that perſons ſo committed by the King, or by the Council, may not be delivered by any of the Courts, &c. And in another, that if the cauſe were expreſſed, either in general or in ſpecialty, it was ſufficient; and he ſaid that the expreſſing of a cauſe in generality, was to ſhew the King or the Council's command: and to this purpoſe, he read the whole words of that reſolution of the Judges. Then he objected alſo, that in the report of one Roſwell's caſe in the King's-Bench, in 13 Jac. he found that the opinion of the Judges of that Court (Sir Edward Coke being then chief Judge and one of them) was, that a priſoner being committed per mandatum Dom. Regis, or privati Concilii, without cauſe ſhewed, and ſo returned, could not be bailed, becauſe it might be matter of State, or Arcana imperii, for which he ſtood committed. And to this alſo he added, an opinion he found in a Journal in the Houſe of Commons of 13 Jac. wherein Sir Edward Coke ſpeaking to a Bill preferred for the explanation of Magna Charta touching impriſonment, ſaid in the ſame Houſe, That one ſo committed could not be inlarged by the Law, becauſe it might be matter of State, for which he was committed. And amongſt theſe objections of the other nature alſo, he ſpake of the confidence that was ſhewed in behalf of the Houſe of Commons: and he ſaid, it was not confidence on either part could add any thing to the determination of the queſtion; but if it could, that he had as much reaſon of confidence for the other ſide againſt the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, grounding himſelf upon the force of his objections, which as he conceived had ſo weakned the arguments of the Houſe of Commons.

To this a reply was made; and firſt it was ſaid to the Lords on the behalf of the Houſe of Commons, that not withſtanding any thing yet objected, they were upon clear reaſon ſtill confident of the truth of their firſt reſolution, grounded upon ſo juſt examination, and deliberation taken by them. And it was obſerved to the Lords alſo, that their confidence herein was of another nature, and of greater weight, than any confidence that could be expreſſed by Mr. Attorney, or whomſoever elſe being of his Majeſty's Counſel learned.

To which purpoſe the Lords were deſired to take into their memories the difference between the preſent qualities of the Gentlemen that ſpake in behalf of the Houſe of Commons, and of the King's learned Counſel in their ſpeaking there, howſoever accidentally they were both men of the ſame profeſſion: for the King's Counſel ſpake as Counſel perpetually retained by Fee, and if they made gloſſes or what advantageous interpretation ſoever for their own part, they did but what belonged to their place and quality, as Mr. Attorney had done. But the Gentlemen that ſpake in behalf of the Houſe of Commons, came there, bound on the one ſide by the truſt repoſed in them by their Country that ſent them, and on the other ſide by an oath taken by every of them before he ſit in the Houſe, to maintain and defend the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown: ſo that even in the point of confidence alone, thoſe of them that ſpeak as retained Counſel by perpetual Fee, and thoſe that by their place being admitted to ſpeak, are bound to utter nothing but truth, both by ſuch a truſt and ſuch an oath, were no way to be ſo compared or counterpoiſed, as if the one were of no more weight than the other.

And then the objections before mentioned were alſo anſwered.

For that of the reſolution of all the Judges of England in 34 Eliz. it was ſhewed, that plainly it agreed with the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons: for although indeed it might have been expreſſed with more perſpicuity, yet the words of it, as they are, ſufficiently ſhew the meaning of it to be no otherwiſe. To that purpoſe, beſides the words of the whole frame of this reſolution of the Judges, as it is in the copy tranſcribed out of the Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon's Book, written in his own hand, which book was here offered to be ſhewed in the behalf of the Houſe of Commons; it was obſerved, that the words of the firſt part of it ſhew plainly, that all the Judges of England then reſolved, that the priſoners ſpoken of in the firſt part of their reſolution, were only priſoners committed with cauſe ſhewed; for they only ſay they might not be delivered by any Court without due trial by Law, and judgment of acquittal had; which ſhews plainly they meant that by trial and acquittal they might be delivered. But it is clear that no trial or acquittal can be had, where there is not ſome cauſe laid to their charge, for which they ought to ſtand committed. Therefore in that part of the reſolution ſuch priſoners are only meant as are committed with cauſe ſhewed, which alſo the Judges in that reſolution expreſly thought neceſſary, as appears in the ſecond part of their reſolution, wherein they have theſe words: "If upon the re-"turn of their Habeas Corpus, the cauſe of their "commitment be certified to the Judges, as it "ought to be, &c." By which words they ſhew plainly, that every return of a commitment is inſufficient, that hath not a cauſe ſhewed of it. And to that which Mr. Attorney ſaid, as if the cauſe were ſufficiently expreſſed in generality, if the King's command or the Council's were expreſſed in it, as if that were meant in the reſolution for a ſufficient general cauſe; it was anſwered, that it was never heard of in Law, that the power or perſon that committed the priſoner was underſtood for the cauſa captionis or cauſa detentionis, but only the reaſon why that power or perſon committed the priſoner. As alſo in common ſpeech, if any man aſk why or for what cauſe a man ſtands committed, the anſwer is not, that ſuch a one committed him, but his offence or ſome other cauſe is underſtood in the queſtion, and is to be ſhewed in the anſwer. But to ſay that ſuch a one committed the priſoner, is an anſwer only to the queſtion, who committed him? and not why, or for what cauſe he ſtands ſo committed.

Then for that of the copy of the report, in 13 Jac. ſhewed forth by Mr. Attorney, it was anſwered by the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, that the report itſelf which had been before ſeen, and peruſed among many other things at a Committee made by the Houſe, was of ſlight or no authority, for that it was taken by one, who was at that time a young ſtudent, and as a reporter in the King's-Bench, and there was not any other report to be found that agreed with it. Secondly, although the reports of young ſtudents, when they take the words of Judges as they fall from their mouths at the Bench, and in the ſame perſon and form as they have ſpoken, may be of good credit; yet in this caſe there was not one word ſo reported: but in truth there being three caſes at a time in the King's-Bench, one Reſwell's caſe, Allen's, and Saltonſtall's caſe, every of which had ſomething of like nature in it, the ſtudent having been preſent in the Court, made up the frame of one report or caſe out of all three in his own words, and ſo put it into his Book: ſo that there is not a word in the report, but it is framed according to the ſtudent's fancy, as it is written; and nothing is expreſſed in it, as it came from the mouth of the Judges, otherwiſe than his fancy directed him.

Thirdly, there are in the report plain falſhoods of matter of fact, wnich are to be attributed either to the Judges or to the Reporter. It is moſt likely by all reaſon, that they proceeded from the reporter's fault; howſoever, theſe matters of falſhood ſhew ſufficiently that the credit of the reſt is of light value. It is ſaid in the report, that Harecourt being committed by the Council, was bailed, in 40 Eliz. upon a Privy-Seal or a Letter, whereas in truth there is no ſuch thing. And it is ſaid there, that kind of Letters are filed in the Crown-Office, whereas in truth there was not any ſuch kind of Letters filed there in any caſe whatſoever. That Reſolution of the Judges in 34 El. is miſcited there, and made in 36 El. And it is ſaid there, that by that Reſolution, a priſoner returned to be committed by the command of the King, might not at all be delivered by the Court; whereas no ſuch thing is comprehended in that Reſolution.

But that which is of moſt moment is, that howſoever the truth of the report were, yet the opinion of the Judges being ſudden, and without any debate had of the caſe, is of light moment: for in difficult points eſpecially, the moſt grave and learned men living may on the ſudden let fall (and that without any diſparagement to them) ſuch opinions as they may well, and ought to change upon further inquiry, examination, and full debate had before them, and mature deliberation taken by them. Now plainly in that of 13 Jac. there is not ſo much as a pretence of any debate at the Bar or Bench. All that is reported to have been, is reported as ſpoken of the ſudden. And can any man take ſuch a ſudden opinion to be of value againſt ſolemn debates and mature deliberations ſince had of the point? And indeed this great point, and all circumſtances belonging to it, have within this half year, been ſo fully examined and ſearched into, that it may well be affirmed, that the moſt learned man whatſoever that hath now conſidered of it, hath within that time, or might, have learned more reaſon of ſatisfaction in it, thanever before hemet with. Therefore the ſudden opinion of the Judges to the contrary is of no value here, which alſo is to be ſaid of that opinion obviouſly delivered in the Commons Houſe in 18 Jac. as Mr. Attorney objected out of the Journal of the Houſe. But beſides, neither was the truth of that report of that opinion in the Journal any way acknowledged; for it was ſaid in behalf of the Houſe of Commons, that their Journals were for matters of orders and reſolutions of the Houſe of ſuch authority, as that they were as their Records. But for any particular man's opinion noted in any of them, it was ſo far from being of any authority with them, that in truth no particular opinion is at all to be entred in them, and that their Clerk offends, whenever he doth to the contrary. And to conclude, no ſuch opinion whatſoever can be ſufficient to weaken the clear Law comprehended in theſe reſolutions of the Houſe of Commons, grounded upon ſo many Acts of Parliament, ſo much Reaſon of the Common-Law, and ſo many Precedents of Record, and the Reſolution of all the Judges of England; and againſt which not one Law, written or unwritten, not one Precedent, not one Reaſon hath been brought, that makes any thing to the contrary.

And thus, ended the next day of the conference deſired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houſes.

Serjeant Aſhley's Argument, ſeconding Mr. Attorney, in the behalf of his Majeſty.

I Hope it will be neither offenſive nor tedious to your Lordſhips, if I ſaid ſomewhat to ſecond Mr. Attorney: which I the rather deſire, becauſe yeſterday it was taken by the Gentlemen, and argued on the behalf of the Commons, that the cauſe was as good as gained by them, and yielded by us, in that we acknowledged the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other ſubſequent Statutes to be yet in force: for on this they inforced this general concluſion;

That therefore no man could be committed, or impriſoned, but by due proceſs, preſentment or indictment.

Which we ſay is a Non ſequitur upon ſuch our acknowledgment; for then it would follow by neceſſary conſequence, that no impriſonment could be juſtified but by proceſs of law, which we utterly deny. For in the cauſe of the Conſtable, cited by Mr. Attorney, it is moſt clear that by the ancient law of the land a Conſtable might ex officio, without any Warrant, arreſt and reſtrain a man to prevent an affray, or to ſuppreſs it. And ſo is the authority 38 Hen. VIII. Brook's abſtract. So may he, after the affray, apprehend and commit to priſon the perſon that hath wounded a man that is in peril of death, and that without warrant, or proceſs; as it is in 38 Edw. III. fol. 6.

Alſo any man that is no Officer may apprehend a Felon without Writ, or Warrant, or purſue him as a Wolf, and as a common enemy to the Commonwealth, as the Book is 14 Hen. VIII. fol. 16. So might any one arreſt a Night-walker, becauſe it is for the common profit, as the reaſon is given 4 Hen. VII. fol. 7.

In like manner the Judges in theſe ſeveral Courts may commit a man, either for contempt, or miſdemeanor, without either Proceſs or Warrant, other than take him Sheriff, or take him Marſhal, or Warden of the Fleet. And the adverſaries will not deny, but if the King will alledge cauſe, he may commit a man per mandatum as the Judges do, without Proceſs or Warrant.

And various are the caſes that may be inſtanced, wherein there may be a lawful commitment without proceſs. Wherefore I do poſitively and with confidence affirm, that if the impriſonment be lawful, whether it be by proceſs, or without proceſs, it is not prohibited by the law.

Which being granted, then the queſtion will aptly be made, whether the King or Council may commit to priſon per legem terræ, were only that a part of the Municipal Law of this Realm, which we call the Common Law? for there are alſo divers juriſdictions in this Kingdom which are alſo reckoned the law of the land.

As in Cawdry's caſe in Coke's 5th report, fol. 1. the firſt Eccleſiaſtical Law is held the law of the land, to puniſh Blaſphemies, Schiſms, Hereſies, Simony, Inceſt, and the like, for a good reaſon there rendred, viz. That otherwiſe the King ſhould not have power to do Juſtice to his Subjects in all caſes, nor to puniſh all crimes within his Kingdom.

The Admiral's juriſdiction is alſo lex terræ, for things done upon the Sea: but if they exceed their juriſdiction, a prohibition is awarded upon the Statute of nullus liber homo; by which appears that the Statute is in force, as we have acknowledged.

The Martial Law likewiſe, though not to be exerciſed in times of peace, when recourſe may be had to the King's Courts, yet in times of invaſion, or other times of Hoſtility, when an Army-Royal is in the field, and offences are committed, which require ſpeedy reformation, and cannot expect the ſolemnity of legal Trials; then ſuch impriſonment, execution, or other Juſtice done by the Law Martial is warrantable, for it is then the law of the land, and is jus gentium; which ever ſerves for a ſupply in the defect of the Common Law, when ordinary proceeding cannot be had.

And ſo it is alſo in the caſe of the Law of the Merchant, which is mentioned 13 Edw. IV. fol. 9, 10. where a Merchant ſtranger was wronged in his goods, which he had committed to a Carrier to convey to Southampton, and the Carrier imbezzled ſome of the goods; for remedy whereof the Merchant ſued before the Council in the Star-Chamber for redreſs. It is there ſaid thus, Merchant ſtrangers have by the King ſafe-conduct for coming into this Realm; therefore they ſhall not be compelled to attend the ordinary Trial of the Common Law, but, for expedition, ſhall ſue before the King's Council, or in Chancery, de die in diem & de horâ in horam: where the caſe ſhall be determined by the Law of Merchants.

In the like manner it is in the Law of State; when the neceſſity of State requires it, they do and may proceed to natural equity; as in thoſe other caſes where the law of the land provides not, there the proceeding may be by the law of natural equity: and infinite are the occurrences of State, unto which the Common Law extends not. And if theſe proceedings of State ſhould not alſo be accounted the law of the land, then we do fall into the ſame inconveniency mentioned in Cawdrey's caſe, that the King ſhould not be able to do Juſtice in all caſes within his own Dominions.

If then the King nor his Council may not commit, it muſt needs follow, that either the King muſt have no Council of State, or having ſuch a Council, they muſt have no power to make Orders, or Acts of State; or if they may, they muſt be without means to compel obedience to thoſe Acts: and ſo we ſhall allow them juriſdiction, but not compel obedience to thoſe Acts; but not correction, which will be then as fruitleſs as the command. Fruſtra potentia quæ nunquam redigitur in ſtatutum. Whereas the very Act of Weſtminſter the firſt, ſhews plainly that the King may commit, and that his commitment is lawful, or elſe that Act would never have declared a man to be irrepleviable when he is committed by the command of the King, if the Law-makers had conceived that his commitment had been unlawful. And Divine Truth informs us, that the Kings have their power from God, the Pſalmiſt calling them the children of the moſt High; which is in a more ſpecial manner underſtood than of other men: for all the ſons of Adam are by election the ſons of God, and all the ſons of Abraham by recreation, or regeneration, the children of the moſt High, in reſpect of the power which is committed unto them; who hath alſo furniſhed them with ornaments and arms fit for the exerciſing of that power, and hath given them Scepters, Swords, and Crowns: Scepters to inſtitute, and Swords to execute laws; and Crowns, as Enſigns of that power and dignity, with which they are inveſted. Shall we then conceive that our King hath ſo far tranſmitted the power of his Sword to inferior Magiſtrates, that he hath not reſerved ſo much ſupream power, as to commit an offender to priſon? 10 Hen. VI. fol. 7. it appears that a Steward of a Court-Leet may commit a man to priſon, and ſhall not the King from whom all inferior power is deduced have power to commit? We call him the fountain of Juſtice, yet when theſe ſtreams and rivulets, which flow from that fountain, come freſh and full, we would ſo far exhauſt that fountain, as to leave it dry. But they that will admit him ſo much power, do require the expreſſion of the cauſe: I demand whether they will have a general cauſe alledged, or a ſpecial? If general, as they have inſtances for Treaſon, Felony, or for Contempt, (for to leave fencing, and to ſpeak plainly as they intend it) viz. If Loan of money ſhould be required and refuſed, and thereupon a commitment enſue, and the cauſe ſignified to be for Contempt, this being unequal inconvenience from yielding, the remedy is ſought; in the next Parliament would be required the expreſſion of the particular cauſe of the commitment. Then how unfit would it be for King or Council in caſes to expreſs the particular cauſe, it's eaſily to be adjudged, when there is no State, or Policy of Government, whether it be Monarchical, or of any other frame, which have not ſome Secrets of State, not communicable to vulgar underſtanding.

I will inſtance but one; if a King imploy an Ambaſſador to a Foreign Country or State, with inſtructions for his Negotiation, and he purſue not his inſtructions, whereby diſhonour and damage may enſue to the Kingdom, is not this committable?

And yet the particular of his inſtruction, and the manner of his miſcarrying, is not fit to be declared to his Keeper, or by him to be certified to the Judges, where it is to be opened and debated in the preſence of a great audience.

I therefore conclude, for offences againſt the State in caſe of State-Government, the King and his Council have lawful power to puniſh by impriſonment, without ſhewing particular cauſe, where it may tend to the diſcloſing of State-Government. It is well known to many that know me, how much I have laboured in this law of the Subject's liberty very many years before I was in the King's ſervice, and had no cauſe then to ſpeak, but to ſpeak ex animo; yet did I then maintain and publiſh the ſame opinion which now I have declared concerning the King's ſupream power in matters of State, and therefore cannot juſtly be cenſured to ſpeak at this preſent only to merit of my Maſter. But if I may freely ſpeak my own underſtanding, I conceive it to be a queſtion too high to be determined by any legal direction; for it muſt needs be an hard caſe of contention, when the Conqueror muſt ſit down with irreparable loſſes, as in this caſe. If the Subject prevails, he gains liberty, but loſeth the benefit of that State-Government, by which a Monarchy may ſoon become an Anarchy; or if the State prevails, it gives abſolute Sovereignty, but loſeth ſubjects: not their ſubjection, for obedience we muſt yield, tho' nothing be left us but prayers and tears, but yet loſeth the beſt part of them, which is their affections, whereby Sovereignty is eſtabliſhed, and the Crown firmly fixt on his royal head. Between two ſuch extreams there is no way to moderate, but to find a medium for the accommodation of the difference; which is not for me to preſcribe, but only to move your Lordſhips, to whom I ſubmit.

After Mr. Serjeant's ſpeech ended, my Lord-Preſident ſaid thus to the Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons; That though at this free conference, liberty was given by the Lords to the King's Counſel to ſpeak what they thought fit for his Majeſty, yet Mr. Serjeant Aſhley had no authority, or direction from them to ſpeak in that manner he had done. And he was committed into cuſtody, and afterwards, being ſorry for any haſty expreſſion he might have uſed, was diſcharged.

The Objections of the King's Counſel, with the Anſwers made thereunto, at the two Conferences touching the ſame matter.

IT was agreed by the Attorney-General, Sir Robert Heath, that the ſeven Statutes urged by the Commons were in force, and that Magna Charta did extend moſt properly to the King. But he ſaid, 1. That ſome of them are in general words, and therefore conclude nothing, but are to be expounded by the precedents; and others that be more particular, are applied to the ſuggeſtions of ſubjects, and not to the King's command ſimply of itſelf. Hereunto it was anſwered, that the Statutes were as direct as could be, which appeareth by the reading of them; and that though ſome of them

ſpeak of ſuggeſtions of the ſubjects, yet others do not: and they that do, are as effectual, for that they are in equal reaſon, a commitment by the command of the King, being of as great force, when it moveth by a ſuggeſtion from a ſubject, as when the King taketh notice of it himſelf; the rather for that Kings ſeldom intermeddle with matters of this nature, but by information from ſome of their people.

2. Mr. Attorney objected, that per legem terræ in Magna Charta (which is the foundation of this queſtion) cannot be underſtood for proceſs of the law and original writs; for that in all criminal proceedings no original writ is uſed at all. But every Conſtable either for Felony or Breach of the Peace, or to prevent the breach of the Peace, may commit without proceſs or original writ, and it were hard the King ſhould not have the power of a Conſtable. And the Statute cited by the Commons, makes proceſs of the law and writ original, to be all one.

The anſwer of the Commons to this objection was, that they do not intend original writs only by law of the land, but all other legal proceſs, which comprehends the whole proceedings of law upon cauſe, other than trial by Jury, Judicium parium, unto which it is oppoſed. Thus much is imported ex vi termini out of the word proceſs; and by the true acceptation thereof in the Statutes which have been uſed by the Commons to maintain their declaration, and moſt eſpecially the Statutes of 25 Ed. III. cap. 4. where it appeareth that a man ought to be brought in to anſwer by the courſe of the law, having former mention of proceſs made by original writ.

And in 28 Ed. III. cap. 3. by the courſe of the law is rendred by due proceſs of the law. And 36 Ed. III. Rot. Parliamenti, num. 20. the petition of the Commons ſaith, that no man ought to be impriſoned by ſpecial command without indictment or other due proceſs to be made by the law. 37 Ed. III. cap. 18. calleth the ſame thing proceſs of the law; and 42 Ed. III. cap. 3. ſtileth it by due proceſs and writ original; where the conjunctive muſt be taken for a diſ-junctive, which change is ordinary in an expoſition of Statutes and Deeds, to avoid inconveniences, to make it ſtand with the reſt; and with reaſon, as it may be collected, by the law of the land in Magna Charta, by the courſe of the law in 25 Ed. III. by the due proceſs of law in 28 Ed. III. other due proceſs to be made by the law in 36 Ed. III. proceſs of the law in 37 Ed. III. and by due proceſs and writ original in 42 Ed. III. are meant one and the ſame thing; the latter of theſe Statutes referring always to the former, and that all of them import any due and regular proceedings of law upon a cauſe other than the Trial by Jury And this appeareth 10 Rep. 74. in the caſe of the Marſhalſea, and 11 Rep. 99. James Bagg's caſe, where it is underſtood of giving juriſdiction by Charter or Preſcription, which is the ground of a proceeding by courſe of law. And in Selden's Notes on Forteſcue, fol. 29. where it is expounded for law wager, which is likewiſe a Trial at law by the oath of the parties, differing from that by Jury. And it doth truly comprehend theſe and all other regular proceedings in law upon cauſe, which gives authority to the Conſtable to arreſt upon cauſe. And if this be not the true expoſition of theſe words per legem terræ, the King's Counſel were deſired to declare their meaning, which they never offered to do; and yet certainly theſe words were not put into the Statute, without ſome intention of conſequence.

And thereupon Mr. Serjeant Aſhley offered an interpretation of them thus; namely, That there were divers laws of this Realm, as the Common Law, the Law of the Chancery, the Eccleſiaſtical Law, the Law of the Admiralty, or Marine Law, the Law of Merchants, the Martial Law, and the Law of State; and that theſe words per legem terræ do extend to all theſe Laws.

To this it was anſwered, that we read of no Law of State, and that none of theſe laws can be meant there, ſave the Common Law, which is the principal and general law, and is always underſtood by way of excellency, when mention is made of the law of the land generally: and that though each of the other laws, which are admitted into this Kingdom by Cuſtom or Act of Parliament, may juſtly be called a law of the land, yet none of them can have the preheminence to be ſtiled the law of the land. And no Statute, Law-Book, or other Authority, printed or unprinted, could be ſhewn, to prove that the law of the land, being generally mentioned, was ever intended of any other than the Common Law; and yet even by theſe other laws, a man may not be committed without a cauſe expreſſed.

But it ſtandeth with the rule of other legal expoſitions, that per legem terræ muſt be meant the Common Law, which is the general and univerſal Law, by which men hold their Inheritances; and therefore if a man ſpeak of eſcuage generally, it is underſtood, as Littleton obſerveth, Sect. 99. of the incertain eſcuage, which is a Knight's ſervice tenure, for the defence of the Realm, by the body of the tenant in time of war; and not of certain eſcuage, which giveth only a contribution in money, and no perſonal ſervice.

And if a Statute ſpeak of the King's Courts of Record, it is meant only of the four at Weſtminſter by way of excellency, Coke's 6. Rep. 20. Gregory's caſe. So the Canoniſts by the Excommunication ſimply ſpoken, do intend the greater Excommunication. And the Emperor in his Inſtitutions ſaith, that the Civil Law being ſpoken generally, is meant of the Civil Law of Rome, though the Law of every City is a Civil Law; as when a man names the Poet, the Grecians underſtand Homer, the Latiniſts Virgil.

2. Admit per legem terræ extend to all the laws of the land, yet a man muſt not be committed by any of them, but by the due proceedings that are executed by thoſe laws, and upon a cauſe declared.

Again, it was urged, That the King was not bound to expreſs a cauſe of impriſonment, becauſe there may be in it matter of State, not fit to be revealed for a time, leſt the confederates thereupon make means to eſcape the hands of Juſtice. And therefore the Statutes cannot be intended to reſtrain all commitments, unleſs a cauſe be expreſſed; for that it would be very inconvenient and dangerous to the State, to publiſh the cauſe at the very firſt.

Hereunto it was replied by the Commons, That all danger and inconvenience may be avoided by declaring a general cauſe, as for Treaſon, Suſpicion of Treaſon, Miſpriſion of Treaſon, or Felony, without ſpecifying the particular; which can give no greater light to a confederate, than will be conjectured by the very apprehenſion upon the impriſonment, if nothing at all were expreſſed.

It was further alledged, That there was a kind of contradiction in the poſition of the Commons, when they ſay a party committed without a cauſe ſhewed, ought to be delivered or bailed; bailing being a kind of impriſonment; delivery, a total freeing.

To

To this it hath been anſwered, that it hath always been the diſcretion of the Judges, to give ſo much reſpect to a commitment by the command of the King, or the Privy-Council, (which are ever intended to be done in juſt and weighty cauſes,) that they will not preſently ſet them free, but bail them to anſwer, what ſhall be objected againſt them on his Majeſty's behalf; but if any other inferiour Officer do commit a man without ſhewing cauſe, they do inſtantly deliver him, as having no cauſe to expect their leiſure. So the delivery is applied to an impriſonment by the command of ſome mean miniſter of Juſtice; bailing, when it is done by the command of the King or his Council.

It was argued by Mr. Attorney, that bailing was a grace and favour of a Court of Juſtice, and that they may refuſe to do it.

This was agreed to be true in divers caſes; as where the cauſe appears to be for Felony or other crimes expreſſed, for that there is another way to diſcharge them in ſome convenient time by their Trial; and yet in theſe caſes, the conſtant practice hath been anciently and modernly to bail men: but where no cauſe of the impriſonment is returned, but the command of the King, there is no way to deliver ſuch perſon by Trial or otherwiſe, but that of the Habeas Corpus. And if they ſhould be then remanded, they might be perpetually impriſoned without any remedy at all; and conſequently a man that had committed no offence, might be in a worſe caſe than a great offender: for the latter ſhould have an ordinary Trial to diſcharge him, the other ſhould never be delivered.

It was further ſaid, that though the Statute of Weſtminſter 1. cap. 15. be a Statute which by way of proviſion did extend only to the Sheriff, yet the recital of that Statute touching the four caſes, wherein a man was not repleviable at the Common Law; namely, thoſe that were committed for the death of a man, by the command of the King, or of his Juſtices, or for the Foreſt; did declare that the Juſtices could not bail ſuch a one, and that repleviable and bailable were ſynonymous or all one: and that Stanford a Judge of great authority, doth expound it accordingly, (Stan. pl. Cor. 72.) and that neither the Statute nor he ſay repleviable by the Sheriff, but generally without reſtraint; and that if the Chief Juſtice commits a man, he is not to be inlarged by any other Court, as appeareth in the Regiſter.

To this it was anſwered, 1. That the recital of the body of the Statute, relateth to the Sheriff only, as appeareth by the very words. 2. That repleviable is to the Sheriff, for that the word imports no more; but a man committed by the Chief Juſtice, is bailable by the Court of King's-Bench. 3. That Stanford meaneth all of the Sheriff, or at leaſt he hath not ſufficiently expreſſed that he intended the Juſtices. 4. It was denied that repleviable and bailable were the ſame, for they differ in reſpect of the place where they are uſed, bail being in the King's Court of Record, repleviable before the Sheriff; and they are of ſeveral natures, repleviable being a letting at large upon ſureties, bailing being when one traditur in ballium, the bail are his Goalers and may impriſon him, and ſhall ſuffer body for body; which is not true of replevying by ſureties: and bail diffe reth from mainprize in this, that mainpriſe is an undertaking in a ſumcertain, bailing is to anſwer the condemnation in civil cauſes, and in criminal, body for body.

The reaſons and authorities in the firſt conference were then renewed, and no exceptions taken to any, ſave that in 22 Hen. VI. it doth not appear that the command of the King was by his mouth, which muſt be intended, or by his Council, which is all one, as is obſerved by Stanford, for the two words are, that a man is not repleviable by the Sheriff, who is committed by the Writ or the commandment of the King.

21 Edw. I. Rot. 2. dorſ. was cited by the King's Counſel; but it was anſwered, that it concerned the Sheriff of Lecieſterſhire only, and not the power of the Judges. 33 Hen. VI. the King's Attorney confeſſed, was nothing to the purpoſe; and yet that Book hath been uſually cited by thoſe that maintain the contrary to the declaration of the Commons. And therefore ſuch ſudden opinions as have been given thereupon, are not to be regarded, the foundation failing.

And where it was ſaid that the French of 36 Ed. III. Rot. Parliamenti, num. 9. which can receive no anſwer, did not warrant what was inferred thence; but that theſe words, ſans diſturbance mettre, ou arreſt fair, & le contre per ſpecial mandement ou en autre maniere, muſt be underſtood, that the Statutes ſhould be put in execution, without putting diſturbance, or making arreſt to the contrary by ſpecial command or in other manner; the Commons did utterly deny the interpretation given by the King's Counſel: and to juſtify their own, did appeal to all men that underſtood French. And upon the ſeven Statutes did conclude, that their declation remained an undoubted truth, not controlled by any thing ſaid to the contrary.

[The Proceedings againſt the Earl of Suffolk, 14 April, 1628*.

MR. Kerton acquainted the Houſe that the Earl of Suffolk had ſaid to ſome Gentlemen, That Mr. Selden had razed a Record, and deſerved to be hanged, for going about to ſet diviſion betwixt the King and his Subjects. And being demanded to whom the words were ſpoken, he was unwilling to name any, till upon the queſtion it was reſolved he ſhould nominate him. He then named Sir John Strangways; who was unwilling to ſpeak what he had heard from the Earl: but being commanded by the Houſe, and reſolved upon the queſtion, he confeſſed,

That upon Saturday laſt, he being in the Committee-Chamber of the Lords, the Earl of Suffolk called to him, and ſaid, Sir John, will you not hang Selden? To whom he ſaid, for what? The Earl replied; By God he hath razed a Record, and deſerves to be hanged †.

This the Houſe of Commons took as a great injury done to the whole Houſe, Mr. Selden being imployed by them in the Conference with the Lords in the great cauſe concerning the Liberty of the perſons of the ſubjects.

* This was Theopilus Earl of Suffolk, Son to James Earl of Suffolk, Lord-Treaſurer, Temp. Jac. I.

† Mr Selden,] I am called up to juſtify myſelf. I ſee the words charge me to have razed Records. I hope no man believes I ever did it. I cannot gueſs what this Lord means. I did deliver in whole Copies of divers Records examined by myſelf, and divers other Gentlemen of this Houſe. Theſe I deliver'd into the Lords Houſe; and the Clerk of the Crown brought in the Records of the Office before the Lords: I deſire that there may be a meſſage from this Houſe to the Lords, to make at the Bar there a Charge againſt the Lord that ſpoke thus; and I hope we ſhall have Juſtice. Ex MSS. Pymmii in Selden's Life, in his Works, Vol. p. 16.

The Houſe preſently ſent Sir Robert Philips with a meſſage to the Lords to this effect; he expreſſed the great care the Commons had upon all occaſions to maintain all mutual reſpect and correſpondency betwixt both Houſes: then he informed them of a great injury done by the Earl of Suffolk to the whole Houſe, and to Mr. Selden a particular Member thereof, who by their command had been imployed in the late conference with their Lordſhips: that the Houſe was very ſenſible thereof, and according to former precedents, made them truly acquainted with it, and demanded Juſtice againſt the Earl of Suffolk. He read the words, ſaying, they were ſpoken to Sir John Strangways, a Member of their Houſe.

After a ſhort ſtay, the Lords called for the Meſſenger, to whom the Lord-Keeper gave this anſwer; he ſignified the great deſire and care of their Lordſhips to maintain and increaſe the correſpondencies betwixt both Houſes, and as a teſtimony thereof they had partly taken into conſideration the charge: that the Earl of Suffolk, being a man of great place and honour, had voluntarily proteſted upon his Honour and Soul, that there paſſed no ſuch words as thoſe from him to Sir John Strangways; and the Lord-Keeper wiſhed that their Lordſhips ſpeedy proceedings in this buſineſs, might teſtify their love and good-will to the Commons Houſe.

The next day, being the 15th of April, Sir John Strangways made a proteſtation openly in the Houſe, wherein he avowed that (notwithſtanding the Earl's denial) he did ſpeak thoſe words poſitively unto him, and would maintain it any way fitting a Member of that Houſe, or a Gentleman of Honour.

They ordered that this proteſtation ſhould be entered into the Journal-book, and that a Committee ſhould take into conſideration what was fit for the Houſe to proceed to, for the juſtification of Sir John Strangways, and what was fitting to be done in this caſe, and to examine witneſſes of the proof of the words.

Upon the 17th day Sir John Elliot reported what the Committee had done; That they had ſent for and examined Sir Chriſtopher Nevil; who related, that upon Saturday being in the Lords Committee-Chamber, the Earl of Suffolk ſaid thus to him: Mr. Attorney hath cleared the buſineſs, and hath made the cauſe plain on the King's ſide; and further ſaid, Mr. Selden hath razed a Record, and hath deſerved to be hanged, and the lower Houſe ſhould do well to join with the higher in a petition to the King to hang him; and added as a reaſon, for Mr. Selden went about, and took a courſe to divide the King from his people: or words to that effect. And being asked whether he conceived that thoſe words of dividing the King from his people, had relation to the whole and general action of Mr. Selden before the Lords, or to the particular of razing a Record; he conceived they were referred to the general action.

They had examined one Mr. Littleton, who confeſſed he heard the Earl of Suffolk ſpeak to a Gentleman, whom he knew not, words to this effect, viz. That he would not be in Mr. Selden's coat for 10000 l. and that Mr. Selden deſerved to be hanged.

The ſecond part of this report concerned the particular of Sir John Strangways, wherein though the Committee found no witneſs to prove the words ſpoken to Sir John Strangways, yet there were many circumſtances which perſuaded them of the truth thereof.

1. That the ſame words in the ſame ſyllables were ſpoken to Sir Chriſtopher Nevil, and that the Earl as he called to him Sir John Strangways, ſo he called to him Sir Chriſtopher Nevil.

2. That the Earl of Suffolk called Sir John Strangways to him, and ſpake to him, was proved by Sir George Fane, and Sir Alexander St. John, at which time the Earl ſeemed full of that which he delivered.

3. That Sir John Strangways inſtantly after his diſcourſe with the Earl of Suffolk went to the Earl of Hertford, and delivered him the paſſages betwixt them, being the ſame related in the houſe.

4. From the unwillingneſs of Sir John Strangways, though called upon by the Houſe, to teſtify againſt the Earl, till it was reſolved by queſtion he ſhould do it: from a probability, that had not theſe words been ſpoken to himſelf, it is like he would have produced Sir Chriſtopher Nevil, from whom he alſo heard the ſame.

5. From the worth of the Gentleman, and his ingenious proteſtation in the Houſe, That he was ready to juſtify the truth of what he ſaid in any courſe the Houſe ſhould think meet, or was fit for a Gentleman of Honour.

Hereupon the Houſe reſolved upon the queſtion;

1. That the Earl of Suffolk, notwithſtanding his denial, had laid a moſt unjuſt and ſcandalous imputation upon Mr. Selden, a Member of the Houſe, being imployed in the ſervice of the Houſe, and therein upon the whole Houſe of Commons.

2. That this Houſe upon due examination is fully ſatisfied that Sir John Strangways, (notwithſtanding the Earl of Suffolk's denial) hath affirmed nothing but what is moſt true and certain.

3. That theſe particulars and additions be again preſented to the Lords, and the Earl of Suffolk be newly charged at the bar, and the Lords deſired to proceed in Juſtice againſt the Earl, and to inflict ſuch puniſhment upon him as an offence of ſo high a nature, being againſt the Houſe of Commons, doth deſerve.

Sir John Elliot was ſent with the meſſage to the Lords; who after a while returned this anſwer, That they had taken the meſſage into conſideration, and would further take it into due conſultation, and in convenient time would return an anſwer by Meſſengers of their own. But what was done in this affair, does not appear.]

MR. Noye, on the 16th of April, offered an anſwer to the inconveniences preſented by Mr. Attorney, which were four in number.

Firſt, where it was objected, that it was inconvenient to expreſs the cauſe, for fear of divulging the Arcana imperii, for hereby all may be diſcovered and abundance of Traitors never brought to Juſtice:

To this that learned man anſwered,

That the Judges by the intention of the Law are the King's Counſel, and the ſecrets may ſafely be committed to all, or ſome of them, who might adviſe whether they will bail him: and here is no danger to King, or ſubjects; for their oath will not permit them to reveal the ſecrets of the King, nor yet to detain the ſubjects long, if by Law he be to be bailed.

Secondly, for that objection of the children of Odonell, he laid this for a ground, that the King can do no wrong; but in caſes of extream neceſſity, we muſt yield ſometimes for the preſervation of the State, ubi unius damnum utilitate publica rependitur: he ſaid there was no truſt in the children of Traitors, no wrong done if they did tabefacere, or marceſcere in carcere. It is the ſame caſe of neceſſity, as when to avoid the burning of a Town, we are forced to pull down an honeſt man's houſe, or to compel a man to dwell by the ſea-ſide for defence or fortitude. Yet the King can do no wrong, for potentia juris eſt non injuria: Ergo the Act of the King, tho' to the wrong of another, is by the Law made no wrong; as if he commanded a perſon to be kept in priſon, yet he is reſponſable for his wrong: he quoted a book, 42. 6. Aſſ. Port.

Thirdly, the inſtance made of Weſtminſt. firſt, he ſaid there was a great difference between thoſe three, Mainpriſe, Bail, and Replevin. The Statute ſays, a man cannot be replevied: Ergo not bailed non ſequitur. Mainpriſe is under pain; Bail is body for body: but no pain is ever in Court to be declared, unleſs the party appears. Replevin is neither by ſurety nor bail; and Replevin is never in Court.

Fourthly, where it is ſaid that bail is ex gratia, he anſwers, that if the priſoner comes to Habeas Corpus, then it is not ex gratia, yet the Court may adviſe, but mark the words ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum prout curia conſideraverit. Now it is impoſſible the Judges ſhould do ſo, if no cauſe be expreſſed; for if they know no cauſe, he may bring the firſt, ſecond, third, and fourth Habeas Corpus, and ſo infinite, till he find himſelf a perpetual priſoner: ſo that no cauſe expreſſed, is worſe for a man, than the greateſt cauſe or villany that can be imagined. And thus far proceeded that learned Gentleman.

MR. Glanvile ſaid, That by favour of the Houſe of Commons, he had liberty to ſpeak, if opportunity were offered. He applied his anſwer to one particular of Mr. Attorney, who aſſigned to the King four great truſts: 1. of War, 2. Coins, 3. Denizens, 4. Pardons; it is aſſented to, that the King is truſted with all theſe four legal Prerogatives, but the argument followeth not, the King is truſted with many Prerogatives: Ergo in this non ſequitur non eſt ſufficiens enumeratio partium. He ſaid he could anſwer theſe particulars with two rules, whereof the firſt ſhould wipe off the firſt and the ſecond; and the other, the third and fourth.

The firſt rule is this: there is no fear of truſting the King with any thing, but the fear of ill Counſel: the King may eaſily there be truſted, where ill Counſel doth not engage both the King and ſubjects, as it doth in matter of War and Coin. If he miſcarry in the Wars, it is not always plectuntur Achivi, but he ſmarts equally with the people; if he abaſe his Coin, he loſeth more than any of his people: Ergo he may ſafely be truſted with the flowers of the Crown, War and Coin.

The ſecond rule he began was this, when the King is truſted to confer grace, it is one thing; but when he is truſted to infer an injury, it is another matter. The former power cannot by miſcounſelling, be brought to prejudice another, the latter may; if the King pardoneth a guilty man, he puniſheth not a good ſubject; if he denizen never ſo many ſtrangers, it is but damnum ſine injuria: we allow him a liberty to confer grace, but not without cauſe to infer puniſhment; and indeed he cannot do injury, for if he command to do a man wrong, the command is void, & actor fit author, and the actor becomes the wrong doer. Therefore the King may be ſafely truſted with War, Coin, Denizens, and Pardons, but not with a power to impriſon without expreſſion of cauſe, or limitation of time; as the Poet tells us, becauſe Libertas potius auro.

After theſe Debates, the Houſe of Peers called upon the Judges to anſwer the Charge of the Houſe of Commons, for their Judgment on the Habeas Corpus, brought in Mich. Term by the Gentlemen impriſoned for refuſing to ſubſcribe to the Loan.

The Anſwer of the Judges for Matter of Fact upon the Habeas Corpus, 21 April.

THE Chief-Juſtice ſaith, they are prepared to obey our command, but they deſire to be adviſed by us, whether they being ſworn upon penalty of forfeiting Body, Lands, and Goods, into the King's hands to give an account to him, may without Warrant do this.

The Duke ſaid, he had acquainted the King with the buſineſs, and for ought he knew he is well content therewith. But for better aſſurance, he hath ſent his brother of Angleſey to know his pleaſure.

Devonſhire. If a complaint be made by a mean man againſt the greateſt Officer in this place, he is to give an acount of his doings to this Houſe.

Biſhop of Lincoln. This motion proceeded from him, and ſo took it for clear, that there was an appeal from the Chancery to a higher Court than the King's-Bench, and that Court hath ever given an account of their doings.

The Lord Say. He wondred there ſhould be any queſtion made of this buſineſs, becauſe in his opinion this being the higheſt Court, did admit of no appeal.

The Preſident. The Judges did not do this by way of appeal, but as the moſt common way for them, this being a matter concerning the King's Prerogative.

Lord Say. If they will not declare themſelves, we muſt take into conſideration the point of our privilege.

The Duke. This was not done by the Judges, as fearing to anſwer, but of reſpect to the King. And now his brother was come with anſwer from the King, that they might proceed.

Order was taken that this paſſage ſhould not be entred into the Journal-Book. And ſo Judge WHITLOCK ſpake.

MY Lords, we are by your appointment here ready to clear any aſperſion of the Houſe of Commons in their late preſentment upon the King's-Bench, that the Subject was wounded in this judgment there lately given. If ſuch a thing were, my Lords, your Lordſhips, not they, have the power to queſtion and judge the ſame. But, my Lords, I ſay there was no judgment given, whereby either the Prerogative might be inlarged, or the Right of the Subject trenched upon. It is true, my Lords, in Michaelmas Term laſt, four Gentlemen petitioned for an Habeas Corpus, which they obtained, and Counſel was aſſigned unto them; the return was per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis, which likewiſe was made unto us under the hands of eighteen privy Counſellors. Now, my Lords, if we had delivered them preſently upon this, it muſt muſt have been, becauſe the King did not ſhew the cauſe, wherein we ſhould have judged the King had done wrong; and this is beyond our knowledge, for he might have committed them for other matters than we could have imagined. But they might ſay, thus they might have been kept in priſon all their days: I anſwer no, but we did remit them, that we might better adviſe of the matter; and they the next day might have had a new Writ, if they had pleaſed. But they ſay, we ought not to have denied bail: I anſwer, if we had done ſo, it muſt needs have reflected upon the King, that he had unjuſtly impriſoned them. And it appears in Dyer 2 Eliz. that divers Gentlemen being committed, and requiring Habeas Corpus, ſome were bailed, others remitted: whereby it appears, much is left to the diſcretion of the Judges.

For that which troubleth ſo much, remittitur quouſque, this, my Lords, was only, (as I ſaid before) to take time what to do; and whereas they will have a difference betwixt remittitur and remittitur quouſque, my Lords, I confeſs I can find none; but theſe are new inventions to trouble old Records. And herein, my Lords, we have dealt with knowledge and underſtanding; for had we given a Judgment, the party muſt thereupon have reſted. Every Judgment muſt come to an iſſue, in matter of fact, or demur in point of Law; here is neither, therefore no Judgment.

As to endavouring to have a Judgment entered, it is true, Mr. Attorney preſſed the ſame for his Maſter's Service; but we being ſworn to do right betwixt the King and his Subjects, commanded the Clerk to make no entry, but according to the old form, and the rule was given by the Chief-Juſtice alone. I have ſpent my time in this Court, and I ſpeak confidently, I did never ſee nor know by any Record, that upon ſuch a return as this, a man was bailed, the King not firſt conſulted with in ſuch a caſe as this.

The Commons Houſe do not know what letters and commands we received, for theſe remain in our Court, and were not viewed by them: for the reſt of the matters preſented by the Houſe of Commons, they were not in agitation before us, whether the King may commit, and how long he may detain a man committed. Therefore having anſwered ſo much as concerneth us, I deſire your Lordſhips good conſtructions of what hath been ſaid.

JUdge Jones ſaid, he was here to deliver before us what judgment was given before them concerning the Habeas Corpus: he anſwered, no judgment was given, and the matter of fact was ſuch as my brother delivered unto you yeſterday. Theſe four Gentlemen were committed to the Fleet, Gatehouſe, and Marſhal of the Houſhold. Four returns were made upon the Writs, and every one of them had a Counſellor appointed, who had copies of the returns. A rule was granted, their Counſel heard, and exception taken to the return, becauſe it did not ſhew cauſe of their caption.

Theſe were of no force in the opinion of the Judges. The next exception was, becauſe no cauſe of their commitment was ſhewed, which the Judges held to be all one in point of Law. Then, my Lords, they alledged many Precedents and Statutes of themſelves, which the King's Attorney anſwered; That perſons committed by the King, or Council, were never bailed, but his pleaſure was firſt known.

We agreed at the Chamber of the Chief-Juſtice, that all the Statutes alledged are in force; but whether we ſhould bail them or no, was the queſtion, therefore we remitted them quouſque. After which, Mr. Attorney required a judgment might be entred: I commanded the Clerk, he ſhould not ſuffer any ſuch thing to be done, becauſe we would be better adviſed.

But ſome will ſay, our Act is otherwiſe: I anſwer no; for we have done no more than we do upon an ordinary Writ, when we purpoſe to be better adviſed, and that was only an interlocutory order. But, my Lords, put the caſe a Habeas Corpus ſhould be granted for one that is committed by the Houſe of Commons, would they (think you) take it well he ſhould be bailed at his firſt coming to the Court? I think they would not, and I think the King would have done ſo in this caſe. Now, my Lords, there is a petition of Right, and a petition of Grace: to be bailed, is a matter of Grace; therefore, if a man be brought upon an Habeas Corpus, and not bailed, he cannot ſay the Court hath done him any wrong. I have now ſerved ſeven years a Judge in this Court, and my conſcience beareth me witneſs, that I have not wronged the ſame; I have been thought ſometimes too forward for the Liberty of the Subject. I am myſelf Liber Homo, my Anceſtors gave their voice for Magna Charta. I enjoy that Houſe ſtill, which they did; I do not now mean to draw God's wrath upon my poſterity; and therefore I will neither advance the King's Prerogative, nor leſſen the Liberty of the Subject, to the danger of either King or People. This is my profeſſion before God and your Lordſhips.

JUdge Dodderidge ſaid, It is no more fit for a Judge to decline to give an account of his doings, than for a Chriſtian of his Faith. God knoweth, I have endeavoured always to keep a good conſcience; for a troubled one, who can bear? The Kingdom holds of none but God, and Judgments do not paſs privately in Chambers, but publick in Court, where every one may hear, which cauſeth Judgment to be given with maturity. Your Lordſhips have heard the particulars delivered by my brethren, how that Counſel being aſſigned to thoſe four Gentlemen, in the latter end of Michaelmas Term their cauſe received hearing; and upon conſideration of the Statutes and Records, we found ſome of them to be according to the good old Law of Magna Charta; but we thought, that they did not come ſo cloſe to this caſe, as that bail ſhould be thereupon preſently granted. My Lords, the Habeas Corpus conſiſts of three parts, the Writ, the Return upon the Writ or Schedule, and the Entry or Rule reciting the Habeas Corpus; and the Return, together with the opinion of the Court, either a remittitur, or traditur in Ballium. In this caſe a remittitur was granted; which we did, that we might take better adviſement upon the caſe, and upon the remittitur (my Lords) they might have had a new Writ the next day; and I wiſh they had, becauſe it may be they had ſeen more, and we had been eaſed of a great labour. And, my Lords, when the Attorney, upon the remittitur preſſed an entry, we all ſtraightly charged the Clerk that he ſhould make no other entry than ſuch as our Predeceſſors had uſually made in like caſes: for the difference (my Lords) betwixt remittitur and remittitur quouſque, I could never yet find any. I have now ſat in this Court fifteen years, and I ſhould know ſomething; ſurely if I had gone in a mill ſo long, ſome duſt would cleave to my clothes. I am old, and have one foot in the grave, therefore I will look to the better part, as near as I can. But omnia habere in memoria, & in nullo errare, divinum potiùs eſt quam humanum.

THE Lord Chief-Juſtice, Sir Nicholas Hyde, ſaid, He ſhould not ſpeak with confidence, unleſs he might ſtand right in the opinion of the Houſe; and proteſted what he ſpake the day before, was not ſaid by him with any purpoſe to trench upon the Privileges of this Houſe, but out of that reſpect which by his place he thought he owed to the King. He ſaid concerning the point he was to ſpeak of, that he would not trouble the Lords with things formerly repeated, wherein he concurred with his brethren. He ſaid, if it were true, the King might not commit, they had done wrong in not partly delivering; for, my Lords, (ſaith he) theſe Statutes and good Laws being all in force, we meant not to trench upon any of them, moſt of them being Commentaries upon Magna Charta: but I know not any Statute that goeth ſo far, that the King may not commit. Therefore juſtly we think, we delivered the interpretation thereof to that purpoſe: for, my Lords, Lex terræ is not to be found in this Statute, they gave me no example, neither was there any cauſe ſhewed in the Return. A precedent (my Lords) that hath run in a ſtorm, doth not much direct us in point of Law, and Records are the beſt teſtimonies. Thoſe precedents they brought, being read, we ſhewed them, wherein they were miſtaken; if we have erred, erramus cum patribus, and they can ſhew no precedent, but that our Predeceſſors have done as we have done, ſometimes bailing, ſometimes remitting, ſometimes diſcharging. Yet we do never bail any committed by the King, or his Council, till his pleaſure be firſt known. Thus did the Lord Chief-Juſtice Coke in Raynard's caſe. They ſay, this would have been done if the King had not written; but why then was the letter read and publiſhed, and kept; and why was the Town-Clerk ſent carefully to enquire, (becauſe the letter ſo directed) whether theſe men offered for bail, were Subſidy men? The letter ſheweth alſo, that Beckwith was committed for ſuſpicion of being acquainted with the Gunpowder-Treaſon, but no proof being produced, the King left him to be bailed.

The Earl of* WARWICK'S Speech, 21 April, 1628.

MY Lords, I will obſerve ſomething out of the Law wherein this Liberty of the Subject's Perſon is founded, and ſome things out of precedents which have been alledged. For the Law of Magna Charta, and the reſt concerning theſe points, they are acknowleged by all to be of force; and that they were to ſecure the ſubjects from wrongful impriſonment, as well, or rather more concerning the King, than the ſubject. Why then, beſides the grand Charter, and thoſe ſix other Acts of Parliament, in the very point, we know that Magna Charta hath been at leaſt thirty times confirmed; ſo that upon the matter we have ſix or ſeven and thirty Acts of Parliament to confirm this Liberty, although it was made matter of deriſion the other day in this Houſe.

One is that of 36 E. III. N°. 9. and another in the ſame year, N°. 20. not printed, but yet as good as thoſe that are; and that of 42 E. III. cap. 3. ſo expreſs in the point, eſpecially the Petition of the Commons that year; which was read by Mr. Littleton with the King's anſwer ſo full, and free from all exception, to which I refer your Lordſhips, that I know not how any thing in the world can be more plain. And therefore, if in Parliament ye ſhould make any doubt of that which is ſo fully confirmed in Parliament, and in a caſe ſo clear go about by new gloſſes to alter the old and good Law, we ſhall not only forſake the ſteps of our Anceſtors, who in caſes of ſmall importance would anſwer nolumus mutare leges Angliæ; but we ſhall yield up and betray our Right in the greateſt inheritance the ſubjects of England have, and that is the Laws of England. And truly I wonder how any man can admit of ſuch a gloſs upon the plain Text, as ſhould overthrow the force of the Law: for whereas the Law of Magna Charta is, that no Freeman ſhall be impriſoned, but by Lawful Judgment of his Peers, or the Law of the Land; therefore that the King hath power to commit without cauſe, is a ſenſe not only expreſly contrary to other Acts of Parliament, and thoſe eſpecially formerly cited, but againſt common ſenſe. For Mr. Attorney confeſſeth this Law concerns the King; why then, where the Law ſaith the King ſhall not commit, but by the Law of the Land, the meaning muſt be, as Mr. Attorney would have it, that the King muſt not commit but at his own pleaſure. And ſhall we think, that our Anceſtors were ſo fooliſh, to hazard their perſons and eſtates, and labour ſo much to get a Law, and to have it thirty times confirmed, that the King might not commit his Subjects but at his own pleaſure? and if he did commit any of his ſubjects without a cauſe ſhewn, then he muſt lie during pleaſure, than which nothing can be imagined more ridiculous, and contrary to true reaſon.

For the precedents, I obſerve, that there hath been many ſhewn, by which it appears to me evidently, that ſuch as have been committed by the King's Council, they have been delivered upon Habeas Corpus, and that conſtantly. It is true, that ſome precedents were brought on the King's part, that when ſome of theſe perſons deſired to be delivered by Habeas Corpus, the King, or his Council ſignified his Majeſty's pleaſure that they ſhould be delivered, or the King's Attorney hath come into the Court and related the King's command: but this ſeems to make for the Subject; for it being in his Majeſty's power to deliver them, who by his ſpecial command were impriſoned, may not we well think, that his Majeſty would rather at that time have ſtayed their deliverance by Law, than furthered it with his letters; and made the priſoners rather beholden to him for his grace and mercy, than to the Judges for Juſtice, had not his Majeſty known that at that time, they ought to have been delivered by Law? I think no man would imagine, a wiſe King would have ſuffered his Grace and Prerogative (if any ſuch Prerogative were) to be ſo continually queſtioned; and his Majeſty and his Council ſo far from commanding the Judges not to proceed to deliver the priſoner by them committed, without cauſe ſhewn, as that on the other ſide ſide, which is all the force of theſe precedents, the King and the Council ſignified to the Judges, that they ſhould proceed to deliver the parties. Certainly if the King had challenged any ſuch Prerogative, that a perſon committed, without any cauſe ſhewn, ought not to be delivered by the Judges without his conſent, it would have appeared by one precedent, or other, amongſt all that have been produced, that his Majeſty would have made ſome claim to ſuch a Prerogative. But it appears to the contrary, that in many of theſe caſes, the King or his Council did never interpoſe; and where they did, it was always in affirmation and incouragement to that Court to proceed. And beſides, the writing of letters from his Majeſty to the Judges to do Juſtice to his Majeſty's Subjects, may with as good reaſon be interpreted, that without thoſe Letters they might not do Juſtice: alſo the King ſignified his willingneſs, that ſuch and ſuch perſons, which were committed by him, ſhould be delivered; therefore they could not be delivered without it, which is a ſtrange reaſon. So that finding the Laws ſo full, ſo many, and ſo plain in the point, and finding, that whenever any were committed, without cauſe ſhewn, and brought their Habeas Corpus, they were delivered, and no command ever given to the contrary, or claim made on the King's part to any ſuch Prerogative: I may ſafely conclude, as the Houſe of Commons have done; and if any one precedent, or two of late can be ſhewn, that the Judges have not delivered the priſoners ſo committed, I think it is their fault, and to be inquired of. But contrary, it ſeems to me to be an undoubted Liberty of the Subject, that if he be committed without cauſe, or without cauſe ſhewn, yet he may have ſome ſpeedy courſe to bring himſelf to trial, either to juſtify his own innocency, or to receive puniſhment according to his fault: for God forbid, that an innocent man by the Laws of England ſhould be put in worſe caſe, than the moſt grievous malefactors are; which muſt needs be, if this ſhould be, that if a cauſe be ſhewed, he may have his trial; but if none, he muſt lie and pine in priſon during pleaſure. Mr. Serjeant Aſhley, the other day, told your Lordſhips of the Emblem of a King, but by his leave made wrong uſe of it. For a King bears in one hand the Globe, and in the other the golden Scepter, the types of Sovereignty and Mercy, but the Sword of Juſtice is ever carried before him by a Miniſter of Juſtice; which ſhews, Subjects may have their remedies for injuſtice done, and appeals to higher powers: for the Laws of England are ſo favourable to their Princes, as they can do no Injuſtice.

Therefore I will conclude, as all diſputes I hold do, Magna eſt veritas & prævalebit; ſo I make no doubt, we living under ſo good a Prince as we do, when this is repreſented unto him, he will anſwer us, Magna eſt Charta & prævalebit.

From this time to the 25th of the ſame month, the Houſe of Commons in a grand Committee ſpent moſt of their time in debate about Martial Law, and part thereof in giving the Lords a meeting at two conferences, concerning their reſolves, in order to a Petition of Right, tranſmitted by the Commons to their Lordſhips.

Friday, 25th of April, 1628. the Lords had a conference with the Commons, where the Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (Dr. George Abbot*) ſpake as follows.*

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons;

THE ſervice of the King and ſafety of the Kingdom do call on us my Lords, to give all convenient expedition, to diſpatch ſome of theſe great and weighty buſineſſes before us. For the better effecting whereof, my Lords have thought fit to let you know, that they do in general agree with you, and doubt not, but you will agree with us, to the beſt of your power, to maintain and ſupport the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and the fundamental Liberties of the Subject: for the particulars which may hereafter fall in debate, they have given me in charge to let you know, That what hath been preſented by you unto their Lordſhips, they have laid nothing of it by, they are not out of love with any thing, that you have tendred unto them; they have voted nothing, neither are they in love with any thing proceeding from themſelves: for that, which we ſhall ſay and propoſe unto you, is out of an intendment to invite you to a mutual and free conference, that you with confidence may come to us, and we with confidence may ſpeak with you; ſo that we may come to a concluſion of thoſe things, which we both unanimouſly deſire.

We have reſolved of nothing, deſigned or determined nothing, but deſire to take you with us, praying help from you as you have done from us.

My Lords have thought of ſome Propoſitions, which they have ordered to be read here, and then left with you in writing, That if it ſeem good to you, we may uniformly concur for the ſubſtance; and if you differ, that you would be pleaſed to put out, add, alter, or diminiſh, as you ſhall think fit, that ſo we may come the better to the end, that we do both ſo deſirouſly embrace.

Then the five Propoſitions following were read by the Clerk of the upper Houſe.

1. THAT his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, That the good old Law called Magna Charta, and the ſix Statutes conceived to be declarations and explanations of that Law, do ſtill ſtand in force to all intents and purpoſes.

2. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, That according to Magna Charta, and the Statutes aforenamed, as alſo according to the moſt ancient Cuſtoms and Laws of this Land, every free Subject of this Realm hath a fundamental Propriety in his Goods, and a fundamental Liberty of his Perſon.

3. That his Majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to declare, That it is his royal pleaſure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful Subjects, all their ancient, ſeveral, juſt Liberties, Privileges, and Rights, in as ample and beneficial manner to all intents and purpoſes, as their Anceſtors did enjoy the ſame, under the Government of the beſt of his moſt noble Progenitors.

4. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, for the good content of his Loyal Subjects, and for the ſecuring them from future fear, That in all caſes within the cognizance of the Common-Law concerning the Liberties of the Subject, his Majeſty would proceed according to the Common-Law of this Land, and according to the Laws eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, and in no other manner or wiſe.

5. As touching his Majeſty's Royal Prerogative, intrinſical to his Sovereignty, and intruſted him withal from God, ad communem totius populi ſalutem, & non ad deſtructionem; his Majeſty would reſolve not to uſe or divert the ſame, to the prejudice of any of his loyal people, in the propriety of his goods, or liberty of their Perſons. And in caſe, for the ſecurity of his Majeſty's Royal Perſon, the common ſafety of his People, or the peaceable government of this Kingdom, his Majeſty ſhall find juſt cauſe for reaſon of State to impriſon or reſtrain any man's perſon, his Majeſty would graciouſly declare, That within a convenient time he ſhall, and will expreſs the cauſe of the commitment or reſtraint, either general or ſpecial; and upon a cauſe ſo expreſſed, will leave him immediately to be tryed according to the common juſtice of the Kingdom.

After the reading of the Propoſitions, the Archbiſhop ſaid;

This is but a Model to be added unto, altered, or diminiſhed, as in your reaſons and wiſdoms ye ſhall thihk fit, after ye have communicated the ſame to the reſt of the Members of the Houſe.

To this Speech, Sir Dudley Diggs, it being at a free conference in behalf of the Commons, made this reply.

MY Lords, it hath pleaſed Almighty God many ways to bleſs the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, now aſſembled in Parliament, with great comfort and ſtrong hopes, that this will prove as happy a Parliament, as ever was in England. And in their conſultations for the ſervice of his Majeſty, and the ſafety of this Kingdom, our ſpecial comfort and ſtrong hopes have riſen from the continued good reſpect, which your Lordſhips ſo nobly have been pleaſed to ſhew unto them; particularly at this preſent, in your ſo honorable profeſſion to agree with them in general, in deſiring to maintain and ſupport the fundamental Laws and Liberties of England.

The Commons have commanded me in like ſort, to aſſure your Lordſhips they have been, are, and will be, as ready to propugn the juſt Prerogative of his Majeſty, of which in all their Arguments, Searches of Records, and Reſolutions, they have been moſt careful, according to that which formerly was, and now again is proteſted by them.

Another noble argument of your honorable diſpoſition towards them is expreſſed in this, That you are pleaſed to expect no preſent anſwer from them, who are (as your Lordſhips in your great wiſdoms, they doubt not, have conſidered) a great Body that muſt adviſe upon all new propoſitions, and reſolve upon them before they can give anſwer, according to the antient order of their Houſe. But it is manifeſt in general (God be thanked for it) there is a great concurrence of affection to the ſame end in both Houſes, and ſuch good harmony, that I intreat your Lordſhips leave to borrow a compariſon from nature, or natural philoſophy: As two Lutes well ſtrung and tuned brought together, if one be play'd on, little ſtraws and ſticks will ſtir upon the other, though it lie ſtill; ſo though we have no power to reply, yet theſe things ſaid and propounded, cannot but work in our hearts, and we will faithfully report theſe paſſages to our Houſe, from whence in due time (we hope) your Lordſhips ſhall receive a contentful anſwer.

Mr. Selden's Speech, about the five Propoſitions ſent from the Lords to the Houſe of Commons, April 26, 1628.

OUR Debate is now, how we like of the propoſitions. Ours were reſolutions of Law, and no man can make queſtion of them. And as we are conſtant, ſo I hope they of other places that have weighed them, are of the ſame mind with us. But now their Lordſhips laying them by, propound what they would have to be Law. As they may ſpeak to what comes from us, ſo may we to what comes from them, and they did invite us thereto. I think there is not one of the five fit to be deſired and aſked. The firſt three are not fit, for there is no uſe of them in theſe great queſtions. The fourth we have already, and the fifth is not fit to be had at all. The firſt is, to declare that Magna Charta and the ſix Statutes, conceived to be declarations and explanations of that Law, do ſtill ſtand in force to all intents and purpoſes. Conſider what it is we aſk: Who doubts whether they ſtand in force or no? Indeed ſome have publiſhed that Magna Charta is but a Charter, and no Law. But it is an Act of Parliament; and let men ſpeak what they will, that was the faſhion of Statutes till printing came in. The Statutes were ſent down in the King's name to be proclaimed, and he prefixed his name, and this was till about Hen. VI. Alſo the body of Magna Charta is, that it is conſented to by all the Earls, &c. and for the aſſent there was a fifteenth granted, and clearly that cannot be without an Act of Parliament: and ſo conſtant it is, that all elſe in it is to this day put in execution. In former Parliaments, by thirty at leaſt, it was confirmed, but it was not of neceſſity, and yet they are ſurer than this declaration you will now add. For the ſecond, that his Majeſty will declare that every Subject hath a Propriety in his goods, and Liberty of his perſon; they that drew this might mean ſomewhat more than I underſtand: I know not what we gain. Who doubts of our propriety? I never heard it denied, but in the pulpit, which is of no weight. For the third, that his Majeſty will confirm all juſt liberties; none can tell what this will produce. It is not fit we trouble his Majeſty with it. The fourth is not fit to be aſked; That in all caſes within the cognizance of the common Law concerning the Liberties of his Subjects, his Majeſty would proceed according to the common Law. I conceive his Majeſty never proceeded but according to Law. It may be there were commitments, yet the Courts of Juſtice were open for the parties to ſeek Juſtice. And if any thing be done againſt the Law there, it is the fault of them that ſit there. So we ſhall take it. But yet his Majeſty hath done nothing againſt the Law. For the fifth, it is not fit to be had, and therefore not fit to be aſked. If we aſk it Parliamentarily, we ſhall have a Law to that ſenſe, and ſo we ſhall deſtroy our fundamental Liberties, which we have already reſolved. Now a convenient time muſt be ſet down. In former times there was no need of ſuch innovations; for ſuch Law of State, in a convenient time every man was to be delivered by Law. If they were ſo wiſe then to hold it needleſs, why is it now neceſſary? And for convenient time; what is convenient time? Who ſhall judge of it, but the Judges? And ſo they now ſhall have the power of the Lords, and of the Council. Alſo now we deſire in ſome caſes the Prerogative, &c. I would fain ſee if any perſon may not be committed at pleaſure by this clauſe, and no man is exempted. At this little gap every man's Liberty may in time go out.

The Commons were not ſatisfied with theſe propoſitions, which were conceived to choak the Petition of Right, then under conſideration, but demurred upon them.

Monday, 28 April. The Lord Keeper ſpake to both Houſes of Parliament by the King's command, who was then preſent.

MY Lords, and ye the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, ye cannot but remember the great and important Affairs, concerning the ſafety both of State and Religion, declared firſt from his Majeſty's own mouth, to be the cauſes of the aſſembling of this Parliament; the ſenſe whereof, as it doth daily increaſe with his Majeſty, ſo it ought to do, and his Majeſty doubts not, but it doth ſo with you, ſince the danger increaſeth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the Enemy.

Yet his Majeſty doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occaſioned by the Debate, which hath ariſen in both Houſes touching the Liberty of the Subject; in which, as his Majeſty takes in good part the purpoſe and intent of the Houſes, ſo clearly and frequently profeſſed, that they would not diminiſh or blemiſh his royal and juſt Prerogative, ſo he preſumes, that ye will all confeſs it a point of extraordinary grace and juſtice in him, to ſuffer it to reſt ſo long in diſpute without interruption. But now his Majeſty, conſidering the length of time which it hath already taken, and fearing nothing ſo much as any future loſs of that, whereof every hour and minute is ſo precious; and foreſeeing, that the ordinary way of Debate, tho' never ſo carefully huſbanded, muſt, in regard of the form of both Houſes, neceſſarily take more time than the affairs of Chriſtendom can permit; his Majeſty, out of his great princely care, hath thought of this expedient to ſhorten the buſineſs, by declaring the clearneſs of his own heart and intention: and therefore hath commanded me to let you know, That he holdeth the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other ſix Statutes inſiſted upon for the Subject's Liberty, to be all in force, and aſſures you, that he will maintain all his Subjects in the juſt freedom of their Perſons, and ſafety of their Eſtates; and that he will govern according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and that ye ſhall find as much ſecurity in his Majeſty's Royal word and promiſe, as in the ſtrength of any Law ye can make; ſo that hereafter ye ſhall never have cauſe to complain. The concluſion is, That his Majeſty prayeth God, who hath hitherto bleſſed this Kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you this day, to make the ſucceſs thereof happy, both to King and People: and therefore he deſires, that no doubt or diſtruſt may poſſeſs any man, but that ye will all proceed ſpeedily and unanimouſly to the buſineſs.

The Commons being returned from the Lords Houſe, Mr. Secretary Cook perſuaded them to comply with the King.

His Majeſty, ſaid he, puts us in mind of the great important affairs of the State, and of his ſenſe thereof, that by effluxion of time increaſeth in him, and he doubts not but that it doth increaſe in us. Ye ſee his Majeſty's moderation in the interpretation of all our actions; he ſaith, that he hopes we have the ſame ſenſe he hath, he is pleaſed to conſider of the occaſion of expence of time, that grew from the debates in both Houſes. We ſee how indulgent he is, that however the affairs of Chriſtendom are great, yet he omits not this, nay, he takes in good part our proceedings and our declarations, that we will not impeach the Prerogative: alſo his Majeſty preſumes that we will confeſs, that he hath uſed extraordinary grace, in that he hath endured diſpute ſo long, he acknowledgeth it Juſtice to ſtand as we have done.

Further, out of a Princely care of the Publick, he is careful no more time be loſt; and becauſe he ſees ſome extraordinary courſe to be taken to ſatisfy us, he obſerves, that in the form of the Debate, ſuch length is required, as the nature of the buſineſs will not endure. It is to be preſumed, that his Government will be according to the Law: We cannot but remember what his Father ſaid, He is no King, but a Tyrant, that governs not by Law; but this Kingdom is to be governed by the Common Law, and his Majeſty aſſures us ſo much; the interpretation is left to the Judges, and to his great Council, and all is to be regulated by the Common Law. I mean not Magna Charta only, for that Magna Charta was part of the Common Law, and the antient Law of this Kingdom; all our difference is in the application of this Law, and how this Law, with difference, is derived into every Court. I conceive there are two rules, the one of braſs, that is rigid, and will not bend, and that is the Law of the King's-Bench, this Law will not bend; and when it lights on Subjects fitting, if it do not bend, it is unjuſt: and there comes in the Law of Chancery and Equity; this is application of Law in private mens cauſes, when it comes to Meum & Tuum. And thus the general government of caſes, with relation to the common State of the Kingdom, is from the Council-board, and there they are to vary from the Law of the Kingdom; ſuppoſe it be in time of Dearth, propriety of Goods may in that time be forced, and be brought to the Market: We ſaw the experience of it in Coals in London, and the Council-Board cauſed them to be brought forth and ſold. In a time of Peſtilence men may be reſtrained: If a Schiſm be like to grow in a Church, the State will inquire after the favourers of it: If there be fear of an invaſion, and it be incouraged by hope of a Party among us, it is in the power of the government to reſtrain men to their Houſes.

In the compoſure of theſe things, there is great difference: What differences have been between the Courts of Chancery and King's-Bench? It is hard to put true difference between the King's Prerogative and our Liberties. His Majeſty ſaw expence of time would be prejudicial; it pleaſed God to move his Majeſty by a divine hand to ſhew us a way to clear all our difficulties, let us attend to all the parts of it; there be five degrees, and there is more aſſurance than we could have by any Law whatſoever. His Majeſty declares, that Magna Charta and the other Statutes are in force: This is not the firſt time that the Liberty of the Subject was infringed, or was in debate and confirmed; all times thought it ſafe, that when they came to a Negative of power, it was hard to keep Government and Liberty together; but his Majeſty ſtopped not there, but according to the ſenſe of theſe Laws, that he will govern his ſubjects in their juſt Liberties, he aſſures us our Liberties are juſt, they are not of grace, but of right; nay, he aſſures us, he will govern us according to the Laws of the Realm, and that we ſhall find as much ſecurity in his Majeſty's promiſe, as in any Law we can make; and whatſoever Law we ſhall make, it muſt come to his Majeſty's allowance; and if his Majeſty find cauſe in his Government, he may not put life to it: We daily ſee all Laws are broken, and all Laws will be broke for the publick Good, and the King may pardon all offenders; his Majeſty did ſee, that the beſt way to ſettle all at unity, is to expreſs his own heart: The King's heart is the beſt guider of his own promiſe, his promiſe is bound with his own heart. What Prince can expreſs more care and wiſdom?

Laſtly, he ſaith, That hereafter ye ſhall never have the like cauſe to complain: may we not think the breach is made up? Is not his Majeſty engaged in his Royal word?

The concluſion is full of weight: and he prays God, that as God hath bleſſed this Kingdom, and put it into his heart to come amongſt us, ſo to make this day ſucceſsful. The wrath of a King is like the roaring of a Lion, and all Laws with his wrath are to no effect; but the King's favour is like the dew upon the graſs, there all will proſper; and God made the inſtruments to unite all hearts.

His Majeſty having thus diſcharged himſelf, he prays us to proceed to the buſineſs, that ſo much concerns him. As his Majeſty hath now ſhewed himſelf the beſt of Kings, let us acknowledge his Majeſty's goodneſs, and return to that union which we all deſire.

But this Motion was not received with general acceptation; and Sir Benjamin Rudyard replied to it.

WE are now upon a great buſineſs, and the manner of handling it may be as great as the buſineſs itſelf. I need not tell you, that Liberty is a precious thing, for every man may ſet his own price upon it, and he that doth not value it, deſerves to be valued accordingly. For my own part, I am clear without ſcruple, that what we have reſolved, is according to the Law; and if any Judge in England were of a contrary opinion, I am ſure we ſhould have heard of him e'er now. Without all queſtion, the very point, ſcope, and drift of Magna Charta was, to reduce the Regal to a Legal power, in matter of Impriſonment, or elſe it had not been worthy ſo much contending for.

But there have been precedents brought to prove the practice and interpretation of the Law. I confeſs I have heard many precedents of utility and reſpect, but none at all of Truth, or of Law: certainly there is no Court of Juſtice in England, that will diſcharge a priſoner committed by the King, Rege inconſulto, without acquainting the King; yet this good manners was never made, or mentioned as a legal part of the delivery.

It is objected, that the King ought to have a truſt left and depoſited in him, God forbid but he ſhould: and I ſay that it is impoſſible to take it from him, for it lies not in the wit of man to deviſe ſuch a Law as ſhould be able to comprehend all particulars, all accidents, but that extraordinary caſes muſt happen, which when they come, if they be diſpoſed of for the common good, there will be no Law againſt them, yet muſt the Law be general, for otherwiſe admiſſions and exceptions will fret, and eat out the Law to nothing. God himſelf has conſtituted a general Law of nature, to govern the ordinary courſe of things, he hath made no Law for miracles; yet there is this obſervation of them, that they are rather præter naturam, than contra naturam, and always propter bonos fines: For Kings Prerogatives are rather beſides the Law, than againſt it; and when they are directed to right ends for the publick good, they are not only concurring Laws, but even Laws in ſingularity and excellency.

But to come nearer, Mr. Speaker, let us conſider where we are now, what ſteps we have gone and gained; the King's learned Council have acknowledged all the Laws to be ſtill in force, the Judges have not allowed any judgment againſt theſe Laws; the Lords alſo have confeſſed, that the Laws are in full ſtrength; they have further retained our reſolutions intire, and without prejudice.

All this hitherto is for our advantage; but above all, his Majeſty has this day (himſelf being publickly preſent) declared by the mouth of the Lord-Keeper, before both the Houſes, That Magna Charta, and the other ſix Statutes, are ſtill in force; That he will maintain his Subjects in the Liberties of their Perſons, and Proprieties of their Goods; That he will govern them according to the Laws of the Kingdom; this is a ſolemn and binding ſatisfaction, expreſſing his gracious readineſs to comply with his People in all their reaſonable and juſt deſires. The King is a good man, and it is no diminution to a King, to be called ſo; for whoſoever is a good man, ſhall be greater than a King that is not ſo. The King certainly is very tender of his preſent honour, and of his fame hereafter: he will think it hard to have a worſe mark ſet upon his government, than upon any of his Anceſtors, by extraordinary reſtraints: his Majeſty hath already intimated unto us by a Meſſage, That he doth willingly give way to have the abuſe of power reformed. By which I do verily believe, that he doth very well underſtand, what a miſerable power it is, which hath produced ſo much weakneſs to himſelf, and to the Kingdom; and it is our happineſs, that he is ſo ready to redreſs it.

For my own part, I ſhall be very glad to ſee that good old decrepit Law of Magna Charta, which hath been kept ſo long, and lain bed-rid, as it were; I ſhall be glad to ſee it walk abroad again with new vigour and luſtre, attended and followed with the other ſix Statutes: queſtionleſs it will be a great heartning to all the people. I doubt not, but upon a debating conference with the Lords, we ſhall happily happily fall upon a fair, and fit accommodation, concerning the Liberty of our Perſons and Propriety of our Goods. I hope we may have a Bill, to agree in the point, againſt impriſonment for Loans or Privy-Seals. As for intrinſecal power and reaſon of State, they are matters in the clouds, where I deſire we may leave them, and not meddle with them at all; leſt by the way of admittance, we may loſe ſomewhat of that which is our own already. Yet this by the way I will ſay of Reaſon of State, That in the latitude by which 'tis uſed, it hath eaten out almoſt, not only the Laws, but all the Religion of Chriſtendom.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will only remember you of one precept, and that of the wiſeſt man, Be not over-wiſe, be not over-juſt: and he gives this reaſon, for why wilt thou be deſolate?

Sir, if Juſtice and Wiſdom may be ſtretch'd to deſolation, let us thereby learn, that Moderation is the Virtue of Virtues, and the Wiſdom of Wiſdoms. Let it be our Maſter-piece ſo to carry our buſineſs, that we may keep Parliaments on foot: For as long as they are frequent, there will be no irregular power; which though it cannot be broken at once, yet in ſhort time it will fade and moulder away: there can be no total or final loſs of Liberties, but by loſs of Parliaments. As long as they laſt, what we cannot get at one time, we may have at another.

Let no man think, that what I have ſaid is the Language of a private end, my aim is upon the good ſucceſs of the whole; for, I thank God, my mind ſtands above any fortune, that is to be got by baſe and unworthy means: no man is bound to be rich or great, no, nor to be wiſe; but every man is bound to be honeſt, out of which heart I have ſpoken.

The Biſhop of Exeter's [Dr. Joſeph Hall] Letter ſent to the Houſe of Commons, 28 April, 1628.

Gentlemen,

FOR God's ſake be wiſe in your well-meant Zeal: why do you argue away precious time that can never be revoked, or repaired? Wo is me, while we diſpute, our friends periſh, and we muſt follow them. Where are we, if we break, (and I tremble to think) we cannot but break, if we hold ſo ſtiff. Our liberties and proprieties are ſufficiently declared to be ſure and legal, our remedies are clear and irrefragable; what do we fear, every Subject ſees the way now chalked out, for future Juſtice, and who dares henceforth tread beſides it? Certainly whilſt Parliaments live, we need not miſdoubt the violations of our Freedoms and Rights: may we be but where the Law found us, we ſhall ſufficiently enjoy ourſelves and ours; it is no ſeaſon to ſearch for more! Oh let us not, whilſt we over-rigidly plead for an higher ſtrain of ſafety, put ourſelves into a neceſſity of ruin and utter deſpair of redreſs: let us not in the ſuſpicion of Evils that may be, caſt ourſelves into a preſent confuſion. If you love yourſelves and your Country, remit ſomething of your own terms; and ſince the ſubſtance is yielded by your Noble Patriots, ſtand not too rigorouſly upon points of circumſtance: fear not to truſt a good King, who after the ſtrict Laws made, muſt be truſted with the execution. Think that your Country, nay Chriſtendom lies on the mercy of your preſent reſolutions. Relent, or farewel welfare.

From him whoſe faithful heart bleeds in a vowed ſacrifice for his King and Country,

EXETER.

Upon this debate it was ordered, That a Committee of Lawyers do draw a Bill, containing the ſubſtance of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes, that do concern the Liberty of the Subject: which buſineſs took up two whole days.

Mr. Selden's Speech at the Committee about the Bill for Magna Charta, and the Liberties of the Subject.

April 28. 1628.

I Would have the violation tenderly mentioned. Let us ſet down the Statute of Magna Charta. 13 Hen. IV. it is adjudged in the Parliament Roll, that the Statute of Tallage is an Act of Parliament. It is not entered in the Statute-Roll, and it was 34 Ed. I. 19 Ed. II. rot. clauſ. mem. 15. Les comens priont lou divers fuer' priſe & impriſon per accuſement de perſons malevolent lou ne fuer' indict acc' al ley del terre, ils priont que ils que ſont priſe ſans indictment veignont en Chancery, & que droit ſerra fait. Et roy vult que nul ſerra priſe. But this is not in the Parliament Roll. 5 Ed. III. c. 9. 14 Ed. III. c. 1. That there ſhall be no aid nor charge but by Parliament. 25 Ed. III. c. 4. None ſhall be attached by petition without preſentment, or an original Writ. 25 Ed. III. no. 16. *Item priont les comens que les loans ſoient releaſe, & null ſerra compell de faire arrere encontre les Franchiſes del terre. THurſday the firſt of May, Mr. Secretary Cook deliver'd a meſſage from his Majeſty, viz. to know whether the Houſe will reſt on his Royal Word, or no, declared to them by the Lord-Keeper; which if they do, he aſſures them it ſhall be royally performed.

Upon this there was a ſilence for a good ſpace: then Mr. Secretary Cook proceeded: This ſilence invites me to a further ſpeech, and further to addreſs myſelf; now we ſee we muſt grow towards an iſſue. For my part, how confident I have been of the good iſſue of this Parliament, I have certified in this place, and elſewhere, and I am ſtill confident therein; I know his Majeſty is reſolved to do as much as ever King did for his Subjects: all this Debate hath grown out of a ſenſe of our ſufferings, and a deſire to make up again thoſe breaches that have been made.

Since

Since this Parliament begun, hath there been any diſpenſe made of that which hath formerly been done? When means were denied his Majeſty, being a young King, and newly come to his Crown, which he found ingaged in a War, what could we expect in ſuch neceſſities? His Majeſty called this Parliament to make up the breach: his Majeſty aſſures us we ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain; he aſſures, the Laws ſhall be eſtabliſhed, what can we deſire more? all is, that we provide for Poſterity, and that we do prevent the like ſuffering for the future. Were not the ſame means provided by them before us? can we do more? we are come to the Liberty of the Subjects, and the Prerogative of the King; I hope we ſhall not add any thing to ourſelves, to depreſs him. I will not divine, I think we ſhall find difficulty with the King, or with the Lords; I ſhall not deliver my opinion as a Counſellor to his Majeſty, which I will not juſtify and ſay here, or at the Council-Board. Will we in this neceſſity ſtrive to bring ourſelves into a better condition, and greater Liberty than our Fathers had, and the Crown into a worſe than ever? I dare not adviſe his Majeſty to admit of that: If this that we now deſire be no Innovation, it is all contained in thoſe Acts and Statutes; and whatſoever elſe we would add more, is a diminution to the King's power, and an addition to our own. We deal with a wiſe and prudent Prince, that hath a ſword in his hand for our good, and this good is ſupported by power. Do not think, that by caſes of Law and Debate we can make that not to be law, which in experience we every day find neceſſary.

Give me leave freely to tell you, that I know by experience, that by the place I hold under his Majeſty, if I will diſcharge the duty of my place and the oath I have taken to his Majeſty, I muſt commit, and neither expreſs the cauſe to the Goaler, nor to the Judges, nor to any Counſellor in England, but to the King himſelf; yet do not think I go without ground of reaſon, or take this power committed to me to be unlimited; yea, rather it is to me a charge, burthen, and danger: for if I by this power ſhall commit the pooreſt porter, if I do it not upon a juſt cauſe, if it may appear, the burthen will fall upon me heavier than the Law can inflict, for I ſhall loſe my credit with his Majeſty, and my place. And I beſeech you conſider whether thoſe that have been in the ſame place have not committed freely, and not any doubt made of it, nor any complaint made by the Subject.

SIR Robert Philips hereupon ſpake thus: That if the words of Kings ſtrike impreſſions in the hearts of ſubjects, then do theſe words upon this occaſion ſtrike an impreſſion in the hearts of us all: to ſpeak in a plain language, we are now come to the end of our journey, and the well-diſpoſing of an anſwer to this meſſage, will give happineſs or miſery to this Kingdom. Let us ſet the Commonwealth of England before the eyes of his Majeſty, that we may juſtify ourſelves, that we have demeaned ourſelves dutifully to his Majeſty.

Mr. Hackwell of Lincoln's-Inn, 1 May 1628.

SIR,

I Choſe rather to diſcover my weakneſs by ſpeaking, than to betray my conſcience by ſilence: my opinion is, that we ſhall do well totally to omit our reſolution out of this Bill, and rely only upon a confirmation of the Laws.

The Objections made againſt this Opinion are two.

The firſt is, that we ſhall thereby recede from our own reſolution.

The ſecond, that by a bare confirmation of the old Laws, without inſerting of our reſolution, by way of explanation, we ſhall be but in the ſame caſe as before.

For the firſt, that though we deſire only a confirmation without adding of our reſolution, we do not thereby recede from our reſolution, I reaſon thus:

Our reſolution was drawn out of the ſenſe of thoſe Laws, which are now deſired to be confirmed, ſo that no queſtion can be made by any of us that have thus declared ourſelves, but that our reſolution is virtually contained in thoſe Laws. If that be ſo, how can our acceptance of a confirmation of theſe Laws be a departure from our reſolution?

Nay, rather we think the contrary is true; he that doubts, that by confirmation of theſe Laws our reſolution is not hereby confirmed, doubts whether we have juſtly deduced our reſolutions out of thoſe Laws, and ſo calls our reſolution into queſtion.

This argument alone is in my opinion a full anſwer to that firſt objection, that in deſiring a bare confirmation from thoſe Laws, we depart from our reſoutions.

The ſecond Objection is, That if we have nothing but a confirmation, we are in no better caſe than we were before thoſe late violations of the Law.

This I deny, and do confidently affirm, that although we have no more than a confirmation of thoſe Laws which are recited in the Bill that is now before us, we ſhall depart hence in far better caſe than we came, and that in divers reſpects.

Firſt, Some of the Laws recited in this bill, and deſired to be confirmed, are not printed Laws, and are known to few profeſſors of the Law, and much leſs to others; and yet they are Laws of as great conſequence for the Liberty of the Subject, if not of greater, than any that are printed: as namely 25 Ed. III. no. 1. That Loans againſt the will of the lender are againſt reaſon and the freedom of the Realm. 36 Ed. III. no. 9. By which Impriſonments by ſpecial commandment without due proceſs are forbidden. Theſe two are not printed.

The excellent Law de Tallagio non concedendo in print, hath in a publick Court been by a great Counſellor ſaid to be but a Charter, and no Law.

The Statute 1 Rich. III. againſt Benevolences, is by ſome opinions in print an abſolute Law. If we can get all theſe good Laws, beſides thoſe ſix other, which are expoſitions of Magna Charta, in the point of the freedom of our perſons, to be confirmed and put in one Law, to the eaſy view of all men, is not our caſe far better than when we came hither?

Secondly, Will not the occaſion of the making of this Law of confirmation, ſo notoriouſly known, be tranſmitted to all poſterity? Certainly it will never be forgotten, that the occaſion thereof was the impriſonment of thoſe worthy Gentlemen for not lending, and the reſolution in the King's-Bench in denying to bail them; and is not the occaſion of the making of a Law a good rule to expound it? If ſo, then by giving a confirmation upon this occaſion, we have bettered our caſe very much.

Thirdly, Have not the Judges in the King's-Bench, in open Parliament, upon our complaint, diſclaimed to have given any judgment in the point? Which generally before by the Parliament was otherwiſe conceived; for now they ſay, it was but an award and no judgment, will ſuch a notorious Act upon ſo important an occaſion in ſo publick a place be quickly forgotten? Nay, will not the memory of it for ever remain upon record? Is not our caſe then much better than when we came hither?

Fourthly, Will not the reſolution of this Houſe, and all our arguments and reaſons againſt impriſonment without a cauſe expreſſed (which no doubt by the courſe we have taken will be transferred to poſterity) be a great means to ſtay any Judge hereafter from declaring any judgment to the contrary, eſpecially if there be likelihood of a Parliament: is not our caſe in this very much amended?

Laſtly, Have we not received propoſitions from the Lords, wherein (amongſt other things) they declared, that they are not out of love with our proceedings? Is not this a great ſtrengthening to it? But after ſo long debate amongſt them about it, they cannot take any juſt exception to it; and doth not this alſo much amend our caſe?

From all theſe reaſons, I conclude that the ſecond objection, that by a confirmation we are in no better caſe than when we came together, is alſo a weak objection.

Now for reaſons to move us to proceed in this courſe of accepting a confirmation: Firſt, we have his Majeſty's gracious Promiſe to yield to a confirmation of the old Laws, from which we may reſt moſt aſſured he will not depart; if we tender him withal our propoſition to be enacted, we have cauſe to doubt that we ſhall loſe both the one and the other.

Secondly, We are no leſs aſſured of the Lords joining with us, for in their propoſitions ſent to us they have delivered themſelves to that purpoſe: this is then a ſecure way of getting ſomewhat of great advantage to us, as we have great hopes, and in a manner aſſurance on this ſide: ſo on the other ſide we have great doubts and fears, that by offering our reſolution to be enacted, we ſhall loſe all.

For firſt we have had already experience of the Lords, that they are not very forward to join with us in a declaration of our propoſition to be Law; if they ſtumble at a declaration, much more will they, in yielding to make a Law in the ſame point.

And have we not much more cauſe to doubt that his Majeſty will not yield unto it, ſeeing it toucheth him ſo near? Is it not the notice of his pleaſure that hath wrought thus with the Lords?

If we ſhould clog our bill with our propoſition, and it ſhould be rejected by the Lords, or by the King, is not our reſolution much weakened by it; and are we not then in far worſe caſe than before we made it? Our reſolution for the rejecting of our propoſition, will tend to a juſtification of all that hath been done againſt us in this great point of our Liberty.

> Let us then like wiſe-men conform our deſire to our hopes, and guide our hopes by probabilities; other deſires and other hopes are but vain.

This is my poor opinion in this weighty buſineſs.

And ſo the day following they had further debate upon that matter, the Houſe being turned into a Grand Committee, and Mr. Herbert in the chair.

Some ſaid that the ſubject has ſuffered more in the violation of ancient Liberties within theſe few years, than in three hundred years before, and therefore care ought to be taken for the time to come.

Sir Edward Coke ſaid, that that Royal Word had reference to ſome meſſage formerly ſent; his Majeſty's word was, that they may ſecure themſelves any way, by bill or otherwiſe, he promiſed to give way to it. And to the end that this might not touch his Majeſty's honour, it was propoſed, that the bill come not from the Houſe, but from the King: We will and grant for us and our ſucceſſors, and that we and our ſucceſſors will do thus and thus; and it is the King's honour, he cannot ſpeak but by Record.

Others deſired the Houſe to conſider, when and where the late promiſe was made; was it not in the face of both Houſes? Cruel Kings have been careful to perform their promiſes, yea, though they have been unlawful, as Herod. Therefore if we reſt upon his Majeſty's promiſe, we may aſſure ourſelves of the performance of it; beſides, we bind his Majeſty, by relying on his word: we have laws enough, it is the execution of them that is our life, and it is the King that gives life and execution.

Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, ſaying, That never Houſe of Parliament truſted more in the goodneſs of their King, for their own private account, than the preſent; but we are ambitious that his Majeſty's goodneſs may remain to Poſterity, and we are accountable to a publick truſt: and therefore ſeeing there hath been a publick violation of the Laws by his Miniſters, nothing will ſatisfy him but a publick amends; and our deſires to vindicate the ſubjects right by bill, are no more than are laid down in former Laws, with ſome modeſt proviſion for inſtruction, performance and execution.

Which ſo well agreed with the ſenſe of the Houſe, that they made it the ſubject of a meſſage to be delivered by the Speaker to his Majeſty.

Amidſt thoſe deliberations, another meſſage was delivered May 2. from his Majeſty by Mr. Secretary Cook; That howſoever we proceed in this buſineſs we have in hand, which his Majeſty will not doubt, but to be according to our conſtant profeſſion, and ſo as he may have cauſe to give us thanks; yet his reſolution is, that both his royal care, and hearty and tender affection towards all his loving ſubjects, ſhall appear to the whole Kingdom, and all the World, that he will govern us according to the laws and cuſtoms of this Realm; that he will maintain us in the liberties of our perſons, and proprieties of our goods, ſo as we may enjoy as much happineſs as our fore-fathers in their beſt times; and that he will rectify what hath been, or may be found amiſs amongſt us, ſo that hereafter there may be no juſt cauſe to complain. Wherein as his Majeſty will rank himſelf amongſt the beſt of our Kings, and ſhew he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or right; ſo he will have us match ourſelves with the beſt ſubjects, not by incroaching upon that ſovereignty and prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing ourſelves within the bounds and laws of our fore-fathers, without reſtraining them, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, expoſitions, or additions in any ſort; which, he telleth us, he will not give way unto.

That the weight of the affairs of the Kingdom, and Chriſtendom, do preſs him more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; ſo as this Seſſion of Parliament muſt continue no longer than Tueſday come ſeven-night at furtheſt: in which time his Majeſty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promiſed; and if the Houſe be not ready to do that is fit for themſelves, it ſhall be their own faults.

And upon aſſurance of our good diſpatch and correſpondence, his Majeſty declareth, that his royal intention is to have another Seſſion of Parliament at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting of ſuch things as cannot now be done.

This meſſage was debated the next day, being Saturday, May 3. whereupon Sir John Elliot ſpake to this effect:

The King, ſaith he, will rank himſelf with the beſt of Kings, and therefore he would have us rank ourſelves with the beſt ſubjects; we will not incroach upon that Sovereignty that God hath put into his hands: this makes me fear his Majeſty is miſ-informed in what we go about, let us make ſome enlargement, and put it before him, that we will not make any thing new. As for the time of this Seſſion, it is but ſhort; and look how many meſſages we have, ſo many interruptions, and miſ reports, and miſ-repreſentations to his Majeſty produce thoſe meſſages.

Sir Miles Fleetwood continued the debate, and ſaid, That this buſineſs is of great importance, we are to accommodate this: the breach of this Parliament will be the greateſt miſery that ever befell us; the eyes of Chriſtendom are upon this Parliament, the State of all our Proteſtant Friends are ready to be ſwallowed up by the Emperor's Forces, and our own Kingdom is in a miſerable ſtrait, for the defence of our Religion that is invaded by the Roman Catholicks, by the colour of a commiſſion, which is intolerable; the defence of our Realm by Shipping is decayed, the King's revenue is ſold and gone; where ſhall the relief be obtained but in Parliament? Now we are in the way, let us proceed by way of Bill, in purſuance of the King's meſſage to eſtabliſh the fundamental Laws in propriety of our goods, and liberty of our perſons: It was declared to us, that courſes by Loan and Impriſonment were not lawful; let us touch them in our Bill, and that all precedents and judgments ſeeming to the contrary, be void; and that all commitments againſt the Law be remedied, and that we be protected againſt the fear of commitments.

Mr. Mason's Speech.

I Am of opinion with the Gentleman that ſpake firſt, that in our proceedings in the matter now in debate, we ſhould have uſe of the title of the Statute, called circumſpecte agatis; for it concerns the liberty of our perſons, without which we do not enjoy our lives.

The Queſtion is:

Whether in this bill for the explanation of Magna Charta, and the reſt of the Statutes, we ſhall provide that the cauſe of the commitment muſt be expreſſed upon the commitment, or upon return of the Habeas Corpus?

Before I ſpeak to the queſtion itſelf, I ſhall propoſe ſome obſervations, in my conceit, neceſſarily conducing to the debate of the matter.

1. That we ought to take care, and to provide for poſterity, as our predeceſſors have done for us, and that this provident care, cannot be expounded to be any diſtruſt of the performance of his Majeſty's gracious declaration, this Act providing for perpetuity, to which his Highneſs's promiſe, unleſs it were by Act of Parliament, cannot extend.

2. That we having long debated and ſolemnly reſolved our rights and privileges by virtue of theſe Statutes, and if now we ſhall reduce thoſe declarations and thoſe reſolutions into an Act, we muſt ever hereafter expect to be confined within the bounds of that Act, being made at our ſuit, and to be the limits of the Prerogative in that reſpect, and it being an Act of explanation, which ſhall receive no further explanation than itſelf contains.

3. That by this Act we muſt provide a remedy againſt the perſons which detain us in priſon, for as to the commander, there can be no certainty.

Concerning the Queſtion itſelf:

It hath been ſolemnly and clearly reſolved by the Houſe, that the commitment of a Freeman without expreſſing the cauſe at the time of the commitment, is againſt the Law: If by this Act of explanation we ſhall provide only that the cauſe ought to be expreſſed upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, then out of the words of the Statute, it will neceſſarily be inferred, that before the return of the Habeas Corpus the cauſe need not to be expreſs'd, becauſe the Statute hath appointed the time of the expreſſion of the cauſe; and it will be conſtrued, that if the makers of the Statutes had intended that the cauſe ſhould have been ſooner ſhewn, they would have provided for it by the Act, and then the Act which we term an Act of explanation, will be an Act of the abridging of Magna Charta, and the reſt of the Statutes: or if this Act do not make the commitment, without expreſſing the cauſe to be lawful, yet it will clearly amount to a toleration of the commitment, without expreſſing the cauſe, until the Habeas Corpus, or to a general or perpetual diſpenſation, beginning with, and continuing as long as the Law itſelf. And in my underſtanding the words in this intended Law, that no Freeman can be committed without cauſe, can no ways advantage us, or ſatisfy this objection; for till the return of the Habeas Corpus, he that commits is Judge of the cauſe, or at leaſt hath a licence by this Law till that time to conceal the cauſe, and the Goaler is not ſubject to any action for the detaining of the Priſoner upon ſuch command. For if the priſoner demanded the cauſe of his impriſonment of the Goaler, it will be a ſafe anſwer for him to ſay that he detains a priſoner by warrant, and that it belongs not unto him to deſire thoſe which commit the priſoner to ſhew the cauſe until he returns the Habeas Corpus. And if the priſoner be a Suitor to know the cauſe from thoſe that committed him, it will be a ſufficient anſwer for them to ſay they will expreſs the cauſe at the return of the Habeas Corpus. In this caſe there will be a wrong, becauſe the commitment is without cauſe expreſſed, and one that ſuffers that wrong, viz. the party impriſoned; and yet no ſuch wrong doer, but may excuſe, if not juſtify himſelf by this Law.

In making of Laws, we muſt conſider the inconveniences which may enſue, and provide for the prevention of them, lex caveat de futuris. I have taken into my thoughts ſome inconveniences which I ſhall expoſe to your conſiderations, not imagining that they can happen in the time of our gracious Sovereign; but in an Act of Parliament, we muſt provide for the prevention of all inconveniences in future times.

1. If

1. If a man be in danger to be impriſoned in the beginning of a long vacation for refuſing to pay ſome ſmall ſum of money, and knows that by this Act he can have no inlargement till the return of the Habeas Corpus in the Term, and that the charge of his being in Priſon, and of his inlargement by Habeas Corpus will amount to more than the ſum, he will part with money to prevent his impriſonment, or to redeem himſelf thence, becauſe he cannot ſay any man doth him wrong, until the return of the Habeas Corpus, and the Law reſolves. A man will pay a Fine rather than be impriſoned, for the judgement which is given when one is fined, is ideo capiatur, and the execution for debt is a capias ad ſatisfaciendum; the Law preſuming any man will part with his money to gain his Liberty. And if the priſoner procure an Habeas Corpus, and be brought into the King's-Bench by virtue of it, yet the cauſe need not to be then expreſſed: the proviſion of this Law being, that if no cauſe be then expreſſed, he ſhall be bailed, and no cauſe being ſhewn upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, yet it may be pretended, that at the time of his commitment, there were ſtrong preſumptions of ſome great offence, but upon examination they are cleared: or it may be ſaid, that the offence was of that nature, that the time of his impriſonment before the return was a ſufficient puniſhment. And we may be frequently impriſoned in this manner, and never underſtand the cauſe, and have often ſuch puniſhment, and have no means to juſtify ourſelves; and for all theſe proceedings this Law will be the juſtification, or colour.

2. If by this Act there be a toleration of impriſonment without ſhewing cauſe, until the return of the Habeas Corpus; yet it is poſſible to accompany that impriſonment, with ſuch circumſtances of cloſe reſtraint, and other hardſhips, which I forbear to expreſs, as may make an impriſonment for that ſhort time, as great a puniſhment, as a perpetual impriſonment in an ordinary manner.

3. The party may be impriſoned a long time before he ſhall come to be delivered by this Law; the place of his impriſonment may be in the furtheſt parts of this Kingdom; the Judges always make the return of the Habeas Corpus anſwerable to the diſtance of the priſon from Weſtminſter; the Goaler may neglect the return of the firſt proceſs, and then the party muſt procure an Alias, and the Goaler may be then in ſome other imployment for the King, and excuſe the not returning the body upon that proceſs; and this may make the impriſonment for a year. And in the end no cauſe being returned, the party may be diſcharged, but in the mean time he ſhall have impriſonment, he ſhall never know the cauſe, he ſhall have no remedy for it, nor be able to queſtion any for injuſtice, which have not a juſtification, or excuſe by this Law.

4. The party may be impriſoned during his life, and yet there ſhall be no cauſe ever ſhewn. I will inſtance in this manner, a man may be committed to the furtheſt part of the Kingdom Weſtward; he obtains an Habeas Corpus; before the Goaler receives the Habeas Corpus, or before he returns it, the priſoner by Warrant is removed from that priſon to another, it may be the furtheſt Northern part of the Realm. The firſt Goaler returns the ſpecial matter, which will be ſufficient to free himſelf, and in like manner the priſoner may be tranſlated from one priſon to another, and his whole life ſhall be a peregrination, or wayfaring from one Goal to another, and he ſhall never know the cauſe, nor be able to complain of any, who cannot defend their actions by this Bill.

5. If the priſoner be brought into the Court by Habeas Corpus, and no cauſe expreſſed, and thereupon he be inlarged, he may be partly committed again, and then his enlargement ſhall only make way for his commitment: and this may continue during his life, and he ſhall never know the cauſe; and this not remedied, but rather permitted by this Act.

And there are alſo ſome things remarkably conſiderable in this matter; the expence of the party in priſon; his Fees to the Goaler, his coſts in obtaining and proſecuting an Habeas Corpus, and his charges in removing himſelf, attended with ſuch as have the charge of his conduct: and that the priſoner muſt ſuſtain all this without ſatisfaction, or knowing the cauſe.

The only reaſon given by thoſe of the other opinion is, That it is requiſite, the King and Council ſhould have power to command the detainer of a man in priſon for ſome time, without expreſſing the cauſe; becauſe it is ſuppoſed, that the manifeſtation of the cauſe at firſt may prevent the diſcovery of a Treaſon. The reaſon is anſwered by the remedy propoſed, by this Act it being propoſed, that it ſhall be provided by this Bill, that upon our commitment, we may inſtantly have recourſe to the Chancery for an Habeas Corpus, returnable in that Court, which is always open; and that upon the receipt thereof, the Writ muſt be returned, and the cauſe thereupon expreſſed. If then this remedy be really the cauſe of commitment, it muſt partly appear, which contradicts the former reaſon of State.

And in my own opinion, we ought not only to take care, that the Subject ſhould be delivered out of priſon, but to prevent his impriſonment; the Statute of Magna Charta, and the reſt of the Acts, providing that no man ſhould be impriſoned, but by the Law of the Land. And although the King, or Council, as it hath been objected, by force may commit us without cauſe, notwithſtanding any Laws we can make; yet I am ſure without ſuch an Act of Parliament, ſuch commitment can have no legal colour, and I would be loth we ſhould make a Law to endanger ourſelves. For which reaſons I conceive, that there being ſo many ways to evade this Act, we ſhall be in a worſe caſe by it, than without it; as it provides no remedy to prevent our impriſonment without expreſſing the cauſe to be lawful, and adminiſters excuſes for continuing us in priſon, as I have before declared. And thus for providing for one particular out of reaſon of State, which poſſibly may fall out in an age or two, we ſhall ſpring a leak, which may ſink all our Liberties, and open a gap, through which Magna Charta and the reſt of the Statutes may iſſue out and vaniſh. I therefore conclude, that in my poor underſtanding (which I ſubmit to better Judgments,) I had rather depend upon our former reſolutions, and the King's gracious declarations, than to paſs an Act in ſuch manner as hath been propoſed.

In concluſion, the Commons agreed to an anſwer to all the preceding meſſages, and preſented it to the King by the mouth of their Speaker.

The Speaker's Speech (Sir John Finch*) to the King, in anſwer to ſeveral Meſſages, in the Banqueting-Houſe,* May 5.

Moſt Gracious and Dread Sovereign,

YOUR Loyal and Obedient Subjects, the Commons now aſſembled in Parliament, by ſeveral meſſages from your Majeſty, and eſpecially by that your declaration delivered by the Lord-Keeper before both Houſes, have, to their exceeding great joy and comfort, received many ample expreſſions of your princely care and tender affections towards them, with a gracious promiſe and aſſurance, that your Majeſty will govern according to the Laws of this Realm, and ſo maintain all your Subjects, in the juſt freedom of their perſons, and ſafety of their eſtates, that all their Rights and Liberties may be by them enjoyed, with as much freedom and ſecurity in their time, as in any age heretofore by their Anceſtors, under the beſt of your Progenitors: For this ſo great a favour enlarged, by a comfortable intimation of your Majeſty's confidence in the proceedings of this Houſe, they do, by me their Speaker, make a full return of moſt humble thanks to your Majeſty, with all dutiful acknowledgement of your grace and goodneſs, herein extended unto them.

And whereas in one of thoſe meſſages delivered from your Majeſty, there was an expreſſion of your deſire to know, whether this Houſe would reſt upon your Royal word and promiſe, aſſuring them, that if they would, it ſhould be royally and really performed: As they again preſent their humble thanks for the ſeconding and ſtrengthning of your former Royal expreſſions, ſo in all humbleneſs they aſſure your Majeſty, that their greateſt confidence is, and ever muſt be in your grace and goodneſs, without which, they well know, nothing they can frame or deſire, will be of ſafety or value to them: Therefore are all humble Suitors to your Majeſty, that your Royal heart will graciouſly accept and believe the truth of theirs, which they humbly preſent, as full of truth and confidence in your Royal word and promiſe, as ever Houſe of Commons repoſed in any of their beſt Kings.

True it is, they cannot but remember the publick truſt, for which they are accountable to preſent and future times; and their deſires are, That your Majeſty's goodneſs might, in fruit and memory, be the bleſſing and joy of Poſterity.

They ſay alſo, That of late, there hath been publick violation of the Laws, and the Subjects Liberties, by ſome of your Majeſty's Miniſters; and thence conceive, that no leſs than a publick remedy will raiſe the dejected hearts of your loving Subjects, to a chearful ſupply of your Majeſty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this Houſe.

From theſe conſiderations, they moſt humbly beg your Majeſty's leave to lay hold of that gracious offer of yours, which gave them aſſurance, that if they thought fit to ſecure themſelves in their Rights and Liberties, by way of Bill or otherwiſe, ſo it might be provided with due reſpect to God's honour, and the publick good, you would be graciouſly pleaſed to give way unto it. Far from their intentions it is, any way to encroach upon your Sovereignty or Prerogative; nor have they the leaſt thought of ſtretching or inlarging the Laws in any ſort, by any new interpretations or additions; the bounds of their deſires extend no further, than to ſome neceſſary explanation of that, which is truly comprehended within the juſt ſenſe and meaning of thoſe Laws, with ſome moderate proviſion for execution and performance, as in times paſt, upon like occaſion hath been uſed.

The way how to accompliſh theſe their humble deſires, is now in ſerious conſideration with them, wherein they humbly aſſure your Majeſty, they will neither loſe time, nor ſeek any thing of your Majeſty, but that they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to aſk, and for a gracious and juſt King to grant.

His Majeſty's Anſwer was delivered by the Lord-Keeper, Thomas Lord Coventry.

MR. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, his Majeſty has commanded me to tell you, that he expected an anſwer by your actions, and not delay by diſcourſe: ye acknowledge this truſt and confidence in your proceedings, but his Majeſty ſees not how you requite him by your confidence of his word and actions: for what need explanations, if ye doubted not the performance of the true meaning? For explanations will hazard an incroachment upon his Prerogative. And it may well be ſaid, What need a new Law to confirm an old, if you repoſe confidence in the declaration his Majeſty made by me to both Houſes; and yourſelves acknowledge, that your greateſt truſt and confidence muſt be in his Majeſty's grace and goodneſs, without which nothing that you can frame will be of ſafety, or available to you. Yet to ſhew clearly the ſincerity of his Majeſty's intentions, he is content, that a Bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the ſix other Statutes inſiſted upon for the Subjects Liberties, if ye ſhall chuſe that to be the beſt way; but ſo, as it may be without additions, paraphraſes, or explanations.

Thus, if you pleaſe, you may be ſecured from your needleſs fears, and this Parliament may have a happy wiſhed for end: whereas by the contrary, if you ſeek to tie your King by new, and indeed impoſſible bonds, you muſt be accountable to God and your Country, for the ill ſucceſs of this meeting. His Majeſty having given his Royal word, that you ſhall have no cauſe to complain hereafter; leſs than which, hath been enough to reconcile great Princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a King and his Subjects.

Laſtly, I am commanded to tell you, that his Majeſty's pleaſure is, That without further replies or meſſages, or other unneceſſary delays, you do what you mean to do ſpeedily, remembring the laſt meſſage, which his Majeſty ſent you by Secretary Cook, in point of time: his Majeſty, always intending to perform his promiſe to his people.

NOtwithſtanding the intimation of his Majeſty's good pleaſure for a Bill, Mr. Secretary Cook, Tueſday May 6. again preſſed the Houſe to rely upon the King's word, ſaying, That he had rather follow others, than begin to enter into this buſineſs; loſs of time hath been the greateſt complaint; the matter fallen now into conſideration, is what way to take, whether to rely on his Majeſty's word, or on a Bill. If we will conſider the advantage we have in taking his Majeſty's word, it will be of the largeſt extent, and we ſhall chuſe that, that hath moſt aſſurance; an Act of Parliament is by the conſent of the King and Parliament, but this aſſurance by word is, that he will govern us by the Laws; the King promiſes that, and alſo that they ſhall be ſo executed, that we ſhall enjoy as much freedom as ever. This contains many Laws, and a grant of all good Laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of thoſe very Laws, aſſurance, which binds further than the Law can: firſt, it binds his affection, which is the greateſt bond between King and Subject, and that binds his judgment alſo, nay his honour, and that not at home, but abroad; the Royal word of a King is the ground of all treaty; nay, it binds his conſcience. This confirmation between both Houſes is in nature of a vow; for my part, I think it is the greateſt advantage to rely on his Majeſty's word. He further added, this debate was fitter to be done before the Houſe, and not before the Committee, and that it was a new courſe to go to a Committee of the whole Houſe.

Sir John Elliott replied, That the proceeding in a Committee, is more honourable and advantageous to the King and the Houſe, for that way leads moſt to truth, and it is a more open way, and where every man may add his reaſon, and make anſwer upon the hearing of other mens reaſons and arguments.

This being the general ſenſe, the Houſe was turned into a Committee, to take into conſideration, what was delivered to the King by the Speaker, and what was delivered to them by the Lord-Keeper, and all other meſſages, and the Committee was not to be bounded by any order: the key was brought up, and none were to go out without leave firſt aſked.

In the Debate of this buſineſs at the Committee, ſome were for letting the Bill reſt: but Sir Edward Coke's reaſons prevailed to the contrary. Was it ever known (ſaid he) that general words were a ſufficient ſatisfaction to particular grievances? was ever a verbal declaration of the King, Verbum Regni? When Grievances be, the Parliament is to redreſs them. Did ever Parliament rely on meſſages? They put up Petitions of their Grievances, and the King ever anſwered them: the King's anſwer is very gracious, but what is the Law of the Realm, that is the queſtion. I put no diffidence in his Majeſty, the King muſt ſpeak by a Record, and in particulars, and not in general: did you ever know the King's Meſſage come into a Bill of Subſidies? All ſucceeding Kings will ſay, Ye muſt truſt me as you did my Predeceſſors, and truſt my meſſages; but meſſages of love never came into a Parliament. Let us put up a Petition of Right: not that I diſtruſt the King, but that I cannot take his truſt, but in a Parliamentary way.

On Thurſday 8 May, the Petition of Right was finiſhed, and the Clauſe of Martial Law was added unto it, and it was delivered to the Lords at a conference in the Painted Chamber for their concurrence; which conference was managed by Sir Edward Coke, who thus expreſſed himſelf: I pray your Lordſhips to excuſe us, for we have been till one of clock about the great buſineſs, and (bleſſed be God) we have diſpatch'd it in ſome meaſure, and before this time we were not able to attend your Lordſhips, but I hope that this will prove a great bleſſing to us. My Lords, I am commanded from the Houſe of Commons to expreſs their ſingular care and affection they have of concurrence with your Lordſhips, in theſe urging affairs and proceedings of this Parliament; both for the good of the Commonwealth, and principally for his Majeſty's. And this I may ſay in this particular, if we had hundreds of tongues, we were not able to expreſs this deſire, which we have of that concurrence with your Lordſhips: but I will leave it without any further expreſſion. My Lords, it is evident what neceſſity there is, both in reſpect of yourſelves, and your Poſterities, to have good ſucceſs in this buſineſs. We have acquainted your Lordſhips with the reaſons and arguments, and after we have had ſome conference, we have received from your Lordſhips five propoſitions; and it behoves me to give your Lordſhips ſome reaſons, why you have not heard from us before now; for in the mean time, as we were conſulting of this weighty buſineſs, we have received divers meſſages from our great Sovereign the King, and they conſiſted of five parts.

1. That his Majeſty would maintain all his Subjects in their juſt freedom, both of their perſons and eſtates.

2. That he will govern according to his Laws and Statutes.

3. That we ſhould find much confidence in his Royal word; I pray obſerve that.

4. That we ſhall enjoy all our Rights and Liberties, with as much freedom and liberty, as ever any Subjects have done in former times.

5. That whether we ſhall think it fit, either by way of Bill or otherwiſe, to go on in this great buſineſs, his Majeſty would be pleaſed to give way to it.

Theſe gracious meſſages did ſo work upon our affections, that we have taken them into conſideration. My Lords, when we had theſe meſſages, (I deal plainly, for ſo I am commanded by the Houſe of Commons) we did conſider, what way we might go for our more ſecure way, nay, yours; we did think it the ſafeſt way to go in a Parliamentary courſe, for we have a maxim in the Houſe of Commons, and written on the walls of our Houſe, That old ways are the ſafeſt and ſureſt ways: And at laſt we fell upon that which we did think (if that your Lordſhips did conſent with us) it is the moſt antient way of all, and that is, my Lords, via fauſta, both to his Majeſty, to your Lordſhips, and to ourſelves. For, my Lords, this is the greateſt Bond, that any Subject can have in Parliament, Verbum Regis, this is an high point of honour, but this ſhall be done by the Lords and Commons, and aſſented to by the King in Parliament; this is the greateſt obligation of all; and this is for the King's honour and our ſafety. Therefore, my Lords, we have drawn a form of a Petition, deſiring your Lordſhips to concur with us therein; for we come with an unanimous conſent of all the Houſe of Commons, and there is great reaſon your Lordſhips ſhould do ſo, for your Lordſhips are involved in the ſame condition, Commune Periculum. So I have done with the firſt part: And now I ſhall be bold to read that which we have ſo agreed on, and I ſhall deſire your Lordſhips leave that I may read it.

Here the Petition of Right was read; but we forbear to inſert it as yet, becauſe there were propoſitions for alteration; and it is not perfect, till the Royal aſſent be given to it.

From

From the eighth to the twelfth of May, all publick buſineſs was laid aſide. On Monday the twelfth, the Lords had a conference with the Commons, where the Lord-Keeper made this Speech.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

MY Lords having a moſt affectionate deſire to maintain that good concurrence, that in this Parliament and others have been of late between both Houſes, deſired this conference, to acquaint you, how, and in what manner, they have proceeded in the Petition of Right that came from this Houſe; and to let you know, that as ſoon as they had received it, they, with all care and expedition they poſſibly could, addreſſed themſelves to conſider thereof; and after good time ſpent in Debate in the whole Houſe, they made a Committee to conſider, whether retaining the ſubſtance of the Petition, there might not be ſome words altered, or put in to make it more ſweet, to procure it a paſſable way to his Majeſty: we know this muſt be crowned by the King, and good muſt come to all the Kingdom by this courſe now taken. The Committee hath met, and hath propounded ſome ſmall matters to be altered in ſome few words, to make it paſſable, and not in ſubſtance. And the Lords having this reported from their Committee, and heard it read in their Houſe, reſolved of nothing till they have your conſent; yet they think it fitter to have it propounded to you, to conſider, whether there ſhould be any alteration or no, and how the propounded alterations may ſtand with your liking.

Concerning the commitment by the King and the Council, without expreſſing the cauſe, it was reſolved by the Lords to debate it this morning, and as ſoon as they ſhould have debated it, they purpoſed to have your concurrence with them before they reſolved it; but at the inſtant when they thought to have debated it, they received a Letter from his Majeſty, which, they conceive, will give a ſatisfaction to both Houſes in the main point. My Lords deſiring to keep that good concurrence begun, deſired to communicate that Letter unto you, that you might take the ſame into your conſiderations, as they mean to do themſelves: This Letter is to be read unto you.

To our Right Truſty and Well-beloved, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the Higher Houſe of Parliament.

Carolus Rex.

" WE being deſirous of nothing more than " the advancement of the peace and pro- " ſperity of our People, have given leave to free " Debate upon the higheſt points of our Prerogative " Royal, which, in the time of our Predeceſſors, " Kings and Queens of this Realm, were ever " reſtrained as matters that they would not have " diſcuſſed; and in other things we have been " willing ſo far to deſcend to the deſires of our " good Subjects, as might fully ſatisfy all mode- " rate minds, and free them from all juſt fears and " jealouſies, which thoſe meſſages, which we have " hitherto ſent into the Commons Houſe, will " well demonſtrate unto the World. Yet we find it " ſtill inſiſted upon, that in no caſe whatſoever, " ſhould it never ſo nearly concern matters of State " or Government, we, or our Privy-Council, " have no power to commit any man without " the cauſe ſhewed; whereas it often happens, " that ſhould the cauſe be ſhewed, the ſervice it- " ſelf would thereby be deſtroyed and defeated, " and the cauſe alledged muſt be ſuch, as may be " determined by our Judges of our Courts of Weſt- " minſter, in a legal and ordinary way of juſtice; " whereas the cauſes may be ſuch, whereof the " Judges have no capacity of judicature, nor rules " of Law to direct and guide their Judgment in " caſes of that tranſcendent nature; which hap- " ning ſo often, the very intermitting the conſtant " rule of Government, for ſo many ages, within " this Kingdom practiſed, would ſoon diſſolve the " very foundation and frame of our Monarchy. " Wherefore as to our Commons, we have made " fair propoſitions, which might equally preſerve " the juſt Liberty of the Subject: ſo, my Lords, " we have thought good to let you know, that " without the overthrow of Sovereignty, we can- " not ſuffer this power to be impeached; notwith- " ſtanding, to clear our conſcience and juſt in- " tentions, this we publiſh, That it is not in our " heart, nor will we ever extend our Royal power, " lent unto us from God, beyond the juſt rule of " Moderation, in any thing which ſhall be con- " trary to our Laws and Cuſtoms, wherein the " ſafety of our People ſhall be our only aim. And " we do hereby declare our Royal pleaſure and " reſolution to be, which, God willing, we ſhall " ever conſtantly continue and maintain, That " neither we, nor our Privy-Council, ſhall or " will, at any time hereafter, commit or command " to priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrain the perſon of " any for not lending money to us, nor for any " cauſe, which in our conſcience doth not con- " cern the publick good and ſafety of us and our " people; we will not be drawn to pretend any " cauſe, wherein our judgment and conſcience is " not ſatisfied with; which baſe thoughts, we " hope, no man can imagine will fall into our " Royal breaſt; and that in all caſes of this " nature, which ſhall hereafter happen, we ſhall, " upon the humble petition of the Party, or ad- " dreſs of our Judges unto us, readily and really " expreſs the true cauſe of their commitment or " reſtraint, ſo ſoon as with conveniency and ſafety " the ſame is fit to be diſcloſed and expreſſed. And " that in all cauſes criminal of ordinary juriſdiction, " our Judges ſhall proceed to the deliverance or " bailment of the priſoner, according to the known " and ordinary rules of the Laws of this Land, and " according to the Statutes of Magna Charta, and " thoſe other ſix Statutes inſiſted upon, which we " do take knowledge ſtand in full force, and which " we intend not to abrogate and weaken, againſt " the true intention thereof. This we have thought " fit to ſignify unto you, the rather to ſhorten any " long Debare upon this great queſtion, the ſea- " ſon of the year being ſo far advanced, and our " great occaſions of State not lending us many " more days for longer continuance of this Seſſion " of Parliament."

Given under our Signet at our Palace at Weſtminſter, 12 Maii, the fourth year of our Reign.

The ſame day the King's Letter was communicated to the Houſe of Commons, they laid it aſide, and Sir Thomas Wentworth ſaid, It was a Letter of Grace; but the people will only like of that which is done in a Parliamentary way: beſides, the debate debate of it would ſpend much time, neither was it directed to the Houſe of Commons; and the Petition of Right would clear all miſtakes: For (ſaid he) ſome give it out, as if the Houſe went about to pinch the King's Prerogative. But the further debate of this matter took up ſeveral days.

May 17. The Lords propounded, at a conference, an addition to be made to the Petition of Right, which was delivered by the Lord-Keeper, to this purpoſe:

YOU the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, my Lords have commanded me to preſent unto you, the ſingular care and affection, they have to preſerve that correſpondency and order, which the two Houſes (both in this and former Parliaments, to the happineſs of this Kingdom) have heretofore enjoyed.

They command me alſo to let you know, that they have no leſs care and affection to bring that great buſineſs the Liberty of the Subject to an happy iſſue. And whereas at the laſt conference of both Houſes, there were ſome things propounded, that came from their Lordſhips, out of a deſire the Petition might have the eaſier paſſage with his Majeſty, not intending to alter in any manner the ſubſtance of the Petition; but it was then thought fit, that there was another part of the Petition, of as great importance and weight: my Lords, ſince the time of that conference, have imploy'd themſelves wholly to reduce the Petition to ſuch a frame and order, that may give both to you and them hope of acceptance.

And after many deliberations, and much advice taken, my Lords have reſolved to repreſent to you ſomething which they have thought upon, yet not as a thing concluſive to them or you; and according to their deſires (having mentioned it in the beginning) have held it fit to conclude of nothing, till that you be made acquainted with it, and that there may be a mature adviſement between you and them, ſo that there may be the happier concluſion in all their buſineſs.

This being the determination of the Lords, that nothing, that is now offered unto you, ſhould be concluſive, yet they thought it convenient to preſent it unto you.

This alteration (and not alteration) but addition, which they ſhall propound unto you, to be adviſed and conferred upon, which is no breach of the ſame, they think it meet, if it ſhall ſtand with your liking, to be put in the concluſion of the Petition which I ſhall now read unto you.

We preſent this our humble Petition to your Majeſty, with the care not only of preſerving our own Liberties, but with due regard to leave intire, that Sovereign Power, wherewith your Majeſty is truſted for the Protection, Safety, and Happineſs of the People.

This is the thing the Lords do preſent unto you, the Subject of this conference, concerning the adding of this in the concluſion of the Petition; and as they know, that this is no ſmall thing, and that you cannot preſently give an anſwer to it; therefore they deſire you, that you do with ſome ſpeed conſider of it, and their Lordſhips will be ready this afternoon.

This addition produced ſeveral ſpeeches.

Mr. Alford.] Let us look (ſaid he) into the Records, and ſee what they are, what is Sovereign Power? Bodin ſaith, That it is free from any condition, by this we ſhall acknowledge a Regal, as well as a Legal Power: Let us give that to the King, that the Law gives him, and no more.

Mr. Pymm.] I am not able to ſpeak to this queſtion, I know not what it is: All our Petition is for the Laws of England, and this power ſeems to be another diſtinct power from the power of the Law. I know how to add Sovereign to his Perſon, but not to his Power: And we cannot leave to him a Sovereign Power, when we never were poſſeſſed of it.

Mr. Hackwell.] We cannot admit of thoſe words with ſafety, they are applicable to all the parts of our Petition: It is in the nature of a Saving, and by it we ſhall imply, as if [redacted] had incroached on his Prerogative; all the Laws we cite are without a Saving: and yet now after the violation of them we muſt add a Saving: I have ſeen divers Petitions, and where the Subject claimed a Right, there I never ſaw a Saving of this nature.

Sir Edward Coke.] This is magnum in parvo, this is propounded to be a concluſion of our Petition: It is a matter of great weight; and, to ſpeak plainly, it will overthrow all our Petition; it trenches to all parts of it: It flies at Loans, and at the Oath, and at Impriſonment, and Billeting of Soldiers; this turns all about again. Look into all the Petitions of former times, they never petitioned, wherein there was a ſaving of the King's Sovereignty: I know that Prerogative is part of the Law, but ſovereign Power is no Parliamentary word. In my opinion, it weakens Magna Charta, and all our Statutes; for they are abſolute, without any ſaving of ſovereign Power. And ſhall we now add it, we ſhall weaken the foundation of Law, and then the building muſt needs fall; let us take heed what we yield unto, Magna Charta is ſuch a fellow, that he will have no ſovereign. I wonder this ſovereign was not in Magna Charta, or in the confirmations of it: If we grant this, by implication we give a ſovereign power above all theſe Laws: power in Law, is taken for a power with force: The Sheriff ſhall take the power of the County, what it means here, God only knows. It is repugnant to our petition, that is a Petition of Right, grounded on Acts of Parliament. Our Predeceſſors could never endure a ſalvo jure ſuo, no more than the Kings of old could endure for the Church, ſalvo honore Dei & Eccleſiæ. We muſt not admit of it, and to qualify it, is impoſſible. Let us hold our privileges according to the Law; that power, that is above this, is not fit for the King and People to have it diſputed further. I had rather, for my part, have the Prerogative acted, and I myſelf to lie under it, than to have it diſputed.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.] If we do admit of this addition, we ſhall leave the Subject worſe than we found him, and we ſhall have little thanks for our labour, when we come home: Let us leave all power to his Majeſty, to puniſh malefactors; but our Laws are not acquainted with ſovereign power: we deſire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench on his Majeſty's prerogative; we muſt not recede from this petition, either in part or whole.

Mr.

Mr. Noye.] To add a Saving, is not ſafe; doubtful words may beget ill conſtruction: and the words are not only doubtful words, but words unknown to us, and never uſed in any Act or Petition before.

Mr. Selden.] Let us not go too haſtily to the queſtion. If there be any objections, let any propound them, and let others anſwer them as they think good. I will not touch the reaſons already given. The ſum of this addition is, that our right is not to be ſubject to Loans or Impriſonment without cauſe, or martial law, but by ſovereign power. If it hath no reference to our petition, what doth it here? I am ſure all others will ſay it hath reference, and ſo muſt we. How far it doth exceed all examples of former times, no man can ſhew me the like. I have made that ſearch that fully ſatisfies me, and I find not another beſides 28 Edw. We have a great many petitions and bills of parliament in all ages, in all which we are ſure no ſuch thing is added. That clauſe of the 28 Edw. I. it was not in the petition, but in the King's anſwer.

In Magna Charta there were no ſuch clauſes; the articles themſelves are to be ſeen in a library at Lambeth, in a book of that time, upon which the law was made. There was none in the ſtatutes in King John's time, for theſe I have ſeen, there is no ſaving. In the articles of confirmatio chartarum, is a ſaving, les ancients aids, that is, for file maryer, & pur fair fitz chivalier, and for ranſom. And in the articles of King John, in the original charter, which I can ſhew, there thoſe three aids were named therein, and they were all known. In the 25 Edw. III. there is a petition againſt Loans, there is no ſaving, and ſo in others. As for that addition in the 28 Edw. I. do but obſerve the petitions after Magna Charta; as 5 Edw. III. they put up a petition: whereas in Magna Charta it is contained, that none be impriſoned but by due proceſs of law; thoſe words are not in Magna Charta, and yet there is no ſaving. And ſo in the 28 Edw. III. and 36, 37, and 42 of Edw. III. all which paſs by petition, and yet there is no ſaving in them. And there are in them other words that are not in Magna Charta, and yet no ſaving. For that that Mr. Speaker ſaid to the King, it was our heart, and ever ſhall be; but we then ſpoke of the King's prerogative by itſelf, and we are bound to ſay ſo: but ſpeaking of our rights, ſhall we ſay we are not to be impriſoned, ſaving but by the King's ſovereign power? Say my lands, without any title, be ſeized in the King's hand, and I bring a petition of right, and I go to the King, and ſay, I do by no means ſeek your Majeſty's right and title; and after that, I bring a petition or monſtrance de droit, ſetting forth my own right and title, and withal ſet down a ſaving, that I leave intire his Majeſty's right, it would be improper. It was objected, that in the 28 of Edw. I. in the end of articuli ſuper chartas, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta, in the end there is a clauſe, ſavant le droit & ſigniory; the words are extant in that roll that is now extant, but the original roll is not extant.

In the 25 Edw. I. there was a confirmation of the Charter; in the 27 Edw. I. the Parliament was called, and much ſtir there was about the Charter, and renewing the Articles, but then little was done. In 28 Edw. I. the Commons by petition or bill, did obtain the liberties and articles at the end of the Parliament; they were extracted out of the roll, and proclaimed abroad. The addition was added in the proclamation: In the bill there was no ſavant, but afterwards it was put in; and to prove this, it is true, there is no Parliament-roll of that year, yet we have hiſtories of that time. In the library at Oxford, there is a journal of a parliament of that very year, which mentions ſo much; alſo in the publick library at Cambridge, there is a manuſcript that belonged to an Abbey, it was of the ſame year 28 Edw. I. and it mentions the parliament and the petitions, and articulos quos petierunt ſic confirmaverat rex ut in fine adderet, Salvo jure coronæ regis; and they came by proclamation in London. When the people heard this clauſe added in the end, they fell into execration for that addition, and the great Earls that went away ſatisfied from the Parliament, hearing of this, went to the King, and afterwards it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this of that time, only in one roll in the end of Edw. III. there is a roll, that recites not the Parliament bill, but the ſtatute that was the effect of the roll, that was proclaimed.

The Lords afterwards, at a conference, tendred reaſons to fortify their addition; which were briefly reported by the Lord-Keeper:

THAT the Lords were all agreed to defend and maintain the juſt liberties of the Subject, and of the Crown; and that the word, leave, was debated amongſt them; and thereby they meant to give no new, but what was before: for the words, Sovereign Power, as he is a King, he is a Sovereign, and muſt have power; and he ſaid, the words were eaſier than the Prerogative. As for the word, that, which is a relative, and referred to that power, that is for the ſafety of the people; and this, ſaid he, can never grieve any man. Being thus publiſhed, it is not ſovereign power in general, but now in confutation of our reaſons, Magna Charta was not with a ſaving; but, ſaid he, you purſue not the words in Magna Charta, and therefore it needs an addition.

As for the 28 of Edw. III. he ſaid, there was a ſaving; and an ill expoſition cannot be made of this, and both Houſes have agreed it in ſubſtance already; the Commons did it in a ſpeech delivered by the Speaker, and that we ſay we have not a thought to incroach on the King's ſovereignty; and why may you not add it in your petition?

Upon this report, Mr. Maſon ſpake his opinion in manner following:

IN our petition of right to the King's Majeſty, we mention the laws and ſtatutes, by which it appear'd, That no tax, loan, or the like, ought to be levied by the King, but by common aſſent in Parliament: that no freeman ought to be impriſoned but by the law of the land; that no freeman ought to be compelled to ſuffer ſoldiers in his houſe. In the petition we have expreſſed the breach of theſe laws, and deſire we may not ſuffer the like; all which we pray as our rights and liberties.

The Lords have propoſed an addition to this petition, in theſe words:

We humbly preſent this Petition to your Majeſty, not only with a care of our own Liberties, but with with a due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power wherewith your Majeſty is intruſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of your people.

And whether we ſhall conſent unto this addition, is the ſubject of this day's diſcourſe: and becauſe my Lord-Keeper at the laſt conference, declared their Lordſhips had taken the words of the petition apart, I ſhall do ſo too. The word, leave, in a petition, is of the ſame nature as ſaving in a grant, or act of parliament: when a man grants but part of a thing, he ſaves the reſt; when he petitions to be reſtored but to part, he leaveth the reſt: then in the end of our petition, the word, leave, will imply, that ſomething is to be left of that, or at leaſt with a reference to what we deſire.

The word, intire, is very conſiderable; a Conqueror is bound by no Law, but hath power dare leges, his Will is a Law; and although William the Conqueror, at firſt, to make his way to the Crown of England the more eaſy, and the poſſeſſion of it more ſure, claimed it by title; but afterwards, when there were no powerful pretenders to the Crown, the title of conqueſt (to introduce that abſolute power of a Conqueror) was claimed, and that Statute of Magna Charta, and other Statutes mentioned in our petition, do principally limit that power. I hope it is as lawful for me to cite a Jeſuit, as it is for Dr. Manwaring to falſify him; Suares, in his firſt book, de Legibus, cap. 17. delivered his opinion in theſe words, Amplitudo & reſtrictio poteſtatis Regum circa ea quæ per ſe mala vel injuſta non ſunt, pendet ex arbitrio hominum & ex ambigua conventione vel pacto inter reges & regnum. And he farther expreſſeth his opinion, That the King of Spain was ſo abſolute a Monarch, that he might lawfully impoſe tribute without conſent of his people, until about two hundred years ſince, when it was concluded between him and his people, that without conſent of his people by proxies, he ſhould not impoſe any tribute. And Suares's opinion is, That by that agreement, the Kings of Spain are bound to impoſe no tribute without conſent.

And this agreement that author calls a reſtraining of that ſovereign Power; the Statutes then mentioned in our Petition, reſtraining that abſolute power of a Conqueror: if we recite thoſe Statutes, and ſay, we leave the ſovereign Power intire, we do take away that reſtraint which is the virtue and ſtrength of thoſe Statutes, and ſet at liberty the claim of the ſovereign power of a Conqueror, which is to be limited and reſtrained by no laws: this may be the danger of the word, intire.

The next word delivered by the Lords as obſervable, is the particle, That; becauſe it was ſaid, That all ſovereign power is not mentioned to be left, but only (that) with which the King is truſted for our protection, ſafety, and happineſs: But I conceive this to be an exception of all ſovereign power; for all ſovereign power in a King, is for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of his people. If all ſovereign power be excepted, you may eaſily judge the conſequence, all Loans and Taxes being impoſed by colour of that ſovereign power.

The next word is, Truſted; which is very ambiguous, whether it be meant, truſted by God only as a Conqueror, or by the people alſo, as King, which are to govern alſo according to laws, ex pacto. In this point I will not preſume to adventure further; only I like it not, by reaſon of the doubtful expoſition it admits. I have likewiſe conſidered the propoſition itſelf, and therein I have fallen upon the dilemma, that this addition ſhall be conſtrued either to refer unto the petition, or not: if it doth refer unto the petition, it is merely uſeleſs and unneceſſary, and unbefitting the judgment of this grave and great Aſſembly to add to a petition of this weight. If it hath reference unto it, then it deſtroys not only the virtue and ſtrength of our petition of Right, but our Rights themſelves; for the addition being referred to each part of the petition, will neceſſarily receive this conſtruction: That none ought to be compelled to make any Gift, Loan, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent, or Act of Parliament, unleſs it be by the ſovereign power, with which the King is truſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of his people.

That none ought to be compelled to ſojourn or billet ſoldiers, unleſs by the ſame ſovereign power; and ſo of the reſt of the Rights contained in the petition: and then the moſt favourable conſtruction will be, that the King hath an ordinary prerogative, and by that he cannot impoſe Taxes, or impriſon; that is, he cannot impoſe Taxes at his Will to employ them as he pleaſeth; but that he hath an extraordinary and tranſcendent ſovereign power for the protection and happineſs of his people, and for ſuch purpoſe he may impoſe Taxes, or billet ſoldiers as he pleaſeth; and we may aſſure ourſelves, that hereafter all Loans, Taxes, and billeting of ſoldiers, will be ſaid to be for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of the people. Certainly hereafter it will be conceived, that an Houſe of Parliament would not have made an unneceſſary addition to this petition of Right; and therefore it will be reſolved, That the addition hath relation to the petition, which will have ſuch operation as I have formerly declared; and I the rather fear it, becauſe the late Loan and Billeting have been declared to have been by ſovereign power for the good of ourſelves; and if it be doubtful whether this propoſition hath reference to the petition or not, I know not who ſhall judge whether Loans or Impriſonments hereafter be by that ſovereign power or not?

A Parliament, which is made a Body of ſeveral Writs, and may be diſſolved by one Commiſſion, cannot be certain to decide this queſtion. We cannot reſolve that the Judges ſhall determine the words of the King's Letter read in this Houſe, expreſſing the cauſe of commitment may be ſuch, that the Judges have not capacity of judicature, no Rules of Law to direct and guide their judgements in caſes of that tranſcendent nature; the Judges then, and the judgments, are eaſily conjectured. It hath been confeſſed by the King's Council, that the ſtatute of Magna Charta binds the King, and his ſovereign power cannot be divided from himſelf. If then the ſtatute of Magna Charta binds the King, it binds his ſovereign power. If to the petition theſe words be added, the expoſition muſt be, that the ſtatute of Magna Charta binds the King's ſovereign power, ſaving the King's ſovereign power. I ſhall endeavour to give ſome anſwer to the reaſons given by the Lords.

The firſt is, That it is the intention of both Houſes, to maintain the juſt liberty of the Subject, and not to diminiſh the juſt power of the King; and therefore the expreſſion of that intention in this petition, cannot prejudice us. To which I anſwer,

First, That our intention was, and is, as we then profeſſed, and no man can aſſign any particular in which we have done to the contrary; neither have we any way tranſgreſſed in that kind in this petition: and if we make this addition to the petition, it would give ſome intimation, that we have given cauſe or colour of offence therein; which we deny: and which if any man conceive ſo, let him aſſign the particular, that we may give anſwer thereunto.

By our petition, we only deſire our particular Rights and Liberties to be confirmed to us; and therefore it is not proper for us in it to mention ſovereign power in general, being altogether impertinent to the matter of the petition.

There is a great difference between the words of the addition, and the words propoſed therein, viz. between juſt Power, which may be conceived to be limited by Laws, and ſovereign Power, which is ſuppoſed to be tranſcendent and boundleſs.

The ſecond reaſon delivered by their Lordſhips, was, That the King is ſovereign; that as he is ſovereign, he hath power, and that that ſovereign power is to be left: for my part, I would leave it ſo, as not to mention it; but if it ſhould be expreſſed to be left in this petition, as it is propoſed, it muſt admit ſomething to be left in the King of what we pray, or at leaſt admit ſome ſovereign power in his Majeſty, in theſe privileges which we claim to be our right, which would fruſtrate our petition, and deſtroy our right, as I have formerly ſhewed.

The third reaſon given from this addition, was, That in the Statute of Articuli ſuper Chartas, there is a ſaving of the Right and Seigniory of the Crown.

To which I give theſe anſwers, That Magna Charta was confirmed above thirty times, and a general ſaving was in none of theſe Acts of confirmation, but in this only; and I ſee no cauſe, we ſhould follow one ill, and not thirty good precedents; and the rather, becauſe that ſaving produced ill effects, that are well known.

That ſaving was by Act of Parliament; the concluſion of which Act is, That in all thoſe caſes the King did will, and all thoſe that were at the making of that ordinance did intend, that the Right and Seigniory of the Crown ſhould be ſaved: by which it appears, that the ſaving was not in the Petition of the Commons, but added by the King; for in the Petition, the King's will is not expreſſed.

In that Act the King did grant, and part with, to his people, divers rights belonging to his prerogative, as in the firſt chapter he granted, That the people might chuſe three men, which might have power to hear and determine complaints, made againſt thoſe, that offended in any point of Magna Charta, though they were the King's Officers, and to fine and ranſome them. And in the 8, 12, and 19 Chapters of that Statute, the King parted with other prerogatives; and therefore there might be ſome reaſon of the adding of, that Sovereign Power, by the King's Council: But in this petition, we deſire nothing of the King's Prerogative, but pray the enjoying of our proper and undoubted rights and privileges; therefore there is no cauſe to add any words, which may imply a ſaving of that which concerns not the matter in the petition.

The fourth reaſon given by their Lordſhips, was, That by the mouth of our Speaker, we have this Parliament declared, That it was far from our intention to incroach upon his Majeſty's prerogative, and that therefore it could not prejudice us, to mention the ſame reſolution in an addition to this Petition.

To which I anſwer, That that declaration was a general anſwer to a meſſage from his Majeſty to us, by which his Majeſty expreſſed, that he would not have his prerogative ſtraitned by any new explanation of Magna Charta, or the reſt of the Statutes: and therefore that expreſſion of our Speaker's was then proper, to make it have reference to this petition, there being nothing therein contained, but particular rights of the Subject, and nothing at all concerning his Majeſty's prerogative.

Secondly, That anſwer was to give his Majeſty ſatisfaction of all our proceedings in general, and no man can aſſign any particular, in which we have broken it; and this petition juſtifies it ſelf, that in it we have not offended againſt the proteſtation: And I know no reaſon, but that this declaration ſhould be added to all our Laws, we ſhall agree on this Parliament, as well as to this petition.

The laſt reaſon given, was, That we have varied in our petition from the words of Magna Charta; and therefore it was very neceſſary, that a ſaving ſhould be added to this petition.

I anſwer, That in the Statute 5 E. III. 25 E. III. 28 E. III. and other Statutes, with which Magna Charta is confirmed: the words of the Statute of explanation, differ from the words of Magna Charta itſelf; the words of ſome of the Statutes of explanation, being, That no man ought to be apprehended, unleſs by indictment, or due proceſs of Law; and the other Statutes differing from the words of Magna Charta, in many other particulars, and yet there is no ſaving in thoſe Statutes, much leſs ſhould there be any in a Petition of Right. Theſe are the anſwers I have conceived to the reaſons of their Lordſhips, and the expoſition, I apprehend muſt be made of the propoſed words, being added to our petition. And therefore, I conclude, that in my opinion, we may not conſent to this addition, which I ſubmit to better judgements.

The Commons afterwards appointed Mr. Glanvile, and Sir Henry Martin, to manage another conference to be had with the Lords, concerning the ſaid matter, and to clear the ſenſe of the Commons in that point: The one argued the legal, the other the rational part.

Mr. Glanvile's Speech in a full Committee of both Houſes of Parliament, May 23, in the Painted-Chamber at Weſtminſter.

MY Lords, I have in charge, from the Commons Houſe of Parliament, (whereof I am a Member) to expreſs this day before your Lordſhips ſome part of their clear ſenſe, touching one point that hath occurred in the great debate, which hath ſo long depended in both Houſes.

I ſhall not need many words to induce or ſtate the queſtion, which I am to handle in this free conference. The ſubject matter of our meeting is well known to your Lordſhips, I will therefore only look ſo far back upon it, and ſo far recollect ſummarily the proceedings it hath had, as may be requiſite to preſent clearly to your Lordſhips conſiderations, the nature and conſequence of the particular wherein I muſt inſiſt.

Your Lordſhips may be pleaſed to remember, how that the Commons in this Parliament have framed a petition to be preſented to his Majeſty, a petition of Right rightly compoſed, relating nothing but truth, deſiring nothing but juſtice; a petition juſtly occaſioned, a petition neceſſary and fit for theſe times, a petition founded upon ſolid and ſubſtantial grounds, the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, ſure rocks to build upon; a petition bounded within due limits, and directed upon right ends, to vindicate ſome lawful and juſt Liberties of the free Subjects of this Kingdom, from the prejudice of violations paſt, and to ſecure them from future innovations.

And becauſe my following diſcourſe muſt reflect chiefly, if not wholly, upon the matter of this petition, I ſhall here crave leave ſhortly to open to your Lordſhips the diſtinct parts whereof it doth conſiſt, and thoſe are four.

The firſt concerns levies of monies, by way of Loans or otherwiſe, for his Majeſty's ſupply; declaring, that no man ought, and praying that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent by Act of Parliament.

2. The ſecond is concerning that liberty of perſon, which rightfully belongs to the free Subjects of this Realm, expreſſing it to be againſt the tenure of the Laws and Statutes of the land, that any Freeman ſhould be impriſoned without cauſe ſhewed; and then reciting how this Liberty amongſt others, hath lately been infringed, it concludeth with a juſt and neceſſary deſire, for the better clearing and allowance of this privilege for the future.

3. The third declareth the unlawfulneſs of billetting or placing Soldiers or Mariners, to ſojourn in free Subjects houſes againſt their wills, and prayeth remedy againſt that grievance.

4. The fourth and laſt aimeth at redreſs touching Commiſſions, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of offenders, and cauſing them to be executed and put to death by the Law Martial, in times and places, when and where, if by the Laws and Statutes of the Land they had deſerved death, by the ſame Laws and Statutes alſo they might, and by none other ought to be adjudged and executed.

This petition, the careful Houſe of Commons, not willing to omit any thing pertaining to their duties, or which might advance their moderate and juſt ends, did heretofore offer up unto your Lordſhips conſideration, accompanied with an humble deſire, That in your nobleneſs and juſtice you would be pleaſed to join with them in preſenting it to his Majeſty, that ſo coming from the whole body of the Realm, the Peers and People, to him that is the head of both, our gracious Sovereign, who muſt crown the work, or elſe all our labour is in vain; it might, by your Lordſhips concurrence and aſſiſtance, find the more eaſy paſſage, and obtain the better anſwer.

Your Lordſhips, as your manner is in caſes of ſo great importance, were pleaſed to debate and weigh it well, and thereupon you propounded to us ſome few amendments (as you termed them) by way of alteration, alledging, that they were only in matters of form, and not of ſubſtance; and that they were intended to no other end, but to ſweeten the petition, and make it the more paſſable with his Majeſty.

In this the Houſe of Commons cannot but obſerve, that fair and good reſpect, which your Lordſhips have uſed in your proceedings with them, by your concluding or voting nothing in your Houſe, until you had imparted it unto them; whereby our meetings about this buſineſs have been juſtly ſtiled free conferences, either party repairing hither diſengaged to hear and weigh the other's reaſons, and both Houſes coming with a full intention, upon due conſideration of all that can be ſaid on the other ſide, to join at laſt in reſolving and acting that which ſhall be found moſt juſt and neceſſary for the honour and ſafety of his Majeſty and the whole Kingdom.

And touching thoſe propounded alterations, which were not many, your Lordſhips cannot but remember, that the Houſe of Commons have yielded to an accommodation, or change of their petition in two particulars; whereby they hope your Lordſhips have obſerved, as well as you may, they have not been affected unto words and phraſes, nor overmuch abounding in their own ſenſe; but rather willing to comply with your Lordſhips in all indifferent things.

For the reſt of your propoſed amendments, if we do not miſconceive your Lordſhips, as we are confident we do not, your Lordſhips, of yourſelves, have been pleaſed to relinquiſh them with a new overture, for one only clauſe to be added in the end or foot of the petition, whereby the work of this day is reduced to one ſimple head, whether that clauſe ſhall be received or not?

This yielding of the Commons in part unto your Lordſhips, of other points by you ſomewhat inſiſted upon, giveth us great aſſurance, that our ends are one; and putteth us in hope, that, in concluſion, we ſhall concur, and proceed unanimouſly to ſeek the ſame ends, by the ſame means.

The clauſe propounded by your Lordſhips to be added to the petition, is this:

We humbly preſent this petition to your Majeſty, not only with a care for preſervation of Liberties, but with a due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power, wherewith your Majeſty is intruſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of your People.

A clauſe ſpecious in ſhew, and ſmooth in words, but in effect and conſequence moſt dangerous, as I hope to make moſt evident: however, coming from your Lordſhips, the Houſe of Commons took it into their conſiderations, as became them, and apprehending upon the firſt debate, that it threatned ruin to the whole petition, they did heretofore deliver ſome reaſons to your Lordſhips, for which they then deſired to be ſpared from admitting it.

To theſe reaſons, your Lordſhips offered ſome anſwers at the laſt meeting; which having been faithfully reported to our Houſe, and there debated as was requiſite for a buſineſs of ſuch weight and importance, I muſt ſay truly to your Lordſhips, yet with due reverence to your opinions, the Commons are not ſatisfied with your arguments; and therefore they have commanded me to recollect your Lordſhips reaſons for this clauſe, and in a fair reply to let you ſee the cauſes why they differ from you in opinion.

But before I come to handle the particulars wherein we diſſent from your Lordſhips, I will in the firſt place take notice yet a little further, of that general wherein we all concur; which is, that we desire not (neither do your Lordships) to augment or dilate the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects beyond the just and due bounds, nor to encroach upon the limits of his Majesty's Prerogative Royal. And as in this, your Lordships at the last meeting, expressed clearly your own senses, so were your Lordships not mistaken in collecting the concurrent sense and meaning of the House of Commons; they often have protested they do, and ever must protest, That these have been, and shall be the bounds of their desires, to demand and seek nothing, but that which may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant: for as they claim by Laws some Liberties for themselves, so do they acknowledge a Prerogative, a high and just Prerogative belonging to the King, which they intend not to diminish. And now, my Lords, being assured, not by strained inferences, or obscure collections, but by the express and clear declarations of both Houses, that our ends are the same; it were a miserable unhappiness, if we should fail in finding out the means to accomplish our desires.

My Lords, the heads of those particular reasons which you insisted upon the last day, were only these:

First, you told us, that the word [leave] was of such a nature that it could give no new thing to his Majesty.

2. That no just exception could be taken to the words [sovereign Power] for that as his Majesty is a King, so he is a Sovereign; and as he is a Sovereign, so he hath power.

3. That the sovereign power mentioned in this clause is not absolute, or indefinite, but limited and regulated by the particle [that]; and the word [subsequent] which restrains it to be applied only for protection, safety, and happiness of the people, whereby ye inferred, there could be no danger in the allowance of such power.

4. That this clause contained no more in substance, but the like expressions of our meanings in this petition, which we had formerly signified unto his Majesty by the mouth of Mr. Speaker, that we no way intended to incroach upon his Majesty's sovereign power or prerogative.

5. That in our petition we have used other words, and of larger extent, touching our Liberties, than are contained in the statutes, whereon it is grounded: In respect of which inlargement, it was fit to have some express, or implied saving, or narrative, declaratory for the King's sovereign power, of which narrative you alledge this clause to be.

Lastly, whereas the Commons, as a main argument against the clause, had much insisted upon this, that it was unprecedented, and unparliamentary in a petition from the Subject, to insert a saving for the Crown; your Lordships brought for instance to the contrary the two Statutes of the 25 E. I. commonly called, confirmatio chartarum, and 28 E. I. known by this name of Articuli super Chartas; in both which Statutes there are savings for the King.

Having thus reduc'd to your Lordships memories, the effects of your own reasons; I will now, with your Lordships favour, come to the points of our reply, wherein I most humbly beseech your Lordships to weigh the reasons which I shall present, not as the sense of myself, the weakest Member of our House, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole House of Commons, conceived in a business there debated with the greatest gravity and solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of opinions, and unanimity that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that House. I shall not peradventure follow the method of your Lordships re-collected reasons in my answering to them, nor labour to urge many reasons. It is the desire of the Commons, that the weight of their arguments should recompence (if need be) the smallness of their number. And, in conclusion, when you have heard me through, I hope your Lordships shall be enabled to collect clearly out of the frame of what I shall deliver, that in some part or other of my discourse there is a full and satisfactory answer, given to every particular reason or objection of your Lordships.

The reasons that are now appointed to be presented to your Lordships, are of two kinds, legal and rational, of which those of the former sort are allotted to my charge; and the first of them is thus.

The clause now under question, if it be added to the petition, then either it must refer, or relate unto it, or else not; if it have no such reference, is it not clear that it is needless and superfluous? And if it have such reference, is it not clear, that then it must needs have an operation upon the whole petition, and upon all the parts of it?

We cannot think that your Lordships would offer us a vain thing, and therefore taking it for granted, that if it be added, it would refer to the petition; let me beseech your Lordships to observe with me, and with the House of Commons, what alteration and qualification of the same it will introduce.

The petition of itself, simply, and without this clause, declareth absolutely the rights and privileges of the Subject, in divers points; and among the rest touching the levies of monies, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesty's supply, That such Loans and other charges of the like nature, by the Laws and Statutes of this Land, ought not to be made or laid without common consent by Act of Parliament: But admit this clause to be annexed with reference (to the petition) and it must necessarily conclude and have this exposition, That Loans and the like charges (true it is, ordinarily) are against the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, unless they be warranted by sovereign Power, and that they cannot be commanded or raised without assent of Parliament, unless it be by sovereign Power: What were this but to admit a sovereign Power in the King above the Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom?

Another part of this petition is, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not to be imprisoned without cause shewed: But by this clause a sovereign Power will be admitted, and left intire to his Majesty, sufficient to controul the force of Law, and to bring in this new and dangerous interpretation, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not by Law to be imprisoned without cause shewed, unless it be by sovereign Power.

In a word, This clause, if it should be admitted, would take away the effect of every part of the petition, and become destructive to the whole: for thence will be the exposition touching the billetting of Soldiers and Mariners in Freemens houses against their wills; and thence will be the exposition touching the times and places for execution of the Law Martial, contrary to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm.

The ſcope of this petition, as I have before obſerved, is not to amend our caſe, but to reſtore us to the ſame ſtate we were in before; whereas, if this clauſe be received, inſtead of mending the condition of the poor Subjects, whoſe Liberties of late have been miſerably violated by ſome Miniſters, we ſhall leave them worſe than we found them; inſtead of curing their wounds, we ſhall make them deeper. We have ſet bounds to our deſires in this great buſineſs, whereof one is not to diminiſh the Prerogative of the King, by mounting it too high; and if we bound ourſelves on the other ſide with this limit, not to abridge the lawful privileges of the Subject, by deſcending beneath that which is meet, no man, we hope, can blame us.

My Lords, as there is mention made in the additional clauſe of ſovereign Power, ſo is there likewiſe of a truſt repoſed in his Majeſty, touching the uſe of ſovereign Power.

The word Truſt is of great latitude, and large extent, and therefore ought to be well and warily applied and reſtrained, eſpecially in the caſe of a King: there is a truſt inſeparably repoſed in the perſons of the Kings of England, but that truſt is regulated by Law. For example, when Statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in ſe, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties, to accrue to the King and to the informers that ſhall ſue for the breach of them; the Commons muſt, and ever will acknowledge, a regal and ſovereign prerogative in the King, touching ſuch Statutes, that it is in his Majeſty's abſolute and undoubted power, to grant diſpenſations to particular perſons, with the clauſes of non obſtante, to do as they might have done before thoſe Statutes, wherein his Majeſty conferring grace and favour upon ſome, doth not do wrong to others. But there is a difference between thoſe Statutes, and the Laws and Statutes whereon the petition is grounded: by thoſe Statutes the Subject has no intereſt in the penalties, which are all the fruit ſuch Statutes can produce, until by ſuit or information commenced, he become intitled to the particular forfeitures: whereas the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our petition, are of another nature; there ſhall your Lordſhips find us rely upon the good old Statute, called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the antient common Laws of the Liberties of England: There ſhall your Lordſhips alſo find us to inſiſt upon divers other moſt material Statutes, made in the time of King Edward III. and Edward IV. and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful rights and privileges, belonging to the Subjects of this Realm: Laws not inflicting penalties upon offenders, in malis prohibitis, but Laws declarative or poſitive, conferring or confirming ipſo facto, an inherent right and intereſt of Liberty and Freedom in the Subjects of this Realm, as their birthrights, and inheritance deſcendable to their heirs and poſterity; Statutes incorporate into the body of the common Law, over which (with reverence be it ſpoken) there is no truſt repoſed in the King's Sovereign Power, or Prerogative Royal, to enable him to diſpenſe with them, or to take from his Subjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the Common Law, and of theſe Statutes.

But if this cauſe be added to our petition, we ſhall then make a dangerous overture to confound this good deſtination touching what ſtatutes the King is truſted to controul by diſpenſations, and what not; and ſhall give an intimation to poſterity, as if it were the opinion both of the Lords and Commons aſſembled in this Parliament, that there is a truſt repoſed in the King, to lay aſide by his ſovereign Power in ſome emergent caſes, as well the common-law, and ſuch ſtatutes as declare or ratify the Subjects liberty, or confer intereſt upon their perſons, as thoſe other penal ſtatutes of ſuch nature as I have mentioned before; which, as we can by no means admit, ſo we believe aſſuredly, that it is far from the deſire of our moſt gracious Sovereign, to affect ſo vaſt a truſt, which being tranſmitted to a ſucceſſor of a different temper, might enable him to alter the whole frame and fabrick of the Commonwealth, and to diſſolve that Government whereby this Kingdom hath flouriſhed for ſo many years and ages, under his Majeſty's moſt Royal Anceſtors and Predeceſſors.

Our next reaſon is, that we hold it contrary to all courſe of Parliament, and abſolutely repugnant to the very nature of a petition of Right, conſiſting of particulars, as ours doth, to clog it with a general Saving or Declaration, to the weakening of the Right demanded; and we are bold to renew with ſome confidence our allegation, that there can be no precedent ſhewed of any ſuch clauſe in any ſuch petitions in times paſt.

I ſhall inſiſt the longer upon this particular, and labour the more carefully to clear it, becauſe your Lordſhips were pleaſed the laſt day to urge againſt us the ſtatutes of 25 and 28 of Edw. I. as arguments to prove the contrary, and ſeemed not to be ſatisfied with that which in this point we had affirmed. True it is, that in thoſe ſtatutes there are ſuch Savings as your Lordſhips have obſerved; but I ſhall offer you a clear anſwer to them, and to all other Savings of like nature that can be found in any ſtatutes whatſoever.

Firſt, in the general, and then I ſhall apply particular anſwers to the particulars of thoſe two ſtatutes; whereby it will be moſt evident, that thoſe examples can no ways ſuit with the matter now in hand. To this end it will be neceſſary, that we conſider duly what that queſtion is, which indeed concerneth a petition, and not an Act of Parliament. This being well obſerved, by ſhewing unto your Lordſhips the difference between a petition for the Law, and the Law ordained upon ſuch a petition, and opening truly and perſpicuouſly the courſe that was holden in framing of ſtatutes before 2 Hen. V. different from that which ever ſince then hath been uſed, and is ſtill in uſe amongſt us, and by noting the times wherein theſe ſtatutes were made, which was about one hundred years before 2 Hen. V. beſides the differences between theſe Savings and this clauſe; I doubt not but I ſhall give ample ſatisfaction to your Lordſhips, that the Commons, as well in this, as in all their other reaſons, have been moſt careful to rely upon nothing but that which is moſt true and pertinent.

Before the ſecond year of King Henry V. the courſe was thus: When the Commons were ſuiters for a Law, either the Speaker of their Houſe by word of mouth from them, the Lords Houſe joining with them, or by ſome bill in writing, which was uſually called their petition, moved the King, to ordain Laws for the redreſs of ſuch miſchiefs, or inconveniences, as were found grievous unto the people.

To

To theſe petitions the King made anſwer as he pleaſed, ſometimes to part, ſometimes to the whole, ſometimes by denial, ſometimes by aſſent, ſometimes abſolutely, and ſometimes by qualification. Upon theſe motions and petitions, and the King's anſwers to them, was the Law drawn up and ingroſſed in the Statute-Roll to bind the Kingdom; but this inconvenience was found in this courſe, that oftentimes the ſtatutes thus framed, were againſt the ſenſe and meaning of the Commons, at whoſe deſires they were ordained; and therefore in the 2 Hen. V. finding that it tended to the violation of their liberty and freedom, whoſe right it was, and ever had been, that no Law ſhould be made without their aſſent; they then exhibited a petition to the King, declaring their Right in this particular; praying, that from thenceforth no Law might be made or ingroſſed as Statutes, by additions or diminutions to their motions or petitions, that ſhould change their ſenſe, or intent, without their aſſent; which was accordingly eſtabliſhed by Act of Parliament. Ever ſince then, the Right hath been as the uſe was before, that the King taketh the whole, or leaveth the whole of all Bills or Petitions, exhibited for the obtaining of Laws.

From this courſe, and from the time when firſt it became conſtant and ſettled, we conclude ſtrongly, that it is no good argument, becauſe ye find Savings in Acts of Parliament before the ſecond of Hen. V. that thoſe Savings were before in the petitions that begat thoſe ſtatutes: for if the petitions for the two Loans ſo much inſiſted upon, (which petitions, for any thing we know, are not now extant) were never ſo abſolute, yet might the King, according to the uſage of thoſe times, inſert the Savings in his anſwers; which paſſing from thence into the Statute-Roll, do only give ſome little colour, but are not proof at all that the petitions alſo were with Savings.

Thus much for the general; to come now to the particular ſtatute of 25 of Edw. I. which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, with ſome proviſion for the better execution of it, as Common Law, which words are worth the noting:

It is true, that Statute hath alſo a clauſe to this effect, That the King, or his Heirs, from thenceforth ſhould take no Aids, Taxes, or Priſage of his Subjects, but by common aſſent of all the Realm, ſaving the antient Aids and Priſage due and accuſtomed.

This Saving, if it were granted, (which is not, nor cannot be proved) that it was as well in the Petition as in the Act; yet can it no way imply, that it is either fit or ſafe, that the clauſe now in queſtion ſhould be added to our petition: for the nature and office of a Saving, or exception, is to exempt particulars out of a general, and to ratify the rule in things not exempted, but in no ſort to weaken or deſtroy the general rule itſelf.

The body of that Law was againſt all Aids, and Taxes, and Priſage in general, and was a confirmation of the Common Law, formerly declared by Magna Charta; the Saving was only of Aids and Priſage in particular, ſo well deſcribed and reſtrained by the words, ancient and accuſtomed, that there could be no doubt what could be the clear meaning and extent of that exception; for the King's Right to thoſe ancient Aids, intended by that Statute to be ſaved to him, was well known in thoſe days, and is not yet forgotten.

Theſe Aids were three; from the King's Tenants by Knights ſervice, due by the Common Law, or general cuſtom of the Realm; Aid to ranſom the King's Royal perſon, if unhappily he ſhould be taken priſoner in the wars; Aid to make the King's eldeſt ſon a Knight, and Aid to marry the King's eldeſt daughter once, but no more: and that thoſe were the only Aids intended to be ſaved to the Crown by that Statute, appeareth in ſome clearneſs by the Charter of King John, dated at Running-Mede the 15th of June, in the fifth year of his Reign, wherein they are enumerated with an excluſion of all other Aids whatſoever. Of this Charter I have here one of the Originals, whereon I beſeech your Lordſhips to caſt your eyes, and give me leave to read the very words which concern this point. Theſe words (my Lords) are thus: Nullum ſcutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno noſtro, niſi per commune conſilium regni noſtri, niſi ad corpus noſtrum redimendum, & primogenitum filium noſtrum militem faciendum, & ad filiam noſtram primogenitam ſemel maritandam, & ad hoc non fiat niſi rationabile auxilium.

Touching priſage, the other thing excepted by this Statute, it is alſo of a particular right to the Crown ſo well known, that it needeth no deſcription, the King being in poſſeſſion of it by every day's uſage.

It is to take one tun of wine before the Maſt, and another behind the maſt, of every ſhip bringing in above twenty tuns of wine, and here diſcharging them by way of Merchandiſe.

But our petition conſiſteth altogether in particulars, to which if any general Saving, or words amounting to one, ſhould be annexed, it cannot work to confirm things not excepted, which are none, but to confound things included, which are all the parts of the petition; and it muſt needs beget this dangerous expoſition, that the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, declared and demanded by this petition, are not theirs abſolutely, but ſub modo; not to continue always, but only to take place, when the King is pleaſed not to exerciſe that ſovereign Power, wherewith, this clauſe admitted, he is truſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of his people. And thus that birthright and inheritance, which we have in our Liberties, ſhall by our own aſſents, be turned into a meer tenancy at will and ſufferance.

Touching the Statute of 28 Edw. I. Articuli ſuper Chartas, the ſcope of that Statute, among other things, being to provide for the better obſerving and maintaining of Magna Charta, hath in it nevertheleſs two Savings for the King; the one particular, as I take it, to preſerve the antient priſage, due and accuſtomed, as of wines, and other goods; the other general, ſeignory of the Crown in all things.

To theſe two Savings, beſides the former anſwers, which may be for the moſt part applied to this Statute as well as to the former, I add theſe further anſwers: The firſt of theſe two Savings, is of the ſame priſage of wines, which is excepted in the 25 Edw. I. but in ſome more clearneſs; for that here the word (wines) is expreſly annexed to the word (priſage) which I take for ſo much to be in expoſition of the former Law: And albeit theſe words (and of other goods) be added, yet do I take it to be but a particular Saving, or exception, which being qualified with the words (antient, due, and accuſ- accuſtomed) is not very dangerous, nor can be underſtood of priſage or leviesupon goods of all ſorts at the King's will and pleaſure; but only of the old and certain cuſtoms upon wool, woolfels, and leather, which were due to the Crown long before the making of this Statute.

For the latter of the two ſavings in this Act, which is of the more unuſual nature, and ſubject to the more exception; it is indeed general, and if we may believe the concurrent relations of the hiſtories of thoſe times, as well thoſe that are now printed, as thoſe that remain only in manuſcripts, it gave diſtaſte from the beginning, and wrought no good effect, but produced ſuch diſtempers and troubles in the State, as we wiſh may be buried in perpetual oblivion; and that the like ſaving in theſe and future times may never breed the like diſturbance: For from hence aroſe a jealouſy, that Magna Charta, which declareth the antient right of the Subject, and was an abſolute Law in itſelf, being now confirm'd by a latter Act, with this addition of a general ſaving; for the King's Right in all things by the ſaving was weakned, and that made doubtful, which was clear before. But not to depart from our main ground, which is, that ſavings in old Acts of Parliament, before the 2 H. V. are no proof that there were the like ſavings in the petitions for thoſe Acts; let me obſerve unto your Lordſhips, and ſo leave this point, That albeit this petition, whereon this Act of 28 Edw. I. was grounded, be periſhed; yet hath it pleaſed God, that the very frame and context of the Act itſelf, as it is drawn up, and entred upon the Statute-roll, and printed in our books, doth manifeſtly import, that this ſaving came in by the King's anſwer, and was not in the original petition of the Lords and Commons; for it cometh in at the end of the Act after the words (le Roy le veut) which commonly are the words of the Royal aſſent to an Act of Parliament. And though they be mixed and followed with other words, as though the King's Council, and the reſt who were preſent at the making of this ordinance, did intend the ſame ſaving; yet is not that concluſive, ſo long as by the form of thoſe times, the King's anſwer working upon the materials of the petition, might be conceived by ſome to make the Law effectual, though varying from the frame of the petition.

The next reaſon which the Commons have commanded me to uſe, for which they ſtill deſire to be ſpared from adding this clauſe to their petition, is this: this offenſive Law of 28 E. I. which confirmed Magna Charta, with a ſaving, reſted not long in peace, for it gave not that ſatisfaction to the Lords or people, as was requiſite they ſhould have in a caſe ſo nearly concerning them: And therefore about thirty three, or thirty four of the ſame King's reign, a latter Act of Parliament was made, whereby it was enacted, that all men ſhould have their Laws, and Liberties, and free Cuſtoms, as largely and wholly as they had uſed to have at any time, when they had them beſt; and if any Statutes had been made, or any Cuſtoms brought in to the contrary, that all ſuch Statutes and Cuſtoms ſhould be void.

This was the firſt Law which I call now to mind, that reſtored Magna Charta to the original purity wherein it was firſt molded, albeit it hath ſince been confirmed above twenty times more by ſeveral Acts of Parliament, in the reigns of divers moſt juſt and gracious Kings, who were moſt apprehenſive of their Rights, and jealous of their Honours, and always without ſavings; ſo as if between 22 and 34 Edw. I. Magna Charta ſtood blemiſhed with many ſavings of the King's Rights or Seigniory, which might be conceived to be above the Law; that ſtain and blemiſh was long ſince taken away, and cleared by thoſe many abſolute declarations and confirmations of that excellent Law which followed in after-ages, and ſo it ſtandeth at this day purged and exempted now from any ſuch ſaving whatſoever.

I beſeech your Lordſhips therefore to obſerve the circumſtance of time, wherein we offer this petition to be preſented to your Lordſhips, and by us unto his Majeſty: Do we offer it when Magna Charta ſtands clogged with ſavings? No, my Lords, but at this day when latter and better confirmations have vindicated and ſet free that Law from all exceptions; and ſhall we now annex another and worſe ſaving to it, by an unneceſſary clauſe in that petition, which we expect ſhould have the fruits and effects of a Law? Shall we ourſelves relinquiſh or adulterate that, which coſt our Anceſtors ſuch care and trouble to purchaſe and refine? No, my Lords, but as we ſhould hold ourſelves unhappy, if we ſhould not amend the wretched eſtate of the poor Subject, ſo let us hold it a wickedneſs to impair it.

Whereas it was further urged by your Lordſhips, That to inſert this clauſe into our petition, would be no more than to do that again at your Lordſhips motion and requeſt, which we had formerly done by the mouth of our Speaker; and that there is no cauſe why we ſhould recede from that which ſo ſolemny we have profeſſed: To this I anſwer and confeſs, it was then in our hearts, and it is now, and ſhall be ever, not to incroach on his Majeſty's ſovereign power. But I beſeech your Lordſhips to obſerve the different occaſion and reference of that proteſtation, and of this clauſe.

That was a general anſwer to a general meſſage, which we received from his Majeſty, warning us not to incroach upon his prerogative; to which, like dutiful and loving Subjects, we anſwer'd at full, according to the integrity of our own hearts; nor was there any danger in making ſuch an anſwer to ſuch a meſſage, nor could we anſwer more truly or more properly: but did that anſwer extend to acknowledge a ſovereign power in the King, above the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our petition, or controul the Liberties of the Subject, therein declared and demanded? No, my Lords, it hath no reference to any ſuch particulars; and the ſame words which in ſome caſes may be fit to be uſed, and were unmannerly to be omitted, cannot in other caſes be ſpoken, but with impertinency at the leaſt, if not with danger. I have formerly opened my reaſons, proving the danger of this clauſe, and am commanded to illuſtrate the impertinency of adding it to the petition by a familiar caſe, which was put in our Houſe by a learned Gentleman, and of my own robe: The caſe is this, Two Mannors or Lordſhips lie adjoining together, and perchance intermixed, ſo as there is ſome difficulty to diſcern the true bounds of either; as it may be touching the confines where the Liberty of the Subject, and the prerogative of the Crown do border each upon the other; to the one of the Mannors the King hath clear right, and is in actual poſſeſſion of it; but the other is the Subjects. The King being miſinformed, that the Subject hath intruded upon his Majeſty's Mannor, aſketh his Subject, whether he doth enter upon his Majeſty's Mannor, or pre-pretendeth any title to it, or any part of it. The Subject being now juſtly occaſioned, maketh anſwer truly to the King, that he hath not intruded, nor will intrude upon his Majeſty's Mannor, nor doth make any claim or title to it, or any part of it. This anſwer is proper and fair; nay, it were unmannerly and ill done of the Subject not to anſwer upon this occaſion. Afterwards the King, upon colour of ſome double or ſingle matter of Record, ſeizeth into his Highneſs's hands, upon a pretended title, the Subject's Mannor: The Subject then exhibiteth his petition of Right, to his Majeſty, to retain reſtitution of his own Mannor, and therein layeth down title to his own Mannor only: Were it not improper and abſurd in this caſe for him to tell the King, that he did not intend to make any claim or title to his Majeſty's Mannors, which is not queſtioned? Doubtleſs it were. This caſe rightly applied, will fit our purpoſe well, and notably explain the nature of our petition.

Why ſhould we ſpeak of leaving entire the King's ſovereign power, whereon we incroach not, while we only ſeek to recover our own Liberties and Privileges, which have been ſeized upon by ſome of the King's Miniſters? If our petition did trench actually upon his Majeſty's prerogative, would our ſaying, that we intended it not, make the thing otherwiſe than the truth?

My Lords, there needeth no proteſtation or declaration to the contrary of that which we have not done; and to put in ſuch a clauſe, cannot argue leſs than a fear in us, as if we had invaded it: which we hold ſacred, and are aſſured, that we have not touched either in our words, or in our intentions. And touching your Lordſhips obſervation upon the word (Leave) if it be not a proper word to give any new thing to the King, ſure we are, it is a word dangerous in another ſenſe; for it may amount, without all queſtion, to acknowledge an old right of ſovereign power in his Majeſty, above thoſe Laws and Statutes, whereon only our Liberties are founded; a doctrine which we moſt humbly crave your Lordſhips leave freely to proteſt againſt. And for your Lordſhips proffering, that ſome ſaving ſhould be requiſite for preſervation of his Majeſty's ſovereign power, in reſpect our petition runneth in larger words than our Laws and Statutes whereon we ground it; what is this but a clear confeſſion by your Lordſhips, that this clauſe was intended by you to be that ſaving? for other ſaving than this, we find not tendred by you: and if it be ſuch a ſaving, how can it ſtand with your Lordſhips other arguments, that it ſhould be of no other effect than our former expreſſion to his Majeſty by the mouth of our Speaker? But I will not inſiſt upon collections of this kind; I will only ſhew you the reaſons of the Commons, why this petition needeth no ſuch ſaving, albeit the words of theſe Statutes be exceeded in the declaratory part of our petition: thoſe things that are within the equity, and true meaning of a Statute, are as good Laws as thoſe which are contained in the expreſs Letter, and therefore the Statutes of the 42 Ed. III. 36 H. 3 Rot. Par. N. 12. and other the Statutes made in this time of King Edw. III. for the explanation of Magna Charta, which hath been ſo often vouched in this Parliament, though they differ in words from Magna Charta, had no ſaving annexed to any of them, becauſe they enacted more than was contained in effect in that good Law, under the words, per legale judicium parium ſuorum, aut per legem terræ; which by theſe latter Laws are expounded to import, that none ſhould be put to anſwer without preſentment, or matter of Record, or by due proceſs, or Writ Original; and if otherwiſe, it ſhould be void, and holden for error.

It hath not been yet ſhewn unto us from your Lordſhips, that we have in any of our expreſſions or applications ſtrained or miſapplied any of the Laws or Statutes whereon we do inſiſt; and we are very confident and well aſſured, that no ſuch miſtaking can be aſſigned in any point of our petition, now under queſtion: if therefore it do not exceed the true ſenſe and conſtruction of Magna Charta in the ſubſequent Laws of explanation, whereon it is grounded, what reaſon is there to add a ſaving to this petition, more than to thoſe Laws? ſince we deſire to tranſmit the fruits of theſe our labours to poſterity, not only for the juſtification of ourſelves in right of our preſent, and their future Liberties; but alſo for a brave expreſſion and perpetual teſtimony of that grace and juſtice, which we aſſure ourſelves we ſhall receive in his Majeſty's ſpeedy and clear anſwer. This is the thing we ſeek for, and this is the thing we hoped for, and this is the thing only will ſettle ſuch an unity and confidence betwixt his Majeſty and us, and raiſe ſuch a chearfulneſs in the hearts of all his loving Subjects, as will make us proceed unanimouſly, and with all expedition to ſupply him for his great occaſions in ſuch meaſure, and in ſuch way, as may make him ſafe at home, and feared abroad.

Sir Henry Martin. My Lords, the work of this day, wherein the Houſe of Commons hath imployed the Gentleman that ſpake laſt, and myſelf, was to reply to the anſwer, which it hath pleaſed the Lord-Keeper to make to thoſe reaſons, which we had offered to your Lorſhips conſideration, in juſtification of our refuſal, not to admit into our petition the addition commended by your Lordſhips. Which reaſons of ours, ſince they have not given ſuch ſatisfaction as we deſired, and well hoped, as by the Lord-Keeper's anſwer appeared; it was thought fit for our better order and method in replying, to divide the Lord-Keeper's anſwer into two parts, a Legal and a Rational: The reply to the Legal your Lordſhips have heard, myſelf comes intruſted to reply to the Rational, which alſo conſiſted of two branches, the firſt deduced from the whole context of the additional clauſe, the ſecond inforced out of ſome part.

In the firſt were theſe reaſons, that the ſame deſerved our acceptance. Firſt, as ſatisfactory to the King; Secondly, to your Lordſhips; Thirdly, agreeable to what ourſelves had often proteſted, and profeſſed expreſly by the mouth of our Speaker.

I muſt confeſs theſe motives were weighty and of great force; and therefore to avoid miſunderſtanding and miſconceit, which otherwiſe might be taken againſt the Houſe of Commons upon the refuſal of the propounded addition, it is neceſſary to ſtate the queſtion rightly, and to ſet down the true difference between your Lordſhips and us. Now, indeed, there is no difference or queſtion between your Lordſhips and us, concerning this additional clauſe in the nature and quality of a propoſition. For ſo conſidered, we ſay it is moſt true, and to be received and embraced by us, in toto & qualibet parte & qualibet ſyllaba; yea, and were that the queſtion, we ſhould add to the addition, and inſtead of due regard, ſay we have had, have, and ever will have a ſpecial and ſingular regard, where to leave intire ſovereign Power. But this were to intimate, as if we had firſt cropt, and then left it; but our regard was to acknowledge acknowledge and confeſs it ſincerely, and to maintain it conſtantly, even to the hazard of our goods and lives, if need be.

To which purpoſe your Lordſhips may be pleaſed to remember that ſtrict oath every member of our Houſe hath taken this very ſeſſion, in theſe words; I (A. B.) do utterly teſtify and declare in my conſcience, That the King's Highneſs is the ſupreme ſovereign Governour of this Realm in all cauſes, &c. and to my utmoſt power will aſſiſt and defend all Juriſdictions, Privileges, Prehemінences and Authorities, granted or belonging to the King's Highneſs, or united or annexed to the imperial Crown of this Realm, &c.

So that your Lordſhips need not to borrow from our proteſtations any exhortations to us, to entertain a writing in aſſiſtance of the King's ſovereign Power, ſince we ſtand obliged by the moſt ſacred bond of a ſolemn oath, to aſſiſt and defend the ſame, if cauſe or occaſion ſo required. So that the only queſtion between your Lordſhips and us, is, whether this clauſe ſhould be added to our petition, and received into it as part thereof; which to do, your Lordſhips reaſons have not perſuaded us, becauſe ſo to admit it, were to overthrow the fabrick and ſubſtance of our Petition of Right, and to annihilate the right pretended by us and the petition itſelf in effect: For theſe words being added to our Petition, viz. "we humbly preſent this peti-"tion, &c. with due regard to leave entire your ſo-"vereign Power," &c. do include manifeſtly an exception to our Petition; and an exception being of the nature of the thing whereunto it is an exception, exceptio eſt de regula, muſt of neceſſity deſtroy the Rule or Petition, ſo far as to the caſe excepted; Exceptio firmat regulam in caſibus non exceptis, in caſibus exceptis deſtruit regulam. Then this conſtruction followeth upon our petition thus inlarged, that after we have petitioned, that no freeman ſhould be compelled by impriſonment to lend or contribute money to his Majeſty without his aſſent in Parliament, nor receive, againſt his will, Soldiers into his Houſe, or undergo a commiſſion of Martial Law, for Life or Member in time of peace; we ſhould add, Except his Majeſty be pleaſed to require our moneys, and impriſon us for not lending, and ſend Soldiers into our Houſes, and execute us by Martial Law in time of peace, by virtue of his ſovereign Power: which conſtruction, as it followeth neceſſarily upon this enlargement, ſo it concludeth againſt our right in the premiſſes, and utterly fruſtrateth all our petition; neither may it ſeem ſtrange, if this clauſe additional (which of itſelf is in quality of a propoſition we confeſs) being added to our petition (which alſo is true) ſhould overthrow the very frame and fabrick of it, ſeeing the Logicians take knowledge of ſuch a fallacy, called by them, Fallacia à bene diviſis ad male conjuncta. Horace the Poet giveth an inſtance to this purpoſe, in a Painter, who when he had painted the head of a man according to art, would then join to it the neck of a horſe, and ſo mar the one and the other; whereas each by itſelf might have been a piece of right good workmanſhip.

The ſecond branch of my Lord-Keeper's rational part, was enforced out of the laſt words of this addition, by which his Lordſhip ſaid, that they did not leave intire all ſovereign Power, but that wherewith his Majeſty is truſted, for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of the people; as if his Lordſhip would infer, that ſovereign Power wherewith, &c. in this place to be Terminum diminuentem, a term of diminution or qualification, and in that conſideration might induce us to accept it. But under his Lordſhip's correction, we cannot ſo interpret it: For firſt we are aſſured, that there is no ſovereign Power wherewith his Majeſty is truſted, either by God, or Man, but only that which is for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of his people; and therefore, that limitation can make no impreſſion upon us: but we conceive it rather in this place to have the force Termini adaugentis, to be a term of important advantage, againſt our petition, a term of reſtriction, and that whereſoever his Majeſty's ſovereign Power ſhould be exerciſed upon us; in all or any the particulars mentioned in the Petition, we ſhould, without further enquiry, ſubmit thereunto, as aſſuming and taking it pro conceſſo, it conduced to our ſafety and happineſs, &c. Since therefore (as the petition is now conceived) it carrieth the form and face of a picture, which repreſenteth to the life the preſſures and grievances of the people, with the eaſy remedies; and therefore we hope that his Majeſty, caſting upon it a gracious eye, will compaſſionate his poor loyal Subjects, and afford a comfortable anſwer.

I do humbly praiſe your Lordſhips not no mar or blemiſh the grace and face of this picture with this unneceſſary addition; and unneceſſary I prove it to be, according to that rule, Expreſſio ejus quod tacite ineſt nihil operatur. And ſovereign Power, in caſes where it hath place, and ought to be uſed, is always neceſſarily underſtood, and though not expreſſed, yet ſupplied by reaſonable intendment, or by the opinion of all learned men.

And therefore, it neither is nor can be by us expreſly included, eſpecially in this petition, where the addition thereof would make ſuch a confuſion of the whole ſenſe and ſubſtance.

The King's ſovereign Power and Prerogative is always able to ſave itſelf; and if it were not, we muſt, without this addition, ſave it to our utmoſt powers, if we will ſave our oath, and ſave ourſelves. The true ſtate of the cauſe thus ſtanding between your Lordſhips and us, the Houſe of Commons doth not a little marvel upon what grounds your Lordſhips are ſo earneſt to urge upon them this addition to be inſerted into their petition; they nothing doubt, but the ſame proceeded out of a ſollicitude and fear, which your Lordſhips have, leſt otherwiſe the ſimple and abſolute paſſage of this petition might be conſtrued hereafter in prejudice of his Majeſty's ſovereign Power: And this your Lordſhips ſollicitude and fear proceedeth from your love, as the Poet ſaith, Res eſt ſolliciti plena timoris Amor.

But I humbly pray your Lordſhips to examine with us, the grounds of this your ſollicitude and fear; which grounds muſt needs be laid either upon the words of the petition, or the intention of the petitioners.

Upon the words there is no poſſibility to lay them, for therein is no mention made of the ſovereign Power; and were the words doubtful, as thus, We pray the like things be not done hereafter, under pretext of your Majeſty's ſovereign Power; yet in reſpect of the proteſtations preceeding, concomitant and ſubſequent to the petition, ſuch doubtful words ought reaſonably to be interpreted only of ſuch ſovereign Power, as was applicable to the caſes wherein it was exerciſed; and of ſuch ſovereign Power as ſhould be juſtly practiſed. But there are no ſuch doubtful words, and therefore it followeth, that your Lordſhips fear and ſollicitude muſt be grounded upon the intention of the petitioners. Now your Lordſhips will know, that the Houſe of Commons is not ignorant, that in a Seſſion of Parliament, though it continue ſo many weeks, as this hath done days, yet there is nothing prius & poſterius, but all things are held and taken as done at one time. If ſo, what a ſtrange collection was this, that at the ſame time, the Houſe of Commons ſhould oblige themſelves, by a fearful adjuration, to aſſiſt and defend all privileges and prerogatives belonging to the King, and at the ſame time by a petition (cautiouſly conveyed) endeavour or intend to diveſt and deprive the King of ſome prerogatives belonging to his Crown? If therefore ſuch fear and ſollicitude can neither be grounded upon the words of the petition, nor intention of the petitioners, I humbly pray your Lordſhips to lay them aſide. As we do believe that the propoſition of this addition from your Lordſhips, was not only excuſable, but commendable, as proceeding from your Love; ſo now having heard our reaſons, your Lordſhips would reſt ſatisfied, that our refuſal to admit them into our petition, proceedeth from the conſcience of the integrity and uprightneſs of our own hearts, that we in all this petition have no ſuch end to abate or diminiſh the King's juſt prerogative. And ſo much in reply to that rational part, whereby my Lord-Keeper laboured to perſuade the entertainment of this addition.

This being done, it pleaſed the Houſe of Commons to inſtruct and furniſh me with certain reaſons, which I ſhall uſe to your Lordſhips, to procure your abſolute conjunction with us in preſenting this petition; which albeit I cannot ſet forth according to their worth, and the inſtructions given me by the Houſe, yet, I hope, their own weight will ſo preſs down into your Lordſhips conſciences and judgments, that without farther ſcruple, you will chearfully vouchſafe to accompany this petition with your right noble preſence.

A perſonis. The firſt argument wherewith I was commanded to move your Lordſhips, was drawn from the conſideration of the perſons, which are petitioners, the Houſe of Commons; a Houſe, whoſe temper, mildneſs, and moderation in this Parliament hath been ſuch, as we ſhould be unthankful and injurious to Almighty God, if we ſhould not acknowledge his good hand upon us, upon our tongues, upon our hearts, procured, no doubt, by our late ſolemn and publick Humiliation and Prayers.

This moderation will the better appear, if, in the firſt place, we may be remembred, in what paſſion and diſtemper many Members of this Houſe arrived thither, what boſoms, what pockets full of complaints and lamentable grievances the moſt part brought thither, and thoſe every day renewed by letters and packets from all parts and quarters: You know the old proverb, Ubi dolor ibi digitus, ubi amor ibi oculus; it is hard to keep our fingers from often handling the parts ill affected; but yet our moderation overcame our paſſion, our diſcretion overcame our affection.

This moderation alſo will the better appear, if in the ſecond place it be not forgotten, how our anceſtors and predeceſſors carried themſelves in Parliaments, when upon lighter provocations, leſs would not ſerve their turns, but new ſevere commiſſions to hear and determine offences againſt their Liberties, publick eccleſiaſtical curſes, or excommunications againſt the authors or actors of ſuch violations, accuſations, condemnations, executions, baniſhments. But what have we ſaid all this Parliament? we only look forward, not backward: we deſire amendment hereafter, no man's puniſhment for aught done heretofore; nothing written by us in blood, nay, not one word ſpoken againſt any man's perſon in diſpleaſure. The concluſion of our petition is, that we may be better intreated in time to come: And doth not this moderate petition deſerve your Lordſhips chearful conjunction, ex congruo & condigno? If a worm being trodden upon, could ſpeak, a worm would ſay, Tread upon me no more, I pray you: Higher we riſe not, lower we cannot deſcend; and thus much we think in modeſty may well be ſpoken in our own commendation, thence to move your Lordſhips to vouchſafe us your noble company in this petition, without ſurcharging it with this addition.

A tempore. Our next argument is drawn à tempore, from the unſeaſonableneſs of the time. The Wiſeman ſaith, There is a time for all things under the Sun; Tempus ſuum. And if, in the wiſeman's judgment, a word ſpoken in its due time be precious as Gold and Silver, then an unſeaſonable time detracts as much from the thing or word done or ſpoken: We hold (under your favours) that the time is not ſeaſonable now for this addition. It is true, that of itſelf, ſovereign Power is a thing always ſo ſacred, that to handle it otherwiſe than tenderly, is a kind of ſacrilege, and to ſpeak of it otherwiſe than reverently, is a kind of Blaſphemy. But every vulgar capacity is not ſo affected, the moſt part of men, nay, almoſt all men, judge and eſteem all things, not according to their own intrinſick virtue and quality, but according to their immediate effects and operations, which the ſame things have upon them. Hence it is, that religion itſelf receiveth more or leſs credit or approbation, as the teachers or profeſſors are worſe or better; yea, if God himſelf ſend a very wet harveſt or ſeed-time, men are apt enough to cenſure divine power. The ſovereign Power hath not now, for the preſent, the antient amiable aſpect, in reſpect of ſome late ſad influences; but by God's grace it will ſoon recover.

To intermix with this petition any mention of ſovereign Power, rebus ſic ſtantibus, when angry men ſay, ſovereign Power hath been abuſed, and the moſt moderate wiſh it had not been ſo uſed; we hold it not ſeaſonable, under your Lordſhips correction.

A loco. Our next argument is drawn à loco: we think the Place where your Lordſhips would have this addition inſerted, viz. in the petition, no convenient or ſeaſonable place. Your Lordſhips will eaſily believe, that this petition will run through many hands, every man will be deſirous to ſee and to read, what their Knights and Burgeſſes have done in Parliament upon their complaints, what they have brought home for their five Subſidies: If, in peruſing of this petition, they fall upon the mention of ſovereign Power, they preſently fall to arguing and reaſoning, and deſcanting, what ſovereign Power is, what is the Latitude, whence the Original, and where the Bounds? with many ſuch curious and captious queſtions; by which courſe, ſovereign Power is little advanced or advantaged: for I have ever been of opinion, that it is then beſt with ſovereign Power, when it is had in tacit veneration, not when it is profaned by publick hearings or examinations.

Our

Our laſt Argument is drawn from our Duty and Loyalty to his Majeſty, in conſideration whereof, we are fearful at this time to take this addition into our petition, leſt we ſhould do his Majeſty herein ſome differvice: with your Lordſhips, we make the great Council of the King and Kingdom; and tho' your Lordſhips, having the happineſs to be near his Majeſty, know other things better, yet certainly the ſtate and condition of the ſeveral parts for which we ſerve, their diſpoſitions and inclinations, their apprehenſions, their fears and jealouſies, are beſt known unto us. And here I pray your Lordſhips to give me leave to uſe the figure called Reticentia, that is, to inſinuate and intimate more than I mean to ſpeak. Our chief and principal end in this Parliament, is, to make up all rents and breaches between the King and his Subjects, to draw them, and knit them together, from that diſtance, whereof the world abroad takes too much notice, to work a perfect union and reconciliation. How unproperly and unapt at this time this addition will be in reſpect of this end, we cannot but foreſee, and therefore ſhun it; and do reſolve, that it is neither agreeable to the perſons of ſuch Counſellors, of whom we are, nor anſwerable to that love and duty which we owe to his Majeſty, to hazard an end of ſuch unſpeakble conſequence, upon the admittance of this addition into our petition, whereof (as we have ſhewed) the omiſſion at this time can by no means harm the King's Prerogative, the expreſſion may produce manifold inconveniences. And therefore, ſince the admittance of your Lordſhips addition into our petition, is incoherent and incompatible with the body of the ſame; ſince there is no neceſſary uſe of it for the ſaving of the King's Prerogative; ſince the moderation of our petition deſerveth your Lordſhips chearful conjunction with us; ſince this addition is unſeaſonable for the time, and inconvenient in reſpect of the place where your Lordſhips would have it inſerted; and laſtly, may prove a differvice to his Majeſty: I conclude with a moſt affectionate prayer to your Lordſhips, to join with the Houſe of Commons, in preſenting this petition unto his Sacred Majeſty, as it is, without this addition.

Monday, 26*th of* May, the Lord Keeper made this Speech at a Conference.

Gentlemen,

YE that are Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, I have many times this Parliament, by command from my Lords, declared the great zeal and affection which my Lords have to maintain and nouriſh the good concurrence and correſpondency which hath hitherto continued between both Houſes, that there might be a happy iſſue in this great buſineſs, for the common good of the King and Kingdom. Now that which I have to ſay this day from my Lords, is, to let you know, this fair proceeding is not a profeſſion of words only, but really and indeed concerning the petition, which hath been long in agitation, as the weight of the cauſe required. Since the laſt conference, my Lords have taken it into their ſerious and inſtant conſideration, and at length are fallen upon a reſolution, which I am to acquaint you with.

The Lords have unanimouſly agreed with you in omnibus, and have voted, that they will join with you in your petition, with the only alteration of the word [means] to be put inſtead of the word [pretext;] and for the word [unlawful] to be put out, and in place thereof to add [not warrantable by the laws and ſtatutes of the Realm.] Which two alterations your ſelves conſented unto.

So that concerning this buſineſs there remains nothing now, but that having the petition in your hands, ye will (if ye have not already) vote it as they have done, and ſo prepare it for his Majeſty; and my Lords will take order, that the King be moved for a ſpeedy acceſs to preſent the ſame to his Majeſty.

And, after ſome pauſe, he ſaid, There reſts one thing which my Lords have commanded me to add, That in regard this petition toucheth upon certain charges raiſed by the Lords Lieutenants, and other perſons, many times for good uſe, for the ſervice and ſafety of the Kingdom; that ye take it into your care and conſideration, and to provide a law for aſſeſſing of ſuch charges, as the occaſion of the time ſhall require.

The Lords and Commons being thus happily accorded, the petition, with the aforeſaid amendments, was read in the Houſe two ſeveral times together: then it was voted upon queſtion, and that it ſhould be ingroſſed, and read the third time, and the Houſe to ſit in the afternoon till it was ingroſſed, and read, and ordered to be preſented to the King; to which there was not a negative vote.

Wedneſday, 28 May, the Lords and Commons had a conference about the manner of delivery of the petition; and Sir Ed. Coke reported, That their Lordſhips were agreed, That no addition or preface be uſed to the King, but that the petition be preferred to his Majeſty by command of the Lords and Commons; and his Majeſty be deſired, that to content his people, he would be pleaſed to give his gracious anſwer in full Parliament.

Monday, 2*d* June, the King came to the Parliament, and ſpake thus in brief to both Houſes.

Gentlemen,

I Am come hither to perform my duty; I think no man can think it long, ſince I have not taken ſo many days in anſwering the petition, as you ſpent weeks in framing it: and I am come hither to ſhew you, that as well in formal things as in eſſential, I deſire to give you as much content as in me lies.

After this, the Lord Keeper ſpake as followeth:

MY Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, his Majeſty hath commanded me to ſay unto you, that he takes it in good part, that in conſideration of ſettling your own Liberties, you have generally profeſſed in both Houſes, that you have no intention to leſſen or diminiſh his Majeſty's Prerogative; wherein as you have cleared your own intentions, ſo now his Majeſty comes to clear his, and to ſubſcribe a firm league with his people, which is ever likely to be moſt conſtant and perpetual, when the conditions are equal, and known to be ſo: theſe cannot be in a more happy eſtate, than when your Liberties ſhall be an ornament and a ſtrength to his Majeſty's Prerogative, and his Prerogative a defence of your Liberties; in this his Majeſty doubts not, but both he and you ſhall take a mutual comfort hereafter; and, for his part, he is reſolved to give an example, in the uſing of his power for the preſervation of your Liberties, that hereafter ye ſhall have no cauſe to complain. This is the ſum of that which I am to ſay to you from his Majeſty: and that which farther remains, is, that you here read your own petition, and his Majeſty's gracious anſwer.

The Petition exhibited to his Majeſty by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, concerning divers Rights and Liberties of the Subjects.

To the King's moſt Excellent Majeſty.

I. HUmbly ſhew unto our Sovereign Lord the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament aſſembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted by a Statute made in the time of the Reign of K. Edward the firſt, commonly called, Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo *, that no tallage or aid ſhall be laid or levied, by the King or his Heirs, in this Realm, without the good will and aſſent of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, Knights, Burgeſſes, and other the Freemen of the Commonalty of this Realm: and by authority of Parliament holden in the five and twentieth year of the Reign of King Edward the third †, it is declared and enacted, That from thenceforth no perſon ſhall be compelled to make any Loans to the King againſt his will, becauſe ſuch Loans were againſt reaſon, and the Franchiſe of the Land; and by other ‡ Laws of this Realm it is provided, that none ſhould be charged by any charge or impoſition, called a Benevolence, nor by ſuch like charge; by which the Statutes before-mentioned, and other the good Laws and Statutes of this Realm, your Subjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not ſet by common conſent in Parliament.

II. Yet nevertheleſs, of late, divers Commiſſions, directed to ſundry Commiſſioners in ſeveral Counties, with inſtructions, have iſſued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places aſſembled, and required to lend certain ſums of money unto your Majeſty, and many of them, upon their refuſal ſo to do, have had an oath adminiſtred unto them, not warrantable by the Laws or Statutes of this Realm, and have been conſtrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your Privy-Council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore impriſoned, confined, and ſundry other ways moleſted and diſquieted. And divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in ſeveral Counties, by Lords Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Commiſſioners for Muſters, Juſtices of Peace, and others, by command and direction from your Majeſty, or your Privy-Council, againſt the Laws and free Cuſtoms of this Realm.

III. And whereas alſo by the Statute called ‖, The great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no Freeman may be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeiſed of his Freehold or Liberties, or his free Cuſtoms, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner deſtroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land.

IV. And in the eight and twentieth year of the Reign of King Edward the third , it was declared and enacted by authority of Parliament, that no man, of what eſtate or condition he be, ſhould be put out of his Land or Tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſherited, nor put to death, without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of Law.

V. Nevertheleſs, againſt the tenor of the ſaid Statutes ††, and other the good Laws and Statutes of your Realm, to that end provided, divers of your Subjects have of late been impriſoned, without any cauſe ſhewed; and when for their deliverance they were brought before your Juſtices, by your Majeſty's Writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the Court ſhould order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cauſes of their detainer; no cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your Majeſty's ſpecial Command, ſignified by the Lords of your Privy-Council, and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make anſwer according to the Law.

[The ſixth, ſeventh, eighth, and ninth Clauſes, relating to billeting of Soldiers and martial Law, are not here inſerted.]

X. They do therefore humbly pray your moſt excellent Majeſty ‡‡, 1. That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any Gift, Loan, Benevolence, Tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent by Act of Parliament; 2. and that none be called to make anſwer, or take ſuch oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for refuſal thereof: 3. and that no Freeman in any ſuch manner as is before-mentioned, be impriſoned or detained.

XI. All which they moſt humbly pray of your moſt excellent Majeſty, as their Rights and Liberties, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm: and that your Majeſty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premiſſes, ſhall not be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example: and that your Majeſty would be alſo graciouſly pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafety of your people, to declare your Royal will and pleaſure, that in the things aforeſaid, all your Officers and Miniſters ſhall ſerve you, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, as they tender the Honour of your Majeſty, and the Proſperity of this Kingdom. [See Statutes at large, 3,4 Car. I.]

Which petition being read the 2*d* of June, 1628. the King's anſwer was thus delivered by the Lord-Keeper:

The King willeth, that right be done according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm; and that the Statutes be put in due execution, that his Subjects may have no cauſe to complain of any wrong or oppreſſions, contrary to their juſt Rights and Liberties; to the preſervation whereof, he holds himſelf in conſcience as well obliged, as of his Prerogative.

On Tueſday, June 3. the King's anſwer was read in the Houſe of Commons, and ſeemed not full enough, in regard of ſo much expence of time and labour, as had been imployed in contriving the petition.

June 3. A Meſſage was brought from the King by the Speaker,

THAT his Majeſty having, upon the petition, exhibited by both Houſes, given an anſwer full of juſtice and grace, for which we and our poſterity have juſt cauſe to bleſs his Majeſty, it

* 34 Edw. I.  28 Edw. III. 3. † 25 Edw. III. Rot. Parl. †† 37 Edw. III. 18. 38 Edw. III. 9. ‡ 1 Edw. III. 6. 11 R. II. 9. 1 R. III. 2. 42 Edw. III. 3. 17 Ric. II. 6. ‖ 9 Hen. III. 29. ‡‡ 25 Edw. I. 6.

it is now time to grow to a concluſion of the Seſſion; and therefore his Majeſty thinks fit to let you know, that as he doth reſolve to abide by that anſwer, without further change or alteration, ſo he will Royally and Really perform unto you what he hath thereby promiſed: and further, that he reſolves to end this Seſſion upon Wedneſday the 11*th* of this month. And therefore wiſheth, that the Houſe will ſeriouſly attend thoſe buſineſſes, which may beſt bring the Seſſion to a happy concluſion, without entertaining new matters; and ſo husband the time, that his Majeſty may with the more comfort bring us ſpeedily together again: at which time, if there be any further grievances not contained, or expreſſed in the petition, they may be more maturely conſidered than the time will now permit.

Another Meſſage was brought from his Majeſty by the Speaker, Thurſday 5*th of* June.

HIS Majeſty wiſhed them to remember the Meſſage he laſt ſent them, by which he ſet a day for the end of this Seſſion, and he commanded the Speaker to let them know, that he will certainly hold that day prefix'd without alteration; and becauſe that cannot be, if the Houſe entertain more buſineſs of length, he requires them, that they enter not into, or proceed with any new buſineſs, which may ſpend greater time, or which may lay any ſcandal or aſperſion upon the State-government, or Miniſters thereof.

Sir Robert Philips, upon this occaſion, expreſſed himſelf thus: I perceive, that towards God, and towards man, there is little hope, after our humble and careful endeavours, ſeeing our ſins are many and ſo great: I conſider my own infirmities, and if ever my paſſions were wrought upon, that now this Meſſage ſtirs me up eſpecially; when I remember with what moderation we have proceeded, I cannot but wonder to ſee the miſerable ſtraight we are now in: What have we not done, to have merited? Former times have given wounds enough to the people's Liberty, we came hither full of wounds, and we have cured what we could; and what is the return of all, but miſery and deſolation? What did we aim at, but to have ſerved his Majeſty, and to have done that that would have made him Great and Glorious? If this be a fault, then we are all criminous. What ſhall we do, ſince our humble purpoſes are thus prevented, which were not to have laid any aſperſion on the Government, ſince it tended to no other end, but to give his Majeſty true information of his and our danger? And to this we are enforced out of a neceſſity of duty to the King, our Country, and to Poſterity; but we being ſtopped, and ſtopped in ſuch manner, as we are enjoined, ſo we muſt now leave to be a Council. I hear this with that grief, as the ſaddeſt Meſſage of the greateſt loſs in the world. But let us ſtill be wiſe, be humble; let us make a fair Declaration to the King.

Sir John Elliot.] Our ſins are ſo exceeding great, that unleſs we ſpeedily return to God, God will remove himſelf further from us; ye know with what affection and integrity we have proceeded hitherto, to have gained his Majeſty's heart, and out of a neceſſity of our duty, were brought to that courſe we were in: I doubt, a miſrepreſentation to his Majeſty hath drawn this mark of his diſpleaſure upon us: I obſerve in the Meſſage amongſt other ſad particulars, it is conceived, that we were about to lay ſome aſperſions on the Government; give me leave to proteſt, that ſo clear were our intentions, that we deſire only to vindicate thoſe diſhonours to our King and Country, &c. It is ſaid alſo, as if we caſt ſome aſperſions on his Majeſty's Miniſters; I am confident no Miniſter, how dear ſoever, can ——

Here the Speaker ſtarted up from the ſeat of the Chair, apprehending Sir John Elliot intended to fall upon the Duke, and ſome of the Miniſters of State; and ſaid, There is a command laid upon me, that I muſt command you not to proceed. Whereupon Sir John Elliot ſate down.

Sir Dudley Diggs.] I am as much grieved as ever, Muſt we not proceed? let us ſit in ſilence, we are miſerable, we know not what to do.

Hereupon there was a ſilence in the Houſe for a while, which was broken by Sir Nathaniel Rich, in theſe words:

Sir Nathaniel Rich.] We muſt now ſpeak, or for ever hold our peace; for us to be ſilent when King and Kingdom are in this calamity, is not fit. The queſtion is, whether we ſhall ſecure our ſelves by ſilence, yea or no? I know it is more for our own ſecurity, but it is not for the ſecurity of thoſe for whom we ſerve; let us think on them: ſome inſtruments deſire a change, we fear his Majeſty's ſafety, and the ſafety of the Kingdom, I do not ſay we now ſee it; and ſhall we now ſit ſtill and do nothing, and ſo be ſcattered? Let us go together to the Lords, and ſhew our dangers, that we may then go to the King together.

Others ſaid, that the Speech lately ſpoken by Sir John Elliot, had given offence (as they feared) to his Majeſty.

Whereupon the Houſe declared, That every Member of the Houſe is free from any undutiful Speech, from the beginning of the Parliament to that day; and ordered, that the Houſe be turned into a Committee, to conſider what is fit to be done for the ſafety of the Kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of going to the Tower. But before the Speaker left the Chair, he deſired leave to go forth; and the Houſe ordered that he may go forth, if he pleaſe. And the Houſe was hereupon turned into a Grand Committee; Mr. Whitby in the Chair.

Mr. Wandesford.] I am as full of grief as others, let us recollect our Engliſh Hearts, and not ſit ſtill, but do our duties: two ways are propounded, to go to the Lords, or to the King; I think it is fit we go to the King, for this doth concern our Liberties, and let us not fear to make a Remonſtrance of our Rights; we are his Counſellors. There are ſome men which call evil good, and good evil, and bitter ſweet: Juſtice is now called popularity and faction.

Sir Edward Coke.] We have dealt with that duty and moderation that never was the like, Rebus ſic ſtantibus, after ſuch a violation of the Liberties of the Subject; let us take this to heart. In 30 E. 3. were they then in doubt in Parliament to name men that miſled the King? they accuſed John de Gaunt, the King's Son, and Lord Latimer, and Lord Nevil, for miſadviſing the King, and they went to the Tower for it; now when there is ſuch a downfall of the State, ſhall we hold our tongues? How ſhall we anſwer our duties to God and men? 7 H. 4. Parl. Rot. numb. 31, & 32. 11 H. 4. numb. 13. there the Council are complained of, and are removed from the King; they mewed up the King, and diſſuaded him from the common good; and why are we now retired from that way we were in? Why may we not name thoſe that are the cauſe of all our evils? In 4 H. 3. & 27 E. 3. & 13 R. 2. the Parliament moderated the King's Prerogative; and nothing grows to abuſe, but this Houſe hath power to treat of it. What ſhall we do? let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not proſper us. I think the Duke of Buckingham is the cauſe of all our miſeries; and till the King be informed thereof, we ſhall never go out with honour, or ſit with honour here; that man is the grievance of grievances: let us ſet down the cauſes of all our diſaſters, and all will reflect upon him. As for going to the Lords, that is not via Regia; our Liberties are now impeached, we are concerned; it is not via Regia, the Lords are not participant with our Liberties.

Tower

Mr. Selden adviſed, That a Declaration be drawn under four Heads. 1. To expreſs the Houſe's dutiful carriage towards his Majeſty. 2. To tender their Liberties that are violated. 3. To preſent what the purpoſe of the Houſe was to have dealt in. 4. That that great perſon, viz. the Duke, fearing himſelf to be queſtioned, did interpoſe and cauſe this diſtraction. All this time (ſaid he) we have caſt a mantle on what was done laſt Parliament; but now being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun, and let the charge be renewed that was laſt Parliament againſt him, to which he made an anſwer, but the particulars were ſufficient, that we might demand judgment on that anſwer only.

In concluſion, the Houſe agreed upon ſeveral Heads for a Remonſtrance. But the Speaker (who after he had leave to go forth, went privately to the King) brought this Meſſage,

That his Majeſty commands for the preſent they adjourn the Houſe till to-morrow morning, and that all Committees ceaſe in the mean time. And the Houſe was accordingly adjourned.

At the ſame time the King ſent for the Lord-Keeper to attend him preſently; the Houſe of Lords was adjourned ad libitum. The Lord-Keeper being returned, and the Houſe reſumed, his Lordſhip ſignified his Majeſty's deſire, that the Houſe and all Committees be adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Friday, 6th of June, Mr. Speaker brings another Meſſage from the King.

IN my ſervice to this Houſe I have had many undeſerved favours from you, which I ſhall ever with all humbleneſs acknowledge, but none can be greater than that teſtimony of your confidence yeſterday ſhewed unto me, whereby I hope I have done nothing, or made any repreſentation to his Majeſty, but what is for the honour and ſervice of this Houſe; and I will have my tongue cleave to my mouth, before I will ſpeak to the diſadvantage of any Member thereof: I have now a Meſſage to deliver unto you;

Whereas his Majeſty underſtanding, that you did conceive his laſt Meſſage to reſtrain you in your juſt Privileges, theſe are to declare his intentions, That he had no meaning of barring you from what hath been your Right, but only to avoid all ſcandals on his Council and Actions paſt, and that his Miniſters might not be, nor himſelf, under their names, taxed for their Counſel unto his Majeſty, and that no ſuch particulars ſhould be taken in hand, as would ask a longer time of conſideration than what he hath already prefixed, and ſtill reſolves to hold; that ſo, for this time, Chriſtendom might take notice of a ſweet parting between him and his people: Which if it fall out, his Majeſty will not be long from another meeting, when ſuch grievances (if there be any) at their leiſure and convenience may be conſidered.

Mr. Speaker proceeded:

I will obſerve ſomewhat out of this Meſſage; ye may obſerve a great inclination in his Majeſty to meet in this Houſe. I was bold yeſterday to take notice of that liberty ye gave me to go to his Majeſty; I know there are none here but did imagine whither I went, and but that I knew ye were deſirous and content that I ſhould leave you, I would not have deſired it: give me leave to ſay, This Meſſage bars you not of your Right in matter, nay, not in manner; but it reacheth to his Counſels paſt, and for giving him counſel in thoſe things which he commanded.

The Houſe of Lords likewiſe received this Meſſage by the Lord-Keeper.

MY Lords, his Majeſty takes notice, to your great advantage, of the proceedings of this Houſe upon the hearing of his Majeſty's Meſſage yeſterday; he accounts it a fair reſpect, that ye would neither agree on any Committee, or ſend any Meſſage to his Majeſty, though it were in your own hearts, but yield your ſelves to his Majeſty's Meſſage, and defer your own reſolutions till you meet again at the time appointed by his Majeſty. Yet his Majeſty takes it in extreme good part to hear what was in your heart, and eſpecially that you were ſo ſenſible of the inconvenience that might enſue upon the breach of this Parliament: which if it had happen'd, or ſhall hereafter happen, his Majeſty aſſures himſelf, that he ſhall ſtand clear before God and men of the occaſion.

But his Majeſty ſaith, Ye had juſt cauſe to be ſenſible of the danger, conſidering how the ſtate of Chriſtendom now ſtands in reſpect of the multitude and ſtrength of our enemies, and weakneſs on our part. All which his Majeſty knows very exactly, and, in reſpect thereof, called this Parliament; the particulars his Majeſty holds it needleſs to recite, eſpecially to your Lordſhips, ſince they are apparent to all men: neither will it be needful to reiterate them to his Majeſty, whoſe cares are moſt attentive upon them, and the beſt remedy that can be thought on therein, is, if his Subjects do their parts. Therefore his Majeſty gives you hearty thanks, and bid me tell you, that nothing hath been more acceptable to him all the time of this Parliament, than this dutiful and diſcreet carriage of your Lordſhips, which he profeſſeth hath been a chief motive to his Majeſty, to ſuſpend thoſe intentions that were not far from a reſolution.

Sir

Sir Robert Philips aſſumed the debate, upon the Meſſage delivered by the Speaker, and ſaid; I riſe up with a diſpoſition, ſomewhat in more hope of comfort than yeſterday; yet, in regard of the uncertainty of Counſels, I ſhall not change much. In the firſt place, I muſt be bold without flattering, a thing not incident to me, to tell you (Mr. Speaker) you have not only at all times diſcharged the duty of a good Speaker, but of a good man; for which I render you many thanks.

Another reſpect touching his Majeſty's anſwer to our petition; firſt, if that anſwer fall out to be ſhort, I free his Majeſty, and I believe his reſolution was to give that which we all expected: but in that, as in others, we have ſuffered, by reaſon of interpoſed perſons between his Majeſty and us. But this day is by intervenient accidents diverted from that, but ſo, as in time we go to his Majeſty: therefore let us remove thoſe jealouſies in his Majeſty of our proceedings, that by ſome men overgrown, have been miſrepreſented. We have proceeded with temper in confidence of his Majeſty's goodneſs to us, and our fidelity to him; and if any have conſtrued, that what we have done, hath been out of fear, let him know, we came hither Freemen, and will ever reſolve to endure the worſt; and they are poor men, that make ſuch interpretations of Parliaments. In this way and method we proceeded, and if any thing fall out unhappily, it is not King Charles that adviſed himſelf, but King Charles miſadviſed by others, and miſled by miſ-ordered Counſel; it becomes us to conſider what we were doing, and now to adviſe what is fit to be done. We were taking conſideration of the State of the Kingdom, and to preſent to his Majeſty the danger he and we are in, if ſince any man hath been named in particular (though I love to ſpeak of my betters with humility) let him thank himſelf and his Counſels, but thoſe neceſſary jealouſies give us occaſion to name him; I aſſure my ſelf we ſhall proceed with temper, and give his Majeſty ſatisfaction, if we proceed in that way. His Majeſty's Meſſage is now explanatory in point of our Liberties, that he intends not to bar us of our Rights, and that he would not have any aſperſion caſt on the Counſels paſt; let us preſent to his Majeſty ſhortly and faithfully, and declare our intentions, that we intend not to lay any aſperſions upon him, but out of a neceſſity to prevent the imminent dangers we are ſurrounded with, and to preſent to him the affairs at home and abroad, and to deſire his Majeſty, that no interpoſition or miſ-information of men in fault may prevail, but to expect the iſſue that ſhall be full of duty and loyalty.

The Commons ſent a meſſage to the Lords, that they would join in an humble requeſt to the King, that a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer be given by his Majeſty in full Parliament to the Petition of Right; whereunto the Lords did agree.

June the ſeventh, the King came to the Lords Houſe, and the Houſe of Commons were ſent for. And the Lord-Keeper preſented the humble petition of both Houſes, and ſaid,

MAY it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament aſſembled, taking into conſideration that the good intelligence between your Majeſty and your people doth much depend upon your Majeſty's anſwer unto their Petition of Right formerly preſented, with unanimous conſent do now become moſt humble Suitors unto your Majeſty, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to give a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer thereunto in full Parliament.

Whereunto the King replied,

The anſwer I have already given you, was made with ſo good deliberation, and approved by the judgments of ſo many wiſe men, that I could not have imagined but it ſhould have given you full ſatisfaction; but to avoid all ambiguous interpretations, and to ſhew you that there is no doubleneſs in my meaning, I am willing to pleaſe you as well in words as in ſubſtance; read your petition, and you ſhall have an anſwer that I am ſure will pleaſe you.

The petition was read, and this anſwer was returned: Soit droit fait come il eſt deſire, par le petition.

C. R.

This I am ſure (ſaid his Majeſty) is full, yet no more than I granted you in my firſt anſwer; for the meaning of that was to confirm all your Liberties, knowing, according to your own proteſtations, that you neither mean nor can hurt my Prerogative. And I aſſure you, my maxim is, that the Peoples Liberties ſtrengthen the King's Prerogative, and the King's Prerogative is to defend the Peoples Liberties.

You ſee how ready I have ſhewed my ſelf to ſatisfy your demands, ſo that I have done my part; wherefore, if this Parliament have not a happy concluſion, the ſin is yours, I am free from it.

Whereupon the Commons returned to their own Houſe with unſpeakable joy, and reſolved ſo to proceed as to expreſs their thankfulneſs.

The King's meſſage to the lower Houſe, by Sir Humfrey May, 10th of June, 1628.

HIS Majeſty is well pleaſed that your Petition of Right and his Anſwer, be not only recorded in both Houſes of Parliament, but alſo in all the Courts of Weſtminſter; and that his pleaſure is, it be put in print for his honour, and the content and ſatisfaction of his people, and that you proceed cheerfully to ſettle buſineſſes for the good and reformation of the Commonwealth.

June 26. The Speaker being ſent for to the King at Whitehall, came not into the Houſe till about nine a-clock. And after prayers, the Remonſtrance concerning tunnage and poundage being ingroſſed, was a reading in the Houſe; and while it was a reading, the King ſent for the Speaker, and the whole Houſe, and the King made a Speech as followeth:

IT may ſeem ſtrange, that I came ſo ſuddenly to end this Seſſion; before I give my aſſent to the Bills. I will tell you the cauſe, though I muſt avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the Houſe of Commons gave me a Remonſtrance, how acceptable, every man may judge; and for the merit of it, I will not call that in queſtion, for I am ſure no wiſe man can juſtify it.

Now ſince I am truly informed, that a ſecond Remonſtrance is preparing for me to take away the profit of my tunnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my Crown, by alledging,

I have given away my Right thereto by my anſwer to your petition:

This is ſo prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this Seſſion ſome few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more Remonſtrances, to which I muſt give a harſh anſwer. And ſince I ſee, that even the Houſe of Commons begins already to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted in your petition, leſt it be worſe interpreted in the Country, I will now make a Declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

The profeſſion of both Houſes in the time of hammering this petition, was no way to trench upon my Prerogative, ſaying, they had neither intention or power to hurt it. Therefore it muſt needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the antient Liberties of my Subjects. Yet to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promiſed you, I do here declare my ſelf, That thoſe things which have been done, whereby many have had ſome cauſe to ſuſpect the Liberties of the Subjects to be trenched upon, which indeed was the firſt and true ground of the petition, ſhall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice; and from time to time, in the word of a King, ye ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain. But as for tunnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am ſure, to grant.

To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my Lords the Judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of Laws: for none of the Houſes of Parliament, either joint or ſeparate, (what new Doctrine ſoever may be raiſed) have any power either to make or declare a Law without my conſent.

Then the Lord-Keeper ſaid, It is his Majeſty's pleaſure that this Seſſion now end, and that the Parliament be prorogued till the 20*th* of October next.

In the following Seſſions, viz. Wedneſday, January 21*ſt*, it was ordered that Mr. Selden and others ſhould ſee if the Petition of Right and his Majeſty's anſwer thereunto were inrolled in the Parliament Rolls, and the Courts at Weſtminſter, as his Majeſty ſent them word the laſt Seſſion they ſhould be; and alſo in what manner they were entered, which was done accordingly: and Mr. Selden made report to the houſe, that his Majeſty's Speech made the laſt day of the Seſſion in the upper Houſe, is alſo entered by his Majeſty's command.

Hereupon Mr. Pym moved that the debate hereof ſhould be deferred till Tueſday next, by reaſon of the fewneſs of the Houſe.

Sir John Elliot.] This which is now mentioned, concerns the honour of the Houſe and the Liberty of the Kingdom; it is true, it deſerves to be deferred till there be a full Houſe, but it is good to prepare things. I find it is a great point; I deſire a ſelect Committee may enter into conſideration thereof, and alſo how other Liberties of the Kingdom be invaded. I find in the country the Petition of Right printed indeed, but with an anſwer that never gave any ſatisfaction: I deſire a Committee may conſider thereof, and preſent it to the Houſe, and that the Printer be ſent for, to give ſatisfaction to the Houſe, by what warrant it was printed. Which was ordered.

Mr. Selden.] For this Petition of Right, it is known how lately it hath been violated ſince our laſt meeting. The Liberties for life, perſon, and freehold, how they have been invaded; and have not ſome been committed, contrary to that? Now we knowing theſe invaſions, muſt take notice of it. For Liberties, for State, we know of an order made in the Exchequer, that a Sheriff was commanded not to execute a replevin, and mens goods are taken and muſt not be reſtored; whereas no man ought to loſe life, or limb, but by Law. Hath not one lately loſt his ears (meaning Savage) that was cenſured in the Star-Chamber by an arbitrary ſentence and judgment? Next, they will take away our arms, and then our lives. Let all ſee we are ſenſible of theſe cuſtoms creeping upon us: let us make a juſt preſentation hereof to his Majeſty.

Norton the King's Printer was brought to the Bar, and asked by what warrant the additions to the petition were printed? He anſwered, that there was a warrant (as he thought) from the King himſelf. And being asked whether there were not ſome copies printed without additions, he anſwered, there were ſome, but they were ſuppreſſed by warrant.

Sir John Elliot deſired ſome clearer ſatisfaction might be made, and that he might anſwer directly by what warrant. Whereupon he was called in again: who ſaid, he did not remember the particular, but ſure he was there was a warrant.

Mr. Selden reported from the Committee concerning the printing of the Petition of Right, that there were printed 1500 without any addition at all, which were publiſhed in the time of the laſt Parliament: but ſince the Parliament, other copies have been printed, and theſe ſuppreſt and made waſte paper; which the Printer did, as he ſaid, by command from Mr. Attorney, which he received from his Majeſty. And the Printer further ſaid, that the Attorney was with the Lord Privy-Seal at Whitehall, and there delivered unto the Printer ſundry papers, with divers hands to them, and on the backſide was endorſed thus, We will and command you, that theſe copies be printed.

Which put an end to this grand affair.

XVII. Pro-

XVII. Proceedings againſt William Stroud Eſq; Walter Long Eſq; John Selden Eſq; and others, on an Habeas Corpus, in Banco Regis. 1629. 5 Car. I.

ON February 23*d*, the Houſe of Commons being upon the debate of the buſineſs of the cuſtomers, who had ſeiz'd goods belonging to Mr. Rolls, a Member of the Houſe; diſſolv'd themſelves into a grand Committee, and at laſt reſolv'd,

That Mr. Rolls, a Member of the Houſe ought to have privilege of perſon and goods; but the command of the King is ſo great, that they leave it to the Houſe.

After which, the King's meſſage in juſtification of the farmers and officers of the cuſtoms was taken into conſideration; which occaſioned warm debates, and the Speaker being mov'd to put the queſtion then propos'd, refus'd to do it, and ſaid, That he was otherwiſe commanded by the King.

Then, ſaid Mr. Selden, Dare not you, Mr. Speaker, put the Queſtion when we command you? If you will not put it, we muſt ſit ſtill; thus we ſhall never be able to do any thing. They that come after you, may ſay, They have the King's command not to do it. We ſit here by the command of the King under the Great Seal, and you are, by his Majeſty, ſitting in this Royal Chair, before both Houſes, appointed for our Speaker; and now you refuſe to perform your Office.

Hereupon the Houſe, (in ſome heat) adjourned till Wedneſday next.

On Wedneſday the 25*th* of February, both Houſes, by his Majeſty's command, were adjourned until Monday morning the 2*d* of March.

Monday the 2*d* of March, the Commons met, and urged the Speaker to put the Queſtion; who ſaid, I have a command from the King to adjourn till March the 10*th*; and put no Queſtion. And endeavouring to go out of the Chair, was notwithſtanding held by ſome Members (the Houſe foreſeeing a diſſolution) till a proteſtation was publiſhed in the Houſe; 1. Againſt Popery and Arminianiſm. 2. Againſt tunnage and poundage not granted by Parliament. 3. If any Merchant yield or pay tunnage and poundage, not granted by Parliament, he ſhould be reputed a betrayer of the Liberties of England.

Hereupon the King ſent for the Serjeant of the Houſe; but he was detained, the door being lock'd: Then he ſent the Gentleman-Uſher of the Lords Houſe, with a meſſage; and he was refuſed admittance, till the ſaid Votes were read. And then in much confuſion the Houſe was adjourned to the 10*th* of March. Nevertheleſs his Majeſty, by Proclamation, dated the 2*d* of March, declares the Parliament to be diſſolved.

(Though the Proclamation was not publiſhed till the tenth) and the day following, (the 3*d*) Warrants were directed from the Council to Denzil Holles Eſq; Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, Benjamin Valentine, Eſqs; commanding their perſonal appearance on the morrow. At which time, Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, Mr. Valentine appearing, and refuſing to anſwer out of Parliament, what was ſaid and done in Parliament, were committed cloſe priſoners to the Tower; and Warrants were given, (the Parliament being ſtill in being) for the ſealing up of the Studies of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and Sir John Elliot. But Mr. Long, and Mr. Stroud not then, nor for ſome time after appearing, a Proclamation iſſued forth for the apprehending of them.

The King purpoſing to proceed againſt the Members of the Houſe of Commons, who were committed to priſon by him in the Star-Chamber, cauſed certain queſtions to be propoſed to the Judges upon the 25*th* of April.

Whereupon all the Judges met at Serjeants-Inn by command from his Majeſty, where Mr. Attorney propoſed certain queſtions concerning the offences of ſome of the Parliament-men committed to the Tower, and other Priſons: At which time, one queſtion was propoſed and reſolved, viz. That the Statute of 4 H. VIII. intitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, was a particular Act of Parliament, and extended only to Richard Strode, and to thoſe perſons that had joined with him to prefer a Bill to the Houſe of Commons concerning Tinners: And although the Act be private, and extendeth to them alone, yet it was no more than all other Parliament-men, by privilege of Houſe, ought to have, viz. Freedom of Speech concerning thoſe matters debated in Parliament by a Parliamentary courſe.

The reſt of the queſtions Mr. Attorney was wiſhed to ſet down in writing againſt another day.

Upon Monday following, all the Judges met again, and then Mr. Attorney propoſed theſe queſtions.

1. Whether if any Subject hath received probable information of any Treaſon or treacherous attempt or intention againſt the King or State, that Subject ought not to make known to the King, or his Majeſty's Commiſſioners, when thereunto he ſhall be required, what information he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to the end, the King being truly informed, may prevent the danger? And if the ſaid Subject in ſuch caſe ſhall refuſe to be examined, or to anſwer the queſtions which ſhall be demanded of him for further inquiry and diſcovery of the truth, whether it be not a high contempt in him, puniſhable in the Star-Chamber, as an offence againſt the general Juſtice and Government of the Kingdom?

Sol. The reſolution and anſwer of all the Juſtices, That it is an offence puniſhable as aforeſaid, ſo that this do not concern himſelf, but another, nor draw him to danger of Treaſon or Contempt by his anſwer.

2. Whether it be a good anſwer or excuſe, being thus interrogated, and refuſing to anſwer, to ſay, That he was a Parliament-man when he received this information, and that he ſpake thereof in the Parliament-houſe; and therefore the Parliament being now ended, he refuſed to anſwer to any ſuch queſtions but in the Parliament-houſe, and not in any other place?

Sol. To this the Judges, by advice privately to Mr. Attorney, gave this anſwer, That this excuſe being in nature of a Plea, and an errour in judgment, was not puniſhable, until he were over-ruled in an orderly manner to make another anſwer; and whether the party were brought in Ore tenus, or by information, for this Plea he was not to be puniſhed.

3. Whether a Parliament-man, committing an offence againſt the King or Council not in a Parliament way, might, after the Parliament ended, be puniſh'd or not?

Sol. All the Judges, una voce, anſwered, he might, if he be not puniſhed for it in Parliament; for the Parliament ſhall not give privilege to any contra morem Parliamentarium, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty. And all agreed, That regularly he cannot be compelled out of Parliament to anſwer things done in Parliament in a Parliamentary courſe; but it is otherwiſe where things are done exorbitantly, for thoſe are not the acts of a Court.

4. Whether if one Parliament-man alone ſhall reſolve, or two or three ſhall covertly conſpire to raiſe falſe ſlanders and rumours againſt the Lords of the Council and Judges, not with intent to queſtion them in a legal courſe, or in a Parliamentary way, but to blaſt them, and to bring them to hatred of the people, and the Government in contempt, be puniſhable in the Star-chamber after the Parliament is ended?

Sol. The Judges reſolve, That the ſame was puniſhable out of Parliament, as an offence exorbitant committed in Parliament, beyond the office, and beſides the duty of a Parliament-man.

There was another queſtion put by Mr. Attorney, viz.

Whether if a man in Parliament, by way of digreſſion, and not upon any occaſion ariſing concerning the ſame in Parliament, ſhall ſay, The Lords of the Council and the Judges had agreed to trample upon the Liberty of the Subject, and the Privileges of Parliament, he were puniſhable or not?

The Judges deſired to be ſpared to make any anſwer thereunto, becauſe it concerned themſelves in particular *.

The

* Nalſon in his Collections, Vol. II. Page 374. ſays, There were ſeveral queſtions propos'd to the three Chief Judges about matters in Parliament, to which they gave theſe anſwers; which being ſomething different from what is above, are here inſerted.

Quære I. Whether a Parliament-man, offending the King criminally or contemptuouſly in the Parliament-houſe (and not then puniſhed) may not be puniſhed out of Parliament?

Anſwer. We conceive, That if a Parliament-man, exceeding the privilege of Parliament, do criminally or contemptuouſly offend the King in the Parliament-houſe (and not there puniſhed) may be puniſhed out of Parliament.

Quære II. Whether the King, as he hath the power of calling and diſſolving a Parliament, have not alſo an abſolute power to cauſe it to be adjourned at his pleaſure?

Anſwer. We conceive, That the King hath the power of commanding of adjournments of Parliaments, as well as of calling, proroguing and diſſolving of Parliaments: But for the manner thereof, or the more particular anſwer to this, and the next ſubſequent queſtion, we refer ourſelves to the precedents of both Houſes.

Quære III. Whether, if the King do command an adjournment to be made, he hath not alſo power to command all further proceedings in Parliament to ceaſe at that time?

Quære IV. Whether it be not a high contempt in a Member of the Houſe, contrary to the King's expreſs commandment, contemptuouſly to oppoſe the adjournment?

Anſwer. The King's expreſs commandment being ſignified for an adjournment, if any after that ſhall tumultuouſly oppoſe it, further, or otherwiſe than the privilege of the Houſe will warrant; this we conceive to be a great Contempt.

Quære V. Whether, if a few Parliament-men do conſpire together, to ſtir up ill affections in the People, againſt the King, and the Government, and to leave the Parliament with ſuch a looſe, and by words or writings put it in execution, and this not puniſhed in Parliament, it be an offence puniſhable out of Parliament?

Anſwer. We conceive this offence to be puniſhable out of Parliament.

Quære VI. Whether, if ſome Parliament-men ſhall conſpire together to publiſh papers containing falſe and ſcandalous rumours againſt the Lords of the Privy-Council, or any one or more of them, not to the end to queſtion them in a legal or Parliamentary way, but to bring them into hatred of the People, and the Government into Contempt, and to make diſcord between the Lords and Commons; is not this an offence puniſhable out of Parliament?

Anſwer. We conceive this alſo to be an offence puniſhable out of Parliament.

Quære VII. If two or three or more of the Parliament ſhall conſpire to defame the King's Government, and to deter his Subjects from obeying or aſſiſting the King; of what nature this offence is?

Anſwer. The nature and quality of this offence will be greater or leſſer, as the circumſtances ſhall fall out, upon the truth of the fact.

Quære VIII. Can any privilege of the Houſe warrant a tumultuous Proceeding?

Anſwer. We humbly conceive, that an earneſt, though a diſorderly and confuſed proceeding in ſuch a multitude, may be called tumultuous, and yet the privilege of the Houſe may warrant it.

We in all humbleneſs are willing to ſatisfy your Majeſty's Command, but until the particulars of the fact do appear, we can give no directer anſwers than before.

And particularly as to the ſecond Quære about the King's Power of adjourning as well as calling and diſſolving of Parliaments, theſe following Parliamentary precedents were given in.

Mercur. 4 Aprilis, 1 Jac. Seſſ. 1. Mr. Speaker pronounceth his Majeſty's Pleaſure of adjourning the Houſe till the 11*th* of April, (and it was ſo done.)

Jovis 18 Dec. 1606. The Lords by their Meſſengers ſignified the King's Pleaſure, that the Seſſion ſhould be adjourned till the 10*th* of February following.

Upon this meſſage Mr. Speaker adjourned the Houſe according to his Majeſty's ſaid Pleaſure.

Martis 31 Martii 1607. The Speaker delivered the King's Pleaſure, that the Houſe ſhould be adjourned till Monday the 20*th* of April following.

Mercurii 20 Maii 1607. Mr. Speaker ſignified the King's Pleaſure about nine a-clock to adjourn the Houſe till the 27*th* of the ſame month.

And 27*th* of May, he being challenged for adjourning without the privity of the Houſe, he excuſeth it, and ſaith, as the Houſe had power to adjourn themſelves, ſo the King had a ſuperior power, and by his command he did it.

Veneris

The next day Mr. Attorney put the Judges another Caſe.

It is demanded of a Parliament-man, being called Ore tenus before the Court of Star-chamber, being charged, that he did not ſubmit himſelf to examination for ſuch things as did concern the King and the Government of the State, and were affirmed to be done by a third perſon, and not by himſelf; if he confeſſes his hand to that refuſal, and make his excuſe, and plead becauſe he had privilege of Parliament;

Whether the Court will not over-rule this Plea as erroneous, and that he ought to make a further anſwer?

Anſ. It is the juſteſt way for the King and the Party not to proceed Ore tenus, becauſe it being a point in Law, it is fit to hear Counſel before it be overruled; and upon an Ore tenus, by the Rules of Star-chamber, Counſel ought not to be admitted; and that it would not be for the honour of the King, nor the ſafety of the Subject, to proceed in that manner.

[But the King dropp'd the Proceedings againſt them in the Star-Chamber.]

Paſch. 5 Car. upon a Habeas Corpus of this Court to bring the body of William Stroud Eſq; with the cauſe of his impriſonment, to the Marſhal of the King's Bench; it was returned in this manner:

That Mr. William Stroud was committed under my cuſtody by virtue of a certain Warrant under the hands of twelve of the Lords of the Privy-Council of the King. The tenour of which Warrant followeth in theſe words:

You are to take knowledge, That it is his Majeſty's pleaſure and commandment, that you take into your cuſtody the body of William Stroud Eſq; and keep him cloſe priſoner till you ſhall receive other order, either from his Majeſty, or this Board: for ſo doing, this ſhall be your Warrant. Dated this 2*d* of April, 1629. And the direction of the Warrant was, To the Marſhal of the King's Bench, or his Deputy.

He is alſo detained in priſon by virtue of a Warrant under his Majeſty's hand; the tenor of which Warrant followeth in theſe words:

C. R.

Whereas you have in your cuſtody the body of William Stroud Eſq; by Warrant of our Lords of our Privy-Council, by our ſpecial command, you are to take notice, that this Commitment was for notable Contempts by him committed againſt our Self and our Government, and for ſtirring up Sedition againſt us; for which you are to detain him in your cuſtody, and to keep him cloſe priſoner, until our pleaſure be further known concerning his deliverance.

Given at Greenwich, the 7*th* of May, 1629. in the fifth year of our Reign.

The direction being, To the Marſhal of our Bench for the time being, & hæ ſunt cauſæ captionis & detentionis prædicti Gulielmi Stroud.

And upon another Habeas Corpus to the Marſhal of the Houſhold, to have the body of Walter Long Eſq; in Court, it was returned according as the return of Mr. Stroud was.

Mr. Aſk of the Inner-Temple, of Counſel for Mr. Stroud; and Mr. Maſon of Lincoln's-Inn, of Counſel for Mr. Long, argued againſt the inſufficiency of the Return.

Mr. Aſk. That the Return was inſufficient. The Return conſiſts upon two Warrants, bearing ſeveral dates, which are the cauſes of the taking and detaining of the priſoner. For the firſt Warrant, which is of the Lords of the Council, that is inſufficient; becauſe no cauſe is ſhewn of his commitment, which is expreſly againſt the reſolution of the Parliament, and their Petition of Right, in the time of this King, which now is, to which he had likewiſe given his aſſent; ſo his taking by virtue of the ſaid Warrant is wrongful. And for the ſecond Warrant, it is inſufficient alſo, and that notwithſtanding it be the King's own; for the King himſelf cannot impriſon any man, as our Books are, to wit, 16 H. VI. F. Monſtrance de faits. 1 H. VII. 4. Huſſey reports it to be the opinion of Markham, in the time of Edw. IV. and Forteſcue in his Book, de laudibus Legum Angliæ, cap. 18. And the reaſon given, is, becauſe no action of falſe impriſonment lies againſt the King, if the impriſonment be wrongful; and the King cannot be a wrong doer. The Statute of Magna Charta is, That no Freeman be impriſoned, but by the Law of the Land. And it appears by theſe Books, that it is againſt the Law of the Land that the King ſhould impriſon any one.

2. Admit that this be only a ſignification and notification given by the King himſelf, of the commitment of the priſoner; yet it ſeems that that ſignification is of no force, 1. Becauſe the words are general and uncertain,——for notable contempts—— There are in the Law many contempts of ſeveral natures; there are contempts againſt the Common Law, againſt the Statute Law; contempts in words, geſtures, or actions. And it appears not to the Court of what nature theſe contempts were. ——Notable——Every contempt which is made to the King is notable.——Againſt our Government—— Contempt which is committed in a Court of Record or Chancery, is a contempt againſt the Government of the King, to wit, becauſe they diſobey the King when he commands them by his Writs, Coke 8. 60. a. Beecher's Caſe. The laſt words of the Return are,——For ſtirring up of ſedition againſt us—— which words likewiſe are indefinite and general. I find not the word Sedition in our Books, but taken adjectively, as ſeditious Books, ſeditious News, &c. In the Statute of the 1*ſt* and 2*d Phil.* and Mary, cap. 3. the words are, If any perſon ſhall be convicted, &c. for ſpeaking, &c. any falſe, ſeditious, or ſlanderous news, ſaying of tales of the Queen, &c. he ſhall loſe his Ears, or pay 100*l.* There the penalty impoſed upon ſuch ſedition is but a fine, Coke 4. Lord Cromwel's Caſe, p. 13. where ſedition is defined to be ſeorſum itio, when a man takes a courſe of his own. And there it is ſaid, that the words,—maintain ſedition againſt the Queen's proceedings—— ſhall be expounded according to the coherence of all the words, and the intent of the parties. So that it is plain, that there is a ſedition that is only fineable, and which is no cauſe of impriſonment without Bail: And what the ſedition is that is here intended, cannot be gathered out of the words, they are ſo general.——againſt Us——

Veneris 30 Martii 1610. His Majeſty's Pleaſure to adjourn from Tueſday till Monday ſevennight.

11 July. The King by Commiſſion adjourneth the Lords Houſe. Meſſengers ſent to the Commons. They ſend by Meſſengers of their own to the Lords, that they uſe to adjourn themſelves.

The Commiſſion is ſent down, Mr. Speaker adjourneth the Houſe till the firſt of Auguſt.

26 Febr. 4 Car. Mr. Speaker ſignifieth his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that the Houſe be preſently adjourned till Monday next, and in the mean time all Committees and other proceedings to ceaſe.

And thereupon Mr. Speaker in the name of the Houſe adjourned the ſame accordingly.

thoſe words are redundant, for every ſedition is againſt the King.

Upon the generality and incertainty of all the words in the Return, he put theſe Caſes: 18 E. III. A man was indicted, quia furatus eſt equum, and doth not ſay felonicè, and therefore ill. 29 Aſſ. 45. A man was indicted that he was communis latro, and the indictment held vicious, becauſe too general. So here the offences are returned generally. But there ought to be ſomething individual, Coke 5. 57. Specot's Caſe, quia ſchiſmaticus inveteratus, is no good cauſe for the Biſhop to refuſe a Clerk, for it is too general, and there are ſchiſms of divers kinds. 38 E. III. 2. Becauſe the Clerk is criminoſus, it is no good cauſe for the Biſhop to refuſe him. 8 and 9 Eliz. Dy. 254. The Biſhop of N. refuſeth one, becauſe he was a haunter of taverns, &c. for which, and divers other crimes, he was unfit; held that the laſt words are too general and incertain. 40 E. III. 6. In the tender of a marriage, and refuſal of the heir, he ought to alledge a certain cauſe of refuſal, whereupon iſſue may be taken. Coke 8. 68. Trollop's Caſe, to ſay, That the plaintiff is excommunicated for divers contumacies, ſhall not diſable him, without ſhewing ſome cauſe in ſpecial of the excommunication, upon which the Court may judge whether it were juſt or no: ſo here. And he concluded with a Caſe that was reſolved, Hill. 33 Eliz. Peak and Paul the Defendants ſaid of the Plaintiff, Thou art a mutinous and ſeditious Man, and maintaineſt ſedition againſt the Queen; and the words adjudged not actionable.

Mr. Maſon (afterwards Recorder of London) moved alſo, That the Return was inſufficient. For the firſt Warrant, That he was committed by command of the King, ſignified by the Privy-Council, I will not argue that, becauſe it was claimed as an ancient Right pertaining to the Subject, in the Petition of Right, whereto the King himſelf hath given his conſent. For the ſecond Warrant, the Return is, ——— for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us and our Government. Sedition is not any determined offence within our Law; our Law gives definitions or deſcriptions of other offences, to wit, of Treaſon, Murder, Felony, &c. but there is no crime in our Law called Sedition. It is defined by a Civilian to be Seditio, or Seceſſio, cum pars Reipublicæ contra partem inſurgit; ſo that Sedition is nothing but diviſion. Bracton and Glanvile have the word Seditio generally. Before the Statute of 25 E. III. cap. 2. it was not clear enough what thing was Treaſon, what not; by which Statute it is declared what ſhall be called Treaſon, and that the Judges ſhall not declare any thing to be Treaſon, that is not contained within the ſaid Statute, but it ſhall be declared only by Parliament. And that Statute ſpeaks not of Sedition, nor the Statute of 1 H. IV. cap. 10. which makes ſome things Treaſon, which are not contained within the ſaid Statute of 25 E. III. The Statute of 1 E. VI. cap. 12. takes away all intervenient Statutes, which declared new Treaſons; and the ſaid Act declares other things to be Treaſon, but mentions not Sedition. Sedition is the quality of an offence, and is oftentimes taken adverbially, or adjectively. To raiſe tumults or treſpaſſes is Sedition, Trin. 21 E. III. rot. 23. B. R. Garbart's Caſe; a man was indicted, becauſe in the high ſtreet he took J. S. there, being in hoſtile manner, and uſurped over him royal power, which is manifeſt Sedition; and there it was but an indictment of treſpaſs. Mich. 20 E. I. rot. 27. One that was Surveyor of the wood-work for the King, was indicted for ſtealing of timber, and detaining wages (ridding Carpenters wages) by one that was but a boy; and this is there termed Sedition, and yet it was but a petty felony. Mich. 42 E. III. rot. 65. B. R. R. Pope was appealed by the wife of J. S. becauſe he feloniouſly and ſeditiouſly murdered J. S. and ſeditiouſly was there put in, becauſe it was done privily. By which caſes it appears, that Sedition is not taken as a ſubſtantive, ſo that it may be applied to treaſon, treſpaſs, or other offences. By the Statute of 2 H. IV. cap. 15. there is a puniſhment inflicted for the raiſing of ſeditious doctrine, and yet no puniſhment could have been inflicted for it until the ſaid Statute; and yet it was ſeditious, as well before the ſaid Statute as after. And this appears alſo by the Statute of 1*ſt* and 2*d* of Philip and Mary, cap. 3. which hath been cited. The Statute 13 Eliz. cap. 2. recites, that divers ſeditious and evil-diſpoſed perſons, &c. obtained bulls of reconciliation from the Pope, which offence was made Treaſon by the ſaid Statute, (for it was not before, and yet there was ſedition) and by the ſaid Statute, the aiders and abettors are but in the caſe of Premunire. By the Statute of 13 Eliz. cap. 1. for the avoiding of contentious and ſeditious titles to the Crown, it is enacted by the ſaid Statute, That he that ſhall declare the ſucceſſor of the King, ſhall forfeit the moiety of his goods, &c. ſo that the ſaid offence, although it be ſeditious, is not treaſon by the common Law, nor is it made treaſon by the Statute of 25 E. III. nor by the Statute of 13 Eliz. By the Statute of 23 Eliz. cap. 2. he that ſpeaks ſeditious or ſlanderous news of the Queen, ſhall loſe his ears, or pay 200*l.* and the ſecond offence is made felony. The Statute of 35 Eliz. cap. 1. is againſt ſeditious ſectaries, which abſent themſelves from the Church; they are to be puniſhed 10*l.* by the month. Out of all which Statutes it may be collected, that the word Sedition is taken variouſly, according to the ſubject in hand. And Coke 4. 13. Lord Cromwel's Caſe, Seditious is referred to doctrine. There are offences more high in their nature than Sedition, which were not treaſon, unleſs ſo declared by Act of Parliament. Every rebellious Act is Sedition, yet if ſuch Acts be not within the Statute of 25 E. III. they are not treaſon. 17 R. 2. cap. 8. Inſurrection of villeins and others is made treaſon; which proves, that before this Act it was not treaſon. And this Act of 17 R. 2. is repealed by the Statute of 1 H. IV. By the Statute of 3 and 4 E. VI. cap. 5. to aſſemble people to alter the Laws, is made treaſon, if they continue together an hour after Proclamation made. This aſſembly of people was Sedition at the common Law; and the very aſſembly, if they after diſſolve upon Proclamation made, is not treaſon by the ſaid Statute. By the Statute of 14 Eliz. cap. 1. it is made felony, maliciouſly and rebelliouſly to hold from the Queen any Caſtles, &c. but becauſe this relates not to the Statute of 25 E. III. it is not treaſon. 2. It ſeems clearly, that this caſe is within the Petition of Right, in which Magna Charta, and the Statutes of 25 and 28 E. III. are recited. The grievance there was, that divers have been impriſoned without any cauſe ſhewed, to which they might make anſwer according to the Law. And upon this Return, nothing appears to be objected to which he might anſwer. It appears not what that Act, which is called Sedition, was. This is the very grief intended to be remedied by this Statute: to this he cannot anſwer according to Law. It appears not whether this were a ſeditious Act, treſpaſs, or ſlander, or what it was at all. The words are, —— Sedition againſt the King ——— this helps not, for every offence is againſt the King, againſt his Crown and Dignity; that which diſturbs the Commonwealth is againſt the King, ſeditious Doctrine is ſedition againſt the King, as is before ſaid. In 28 H. VI. vide proſtrat. fol. 19. the Lords and Commons deſire the King, that William de la Pool may be committed for divers Treaſons, and ſundry other heinous crimes; and the petition held not good, becauſe too general: whereupon they exhibit particular Articles againſt him. And therefore upon the whole matter prayed, that Mr. Long might be diſcharged from his impriſonment.

On another day, Berkley and Davenport, the King's Serjeants, argued for the King, that this Return was ſufficient in Law to detain them in priſon. Berkley began, and ſaid, That the caſe is new, and of great weight and conſequence; and yet, under favour, the Prerogative of the King, and the Liberty of the Subject, are not mainly touched therein; for the caſe is not ſo general as it hath been made, but particular upon this particular return. The Liberty of the Subject is a tender point, the right whereof is great, juſt, and inviolable. The Prerogative of the King is an high point, to which every Subject ought to ſubmit. I intend not to make any diſcourſe of the one or the other, I will only remember what the King hath determined upon them both, in his ſpeech which he made upon the Petition of Right; to wit, that the People's Liberties ſtrengthen the King's Prerogative, and that the King's Prerogative is to defend the People's Liberties. This may ſettle the hearts of the people concerning their Liberty. The way which I intend to treat in my Argument, is, to anſwer the objections and reaſons which have been made, and to give ſome reaſons, whereby this Return ſhall be ſufficient.

The objections which have been made are reducible to four heads.

1. By what the Priſoner here ſhall be ſaid to be committed and detained.

2. That this Commitment is againſt the Petition of Right.

3. That the Cauſe which is here returned, is general and incertain.

4. That the offences mentioned in the Return are but finable; and therefore notwithſtanding them, the party is bailable.

For the firſt, it hath been objected, That the Commitment here was by the Lords of the Privy-Council, and the ſignification of this cauſe is by the King himſelf. But I ſay, that there is a further matter in the Return; for the Lords of the Council do it by the command of the King, and they only purſue this command. I will not diſpute whether the Lords of the Council have power to commit an offender or no, it is common in experience, 33 H. VI. 28. Poignes caſe is expreſs in it. And in the Petition of Right it is admitted, that they may commit. And this is not alledged there for a grievance, but the grievance there, was, becauſe the particular charge of commitment was not ſhewed. Some Books have been objected to prove, that the King, though in perſon, cannot commit any perſon; 16 H. VI. F. Monſtrance de faits 182. But the authority of that Book vaniſheth, if the caſe be put at large, which was in treſpaſs for cutting of trees. The Defendant ſaid, That the place where, &c. is parcel of the Manor of D. whereof the King is ſeized in Fee, and the King commands us to cut. And the opinion of the Court was, that this is no plea, without ſhewing a ſpecialty of the command of the King. And there the whole Court ſays, That if the King command me to arreſt a man, whereby I arreſt him, he ſhall have treſpaſs or impriſonment againſt me, although it be done in the preſence of the King. That the following words are to be underſtood, that the principal caſe was of one command of the King by word, and then ſuch command by word to arreſt a man is void. And 1 H. VII. 4. was objected; Huſſey ſays, that Markham ſaid to King E. IV. that he cannot arreſt a man for ſuſpicion of Treaſon or Felony, becauſe if he do wrong, the party cannot have his action. To this I ſay, That the Book there is to be underſtood of a wrongful arreſt, for there it is ſpoken of an action of falſe impriſonment; and a wrongful arreſt cannot be made by the King.

2. It ſtands not with the dignity of the King to arreſt any man. Coke 4. 73. The King makes a leaſe for years, rendring rent, with condition of reentry for non-payment; he ſhall take advantage of the condition without any demand; and the reaſon there given, is, that a decorum and conveniency might be obſerved. So it is not befitting for the King in perſon to arreſt any man, but the King may command another to do it. Bracton lib. 2, de acquirendo rerum Dominio, fol. 55. ſays, That the Crown of the King is to do juſtice and judgment, and facere pacem, without which, the Crown it ſelf cannot ſubſiſt. Several conſtructions are to be made upon thoſe ſeveral words, —— and the laſt words —— facere pacem ——— imply, that the King hath a coercive power. Britton f. 1. amongſt the Errata. The King ſaid, Becauſe we are not ſufficient in perſon to do every thing, we divide the charge into many parts. We are the people's Juſtice, and a Juſtice implies one that hath power to do Juſtice in every kind, to wit, by impriſonment, or otherwiſe. 20 H. VII. 7 Coke 11. 85. it is ſaid, That the King is the Chief-Juſtice. And Lambert in his Juſtice of Peace, fol. 3. ſays, That in ancient hiſtories, the Chief-Juſtice of England, is called Capitalis Juſticiarius & Prima Juſticia, after the King, in England. So that the King hath the ſame power of Juſtice, as the Chief-Juſtice had. This impriſonment here, which is before conviction for any offence, is not uſed toward the Subject as impriſonment for any fault, but is rather an arreſt or reſtraint to avoid further inconveniencies, 14 H. VII. 8. A Juſtice of Peace may arreſt men riotouſly aſſembled, for prevention of further miſchief. And the Book alſo ſays, That he may leave his ſervants there to arreſt men, for ſafeguard of the Peace. It is a caſe well known, that if a houſe be ſet on fire, every man may pull down the next houſe, for prevention of a greater miſchief; ſo it ſeems concerning the Incendiaries of State, they ought to be reſtrained and ſuppreſt, leſt others ſhould be ſtirred up by them to the ſame combuſtion. 22 Aſſ. 56. and 22 E. IV. 45. in falſe impriſonment the Defendant juſtifies, becauſe the Plaintiff was mad and out of his wits, and that he had done ſome harm, and that he had bound and beat him to avoid further harm, which might have happened by his madneſs: and the juſtification was held good. So is it in matter of Government, to avoid comcommotions, the King ought to uſe his coercive power againſt thoſe that are enraged. The objection was that this courſe was againſt the Petition of Right. But I anſwer, That this caſe is out of the words of that petition; the words of the petition were, —Whereas by the Statute called, the great Charter, and by the Statute of 28 E. III. no Freeman may be taken or impriſoned —; yet againſt the tenour of the ſaid Statute, &c. divers of your Subjects have of late been impriſoned, without any cauſe ſhewed; and when for their deliverance, &c. they were brought before the Juſtices by Writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the Court ſhould order, and their Keepers commanded to certify the cauſe of their detainer, and no cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your Majeſty's ſpecial command, ſignified by the Lords of your Council; and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make anſwer according to Law. Theſe laſt words are obſervable, —— without being charged with any thing, to which they might make anſwer—— theſe words do not refer to the Return of the Habeas Corpus; for the cauſe returned therein cannot be traverſed, 9 H. VI. 54. but the Court took it as true. But the ſetting forth of the cauſe, and the anſwer to the ſame cauſe, is to be upon other proceedings, to wit, upon the Indictment for the offence, or otherwiſe. And there is a great difference between the return of a Writ to which a man may anſwer, and the return of an Habeas Corpus, 10 E. IV. & 3 H. VII. 11. are, that if the Sheriff return Reſcous, all certainties of every circumſtance ought to be ſhewed; becauſe it is fitting, that a thing certain be brought into judgment. And upon ſhewing of the grievance, as above, the Petition is, that no Freeman, in any ſuch manner as before is mentioned, be impriſoned or detained; ſuch, and it hath relation to ſuch impriſonment, which is mentioned in the premiſſes. And impriſonment mentioned in the premiſſes of the Petition, is, where no cauſe at all was mentioned; then where any cauſe is ſhewed, is out of the Petition, and that ſuch is the word relative, appears by Coke 11. 62. where many caſes are put to the ſame purpoſe, which ſee.

The third objection was, That the Return was general and uncertain. The Counſel on the other ſide had divided the words of the Return, but that is to offer violence thereto; for an expoſition ſhall not be made by fractions, but upon the whole matter. For the firſt words, — notable contempts — it hath been ſaid, that the addition of the word notable is but to make a flouriſh: But I ſay, That notable is not the emphaſis of the Return, but it only expreſſeth the nature of the offence; and yet notable is a word obſervable by itſelf in the Law, and implies, that the thing is known and noted. By 27 E. I. Sheriffs ſhall be puniſhed, that let notorious offenders to bail; and by the Statute of 4 H. IV. cap. 3. a notorious or common Thief ſhall not make his purgation: and 26 E. III. 71. in a treſpaſs for falſe impriſonment, the Defendant ſaid, That the Plaintiff came into the Town of Huntington, and becauſe he was ſeen in the company of R. de Thorby, who was a notorious Thief, he, as Bailiff of Huntington, took him upon ſuſpicion. I confeſs, that —— for contempts—— is general, yea, it is genus generaliſſimum, and within the Petition of Right; but the words are, —— againſt ourſelf. —— It hath been ſaid, that this might be by irreverent words or geſtures. —— And our Government —— it hath been ſaid, that this might be by contempt to the King's Writ, or by Retraxit, as Beecher's caſe is. To this I anſwer, that thoſe words which are ſpoken to one purpoſe, ought not to be wreſted to another; and this is againſt the common meaning of the words. Coke 4. Thou art a murderer, the Defendant ſhall not afterwards explain it to be a murderer of Hares, for the higheſt murder is intended. So here, the higheſt Government is intended.

4. It hath been objected, that —— for ſtirring up of ſedition againſt us —— may perhaps be but an offence finable: but thoſe words joined with the former words, ſhew this to be an offence of the higheſt nature; ſedition is a ſpecial contempt. And although ſedition in itſelf may be but a general offence, yet here it is, —— ſedition againſt us and our Government —— which makes it particular. It hath been confeſſed by one, that argued on the other ſide, that there is a general in a particular. Coke 4. p. 75. Holland's caſe, there is the moſt general, and there is a general in particular, as the State Eccleſiaſtical. Thirdly, There is more particular, as the Colleges, Deans, and Chapters. This being in a caſe of Return upon Habeas Corpus, no preciſe certainty is required. In an Indictment, a certainty of all circumſtances is requiſite; in Pleading, a certainty is required; in Counts, a more preciſe certainty; in Bars, a certainty to a common intent is enough. There is not ſuch preciſe certainty requird here as in Indictment or Count, becauſe the party ought to anſwer unto them; nor ſo much certainty required in this as in a Bar. And the Return is not incertain; for, as it is ſaid in Plowden 202. and 193. a thing is incertain, where it may be taken indifferently one way or the other. But where the intendment the one way exceeds the intendment the other way, it is not uncertain as it is here. The words are, —— for notable contempts againſt us and our Government, and for ſtirring up of ſedition againſt us— here is a certainty of intendment one way. There are many Writs which are more uncertain than this Return here is, and yet good. The Writ concerning the taking of an Apoſtate is general, quod ſpreto habitu ordinis; and yet there are more ſorts of Apoſtacies. In the Writ concerning the amoving of a Leper, the words are general, and yet it appears by F. N. B. that there are two kinds of Lepers, one outward, and the other inward; and for the latter, the Writ concerning amoving a Leper. So the Writs concerning the burning of an Heretick, and concerning the burning of an Ideot, are general; and yet there are ſundry kinds of Hereticks and Ideots alſo. But it hath been objected, that Sedition is not a law-term, nor known in the Law, of which the Judges can take no notice; but the words, to expreſs offences of this nature, are Murder, Treaſon, Felony, &c. and that no Indictment of ſedition generally was ever ſeen. To this I anſwer, perhaps it is true, that no Indictment was ever ſeen made, becauſe the form of an Indictment is preciſe; words of art are required therein, as appears in Dyer 69. 261. Coke 4. p. 39. Vaux's caſe; yet in 5 E. VI. Dyer 69. it is ſaid, that Furatus implies felonicè cepit, although the contrary hath been objected. In a Return, words by periphraſis are ſufficient. The Warrant of a Juſtice of Peace to apprehend J. S. becauſe of prepenſe malice, interfecit J. D. is good enough, although there wants the word murdravit. In 5 R. II. F. Tryal 54. Belknap ſays, That a miſcreant ſhall forfeit his land. Out of which it may be gathered, that a man may be indicted for miſcreancy. And it ſeems likewiſe, that an Indictment of ſedition may be good, for in ſome caſes it is Treaſon. I agree, Peak's caſe, which hath been objected, that for theſe words, [ſeditious fellow] no action lies; and ſo is Coke 4. 19. becauſe thoſe words do not import an Act to be done, but only an inclination to do it; but if a man ſay ſuch words of another, which import that he hath made ſedition, they are actionable, as it was reſolved in Philips's and Badby's caſe. 24 Eliz. Coke 4. 19. Thou haſt made a ſeditious Sermon, and moved the people to ſedition this day, adjudged actionable. So in the Lord Cromwel's, Coke 4. 12, 13. the action would have lain for thoſe words, You like of thoſe that maintain ſedition againſt the Queen's proceedings, if there had not been another matter in the caſe. I agree, the caſe of 21 E. III. Sir John Garboyl's caſe, and 42 E. III. for in thoſe caſes, ſedition was only taken adjectively, and ſhews an inclination only to do a ſeditious Act; and in ſuch ſenſe, ſedition may be applied to other offences than Treaſon. In 31 E. I. f. gard. 157. Gardein in Socage made feoffment of land which he had in ward, this is forfeiture, ſays the Book, for the Treaſon which he did to the ward; ſo there, one thing is called Treaſon, which is only a breach of truſt. In an appeal of Mayhem, it is felonicè, and yet 6 H. VII. 1. it is not Felony: but Felony is there only put to expreſs the heinouſneſs of the offence; it is, as it were, a Felony. The Statutes of 2 H. IV. 1 Mar. 13 Eliz. 35 Eliz. 17 R. II. 3 & 4 E. VI. 14 Eliz. which have been objected, have the word ſedition but not applicable to this caſe. Bracton in his Book de Corona, ſays, ſi quis, &c. If any by raſh attempt, plotting the King's death, ſhould act, or cauſe any to act, to the ſedition of the Lord the King, or of his army, it is Treaſon. And Glanvil, in as many words, ſays, That to do any thing in ſedition of the Kingdom, or of the army, is High-Treaſon. And Britton, fol. 16. it is High-Treaſon to diſinherit the King of the Realm, and ſedition tendeth to the diſinheritance of the King; for, as it hath been ſaid, Seditio eſt quaſi ſeorſum-itio, when the people are ſever'd from the King: or it is, Separans à ditione, when the people are ſever'd from the power of the King. And in this ſenſe ſedition is no ſtranger in our Law; and ſuch ſedition which ſevers the people from the King, is Treaſon.

But it hath been objected, That by the Statute of 25 E. III. the Parliament ought only to determine what is Treaſon, what not. To this I anſwer, That upon the ſaid Statute, the poſitive Law had always made explication and expoſition, Br. Treaſon 24. the words are, Compaſs or imagine the death of the King; and there it is taken, that he that malicioufly deviſeth how the King may come to death, by words or otherwiſe, and does an act to explain it, as, in aſſaying harneſs, this is Treaſon. 13 El. Dy. 298. Doctor Story's caſe, he being beyond ſea, practiſed with a foreign Prince to invade the Realm, and held Treaſon, becauſe invaſion is to the peril of the Prince, and ſo within the Statute of 24 E. III. Mar. Dy. 144. The taking of the Caſtle of Scarborough was Treaſon in Stafford by 30 aſſ. p. 19. which was preſently after the making of the Statute of 25 E. III. A man ought to have been hang'd and drawn, that brought letters of Excommengement from the Pope, and publiſhed them in England: and it is to be noted, that at the ſame time there was no Statute to make it Treaſon, but upon conſtruction of the ſaid Statute of 25 E. III. though now it be made Treaſon by the Statute of 13 Eliz. if it be with intention to advance foreign Power. Perhaps the ſedition mentioned in this Return is High-Treaſon, and yet the King may make it an offence finable, for he may proſecute the offender in what courſe he pleaſeth; and if it be Treaſon, then the priſoners are not bailable by the Statute of Weſtminſter. But, ſuppoſe that it is but a finable offence, yet by the ſaid Statute, thoſe who are impriſoned for open and notorious naughtineſs, ſhall not be bailed; the ſame naughtineſs is there intended high and exorbitant offence.

2. It is fit to reſtrain the priſoners of their liberty, that the Common-wealth be not damnified. It is lawful to pull down a houſe, to prevent the ſpreading miſchief of fire; it is lawful to reſtrain a furious man. And by the 14 H. VII. a Juſtice of Peace may reſtrain a rout. Then the reſtraint of dangerous men to the Common-wealth is juſtifiable and neceſſary. 24 E. III. 33. p. 25. Sir Thomas Figet went armed in the Palace, which was ſhewed to the King's Council; wherefore he was taken and diſarmed before the Chief-Juſtice, and committed to the priſon, and he could not be bailed till the King ſent his pleaſure; and yet it was ſhewed, that the Lord of T. threatned him. Out of which caſe I obſerve two things: 1. That the Judge of this Court did cauſe a man to be apprehended, upon complaint made to the Council, that is, to the Lords of the Privy-Council. 2. That although he did nothing, he is not main-pernable until the King ſent his pleaſure, becauſe he was armed and furiouſly diſpoſed. So here. Wherefore I pray, that the priſoners may be ſent back again.

Davenport argued to the ſame intent and purpoſe, and therefore I will report his argument briefly.

1. He ſaid, That the Return here is ſufficient. The Counſel on the other ſide have made fractions of this Return, and divided it into ſeveral parts, whereas the genuine conſtruction ought to have been made upon the entire Return; for no violence ought to be offered to the Text. 7 E. IV. 20. In falſe impriſonment, the Defendant did juſtify, and alledged ſeveral reaſons of his juſtification; to wit, becauſe a man was killed, and that this was in the County of S. and that the common voice and fame was, that the Plaintiff was culpable. And this was held a good plea, although Bryan did there object, That the plea was double or treble; and the reaſon was, becauſe twenty cauſes of ſuſpicion make but one entire cauſe; and indiviſible unity in this ought not to be divided: ſo Coke 8. 66. Crogate's caſe. In an action of treſpaſs, the Defendant juſtifies for ſeveral cauſes, and held good, becauſe upon the matter, all of them make but one cauſe. Coke 8. 1. 17. It is ſaid, That it is an unjuſt thing, unleſs the whole Law be look'd into, to judge and anſwer, by propounding any one particular thereof; and if it be unjuſt in the expoſition of a Law, it is uncivil in a Return to make fractions of it, in the conſtruction thereof eſpecially, it being a Return for information, and not for accuſation.

2. Although the Counſel on the other ſide have taken this caſe to be within the Petition of Right, yet this is Petitio principii, to take that for granted which is the queſtion in debate. He ſaid, That he would not offer violence to the Petition of Right, to which the King had aſſented, and which ſhall really be performed. But the queſtion here is, whether this Return be within it? And the Judges are keepers, keepers, not maſters of this pledge; and it ſeems, that this Return is out of the letter and meaning of the ſaid Statute.

3. He ſaid, That this was the actual commitment of the Lords of the Privy-Council, and the habitual or virtual commitment of the King. [But becauſe upon theſe two matters he put no caſe, nor gave any reaſon, but what had been put or given in the argument of the grand Habeas Corpus, Mich. 3 Caroli, and afterwards in the Houſe of Commons, (vide Pag. 115, &c. ante) which was reported to the Lords in the painted Chamber, I have here omitted them.] And for the great reſpect which the Law gives to the commands of the King, he put theſe caſes; 7 H. III. attachment of waſte againſt the tenant in dower, and the waſte was aſſigned in the taking of Fiſh out of a pond, and the carrying them away. And the Defendant pleaded, That her ſecond Husband by the command of the Lord the King, took all the Fiſh out of the ſaid pond to the uſe of the Lord the King, and held a good juſtification; which proves, that the command of the King there to her Husband, excuſed her of the ſaid waſte. And yet it is clear, that a tenant in dower is liable to an action of waſte, for waſte done in the time of her ſecond Husband: but contrary is it, where a woman is tenant for life, and took a Husband, who made waſte and died, no action lies againſt the wife for that waſte. And F. N. B. 17. A. If the tenant in præcipe at the grand cape makes default, the King may ſend a Writ to the Juſtices, rehearſing that he was in his ſervice, &c. commanding them, that that default be not prejudicial to him; and this command of the King excuſeth his default, be the cauſe true or no.

4. For the particulars of the Return, it is —— for notable contempts againſt the Government —— but as to that, it hath been ſaid, that the King hath ſundry Governments, to wit, Eccleſiaſtical, Political, &c. and it is not ſhewn, againſt which of them. This is but a cavilling exception; they might as well have excepted to this Return, becauſe it is not ſhewn, that theſe contempts were after the laſt general pardon; that had been a better exception. The laſt words of the Return are, —— raiſing ſedition againſt us —— but as to this, it hath been ſaid, That ſeditio is not a word known in the Law, and is always taken either adverbially, or adjectively, and is not a ſubſtantive. To this he ſaid, That although it is not a ſubſtantive for the preſervation, yet it is a ſubſtantive for the deſtruction of a Kingdom. And he ſaid, That he found the word ſeditio in the Law, and the conſequent of it likewiſe, which is, ſeductio populi. But it is not ever found to be taken in a good ſenſe, it's always ranked and coupled with Treaſon, Rebellion, Inſurrection, or ſuch like, as it appears by all thoſe Statutes which have been remembred on the other ſide. Therefore he prayed that the priſoners might be ſent back.

Trin. 5 Car. I. B. R.

THE firſt day of the Term, upon Habeas Corpus to Sir Allen Apſley the Lieutenant of the Tower, to bring here the body of John Selden Eſq; with the cauſe of detention; he returned the ſame cauſe as in Mr. Stroud's caſe: and Mr. Littleton (afterwards Sir Edward, and Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and Keeper of the Great-Seal) of Counſel with him, moved, That the Return was inſufficient in ſubſtance; therefore he prayed, that he might be bailed. It is true, that it is of great conſequence, both to the Crown of the King, and to the Liberty of the Subject. But, under favour, for the difficulty of Law contained in it, the caſe cannot be called grand. In my argument, I will offer nothing to the Court, but that which I have ſeen with theſe eyes, and that which in my underſtanding (which is much ſubject to miſtakes) can receive no ſufficient anſwer.

I will divide my argument into four ſeveral heads.

1. To point out thoſe matters which I think unneceſſary, and not conducible to the matter in queſtion.

2. I will conſider the Warrant of the Privy-Council in this caſe.

3. The Warrant of the King himſelf.

4. The objections which have been made by the contrary ſide, the ſtrength of them, and give anſwer to them.

For the firſt of theſe heads, 1. I will admit, that the King may commit a man. 2. That a man committed by the King is not repleviſable by the Sheriff, but he is bailable by this Court, notwithſtanding the Statute of Weſtm. 1. C. 15. And that he ſhall not be bailable, is againſt the Petition of Right; I will not diſpute it, for it is eſtabliſhed by the anſwer of the King to the ſaid petition. And the arguments made to this purpoſe in the ſaid Parliament, and in the painted Chamber before both the Houſes, are recorded in Parliament, to which every one may reſort. But I will lay as a ground of my following argument, that as offences are of two natures, capital, or as treſpaſſes; ſo they are puniſhed in two manners, to wit, capitally, or by fine, or impriſonment. For the offences of the firſt nature, as Treaſons, and the like, impriſonment is impoſed upon the offender, only for cuſtody; but for miſdemeanors of the ſecond nature, impriſonment is impoſed upon him for a puniſhment. Then this is my ground, That no Freeman that is impriſoned, only for miſdeameanors before conviction, may be detained in priſon without bail, if it be offered, unleſs it be in ſome particular caſes, in which the contrary is ordained by any particular Statute.

2. For the Warrant of the Privy-Council, which ſignifies the pleaſure of the King to commit the priſoner; perhaps this was a good ground of the commitment, but it is no ground for the detaining of the priſoner without bail; and this the King himſelf hath acknowledged, as the antient right of the Subject, in the Petition of Right; wherefore it is not now to be diſputed.

3. For the Warrant of the King, as it is certified by this Return, there is not any ſufficient cauſe contained within it, for the detaining of the priſoner in priſon; for the Law being, as I have declared above, that for a miſdemeanor before conviction, no Freeman may be impriſoned before conviction, without bail or mainprize, the ſole queſtion now is, if this Return contain within it any capital offence; or if only a treſpaſs or miſdemeanor, and then the party is bailable: and for the diſquiſition hereof, I will conſider the Return, 1. As it is divided in ſeveral parts: 2. I will conſider all thoſe parts of it together. 1. As it is ſever'd in parts. The firſt part of it, for notable contempts by him committed againſt our ſelf and our Government. For contempts all contempts are againſt the King, mediately, or immediately, and againſt his Government. Notable, this is all one with notorious and manifeſt, as appears by the Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. and 26 E. III. 71. which hath been remembred. And notable is but an emphatical expreſſion of the nature of the thing, and alters it not. [Againſt us] all riots, routs, batteries, and treſpaſſes, are againſt us, and againſt our Crown and Dignity; contempt againſt our Court of Juſtice, is a contempt againſt us. But if the Return were made here, that he was committed for a contempt made in Chancery, the party ſhall be bailed, as it was reſolved in this Court in Michael Apſley's caſe, and in Ruſwel's caſe, 13 Jac. for the Return is too general. In it the nature of the offence ought to be expreſſed, that the Court may judge thereof. And contempts here is individuum vagum: therefore for them, before conviction, the party cannot be impriſoned without bail or mainprize.

The ſecond part of the Return is, [and for ſtirring up of ſedition againſt us:] the other ſide ſaid, That ſeditio is ever taken in the worſt ſenſe: that is true. But hence it follows not, that the Party that commits it is not bailable. Every ſmall offence is taken in the worſt ſenſe, as the ſtealing of an Apple, and the like; but ſuch kind of offenders ſhall not be committed without Bail. To examine the nature of this offence, which is called ſedition, it ought to be underſtood, as this Return is, either as Treſpaſs, or as High-Treaſon; for it cannot be intended to be Petty-Treaſon: for Petty-Treaſon is ſo called in reſpect of the offence done to any particular Subject; but in reſpect of the King, it is but as a Felony, therefore the Indictments for the ſame are felonioufly and traitorouſly. And here the words are, —ſedition againſt us— ſo of neceſſity it ought to be intended of an offence, that more immediately concerns the ſame King. For the diſcuſſing of this matter,

1. I will conſider in what ſenſe and ſignification this word ſeditio is uſed.

2. How it ſhall be expounded here by the relation thereof to the King.

3. What ſenſe theſe words [againſt us] ſhall have here.

1. For ſedition; it is not found in the diviſion of offences in our Law, but as it is mingled and coupled with other offences. No Indictment of ſedition only was ever ſeen, nor can be ſhewn; routs, riots, and unlawful Aſſemblies, are much of the ſame nature with it, and do well expreſs the nature of ſedition. The Engliſh word is drawn from the word ſeditio in Latin, and the derivation of it is, as hath been obſerved, Se-itio, or Seorſum-itio; and the ſeditious (as one ſays) take a diverſion, and draw others: it is uſed in the Bible, in Poets, Hiſtories, and Orators, for tumult, or hurly-burly, or uproar, or confuſed noiſe, — Seditioque recens dubioque ſuſurro, in Liv. lib. 2. cap. 44. And in Tacitus it is taken for mutiny in an army, when the army is always repining at the Captain. In the Italian Language, which is the elder ſon of Latin, ſedition and diſcord is all one, Numb. cap. 20. 3. the Latin Tranſlation is, Verſi in ſeditione; the Engliſh is, chode, or murmured. Numb. 26. 9. the Latin is, In ſeditione Corah; the Engliſh is, In the company of Corab. Numb. 27. 3. the Latin is, Nec fuit in ſeditione eorum; the Engliſh is, In the company or aſſembly of them. Judg. 12. 1. the Latin Tranſlation is, Facta eſt ergo ſeditio in Ephraim; the Engliſh Tranſlation is, The men of Ephraim gathered themſelves together. In the New Teſtament, Acts 19. 40. Seditio in the Latin is tranſlated uproar or meeting. Acts 15. 2. Facta eſt ergo ſeditio, &c. and it is tranſlated diſſenſion and diſputation. Acts 24. 5. Tertullus the Orator accuſeth Paul for moving ſedition; and the ſubſequent words are, A ring-leader of the ſect of the Phariſees; ſo that his ſedition there was but a ſchiſm: and the words there are in a manner the very ſame with ours here; there it was, for moving; here, for ſtirring of ſedition. Seditio, as an approved Author ſays, imports diſcordiam, to wit, when the members of one body fight one againſt another. The Lord of St. Albans, who was lately the Lord-Chancellor of England, and was a Lawyer and great Stateſman likewiſe, and well knew the acceptation of this word ſedition in our Law, hath made an eſſay of ſedition, and the title of the eſſay is, Of Seditions and Tumults: the whole eſſay deſerves the reading. (See Bacon's Works Vol. III. p. 320.) And there is a Prayer in the Litany, —from ſedition and hereſy, &c. So that here ſedition is taken as a kind of ſect.

This being the natural ſignification of the word, then the next labour ſhall be to ſee, if any thing in our Law croſs this expoſition. And it ſeems clearly, that there is not, 2 H. IV. cap. 15. And it is in the Parliament-roll, numb. 48. againſt Lollards, who at that time were taken as hereticks, and ſays, That ſuch Preachers which excite and ſtir up to ſedition, ſhall be convented before the ordinary, &c. There, ſedition is taken for diſſenſion and diviſion in doctrine. And this is not made Treaſon by the ſaid Statute, although the ſaid Statute be now repealed by the Statute of 25 H. VIII. c. 4. 1 and 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 3. which is in Raſtal, News 4. which is an act againſt ſeditious words and news of the King and Queen, which is a great miſdemeanor; and yet the puniſhment appointed to be inflicted by the ſaid Statute, is but the pillory, or a fine of 100*l.* And the ſaid Statute, by the Statute of 1 Eliz. c. 16. was extended to her alſo, which Statute now by her death is expired: which I pray may be obſerved, 13 Eliz. cap. 1. againſt thoſe, who ſeditiouſly publiſh who are the true heirs of the Crown, that they ſhall be impriſoned for a year, &c. And 13 Eliz. c. 2. the ſeditious bringing in of the Pope's bulls is made Treaſon, which implies, that it was not ſo at the Common Law. 23 Eliz. c. 2. If any perſon ſhall deviſe, write, or print any Book, containing any falſe, ſeditious and ſlanderous matter, to the ſtirring up or moving of any rebellion, &c. every ſuch offence ſhall be judged felony. And in an Indictment upon the ſaid Statute, (which ſee Coke's Entries, f. 352, 353.) there are the words — rebellionem & ſeditionem movere; and yet it is but felony, 35 Eliz. c. 1. made againſt ſeditious ſectaries. Alſo there are certain Books and Authorities in Law, which expreſs the nature of this word ſedition, Coke's 4. Rep. p. 13. the Lord Cromwell's caſe. In an action for thoſe words, [you like of thoſe that maintain ſeditions againſt the Queen's proceedings] the Defendant pleaded, That he intended the maintenance of a ſeditious ſermon; and this was adjudged a good plea and juſtification. From which it follows, that the ſeditious ſermon mentioned in the declaration, and the maintaining of ſedition againſt the Queen, is all of one ſignification; for if they might have been taken in a different ſenſe, the juſtification had not been good. Philips and Badby's caſe, which is in Coke's 4. Rep. p. 19. a. which was objected by Serjeant Berkley, makes ſtrongly for me; for there an action upon the caſe was brought by a perſon, for thoſe words, Thou haſt made a ſeditious ſermon, and moved the people to ſedition this day. And although it were there adjudged, that the action lay, yet the reaſon of the judgment is obſervable, which was, becauſe the words ſcandalize the Plaintiff in his profeſſion; which imply, that if they had not ſcandalized him in his profeſſion, no action would have lain. And ordinary words, if they ſcandalize a man in his profeſſion, are actionable; as to ſay to a Judge, that he is a corrupt man; or to a Merchant, that he is a Bankrupt; although if they were ſpoken to another man, they would not bear an action. And although the Book ſay, that no Act followed there; yet if the matter objected had been Treaſon, the very will had been puniſhable, and, by conſequence, a great ſlander. But it is obſerved, that words which imply an inclination only to ſedition, are not actionable, as, ſeditious knave; but inclination to treaſon, is treaſon, therefore words which imply it are actionable. And alſo for divers words, an action upon the caſe will lie, which induce not treaſon or felony; as, for calling a woman whore, by which ſhe loſeth her marriage, and ſuch like. Then ſedition is no offence in it ſelf, but the aggravation of an offence; and no indictment (as I have ſaid afore) was ever ſeen of this ſingly by it ſelf. Trin. 21 E. III. rot. 23. Sir John Garbut's Caſe, which was put before by Maſon, the indictment was in prejudice of his Crown, and in manifeſt ſedition; and yet the offence there was but a robbery. It is true, that upon his arraignment he ſtood mute, therefore the Roll is, that he was put to penance, that is, to ſtrong and hard pain; and this proves, that it was not Treaſon; for if a man arraigned of Treaſon, ſtand mute, yet the uſual judgment of Treaſon ſhall be given on him. And it is true alſo, that he cannot have his Clergy, becauſe inſidiator viarum was in the indictment; which if it was, outs the party of its Clergy, until the Statute of 4 H. IV. cap. 2. as is obſerved in Coke's 11. Rep. p. 29. Alexander Poulter's Caſe. And upon the ſame Roll of 21 E. III. there are four other indictments of the ſame nature, where ſeditioſè is contained in them. Anno 1585. Queen Elizabeth ſent a Letter (which I have ſeen by the hands of the noble Antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton) to the Mayor of London, for the ſuppreſſing of divers ſeditious Libels, which were publiſhed againſt her Princely Government; and yet in the concluſion of the Letter it appears, that they were only againſt the Earl of Leiceſter, and this was to be publiſhed only by Proclamation in London.

5 H. IV. numb. 11. and 13. the Earl of Northumberland preferred a Petition to the King in Parliament, in which he confeſſeth, that he had not kept his Majeſty's Laws as a liege Subject; and alſo confeſſeth the gathering of Power, and the giving of Liberties: wherefore he petitioned the worſhip of the King (for ſo are the words) for his grace. The King, upon this Petition, demanded the opinion of the Lords of Parliament, and of the Judges aſſiſtant, if any thing contained within the ſaid Petition were Treaſon, or no; and it was reſolved by them all, that nothing as it is mentioned in the ſaid Petition was Treaſon, but great Miſdemeanors; and yet truly, though not fully there mentioned, it was a great rebellion and inſurrection. But they adjudged according to the ſaid Petition, as you are now to judge upon the Return, as it is made here. In Mich. 33 Eliz. Cawdry's Caſe, Coke's fifth Report, p. 1. Sedition and Schiſm were deſcribed; as Schiſm is a ſeparation from the unity of the Church, ſo Sedition is a ſeparation from the unity of the Commonwealth. And an Author ſays, That a ſeditious perſon differs from a Schiſmatick, becauſe the one oppoſeth the ſpiritual truth, the other the temporal: And as Schiſm of it ſelf is not Hereſy, ſo Sedition without other adjuncts is not Treaſon. Bracton. f. 112, 113, 118. hath been objected, that he makes Sedition Treaſon: I will grant to them, Hengham alſo, who is to the ſame purpoſe; for in thoſe Books it is called, Seditio Regis & Regni. To them I anſwer, 1. That they are obſcure. For what ſignifies ſeditio Regis, or tumultus Regis? Shall it be the ſame thing in ſenſe with ſeditio contra Regem? It ſeems that the ſaid Authors neither remember Law nor Language. 2. Although they reckon Sedition amongſt the crimes læſæ Majeſtatis, yet that is not to be regarded; for they are obſolete Authors, and are not eſteemed as Authors in our Law, as it is in Pl. 356. and Coke 8. 35. but they may be uſed for ornament, and they are good marks to ſhew to us, how the Law was then taken, but not to declare how the Law is at this day; they are no binding authority; and if they be, yet we have them on our ſide likewiſe: For in his 14*th* Book, Glanvile ſays, That a man accuſed of ſuch a crime ſhall be bailed, and that the accuſer ſhall give pledges. And Bracton ſays, That if no accuſer appears, they ſhall be ſet at liberty. And Hengham reckons amongſt the crimes læſæ Majeſtatis, the breach of the Peace, and ſo does Glanvile alſo. Fleta, who was a follower of Bracton, and tranſcribes much verbatim out of him, calls Sedition, Seductionem of the Lord the King. And 12 Edw. I. the Statute of Rutland, which preſcribes Laws for Wales, enacts, That the Sheriff ſhall enquire in his turn, de ſeductoribus Domini Regis; and it is not apparent, whether he intend thoſe which ſeduce the King or his People. And in latter times, Seditio is called Sedutio. In the time of Henry the ſeventh, the Earl of Northumberland, being a great and potent Peer, and the King ſtanding in awe of him, cauſed him, with twenty-four others of great quality, to enter into an obligation of twenty thouſand pounds (which obligation is in the hands of Sir Robert Cotton) unto him, That if the ſaid Earl knew Treaſon, Sedution, Loſs, &c. to be intended to the King, that he ſhould reveal it. 3. Alſo, Crimen læſæ Majeſtatis, which is the phraſe of the Civil-Law, is more general than Treaſon; and the old Authors, which have been cited much, follow the Civil-Law, which hath this expreſſion; and Sedition by the Civil-Law is Treaſon. But it was reſolved, 11 R. II. n. 14. we are not governed by the Civil-Law*. And the Mirrour of Juſtices, the principal copy whereof is in Bennet-College Library in Cambridge, and there is alſo a copy in Lincoln's-Inn Library: Nor Britton in his Book, who writ in the name of the King, have not the word Seditio in them. And I affirm confidently, that there cannot be ſhewn any Record, Book, or Statute, after the making of the Statute of 25 Edw. III. in which Seditio is taken as a capital offence. And yet the Mirrour of Juſtices reckons up ſeveral kinds of Treaſons, which he divides into Treaſons againſt the celeſtial or terreſtrial Majeſty; againſt the celeſtial Majeſty, as Schiſm, Hereſy, Miſcreancy, (and according to this, the Book of 5 R. II. Trial 54. is to be underſtood, which ſays, That a miſcreant ſhall ſhall forfeit his Lands, becauſe it is a kind of Treaſon.) And alſo he ſhews divers Treaſons againſt the King, as, The deflouring of the King's eldeſt Daughter, &c. but not a word of Sedition. But admit, that Sedition imports a greater offence than Tumult, yet there is no colour to ſay, that it is Treaſon; for 25 Edw. III. is a flat bar (that I may uſe the Inner-Temple phraſe) to any thing to be Treaſon, which is not contained in it, unleſs it be made Treaſon by any ſpecial Act afterwards; and 25 Edw. III. does not make it Treaſon. Stamford cites Glanvile, and Bracton, and other ancient Books, to ſhew what was Treaſon before the ſaid Statute, and what not: And he ſays, That it was a great doubt what ſhall be call'd Treaſon; ſaving that all agree, that any thing that tends to the death of the King was Treaſon. 3*dly*, Now examine the words, —againſt Us— thoſe words make not the crime more heinous, as the caſe is. I agree, that if the words had been, —Sedition to take away the Life of the King—it would have been Treaſon; yea, the very thought of Treaſon is Treaſon, (though none can judge thereof till it be produc'd in Act) 19 H. VI. 47. b. by Newton, 13 Jac. B. R. John Owen's Caſe, the writing of a Letter, whereby he intended the death of the King, was Treaſon; but it is not expreſſed, that the raiſing of this Sedition was with ſuch intent; whereby this differs from all the caſes which can be put, in which there is ſuch an intent of the death of the King. Alſo this raiſing of Sedition againſt Us, ſhall not be intended Treaſon; for if it had been ſo, the King would have ſo expreſſed it by the word Treaſon: For, as in his gracious diſpoſition, he will not extend a fault beyond the magnitude thereof, ſo he will give to every offence the true and genuine name. If the Return had been—againſt Our Perſon—it had been more certain, that it concerned the King immediately; this may be againſt any point of his Government. And the proper and natural ſignification of the words,—againſt Us—is as much as, againſt Our Authority, Our Superintendency, againſt Our Peace, Crown and Dignity, which are the uſual words in every Indictment of Felony. Every breach of the Peace is againſt the King. The uſual Return upon every ordinary Writ out of this Court, is, That the party be before Us; and Contempt to this Court is, Contempt againſt Us; and it is in the nature of Sedition to the King. Contempts to the Court of Star-Chamber, are Contempts againſt Us; and upon them, Commiſſions of Rebellion iſſue: and if the parties are brought in upon ſuch Commiſſions, yet they are bailable until their conviction. The King ſtiles himſelf, Us, in Writs; and every diſobedience to any Writ may be ſaid, Sedition againſt Us. Routs, riots, illegal aſſemblies, may well be ſaid and called, Sedition againſt Us: And for ſuch offences, a man ſhall not be reſtrained of his Liberty upon an it may be. Such a Return is neceſſary, by which the Court may be truly informed of the offence. For the Writ of Habeas Corpus is, to ſubmit and receive what the Court ſhall ordain. And this Return of this nature is not to be compared to Writs which are general, and make a brief narration of the matter, and are purſued and explained by ſubſequent declarations. And yet I urge not, that the Return ought to be as certain as an Indictment; for an Indictment of Murder is not good, if it lack the word Murdravit. But the Return upon an Habeas Corpus, q. d. interfecit I. S. upon prepenſed malice, is good; for the nature of the thing is expreſſed, although the formal word be wanting; but out of the Return, the ſubſtance of the offence ought always to appear, which appears not here. But it hath been ſaid by the other ſide, That, let the cauſe in the Return be as it will, yet it is not traverſable, 9 H. VI. 54. and I confeſs it. But as Coke's 11. Rep. P. 93. James Bagg's Caſe is, the Return ought to have certainly ſo much in it, that, if it be falſe, the party grieved may have his action upon the caſe. And the grievance complained of in the Petition of Right is, That upon ſuch Return no cauſe was certified, that is, no ſuch cauſe upon which any Indictment might be drawn up; for we never underſtand, that the party ſhall be tried upon the Habeas Corpus, but that upon the matter contained within it, an Indictment ſhall be made, and he ſhall have his trial upon it. And yet it is clear, and it hath been agreed of all hands, in the argument of the grand Habeas Corpus, Mich. 3 Car. in this Court, that if the cauſe be certified upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, that the Court may judge of the legality of that cauſe. 2. Conſider the parts of this Return, as they are coupled together, ——for notable Contempts by him committed againſt Our Self and Our Government, and for ſtirring of Sedition againſt Us——Upon the entire Return, the King joins Sedition with notable Contempts; ſo that it is as much as if he had ſaid, that Sedition is one of the notable Contempts, mentioned in the firſt part of the Return, ſo that he makes it but a Contempt. For the generality and incertainty of the Return, I refer my ſelf to the caſes put by Mr. Ask, and I will not wave any of them. True it is, if the Return had been, that it was for Treaſon, he had not been bailable but by the diſcretion of the Court, and ſuch Return would have been good; but it is not ſo of Sedition. Gard. 157. Treaſon is applied to a petty offence, to the breach of Truſt by a Guardian in Socage; but it is not Treaſon. And ſo Sedition is of far leſs nature than Treaſon, and is oftentimes taken of a Treſpaſs; it is not Treaſon of it ſelf, nor ſeditioſè was never uſed in an Indictment of Treaſon. It was not Treaſon before the 25 of Edw. III. nor can it be Treaſon: for 25 Edw. III. is a flat Bar (as I have ſaid before) to all other offences to be Treaſon, which are not contained within the ſaid Act, or declared by any Statute afterwards. And there are offences which are more heinous in their nature than Sedition is, which are no Treaſon, as Inſurrections, &c. which ſee in the Statute 11 H. VII. cap. 7. 2 H. V. cap. 9. 8 H. VI. cap. 14. 5 R. II. cap. 6. 17 R. 2. cap. 8. And by 3 and 4 E. VI. cap. 5. the aſſembly of twelve perſons to attempt the alteration of any Law, and the continuance together by the ſpace of an hour, being commanded to return, is made Treaſon; which Act was continued by the Statute of 1 Mar. cap. 12. and 1 Eliz. cap. 16. but now is expired by her death, and is not now in force, (although the contrary be conceived by ſome) which I pray may be well obſerved. By the Statute of 14 Eliz. cap. 1. rebellious taking of the Caſtles of the King is made Treaſon, if they be not delivered, &c. which ſhews clearly, that ſuch taking of Caſtles in its nature was not Treaſon. But the ſaid Statute is now expired; and alſo all Statutes, creating new Treaſons, are now repealed. But, for a concluſion of this part of my argument, I will cite a caſe, which I think expreſs in the point, or more ſtrong than the caſe in queſtion; and it was M. 9 E. III. roll. 39. B. R. Peter Ruſſel's Caſe;

* See Forteſcue, f. 115. the which was not cited, there, never Sedition, Strife, or Murmur is heard.

he was committed to priſon by the Deputy-Juſtice of North-Wales, becauſe he was accuſed by one William Solyman of Sedition, and other things touching the King: And hereupon a Commiſſion iſſued out of the Chancery, to enquire, if the ſaid Peter Ruſſel behaved himſelf well or ſeditiouſly againſt the King; and by the inquiſition it was found, that he behaved himſelf well. And upon an Habeas Corpus out of this Court, his body was returned, but no Cauſe. But the ſaid inquiſition was brought hither out of Chancery, and for that no cauſe of his caption was returned, he prayed delivery; but the Court would not deliver him, till it knew the cauſe of his commitment: Therefore (taking no regard of the ſaid Inquiſition) they now ſend a Writ to the now Juſtice of Wales, to certify the cauſe of his commitment. And thereupon he made this Return, That the aforeſaid Peter Ruſſel was taken, becauſe one William Solyman charged him, that he had committed divers Seditions againſt the Lord the King; and for that cauſe he was detained, and for no other. And becauſe the Return mentions not what Sedition in ſpecial, he was bailed, but not diſcharged. And I deſire the bailment of the priſoner only, and not his deliverance. I deſire that the Caſe be well obſerved. In the ſaid Caſe, there was an actual Sedition againſt the King; here is only a ſtirring up of Sedition. The words of the ſaid Award are, Videtur curia; which are the ſolemn words of a Judgment, given upon great deliberation. There it was,——for other things concerning Us——This is all one as if he had ſaid,——for other things againſt Us.—Concerning the King, and, againſt the King, are all one, as appears by 25 E. III. c. 4. de Clero, Stamf. 124. Weſtm. 1. c. 15. Bracton, f. 119. 14 Eliz. c. 2. And the words of the Judgment in the ſaid Caſe, were not,——dimittitur—— but, ideo dimittendus——which imply the right of the party to be bailed. The ſaid caſe in ſome things was more particular than our caſe, and more ſtrong; for there was an accuſer to boot, which wants in our caſe. There, true it is, that he was committed by the Juſtice of Wales, and here by the King himſelf; but this makes no difference, as to this Court: for, be the commitment by the King himſelf, or by any other, if it be not upon juſt cauſe, the party may be bailed in this Court. And for the Inquiſition, which is mentioned, it was no trial in the caſe; nor did the Court give any regard thereto. To detain the priſoner by the command of the King ſingly, is againſt the Petition of Right; but it being coupled with the cauſe, the cauſe is to be conſidered, and the truth of the cauſe is to be intended, as well where it is mentioned, to be by an inferiour Judge, as where by the King himſelf, for it is traverſable neither in the one nor other. And 22 H. VIII. roll. 37. B. R. and 1 H. VIII. roll. 8. Harriſon's Caſe, reſolv'd, That a man committed by the command of the King, is bailable. And 33 Eliz. it was reſolved by all the Juſtices of England, which I have viewed in Chief Juſtice Anderſon's Book, under his own hand, and it was produced in Parliament, That all men committed by the Privy-Council are bailable, if the commitment be not for High-Treaſon. In all caſes of commitment, an accuſer is underſtood. Suppoſe that the accuſation mentioned in Ruſſel's Caſe of Sedition, had been an accuſation of Treaſon, then the Judges ought not to have bailed him of right, and no man will ſay, but that the ſaid accuſation was a good cauſe to commit him. But the diſcovery of the offence ought to be afterward in an Indictment.

Fourthly, I come to the objections which have been made on the contrary.

1. It was objected, That this was a caſe of great conſequence. I confeſs it, but this conſequence is not to the King; for if it be truly Treaſon, then they might have returned Treaſon, and then the party was not to be bailed of right, till there ſhould be a failure of proſecution; as was lately in Melvin's Caſe, who was bailed for lack of proſecution; the Return being for High-Treaſon.

2. It was objected, That there can be no conviction, as this caſe is, therefore there ought to be coercive power to reſtrain the priſoner. This is ſtrange news to me, that there ſhall be any offence, for which a man cannot be convicted. And if there can be no conviction, it hence follows, that there is no offence; and if there be no offence, there ought by conſequence to be no impriſonment.

3. The caſe of 14 H. VII, VIII. hath been objected, that a Juſtice of Peace may commit Rioters without bail. I confeſs it, for this is by force of a Statute which ordains it.

4. It hath been objected, That if an houſe be on fire, it is lawful to pull down the neighbour's houſe, for the preſervation of further miſchief; and the caſes of 22 aſſ. and 22 E. IV. that every man may juſtify the coercion of a mad-man. I anſwer, that theſe caſes are true, as of neceſſity, and no other evaſion: but here, bail is proffer'd, which is, body for body. Fire is ſwift, and cannot be puniſhed, and no caution can be obtained thereof. But obſerve the true inference and conſequence of this argument; If my houſe be on fire, my neighbour's houſe muſt be pulled down; Mr. Selden is ſeditious, ergo, Mr. Herbert, his neighbour, muſt be impriſoned.

5. It hath been objected out of Br. Treaſon, 24. 1 Mar. That the ſaid Statute of 25 E. III. is taken largely, and that the detaining of a Caſtle or Fortreſs is Treaſon. To this I anſwer, that the bare detaining of a Caſtle is not Treaſon, unleſs it be with intention of the death of the King; but the taking of a Caſtle is Treaſon. And the caſe there meant by Brook, is Conſtable's Caſe, Dy. 128. And I confeſs, 13 Eliz. Dy. 298. Dr. Story's Caſe*, that conſpiracy to invade the Kingdom, is Treaſon; for this cannot be without great danger of the death of the King; for,——arma tenenti, Omnia dat qui juſta negat.—And all thoſe Indictments were, that they intended the death of the King; but no ſuch intention is expreſſed here.

6. It hath been objected, That this caſe is out of the Petition of Right, becauſe in this Return there is a cauſe ſhewed. But the grievance whereupon the Petition of Right was framed, was, where no cauſe was returned. It is true, that the grievance goes no further, but where no cauſe was return'd; for that was the grievance at that time. But the words of the Petition of Right are further,——without being charged with any thing, to which they might make anſwer by the Law——which implies, that ſuch cauſe ought to be contained in the Return, which being put into an Indictment, the party may have his anſwer thereto.

7. It

See alſo Sir John Hawles's Reply to the Magiſtracy of England vindicated, (a Folio Pamphlet) p. 26.

7. It was objected, That the Return ſhall not be conſtrued and expounded by fractions. I anſwer, That we need not make ſuch an expoſition; for the joint-conſtruction thereof makes more for us, than the ſeveral, as is ſhewed before.

8. That a general Return is ſufficient, and it need not have terms of art in it, as an Indictment ought to have. For anſwer, I confeſs it; but I affirm, as above, that a Return ought to be ſo particular, that the nature of the offence ought to appear out of it: and it is not to be compared to general Writs, as, Apoſtatâ capiendo, Idiotâ examinando, Leproſo amovendo, and the like: for thoſe Writs are good enough, becauſe they contain the very matter. And although it hath been ſaid, that there are two kinds of Lepers, yet I never heard but of one: and the Writ, de Hæretico comburendo, is general, and good, becauſe it is but a Writ of execution upon a Judgment, given by the ſpiritual Power. But becauſe they might not meddle with the blood of any man, the execution is by the ſecular Power.

9. It hath been objected out of 30 aſſ. p. 19. that the King would have one drawn and hanged, for bringing into England the Bulls of the Pope. But the Book anſwers it ſelf, for he was not drawn and hanged.

10. The Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. was objected. But as oft as that Statute is objected, I will always cry out, The Petition of Right, The Petition of Right! as the King of France cried out nothing but France, France! when all the ſeveral Dominions of the King of Spain were objected to him.

11. A curious diſtinction hath been taken by Serjeant Davenport, between ſtirring To Sedition, and ſtirring Up Sedition; for the firſt implies an inclination only to do it, the ſecond implies an act done. But this is too nice, for if a man ſtir up Sedition, or to Sedition, if it be with intention of the death of the King, the one and the other is Treaſon.

12. The opinion of Forteſcue in 31 H. VI. 10. b. hath been objected, That for an offence done to the Court, a man may be committed before conviction. To this I anſwer, 1. That the Book does not ſay, That he ſhall be committed without Bail. 2. The offence being done in face of the Court, the very view of the Court is a conviction in Law.

13. There was objected the 24 of Edw. III. 23. Sir Thomas Fitchet's Caſe, who, for going armed in the Palace, was committed by this Court without bail or mainprize; which ſeems to be the ſtrongeſt and hardeſt caſe that hath been objected. But the anſwer to it is clear, and undeniable; for the Statute of 2 E. III. cap. 3. is, That if any one come armed before the Juſtices, he ſhall forfeit his armour, and ſhall be impriſoned during the King's pleaſure; ſo that by the expreſs purview of the Statute, ſuch a man is not bailable. So my concluſion remains firm, notwithſtanding any of thoſe objections. That the priſoner here, being committed before conviction of any offence, (it being not poſſible to underſtand this offence Treaſon) is bailable; and that he is bailable here, I will offer two other reaſons: 1. The Return is here for Sedition; and there is an information in the Star-chamber againſt the priſoner, for ſeditious Practices againſt the King and his Government. I will not affirm, that they are the ſame offence, but there is ſome probability that they are the ſelf-ſame; and if they be the ſame offence, then the Sedition here intended is not Treaſon, and ſo the party is bailable. 2. This priſoner was ready at this Bar the laſt Term, and here was a Grand-Jury at Bar the laſt Term, and here was the King's Counſel preſent, who are moſt watchful for the King; and yet an Indictment was not preferred to them againſt this priſoner. Which things induce me to be of opinion, that the offence here mentioned in this Return is not Treaſon, or ſo great as is pretended on the other ſide. I will remember one caſe which perhaps may be objected, (and yet I think they will not object it) and ſo conclude. 11 R. II. Parliament Roll 14. in the printed Statute, cap. 3. and 5. where it appears, that divers queſtions were propounded by the King to Treſilian and Belknap, the two Chief Juſtices, and to the other Juſtices: one of which queſtions was, how they are to be puniſhed, who reſiſted the King in exerciſing his Royal Power? &c. And the anſwer of the Judges was, una voce, that they are to be puniſhed as traitors; and 21 R. II. cap. 21. this opinion was confirmed. But afterwards in 1 H. IV. cap. 3 and 4. and 1 H. IV. in the Parliament-Roll, numb. 66, 67. the Judges were queſtioned, for their opinion, in Parliament. They anſwered, That they were threatned and enforced to give this opinion, and that they were in truth of the contrary opinion. And Belknap ſaid, That he acquainted and proteſted to the Earl of Kent aforehand, that his opinion was always to the contrary. But the Parliament was not content with theſe excuſes, but they were all adjudged Traitors; and Treſilian's end is known to all, and Belknap was baniſhed; for his wife, in 2 H. IV. brought a Writ, without naming her husband, becauſe he was baniſh'd. And the ſaid Statute of 21 R. II. was repealed. Therefore upon the whole matter I conclude, that the priſoner ought to be bail'd.

On the ſame day, Sir Miles Hobart, and Benjamin Valentine, and Denſil Hollis Eſquires, were at the Bar, upon an Habeas Corpus directed to the ſeveral priſons; and their Counſel was ready at the Bar to have argued the caſe for them alſo: But becauſe the ſame Return was made as above, they ſaid, That all of them would rely upon this argument made by Mr. Littleton.

Mr. Selden's Argument *.

UPON the Writ of Habeas Corpus, ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum, directed out of the King's-Bench to the Lieutenant of the Tower, he returns, that the priſoner was firſt committed to his cuſtody by a warrant of the Lords of the Privy-Council, dated 4 Martii 5 Caroli Regis, and recites the warrant wherein the King's pleaſure for the commitment is alſo ſignified. And farther, he returns, that the priſoner is detained by him, by virtue of another warrant, afterward directed to him, under the King's own hand, dated the 7th of May following; wherein it is ſignified, that he was to take knowledge, that the commitment was for notable Contempts committed againſt Our Self and Our Government, and for ſtirring up of Sedition againſt Us, with

* The Editor of Mr. Selden's Works, in his Preface to the third Volume, ſays, "This is the Subſtance of an Argument made in "his (Mr. Selden's) own Caſe, and which was pronounc'd by Mr. Littleton." But as there is ſo great a difference between them, we leave the Reader to judge of that; and, as it concerns ſo grand a point as the Liberty of the Subject, have therefore given both a command to detain him until his Majeſty's pleaſure were farther known, &c. And ſo certifies the Court, that theſe are the cauſes of taking and detaining him, and brings in his Body according to the Writ. And, whether upon this Return, the priſoner ought to be delivered by the Court, upon ſufficient bail, or remanded to the Tower, is the queſtion? That is, ſuppoſing the Return to be every way true (as in all caſes it muſt be ſuppoſed, when the queſtion ariſes upon a Return) whether there be ſufficient cauſe expreſſed in it, for which the priſoner ought to be remanded? Or, that the cauſe of the commitment be ſuch (as it is expreſſed in the Return) that he ought to be bailed? If there were no more in the caſe, but the Lords, or the King's command only, without farther cauſe ſhewed of the commitment; then it were clear, by the declaration of both Houſes of Parliament, and the anſwer of his Majeſty to that declaration, in the late Petition of Right, that the priſoner were to be remanded. And the objections that ſome have made, out of the Statute of Weſtminſter, the firſt, cap. 15. That perſons committed by command of the King, are not repleviſable, and out of Stamford, fol. 73. as if he interpreted bailable (which indeed he doth not, if he be obſerved) to be underſtood in that Statute by repleviſable, and the like, are directly againſt the very body of the Petition of Right, and were ſo fully cleared in the debates, out of which the Petition of Right was framed, that to diſpute them again, were but to queſtion what the whole Parliament had already reſolved on, as the certain and eſtabliſhed Law of the kingdom. Nor is it timely to diſpute here again the general power of commitment, by the Lords or by the King himſelf. There is a commitment in the caſe, and there is a cauſe ſhewed of that commitment, and of the detainer in priſon; and the quality of that cauſe only is truly the ſole queſtion; to the ſtating of which, the nature and courſe of bails upon offences, either returned generally upon Habeas Corpus, or appearing more ſpecially upon Indictments, is ſhortly to be firſt opened. All offences, by the Laws of the Realm, being of two kinds: The firſt, puniſhable by loſs of life or limb; the ſecond, by fine, or ſome pecuniary mulct, or damage and impriſonment, or by one of them; and thoſe of the firſt kind being Treaſon, Murder, Felonies of leſs nature, and ſome more; and of the ſecond kind, bloodſheds, affrays, and other treſpaſſes: If any priſoner ſtand committed (though before conviction) for Treaſon or Murder; the Judges, for ought appears in the Books, have not often uſed to let him to bail, unleſs it have appeared to them, that there hath been either want of proſecution, or of evidence to proceed, or that the proceeding through diſability of the appellant (in caſe of appeals) as when he is excommunicate, is delayed; or that the evidence is ſlight, or ſome ſuch like cauſe. So that in the bailing upon ſuch offences of the higheſt nature, a kind of diſcretion, rather than a conſtant Law hath been exerciſed, when it ſtands wholly indifferent in the eye of the Court, whether the priſoner be guilty or not*. And according to that, they often let to bail, detain in priſon, or remand the priſoner. Alſo in Felonies of leſs nature; which being all, as thoſe of the greateſt nature capital, and ſo the puniſhment of the ſame above impriſonment, the impriſonment of the offenders without bail, is only uſed ad ſalvam cuſtodiam, and cannot be uſed ad pœnam. But if a priſoner before conviction, or ſomewhat that ſupplies a conviction, (ſo therefore alſo fit enough before conviction) ſtand committed for treſpaſſes only, as all offences of the ſecond kind are, and are puniſhable only by fine and impriſonment, or by one of them (in which caſe impriſonment is to be the higheſt part of his puniſhment, after conviction) there, by the conſtant courſe (unleſs ſome ſpecial Act of Parliament be to the contrary in ſome particular caſe) upon offer of good bail to the Court, he is to be bailed; which agrees alſo with all juſtice and exactneſs of reaſon, that ſo both the Court may, by his ſureties and bail (to whoſe care he is a-new committed) be aſſured to have him ready at the day given him upon the bail, to anſwer all proceeding againſt him; and he himſelf, having ſureties that ſo undertake for his appearance, may not be compelled, before conviction, to endure that continually, ad cuſtodiam only, which is the higheſt part of what he is to ſuffer, after conviction, ad pœnam. So that in caſes of impriſonment for offences of the firſt kind, divers circumſtances might be, for which ſufficient bail offered, might, according to the uſe, be refuſed by the Court. But in caſes of impriſonment for offences of the ſecond kind, ſufficient bail, offered before conviction, ought of common right to be accepted; ſaving ſtill, where a ſpecial Act of Parliament alters the Law in ſome particular caſe: but there is no colour or pretence of any ſuch Act concerning the caſe in queſtion; ſo that we are to examine it (for the point of bailing) only at the common Law.

The ſtate then of the queſtion is but this: Whether that expreſſion, for notable Contempts againſt Our Self, and Our Government, and for ſtirring up of Sedition againſt Us, do denote any offence of the firſt kind? Which, if it do not, or ſo do not, as that the Court may by the words of it be ſufficiently informed that it is ſome offence, at leaſt, of the firſt kind; the bail, in this caſe, ought to be accepted. The offences in the Return, being two; firſt, notable Contempts, and then ſtirring of Sedition, and both againſt the King.

There can be no queſtion made of it, but that all Contempts, of what kind ſoever, that are puniſhable by the Laws of the Realm, are againſt the King and his Government, immediately or mediately. And although the latitude of them be ſuch, as that ſome may vaſtly exceed others; yet they are all, as Contempts, only treſpaſſes, &c. puniſhable only by fine or impriſonment, or by both, but not until conviction of the parties (as neither are other like offences) unleſs the Contempt be in the face of ſome Court, againſt which it is committed, which ſupplies a conviction. Now in this caſe, the Contempts are only expreſſed in a generality, and no conviction appears of them. So that for that part of the Return, there can be no colour why the bail ought not to be accepted. But all the doubt of the caſe depends upon the ſecond offence; that is, the ſtirring up of Sedition againſt the King. Which if it be an offence only of the ſame kind as Contempts are, or a meer treſpaſs only to the King; or, if by the words of the Return, it appears not to the Court to be an offence of the firſt kind, that is, either Treaſon, or Felony at leaſt, (there being no con-conviction in the caſe) the priſoner ought to be bailed. For, unleſs the Court be aſſured, out of the words of the Return, that the priſoner ſtands committed for ſome ſuch cauſe, for which he might not, of right, demand his bail; it is clear they ought to bail him. It reſts therefore to examine the nature of the offence comprehended in thoſe words, ſtirring up ſedition againſt us. If it be any thing above what is treſpaſs only, plainly it muſt be either Treaſon or Felony. For Felony, no man pretends that by thoſe words, any kind of Felony is to be underſtood. The queſtion then muſt be, whether the ſtirring up ſedition againſt the King, be Treaſon or no? that is, High-Treaſon, as all Treaſon is that toucheth the King, as Treaſon. For Petit-Treaſon, by the Common Law, is Felony, in regard of the King, and Treaſon only with reſpect to perſons ſlain, againſt the faith and obedience due from the offender; and therefore the indictments of it ſay, felonice & proditorie.

In the conſideration of the queſtion thus ſtated, firſt, the uſe of the word ſedition, and the ſenſe of it in our Language, and in our Laws, that received it out of that language, is to be examined; and then what thoſe words, againſt us, import. Out of both which, it will be eaſily concluded, that the offence, as it is expreſſed in the Return, although it be a great one, yet it is only a treſpaſs, and puniſhable by fine only or impriſonment, or both of them. For ſedition, and the general notion of it; we have not either in the diviſion, or explication of offences that occur in our Books, an expreſs definition, deſcription or declaration of it, though it occurs ſometimes, as mingled with ſome other offences, and the adjective of it oftener than ſubſtantive: Nor hath there been yet found any indictment or proceeding upon the crime of ſedition, by that name ſingly, as an offence in Law, clearly enough known by itſelf. Unlawful aſſemblies, routs, riots, commotions, are the neareſt, if not the very things that, by other names do, for the moſt part, expreſs what ſedition is in our Laws. Vid. 3 Hen. VII. fol. 1. & Brook. riots 4 & 5. But our language, rather than our Laws, hath received the word from Latin, and thence hath in preambles of Statutes, and of indictments, ſometimes inſerted it; ſo that miſſing an expreſs expoſition of the word in our Law, we have reaſon to ſeek for it firſt in the language whence we received it, and then in the uſe of it in our own.

In Latin, that which is mutiny, raiſing of tumult, aſſembling of any arm'd power, or conventicles, or the like, is ſedition. Whence it is, that in the Civil Law, ſeditio & tumultus are frequently joined; and concitatores ſeditionis, and actores ſeditionis, occur in the text of that Law, * for ſuch as ſtir up ſedition. And thence alſo ſeditio militaris is uſed for a mutiny of the Soldiers in the Army, in Tacitus and others, and that for no more than the profeſſing themſelves againſt any command whatſoever given by the General. In this ſenſe it is uſed alſo by a Lawyer of Epheſus, in the holy text, where Demetrius the ſilver-ſmith aſſembled the reſt of his company againſt St. Paul, for preaching againſt Diana. For we are (ſaith he, ſpeaking to appeaſe the aſſembly) even in jeopardy to be accuſed of this day's ſedition, for as much as there is no cauſe whereby we may give a reaſon of this concourſe of people. Acts xix. 40. In the ſame ſenſe Tertullus, an Orator and Lawyer, pleading againſt St. Paul at Cæſarea, before Felix the Governour there, We have found this man a mover of ſedition amongſt all the Jews throughout the World, and a chief maintainer of the ſect of the Nazarens, Acts xxiv. 5. And ſuch like teſtimonies are very obvious. In the ſelf-ſame ſenſe the word was received into our language, as we may ſee in that Act of Parliament againſt the Lollards, under Hen. IV. 2 Hen. IV. c. 15. The words there are, That they taught openly and privily divers new doctrines, contrary to the faith and determinations of the Holy Church; and of ſuch ſect and wicked doctrine and opinions they make unlawful conventicles and confederacies, they hold and exerciſe ſchools, they make and write books, they do wickedly inſtruct and inform people. Et ad ſeditionem ſeu inſurrectionem excitant quantum poſſunt, & magnas diſſentiones & diviſiones in populo faciunt. Rot. parl. 2 H. IV. n. 48. And, as much as they may, incite and ſtir them to ſedition and inſurrection, and maketh great ſtrife and diviſion among the people, &c. And about the beginning of Queen Mary, an Act of Parliament was made againſt ſeditious words and rumours; in the preamble whereof, ſeditious and ſlanderous news is mentioned, and ſeditious and ſlanderous writings, and perſons intending and practiſing to move and ſtir ſeditions, (ſo it is in Raſtall, and the Roll of Parliament, not ſeditious, as in the Statutes at large) diſcord, diſſenſion, and rebellion within this Realm. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. 3. And to the ſame purpoſe, an Act of Explanation of the ſaid Act of Queen Mary, was made in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth, 1 Eliz. cap. 6. wherein mention alſo is of falſe, ſeditious, and ſlanderous news, or tales, againſt the Queen. As alſo in her 13*th* Year, cap. 1. a proviſion is made againſt contentious and ſeditious ſpreading abroad of titles to the ſucceſſion of the Crown. And in another Act of the ſame year, c. 2. alſo the bringing Bulls from Rome, to raiſe and ſtir ſedition, is mentioned in the preamble. And in the 23*d* year, another Act 23 Eliz. cap. 2. was made with this title, Againſt ſeditious words and rumours uttered againſt the Queen's moſt excellent Majeſty. And in Indictments upon that Statute of the 1*ſt* and 2*d* of Philip and Mary, as it was continued in the Act of the 23*d* of Elizabeth; the party indicted for ſlanderous words, in defamation of the Queen, is ſaid to have been machinans & intendens ſeditionem & rebellionem infra hoc regnum Angliæ movere & ſuſcitare, and that adviſate, & cum malitioſa intentione, contra dictam dominam reginam, & felonice ut felo dicte domine regine nunc, deviſavit & ſcripſit quaſdam falſas, ſeditioſas, & ſcandaloſas materias, &c. 34 Eliz. Coke, lib. intrat. tit. indictment, fol. 352. col. 3. & 353. where the title is miſreferred to the Act of 1 Eliz. cap. 2.

In the Lord Cromwell's caſe alſo, 20 Eliz. Coke 4. in act. de ſcandalis, ſeditio is mentioned againſt the Queen's Proceedings; and ſeditio domini regis, vel exercitus ſui, in Bracton, fol. 118. and ſeditio regni, vel exercitus, in Glanville, l. 14. c. 1. and ſeditio perſonæ domini regis vel exercitus, in Hengham, c. 2.

Now, for the ſenſe of the words ſedition and ſeditious, it will be moſt plain, that in all theſe places, (except thoſe old Books of Bracton, Glanville, and Hengham, the interpretation of whom hath fitteſt place after the examination of the objections made to prove ſedition to be treaſon) they denoted in our Language, and in the uſe of our Laws, that received them thence, ſuch an offence as was not puniſhable (without ſome ſpecial proviſion by Act of Parliament) otherwiſe than by fine and impriſonment, at the utmoſt; and were reputed ſingly, but as words or names deſigning tumults, unlawful aſſemblies, routs, factions or rebellions againſt any part of the eſtabliſhed Laws, or publick commands. Therefore in that Act of 2 Hen. IV. concerning the Lollards, the puniſhment of them that offended againſt the Act, and were ſuch ſtirrers of ſedition and inſurrection, was, that they ſhould be impriſoned only by virtue of that act, until purgation, if they purged themſelves; and impriſoned and fined after conviction, and detained in priſon till abjuration; and upon refuſal to abjure, or upon relapſe, to be burnt for Hereticks: But that Act is repealed by the 25 Hen. VIII. cap. 14. So, by the Act of the 1ſt and 2*d* of Philip and Mary, the firſt offence of ſpeaking ſeditious and ſlanderous words, or rumours of the King or Queen, was after conviction, ſtanding on the Pillory, and loſs of Ears, (unleſs he redeemed them by the fine of 100 l.) and three months impriſonment. And if any, from another's report, ſhall ſpeak any ſeditious and ſlanderous news of the King and Queen, he ſhould, after conviction, loſe one Ear (or redeem it by 100 Marks) and have one month's impriſonment: And that if any ſhould maliciouſly deviſe, or write any book or writing, containing any falſe matter, clauſe or ſentence, of ſlander, reproach, and diſhonour of the King or Queen, to alienate the minds of the ſubjects from their dutiful obedience, or to the encouraging, ſtirring, or moving of any inſurrection or rebellion within this realm; or, if any procure any ſuch thing to be done (the ſaid offence being not puniſhable by the Statute of 25 of Edw. III. of treaſon) he ſhould loſe his right hand. And that the ſecond offence of them that were puniſhable by loſs of Ear, or Ears, ſhould be impriſonment during life, and loſs of all their goods and chattels. This Act of Queen Mary expired at her death, and agreeable to it was that proviſion of the Act of 1 Eliz. c. 6. which extended the ſame to Queen Elizabeth, during her life; but there is no ſuch law at this day in being. So, in that of the 13 of Eliz. cap. 1. the firſt offence of contentious and ſeditious ſpreading abroad of titles to the ſucceſſion of the Crown, is puniſhed by the impriſonment of one whole year, and the loſs of half the offender's goods, and the ſecond offence by the pains of a præmunire. The bringing in of Bulls alſo from Rome, to alienate the minds of the ſubjects from their dutiful obedience, and to raiſe and ſtir ſedition and rebellion, is made High-Treaſon by that other Act of the ſame year. By which it appears, that ſtirring to ſedition alone is in that very Act clearly ſuppoſed of far leſs nature. But that Act is alſo expired. In that alſo of the 23 of Eliz. cap. 2. the reporters of ſeditious news, or rumours, againſt the Queen, was made loſs of Ears (as before) or, that to be redeemed at 200 l. beſides impriſonment of ſix months: and the reporters from another's mouth, to be puniſhed according to that of 1 and 2 of Philip and Mary; ſaving, that the impriſonment, by this Act, is three months, and the ſecond offence is made Felony, and writing of any ſeditious matter, to the purpoſes in that Act of Queen Mary, is made Felony, upon which Act the indictments of Felony, before-mentioned, are grounded; but that Act alſo expired by the death of Queen Elizabeth. And in that caſe of the Lord Cromwell, who brought a Scandalum magnatum againſt the parſon of Northelenham in Norfolk, for ſaying, That you like not of me, but you like of them that maintain ſedition againſt the Queen's proceedings. Although, in the report of the caſe, ſedition generally be called an open and heinous crime, and deſcribed to be as in the nature of ſome great factious aſſembly, or riot; yet the defendant juſtifies the words, by this, that the plaintiff and he had diſcourſe of one that preached againſt the Book of Common-Prayer, and that in their diſcourſe, the plaintiff ſaid to the defendant, I like not of thee: To which he replied, It is no marvel, for you like of them that maintain ſedition, (prædict. ſeditioſam doctrinam innuendo) againſt the Queen's proceedings; and the juſtification allowed good. Whence it appears clearly, that maintaining ſedition generally may be, ſuch preaching of ſeditious doctrine which is puniſhable only by the Statute of 1 Eliz. c. 1. by fine and impriſonment. Out of all which examples it appears, that ſedition, and Acts ſeditiouſly done, are of themſelves ſingly, no capital crimes, or otherwiſe puniſhable than by fine or impriſonment, or both; unleſs by ſome ſpecial Act of Parliament it be ordained otherwiſe. And to confirm this alſo, we may obſerve divers other Statutes; where, routs, riots, rebellions, and inſurrections (all which, of themſelves, if no traitorous intent appear, by ſome overt Act, are puniſhable but by fine and impriſonment, unleſs ſome Act of Parliament eſpecially ordain a greater puniſhment) have ſpecial puniſhments appointed for them; being at the Common Law, but in the nature of treſpaſſes. As in the 17 Rich. II. c. 8. it appears, that in the 5th year of the ſame King (which is 5 Rich. II. c. 6. Stat. 1.) outragious aſſemblies of the people againſt the King's dignity, and his Crown, and the Laws of the land (as every great riot is) were made Treaſon; which Act is long ſince repealed. Whence it is alſo very obſervable to this purpoſe, that in two Acts of Parliament, the one of the 2 Hen. V. c. 9. Stat. 1. and the other of the 8 Hen. VI. c. 14. the ſimple word riots (which is moſt known in the Law, to this day, for ſeditious aſſemblies) is taken plainly as an expreſſion ſufficiently comprehending aſſemblies of people, in great number, in manner of inſurrection, and alſo rebellions, as will appear plainly, by comparing the preambles with the bodies of the ſame Acts. And in 11 Hen. VII. c. 7. for the puniſhment of unlawful raiſing and leading of people, riots, routs, and other unlawful aſſemblies, a form of proceeding is appointed; wherein appears moſt plainly and expreſsly, that the puniſhment was only by fine and impriſonment, and the Act was to continue but till the next Parliament, when it expired. Therefore alſo by the Act of 3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 5. entitled, An Act for the puniſhment of unlawful aſſemblies, and riſing of the King's Subjects, it was ordained, That if any perſons, to the number of twelve, or above, being aſſembled together, ſhall intend, with force of arms, unlawfully and of their own authority, to kill or impriſon any of the King's Privy-Council, or to alter, or change any Laws eſtabliſhed by Parliament, and ſhall not depart and retire to their own habitations, within one hour after command made by the Sheriff, ſome Juſtice of the Peace, or other ſuch Officer, in that behalf; the offence ſhould be High-Treaſon. And if ſuch perſons aſſembled, to the pulling down of ditches, or laying open incloſures, or to the committing of ſome ſuch more offences, retire not within that ſpace, that it ſhall be Felony in them. And if any ſhould incite ſuch perſons to any ſuch act, by ſpeaking, ringing a bell, ſounding a trumpet, firing of beacons, or the like; inſomuch that they remain together after any ſuch command, as aforeſaid, by the ſpace of an hour, and commit any ſuch Act, as aforeſaid, it ſhould be Felony alſo. And the perſons ſo aſſembled, and remaining together, to the number of forty, by the ſpace of two hours, are by the ſame made Traitors. And that if the number be above two, and under twelve, that with force of arms, unlawfully, and of their own authority, aſſembled for the caſting down of ditches, incloſures, and divers ſuch other things, their ſtaying together after ſuch command by the ſpace of an hour, ſhould be puniſhed by a year's impriſonment, and fine and ranſom at the King's pleaſure. And it is alſo in the ſame Act ordained, That if any perſon ſhall procure, move, or ſtir any other perſon, or perſons, to ariſe, or make any traitorous or rebellious aſſembly, to the intent to do any of the things before-mentioned, it ſhould be Felony. And further, that if any perſon were ſpoken to, moved, or ſtirred to make any commotion, inſurrection, or unlawful aſſembly for any of the intents before-mentioned, and did not tell it within twenty-four hours afterward, unleſs he have ſufficient excuſe, to ſome head Officer where ſuch ſpeaking were had, ſhould ſuffer impriſonment, until he were diſcharged by three Juſtices of the Peace, whereof one to be of the quorum. This Act was to endure till the end of the next Parliament only, which was in 7 Edw. VI. and then, cap. 11. it was continued till the end of the next, which was in 1 Mar. ſeſſ. 2. wherein, c. 12. it is repealed, and another of the ſame nature made. Both which ſhew moſt evidently, that thoſe unlawful aſſemblies, inſurrections, commotions, and the like, which are plainly Seditions, provided for by thoſe Acts, were before but treſpaſſes, puniſhable only by fine and impriſonment. That of the 1 Mar. ſeſſ. 2. c. 12. is entituled, An Act againſt unlawful and rebellious Aſſemblies, where the clauſe of the Privy-Counſellors (that was in the 3 & 4 Edw. VI.) is omitted; and the reſt of the offence touching the altering of Laws, is expreſſed, as in that of Ed. VI. ſaving that the crime is made Felony, whereas it was Treaſon by that of Ed. VI. The reſt of that Act of 1 Mar. is, for the moſt part, agreeable with that of Ed. VI. ſaving, that none of the offences are Treaſon by this Act, but Felony at the moſt. And for the being ſpoken to, or ſtirred to make any commotion, and not diſcovering it; here, in this of Queen Mary, the offender is to ſuffer impriſonment only for three months, unleſs he be diſcharged by three Juſtices of the Peace, as in that of Ed. VI. This of Queen Mary, was kept on by continuance only, from one Parliament to another, during her time; and in 1 Eliz. c. 16. it was made to continue during the life of Queen Elizabeth, and at her death expired. To this purpoſe alſo the Act of 14 Eliz. c. 1. is obſervable; where, unlawful practices, ſecret conſpiracies and devices, to take or ſurprize any of the Queen's fortified Caſtles, and the malicious and rebellious intent of ſurprizing, or taking them, being expreſſed by overt Act, or word, are made Felony; and the not giving them up within ſix days after command from her, is made Treaſon; which Act alſo expired with her life. Here the offences made Treaſon and Felony by the Act, were both Seditions of a high nature; and yet but treſpaſſes before the Act made, nor are they other now the Act is expired. For the ſurpriſing or detaining of a Caſtle, without levying a war, or ſome other Act of Treaſon (as in Sherley's caſe in Dyer) was not Treaſon, but by that Act. To theſe we may juſtly add that caſe of the Earl of Northumberland in 5 Hen. IV. rot. parl. n. 11. 12. &c. He acknowledged by writing, in Parliament, that he was guilty of not keeping the Laws as ligeance asketh, and of gathering power, and giving of liveries, (which are the words of the Parliament-Roll) and upon ſpecial conſideration had, by the Lords and Judges in Parliament, of the nature of the offence thus ſet forth, they adjudged it was neither Felony nor Treaſon, but only Treſpaſs; and ſo are the expreſs words of the Roll. Yet the gathering of power, and giving liveries, and breaking of allegiance, are large expreſſions of that, which in itſelf was truly ſedition, and that of a high nature. And thus, both by the uſe of the word, and the puniſhments provided, in ſome caſes in Parliament, for remedy of the offence (without which ſpecial proviſion it is never found capital) it appears clearly that ſedition, or the ſtirring of ſedition, alone, at the Common Law, (and no Statute, now in force, hath ordained otherwiſe) is but treſpaſs, and puniſhable only by fine and impriſonment.

Now for the words againſt us; that is, againſt the King. There is no doubt at all, but that all offences are againſt the King. Every ſlight treſpaſs, by the Law, is contra pacem domini Regis, and whatſoever is againſt his peace, is againſt him; as alſo divers indictments of meer treſpaſſes, conclude with in contemptum domini regis; and contra coronam & dignitatem ſuas: As in an indictment for hearing of maſs, is contra pacem, dignitatem & coronam domini regis. All which import againſt the King. And that Act of 23 Eliz. is made againſt ſeditious words againſt the Queen's moſt excellent Majeſty; which, even after the Act, remained not capital, being before but treſpaſs. And in the preamble of that of 14 Eliz. it appears, the Act was made againſt unlawful practices, ſecret conſpiracies and devices, ſtirred and moved againſt our ſovereign Lady the Queen, in ſeeking unlawfully to take her Caſtles, Fortreſſes, and the like. And in Bracton, fol. 119. b. §. 3. & 120. b. §. 6. the concealing of treaſure, which is puniſhable by fine and impriſonment, is expreſsly ſaid to be, gravis præſumptio contra regem, & dignitatem, & coronam ſuam; as alſo the not keeping the aſſiſes of bread and ale, and the like. Neither is there any doubt of this, but that the words, againſt the King, may be applicable to any kind, and as well to the leaſt as the greateſt kind of offences, and imply nothing that increaſes the offence above treſpaſs.

It follows then, for the laſt part of the conſideration, that (ſedition being but that which we otherwiſe call unlawful aſſemblies, riot, mutiny, rebellion, or the like; and every offence, puniſhable, being againſt the King) the ſtirring up of ſedition againſt the King, which is, or may be, the ſtirring up of a rout, unlawful aſſembly, mutiny, rebellion, or the like, againſt ſome ordinary, or extraordinary command, proceſs, writ, or execution of ſome eſtabliſhed Law, is no other offence, by the expreſſion in the return; nor can thereby be underſtood to be other (without ſome ſpecial Act of Parliament have altered the Law) than treſpaſs, and puniſhable only by fine and impriſonment, and ſo, by conſequence, no Treaſon. As for a ſpecial Act of Parliament, that maketh ſedition againſt the King, to be higher than treſpaſs, there is none ſuch extant. Among all the Acts of Parliament that are in force, there is none gives any colour here, but that of 25 Ed. III. wherein Treaſon is declared: And in that Act, only theſe words; If any one levy War againſt our Lord the King, in his Realm, or be adhering to the enemies of our Lord the King in his Realm, giving to them aid or comfort in his Realm, or elſewhere, and hereof be attainted tainted of overt fact, it is High-Treaſon. The other words concerning other and higher Treaſons, in that Act, have nothing that can ſo much as of themſelves ſuppoſe a ſedition againſt the King. But it is true, that in theſe before recited, there may be a ſedition againſt the King; that is, the levying of War againſt the King may be by ſedition, or the adhering to the King's enemies, or the levying of War againſt him, may be, by a low expreſſion, perhaps ſtiled ſedition againſt the King; as in every greater crime, as in theft, treſpaſs may be included, or underſtood. Now, unleſs on the other ſide, in that which is ſedition againſt the King, Treaſon muſt neceſſarily be underſtood, theſe words of the 25 Ed. III. make no more to prove that ſedition is Treaſon, than any Act againſt theft, can prove that treſpaſs is Felony. Therefore alſo in that very Act of 25 Ed. III. the riding openly or ſecretly with armed men to kill or rob another man, or to take him, and keep him till he make fine and ranſom for his deliverance (though it be plainly ſedition againſt the King, it being againſt his Peace, his Laws, and his Crown and Dignity) is but Felony, if robbery be committed with it, and treſpaſs only if impriſonment till fine and ranſom. And ſo is it declared expreſsly in that Act. And though there have been divers Acts of Parliament ſince that of the 25 Ed. III. that have made divers other facts Treaſon, yet there is none of them that remain unrepealed, or not expired, that make any ſuch fact Treaſon, as is of the nature of ſedition againſt the King: And except only the Treaſons made by thoſe ſpecial Acts of Parliament that remain in force (as thoſe concerning Bulls from Rome, Jeſuits, clipping of Coin, and ſome few more) there is nothing at this day Treaſon, ſaving what is compriſed in that Act of 25 Ed. III. to which ſome ſpecial Laws * have, in the ages ſince Ed. III. now and then reduced all Treaſon, by abrogating all intervenient Laws of Treaſon. And by that Act, if there be a doubt that happens before the Judges, by reaſon of any new caſe that comes before them; they ought not to judge it Treaſon, until it be enacted by Parliament to be ſo. And it doth, in the ſame Act, appear, that before that time, there was a greater latitude of Treaſon, than at any time ſince. Now, even in that time, there is an expreſs judgment of the very point in queſtion; though not in the ſame terms with this caſe, yet in the ſelf-ſame ſenſe, as if this caſe had then been before the Judges. It was the caſe of one Ruſſel; he was impriſoned by the Juſtice of North Wales, in 9 Ed. III. and returned to be ſo, eo quod A. B. impoſuit ei feciſſe debuiſſe diverſas ſeditiones, &c. dominum regem tangentes. Upon this return, the Court adjudged, that the offences contained in the Return, and as they could thereby be underſtood, were ſuch for which he ought to be bailed; and they gave their reaſon with the judgment, becauſe it did not appear what kind of ſeditions againſt the King were meant by it. Eo quod non ſpecificatur quales ſeditiones, &c. Ideo dimittendus, by mainpriſe or bail, which to this purpoſe are all one. For if the ſedition had been with traitorous intents, and ſo expreſſed, then it had been Treaſon, for which they would not have let him to mainpriſe. But becauſe ſedition againſt the King, might be of divers other natures, and meer treſpaſſes, therefore they ſaid, ideo dimittendus eſt, expreſſing therein the right of the priſoner, that he might juſtly claim to be bailed, and by law ought to be bailed, and not only that he was bailable. But three objections may, perhaps, be made to this judgment, to make it differ in ſubſtance from the caſe in queſtion. The firſt, that A. B. impoſuit ei feciſſe debuiſſe diverſas ſeditiones, &c. which being as an accuſation in ſo general terms, was not certain enough to make him anſwer to it, and thence might be cauſe of the judgment. The ſecond, that it is not contra dominum regem, or againſt the King, as the caſe here is, but tangentes, or touching the King. And the third, that here is the King's Warrant witneſſing the offence, and command for impriſonment, and in that of 9 Ed. III. only the charge of a Subject and the commitment of a Subject. To all three, the reply is eaſy. For the firſt, it is plain, that the Juſtice of North Wales, ſhews the reaſon of the impriſonment to be, becauſe Ruſſel was charged by A. B. to have committed ſedition touching the King, as every one that is returned to ſtand committed for any offence, is ſuppoſed to ſtand ſo committed, becauſe ſomebody charged him, or accuſed him, or can teſtify againſt him; and that is here more particularly expreſſed, which in every Return is ſuppoſed to be underſtood in the general words. As, ſuppoſe the Return were, that ſuch one ſtands committed for Treaſon, or Murder, upon the accuſation, teſtimony, or examination of A. B. taken thus, or thus; would the Court bail him the ſooner for that addition? And in Returns, it was never expected that there ſhould be ſuch certainty as that the priſoner might plead and be tried. Which can never be done from Returns, but only by Appeals or Indictments, wherein the offence is in ſpecial ſet forth by time, place, and all circumſtances. Or, if they had, in this caſe of Ruſſel, expected or conſidered ſuch a certainty, they ought not to have let him into mainpriſe, or bailed him; but clearly diſmiſſed him. For, if an appeal, which is an accuſation, were brought againſt a man, or an indictment put in de diverſis murdris, or de murdro, generally; or, de proditione generally; clearly, upon ſuch an appeal or indictment, the Court would not put the party neither to anſwer, nor ſo much as to the trouble of bail or mainpriſe, becauſe ſuch a charge that way, were merely void. For in appeals and indictments, the particular circumſtance, and the ſpecial offence muſt always be ſet forth, or elſe they are void; but, in Returns, the general expreſſion is ſufficient for the Court to judge, whether the offence be ſuch, as that the priſoner ought to be bailed or no, as the common and moſt known practice is. So that the firſt objection is of no force. For the ſecond, it is certain, that the words tangentes regem, and contra regem, in matter of offences, occurring in our Laws, are taken as ſynonymous. As in 25 Ed. III. Stat. de clero, cap 4. we have Treaſons or Felonies, touchants auters perſons que le roy meſme ou ſon royal majeſtie, touching others than the King; which is the ſame with, being againſt others than the King, or beſides the King; that is, petit Treaſons, (which are both Treaſons and Felonies) as it appears in Stamford, l. 2. c. 43. fol. 124. b. High-Treaſon being touching the King, or againſt the King, or extending to the King; which is the ſame in 25 Ed. III. de proditionibus. Where the ſenſe of the words appear by a Law made but few years after this very caſe of Ruſſel. So in Weſtmin. 1. ch. 15. Treaſon que toucha le roy meſme, is expreſsly for Treaſon againſt the King;

* Vide 11 Rich. II. c. 3. pet. 3. 1 Hen. IV. c. 10. 1 Ed. VI. c. 12. 1 Mar. parl. 1. c. 6.

King; that is, High-Treaſon. And Bracton, fol. 119. b. §. 2. calls the counterfeiting the Great Seal, which is High-Treaſon to this day, Crimen læſæ majeſtatis, quod tangit coronam Regis, or, Treaſon againſt the King. And in this latter age, we ſee in the Statute of 14 Eliz. cap. 2. that Treaſon touching the perſon of the Queen, and Treaſon concerning the perſon of the Queen, are both as the ſame, and both for Treaſons againſt the Queen's perſon. So that tangentes regem, and contra regem, denote the ſelf-ſame thing in the Law; and for that matter, Ruſſel's caſe, and this Return are of the ſelf-ſame nature. Now for the third objection concerning the King's warrant and command in this preſent caſe, which is not in that of Ruſſel's, but only the accuſation, or charge, and command of a Subject. For the command ſingly conſidered, it is clearly againſt the Petition of Right: But if it be conſidered here (as it ought) joined with the cauſe of commitment, then the cauſe is only conſiderable by itſelf, as expreſſed by the warrant. But there is no Book-caſe, Act of Parliament, or other teſtimony of Law with us, that in this kind of conſideration makes any difference between the expreſſion of an offence, in a Return of the King's warrant, and the expreſſion of it in a Return of a Subject. For all Returns of this kind, in judgment of Law, are ſuppoſed true; and the ſole point examinable, for matter of bail, is the nature of the offence; unleſs the commitment were by one that might not commit, or that ſome other circumſtance, not concerning theſe matters, were in the caſe. And beſides, in 22 Hen. VIII. rot. 38. Parker's caſe, & 1 Hen. VIII. rot. ..... the King's command for commitment for Murder, and other offences of high nature, hath been in the Return, where the priſoner was bailed. Nor will there remain any colour of teſtimony to maintain this laſt objection.

And as againſt this caſe of Ruſſel (which is ſo fully in the point) theſe objections may be made; ſo againſt the main, the concluſion, it may be objected out of thoſe old Authors, Bracton, Glanville and Hengham; that Bracton in expreſs words, makes ſeditio domini Regis to be Treaſon: Si quis aliquid egerit (ſaith he, fol. 118. b.) ad ſeditionem domini Regis, vel exercitus ſui, vel procurantibus auxilium & conſilium præbuerit vel conſenſum, it is crimen læſæ majeſtatis, to be puniſhed with death, and ſo ſuppoſes it High-Treaſon. So Glanville, Si quis machinatus fuerit, vel aliquid fecerit, in mortem Regis, vel ſeditionem regni, vel exercitus; he ſaith it is likewiſe Treaſon. And Hengham bringing examples of the Placita de crimine læſæ majeſtatis, adds, ut de nece vel ſeditione perſonæ domini Regis, vel regni, vel exercitus. Where we ſee, ſeditio Regis, or regni, or excercitus, is ſuppoſed Treaſon. But the anſwers to the authority of theſe old Authors is various. Firſt, However they were all three (if at leaſt that of Glanville be the work of Sir Randal Glanville, Chief-Juſtice of England under Hen. II.) learned and famous Judges in their ages, yet they lived ſo long ſince, and the reſt of the particulars of which they write, are ſo different (whether we obſerve the Pleas of the Crown in them, or the Pleas between party and party) from the practice and eſtabliſhed Laws of the enſuing ages, that their authority is of ſlight, or no moment for direction in judgment of the Law at this day, though it be very conſiderable in examination what the Law was in their times; and that way it ſometimes is uſed as an ornament in argument only, as it is ſaid in the commentaries of them. The firſt of them died about 400 years ſince; the ſecond, about 350; and Hengham about 300 years paſt. Secondly, The words of ſeditio Regis, or regni, are an obſcure expreſſion, and hardly ſo intelligible as that we may know what they meant. For what can ſedition of the King mean, in Engliſh, or in Latin, as they expreſs it? And if it be taken for ſedition againſt the King (as indeed the like words are interpreted in Scottiſh, out of the Regiam majeſtatem, by Mr. Skene) it muſt be ſo taken againſt all Grammar, and uſual context of words; for no more than tumultus Regis, rebellio Regis, inſurrectio Regis, is tumult againſt the King, or rebellion againſt the King, or inſurrection againſt the King, is ſeditio Regis, in force of Language, ſedition againſt the King. Thirdly, Admit it be rightly taken for ſedition againſt the King, in thoſe old Authors, yet the Statute of 25 Edw. III. de proditionibus, ſo ſettles the Law for Treaſon, that whatſoever was Treaſon before that Act, and is not compriſed within that Act, is no Treaſon at this day, unleſs ſome ſpecial Act of Parliament have ordained it. Fourthly, The conſtant courſe of teſtimonies, as they are before ſhewed, ſince the 25 of Ed. III. prove expreſsly, that only ſedition againſt the King is taken for a leſs offence, and mere treſpaſs. Fifthly, In particular offences, we ſee Bracton, (whoſe authority is the chief of the three, whether we regard the expreſſion, or the quality of the writer) differs much from the Common Law of the later ages; and ſo much, that he is directly, in ſome things of great moment, contrary to the clear known Law, both of the preſent and of antient times. As, he allows no killing of a man to be Murder, but what is done ſo ſecretly, that it is not known who doth it. Bracton, l. 3. de corona, fol. 134. b. & 135. And that if the offender be taken, or, if the party hurt, live long enough to diſcover him that hurt him, though he die afterward, it is (ſaith he) no Murder. Which is directly contrary to the Law, yet altered by no ſpecial Act of Parliament. So, Si quis alterius virilia abſciderit, & libidinis cauſa, vel commercii caſtraverit, ſequitur (ſaith he, p. 144. b. §. 3.) pœna aliquando capitalis, aliquando perpetuum exilium, cum omnium bonorum ademptione; whereas there is no ſuch thing in the Laws of England. But indeed, by the Civil Law, Qui hominem libidinis, vel promercii cauſa caſtraverit, pœna legis Corneliæ de ſicariis punitur; that is, is puniſhable capitally. ff. ad leg. Cornel. de ſicarris. l. 3. §. 4. & l. 4. §. ult. Whence doubtleſs Bracton (who cites often, to other purpoſes, the very texts and words, and quotes the places of the Digeſts, and the Code) had that puniſhment for ſuch as gelded men. And thence alſo had, by all likelihood, that touching ſedition. For, by the Civil Law, all ſedition, publick raiſing of tumults, gathering armed men, without publick authority; and whatſoever is but with us as a commotion or riot is Treaſon (crimen læſæ majeſtatis) and capital. To which purpoſe there be divers texts in that Law ff. ad leg. Juliam majeſt. l. 1. & de pœnis, l. 38. §. 2. de appellationibus, l. 16. C. de ſeditioſis, l. 1. & 2. &c. which doubtleſs he both read, and often followed; and by concitatores ſeditionis, or ſtirrers up of ſedition, by that very name were condemned as capital Traitors. But this was never, for ought appears, Law in England; but the contrary appears plain enough by what is already ſaid. Sixthly, For anſwer to the objections out of Bracton and Glanville, if their authority ſhall be taken ſufficient to maintain ſedition to be Treaſon; then will it be as reaſonable to prove, that in ſuch a caſe bail alſo ſhould be taken. For Bracton ſaith expreſsly of that and other Treaſons that he joins with it, that the priſoner ought to be bailed, unleſs an accuſer be preſent. Si quis, ſaith he, de hoc crimine diffamatus fuerit, tunc videndum erit utrum appareat accuſator, vel non; ſi autem nullus appareat, niſi ſola fama quæ tantum apud bonos & graves oriatur, hic ſalvo attachiabitur per ſalvos & ſecuros plegios; vel ſi plegios non habuerit, per carceris incluſionem, donec de crimine ſibi impoſito veritas inquiratur. And Glanville ſaith expreſsly, that although an accuſer be preſent, yet he is to be bailed. Etiamſi accuſator fuerit (ſaith he) accuſatus dimittitur per plegios; aut ſi non fuerit, in carcerem dimittitur. So that either the authority of theſe old Authors is of no moment, for the reaſons before ſhewed; or if it be valuable, and that advantage muſt be taken from them; it is as reaſonable that their other opinion, for the bail, be as well accepted and allowed of in this caſe. But there remains, perhaps, one objection, out of the opinions of Treſilian and Belknap, the two Chief-Juſtices; and of Holt, Fulthorp and Burgh, Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, and Lockton, one of the King's Serjeants in 11 Rich. II. (Vide 21 Rich. II. c. 11. ſee the Roll:) Who being, among other things, demanded at Nottingham by the King, and charged to anſwer, upon their faith and liegeance to the King, how they ought to be puniſhed that did interrupt the King, ſo that he might not exerciſe thoſe things that pertaineth to his regality and prerogative; (in which words perhaps, may be included all kind of ſedition againſt any proceeding, proceſs, or ordinary command of the King) with one aſſent they anſwered, that they ought to be puniſhed as Traitors. And if that were Law, it were hard to find a ſedition againſt the King, but that it were Treaſon. For all his proceedings, proceſs, and ordinary commands, belong to his regality, and prerogative, and every ſedition againſt him, is a kind of interruption of the exerciſe, at leaſt of thoſe proceedings, proceſs, and ordinary commands.

It is true, that in the 11*th* of Rich. II. ſuch an anſwer, among divers others of like nature, were given by thoſe Judges, and that Serjeant; and they put their Seals alſo to them. But it is as true, that for theſe very anſwers they were accuſed by the Commons in Parliament, the ſelf-ſame year, where they anſwered upon the accuſation: Firſt, That the anſwers were written in the original to which their Seals were put, otherwiſe than their meaning was, in ſome part. Secondly, That they had been threatned to make no other anſwer than what might agree with the King's liking. Thirdly, That their anſwers proceeded not of their free-will, but for fear of death; and that ſome of them had revealed as much to the Earl of Kent, deſiring him to witneſs as much hereafter if time ſerved. Rot. parl. 11 Rich. II. n. 14. & vide Stat. 11 Rich. II. c. 3, 5, &c. Notwithſtanding all which, at the inſtance of the Commons, they were judged all by Declaration in Parliament made by the King and Commons (which was according to the Act of 25 Ed. III. and ſo by Act of Parliament) to be Traitors, and to ſuffer as in caſe of Treaſon; good part of which proceeding is remembered in the Statutes of that year, but much more in the Rolls of that Parliament. And although in the Parliament of 21 of Rich. II. that Parliament, and in particular, this proceeding againſt the Judges, were wholly annulled, and their anſwers adjudged good; as appears in the printed Statutes of that year, 21 Rich. II. c. 12. yet in the 1ſt of Hen. IV. it was declared by Parliament, 1 Hen. IV. c. 3. that this proceeding of Parliament of 21 of Rich. II. being cauſed by a certain number only, of the Members of Parliament, and that the Statutes, Judgments, Ordinances, and Eſtabliſhments, were made, ordained, and given erroneouſly and deceitfully in great diſheriſon and final deſtruction, and undoing of the liege people of the realm. Where alſo it was further declared and adjudged, in the ſame Parliament, that all the Parliament of 21 Rich. II. and all circumſtances and dependents thereupon to be of no force or value, but annulled. And beſides, that the Parliament of the 11*th* of Rich. II. wherein thoſe Judges were condemned as Traitors, for that anſwer, and all the reſt of that kind, ſhould be firmly holden and kept, after the purport and effect of the ſame, as a thing made for the great honour and common profit of the Realm. So that that anſwer of the Judges, in the 11 of Rich. II. ſo highly condemned as falſe and erroneous, by two Parliaments, both which have to this day continued in firm ſtrength, is of no weight to prove that ſedition againſt the King is Treaſon. Nor doth any thing elſe prove it, but the contrary is manifeſted by the arguments before urged. And by conſequence, it is only treſpaſs againſt the King, and puniſhable by fine and impriſonment, and therefore the priſoner returned to ſtand committed for ſtirring it up againſt the King, ought to be bailed.

Some days after Sir Rob. Heath the King's Attorney-General argued, That this return was good, and that the parties ought not to be bailed: And that within the return there appears good cauſe of their commitment, and of their detaining alſo. The caſe is great in expectation and conſequence: and concerns the liberty of the ſubject on the one part, whereof the argument is plauſible; and on the other part, it concerns the ſafety and ſovereignty of the King, which is a thing of great weight. The conſideration of both pertains to you the Judges, without ſlighting the one, or too much elevating the other. The Return, which now is before you, is entire; but I will firſt conſider it as divided in parts. Firſt, the firſt Warrant, which is that of the Lords of the Privy-Council, is general, that it was by the command of the Lord the King: and this in former times was held a very good return, when due reſpect and reverence was given to government; but, Tempora mutantur. And this return is no way weakned by any latter opinion; for notwithſtanding that, the firſt commitment of a man may be general: for if upon the return, the true cauſe ſhould be reveal'd to the Goaler, by this means, faults ſhould be publiſhed and divulged before their puniſhment, and ſo the complices of the fact will eſcape, and it is not fit that the Goaler, which is but a miniſterial Officer, ſhould be acquainted with the ſecrets of the cauſe. But when the cauſe is returned in Court, more certainty is requiſite; for then (as it hath been objected) ſomething ought to be expreſſed to which the party may anſwer, and upon which the Court may ground their judgment. And to this purpoſe, the Petition of Right hath been much inſiſted upon; but the Law is not altered by it, but remains as it was before. And this will appear upon the view of all the parts of the Petition. 1. The occaſion of the Petition, and the grievance, is ſhewed in theſe words, Divers of your Subjects have been of late impriſoned, without any cauſe ſhewed, &c. But in this return there is a cauſe ſhewed, to which the parties may anſwer. Then, 2. the prayer of the Petition is, That no freeman, in any ſuch manner as before is mentioned, be impriſoned or detained; that is, ſuch manner of impriſonment, the ground whereof doth not appear. Then the anſwer of the King to the Petition was in ſundry words; 2 June 1628. in theſe words, The King willeth, that right be done according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, &c. Which anſwer gave not ſatisfaction. And afterwards his anſwer was in a Parliamentary Phraſe, Soit droit fait come eſt deſire. But afterwards on the 26 of June, 1628. the King expreſſed his intention and meaning in the ſaid anſwer. "It muſt be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the antient Liberties of my ſubjects, &c." A Petition in Parliament is not a Law, yet it is for the honour and dignity of the King, to obſerve and keep it faithfully; but it is the duty of the people not to ſtretch it beyond the words and intention of the King. And no other conſtruction can be made of the Petition, than to take it as a confirmation of the antient liberties and rights of the ſubjects. So that now the caſe remains in the ſame quality and degree, as it was before the Petition. Therefore we will now conſider, how the Law was taken before the Petition; and for the diſcuſſing thereof, we will examine the ſecond part of the return, and in it, two things. 1. If the return, as it is now made, ſhall be intended for true. 2. Admit that it is true, if there be any offence contained within it, which is good to detain the priſoners. For the firſt, it is clear, that the cauſe ſhall be intended true which is return'd, though in truth it be falſe; and ſo are 9 H. VI. 44. and F. Corpus cum cauſa, and 2. Coke's Rep. 11. p. 93. Bagg's caſe. 2. It ſeems, that there is ſuch a crime contain'd in this return, which is a good cauſe for detaining the Priſoners. It is true, that it was confidently urged in Parliament, in 3 Car. that general returns, that were committed by the command of the Lord the King are not good: and that thoſe arguments remain as monuments on record, in the upper Houſe of Parliament; but I will not admit them for Law. But I will remember what was the opinion of former times, 22 H. VI. 52. by Newton; a man committed by the command of the King, is not repleviſable. And the opinion cannot be intended of a replevin made by the Sheriff, becauſe the principal caſe there is upon a return in this Court. 33 H. VI. 28. Poyning's caſe, where the return was, That he was committed by the Lords of the Council, and it was admitted good. It is true, that this opinion is grounded upon Weſt. 1. c. 15. but I will not inſiſt upon it. But the conſtant opinion hath always been, that a man committed by the command of the King is not bailable. In 9 H. VI. 44. it is ſaid, That if one be taken upon the King's ſuit, the Court will not grant a Superſedeas. The contrary opinion is grounded upon Magna Charta, which is a general Law, and literally hath no ſenſe to that purpoſe; and it is contrary to the uſual practice in criminal cauſes, in which the impriſonment is always lawful until the Trial, altho' it be made by a Juſtice of Peace, or Conſtable. And that a man committed by the command of the King, or Privy-Council, is not bailable, he cited 1 Jacobi, Sir John Brocket's caſe. 8 Jacobi. Thomas Ceſar's caſe. 12 Jac. James Demaiſtres's caſe. 43 Eliz. William Rinch's caſe. And in the caſe M. 36 Eliz. and 4 and 5 Eliz. Richard Thimelby's caſe. And ſaid, that there are innumerable precedents to this purpoſe. M. 21 & 22 Eliz. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus it appears, that Michael Page was committed by the command of the Lord the King, but was not delivered; and after was arraigned in this Court, and loſt his hand. And at the ſame time, Stubbs was committed by the command of the Lord the King, for ſeditious words and rumors, and he loſt his hand alſo upon the ſame Trial. M. 17 & 18 Eliz. upon Habeas Corpus for John Loan, it was returned, That he was committed for divulging ſundry ſeditious writings, and he was remanded. And 7 H. VII. roll. 6. Rug's caſe; and roll. 13. Chaſe's caſe, where the return was, That they were committed by the command of the Lord the King, and they were not delivered: and this was alſo the opinion in this Court, M. 3 Car. and after the ſaid time the Law is not altered; and ſo, I hope, neither are your opinions.

But to conſider the particular cauſe mentioned in the return, I will not rely upon the firſt part of the words, although they be of great weight, but only upon the laſt words,——for ſtirring up of ſedition againſt Us.——But it hath been objected, that Sedition is not a word known in the Law: But I marvel that the ſignification of the word is not underſtood, when it is joined with the words,——againſt Us——this ought to be underſtood, Sedition againſt the King, in his politick capacity. Sedition hath ſundry acceptations, according to the ſubject handled, as it appears Coke's 4 Rep. p. 13. Lord Cromwel's caſe, which hath been cited. If it be ſpoken of a man, that he is ſeditious; if it be of a Company in London, it ſhall be underſtood ſedition in the Company; if it be ſpoken of a Soldier, it ſhall be taken for mutinous. Mr. Littleton, who argued this caſe very well, ſaid, That Tacitus uſed this word, and it is true; and he ſays, That there are two manners of ſeditions, Seditio armata & togata; and the laſt is more dangerous than the former. But couple it with the ſubſequent words here, [againſt Us] the interpretation and ſenſe thereof is eaſy, and loquendum ut vulgus. Mr. Littleton ſhews the acceptation of this word in divers places of Scripture, and I will not reject them, for they make for me: 20 Numb. 3. the Latin is, ——populi verſi ſunt in ſeditionem; and it is engliſhed,——murmuring——but clearly it was High Treaſon againſt the Governour, and God himſelf. 26 Numb. 9. in ſeditione Corah—it is manifeſt, that that was a great Inſurrection. 12 Jud. 1. facta eſt ergo ſeditio in Ephraim, The Ephraimites roſe againſt Jephtha; and he at the ſame time was their Judge and Governour, ſo it was the height of Inſurrection. It is true, that in 15 Acts 2. facta eſt ſeditio; and in ſome tranſlations it is, Orta eſt repugnantia non parva, for it may be taken in ſeveral ſenſes. 19 Acts 40. the Town-Clerk there knew not how to anſwer for this day's ſedition, or inſurrection; and no doubt he was in great peril, for it was a great inſurrection: and I wiſh the greater ones were as circumſpect as he was. 24 Acts 5. Tertullus accuſed Paul of ſedition, and doubtleſs it was conceived a great offence, if you conſider the time and other circumſtances, for they were Heathens and Romans. And although he in very truth taught the Goſpel of God, yet he was taken for a peſtilent fellow, and as a perſuader to ſhake off Government. Bracton lib. 3. de Corona, c. 2. ranks Sedition amongſt the crimes læſæ Majeſtatis. But it hath been objected, that if it be a capital offence, it ought to be Felony or Treaſon. To this I ſay, That it cannot be Felony, but it may be Treaſon, for any thing that appears. It is true, that by the Statute of 25 E. III. Treaſons are declared, and nothing ſhall be called Treaſon, which is not compriſed within the ſaid Statute, unleſs it be declared ſo by Act of Parliament. But upon Indictment of Treaſon, ſuch Sedition as this may be given in evidence, and perhaps will prove Treaſon. And the return is not, that he was ſeditious, which ſhews only an inclination; but that he ſtirred up ſedition, which may be Treaſon, if the evidence will bear it. In divers Acts of Parliament, notice is taken of this word [Seditio] and it is always coupled with Inſurrection or Rebellion, as appears by the Statutes of 5 R. II. c. 6. 17 R. II. c. 8. 2 H. V. c. 9. 8 H. VI. c. 14. 3 & 4 E. VI. c. 5. 2 R. II. c. 5. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 2 1 Eliz. c. 7. 13 Eliz. c. 2. 23 Eliz. c. 2. 27 Eliz. c. 2. and 35 Eliz. c. 1. all which were cited before; and they prove, that Sedition is a word well known in the Law, and of dangerous conſequence, and which cannot be expounded in good ſenſe. Wherefore, as to the nature of the offence, I leave it to the Court. But out of theſe Statutes it appears, that there is a narrow difference between it and Treaſon, if there be any at all.

3ldy, As to the Objections which have been made, I will give a ſhort anſwer to them.

1. It was objected, That every impriſonment is either for cuſtody, or puniſhment; the laſt is always after the Judgment given for the offence; and if it be but for cuſtody, the Party upon tender of ſufficient Mainpernors is bailable. I confeſs, that this difference is true, but not in all reſpects; for I deny, that a man is always bailable, when impriſonment is impoſed upon him for cuſtody: For impriſonment is for two intents; the one is, that the Party which had offended, ſhould not avoid the judgement of Law; the ſecond is, that he ſhall not do harm in the interim during his Trial; and the Law is careful in this point. But it hath been ſaid, That although the Party be bailed, yet he is impriſoned. I deny that, for ſo is 1 H. IV. 6. If the Party come not at the day, the Bail ſhall be impriſoned; but yet the Bail ſhall not ſuffer the ſame puniſhment which ought to have been inflicted upon the Party; as if it were for Treaſon, the Bail ſhall not anſwer for the fault, but only for the body. Serjeant Berkley did well call a ſeditious man an Incendiary to the Government, and, as commune incendium, is to be reſtrained of his Liberty. And he put 22 E. IV. and 22 aſſ. 56. that a mad-man may be reſtrained, to prevent the hurt he would otherwiſe do himſelf and others. A ſeditious man is as a mad-man in the publick ſtate of the Commonwealth, and therefore ought to be reſtrained. And it appears by the Writ, de Leproſo amovendo, that a Leper is to be removed, and, in a manner, impriſoned, for the contagion of the diſeaſe; and this is for the Safeguard of others, leſt his Leproſy infect others. The application is eaſy, and by the Statute of 1 Jac. c. 33. is reſtrained to keep within doors; and if he go abroad, any man may juſtify the killing of him. The infection of Sedition is as dangerous as any of theſe diſeaſes, therefore it is not ſafe to let ſeditious men to bail, or at liberty; and in dangerous caſes, the wiſeſt way is, to make all ſafe. In all caſes of this nature, much is left to the diſcretion of the Court. The caſe of M. 9 E. III. roll. 39. Ruſſel, hath been objected, to be in the point; I have viewed the record of that caſe, and although it be verbally, yet it is not materially to this purpoſe: for the commitment was by a Juſtice of North-Wales, upon the accuſation of an accuſer; and it was within a ſhort time after the Statute of 5 E. III. by which it was ordained, That none ſhould be impriſoned upon the accuſation of one accuſer: but here the detainment is by the King himſelf, for ſtirring up of ſedition. And there the return was, That he was accuſed of ſeditions and indecencies, where the latter word doth qualify the former. And there iſſued a Writ of good behaviour, (as the Uſe was) to enquire of the truth of the offence; and it was found, that there was no ſuch offence: and then upon the ſame return again he was ſet at liberty; ſo that the caſe there was ſpecial, and the manner of proceedings ſpecial. And I deſire that one thing may be obſerved, that Ruſſel came in here upon the Habeas Corpus, 20 Sept. but was not delivered until Hillary-Term following. And for 28 H. VI. the Duke of Suffolk's caſe, which was objected, that the general accuſation of divers Treaſons was not legal. That is true, becauſe it was in Parliament, and in the nature of an accuſation; and being in a Court of Juſtice, it had been unjuſt to condemn a man before his Trial; and yet this Court, upon probability of a fault, does ofttimes reſtrain a man before conviction. But it hath been objected in this caſe, They have been a long time impriſoned, and no proceedings againſt them. It is well known, there have been ſome proceedings againſt them, and they declined them; and alſo more than three months is requiſite for the preparation of ſuch proceedings, and the King intends to proceed againſt them in convenient time. And ſome that were offenders in the ſame kind, are already delivered, to wit, Mr. Coryton, and Sir Peter Hayman. Therefore if any injury be done to the Priſoners, they themſelves are the cauſe of it, for not ſubmitting themſelves to the King. And for the inſtance which Mr. Littleton uſed of the Judges in 11 R. II. altho' they ſuffered for their opinions given to the King, I deſire, that the time when their opinion was delivered, may be conſidered, to wit, in the time of R. II. and the time when they ſuffered, to wit, in the time of H. IV. And it was the ſaying of a Noble Gentleman, the Lord Egerton, That Belknap ſuffered rather by the potency of his enemies, than the greatneſs of his offence: And yet it is to be confeſſed, that they might have given better counſel; but there was no time to diſpute of the juſtneſs of their counſel, when the ſword was in the hands of the Conqueror.

What hath been relied upon is the reſolution of all the Juſtices of England in 34 Eliz. which reſolution is now regiſtred in the upper Houſe of Parliament, at the requeſt of the Commons, in Tertio Caroli Regis; but I leave it to you, as that reſolution ſhall ſway your Judgments. The ſaid reſolution is, That the cauſe ought to be certified in the generality, or ſpeciality; and here the general cauſe is certified at leaſt, if the ſpecial be not ſo: and upon the whole matter, the bailment of theſe priſoners is left to your diſcretion; and I have ſhewed to you the diſcretion of your predeceſſors. And if any danger appear to you in their bailment, I am confident that ye will not bail them, if any danger may enſue; but firſt ye are to conſult with the King, and he will ſhew you where the danger reſts. Therefore upon the whole matter I pray, that they be remanded.

When

When the Court was ready to have delivered their opinions in this great buſineſs, the Priſoners were not brought to the Bar, according to the rule of the Court. Therefore proclamation was made, for the keepers of the ſeveral priſons to bring in their priſoners; but none of them appeared, except the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, who informed the Court that Mr. Stroud, who was in his cuſtody, was removed yeſterday, and put in the Tower of London by the King's own Warrant: and ſo it was done with the other priſoners, for each of them was removed out of his Priſon in which he was before. But notwithſtanding, it was prayed by the Counſel for the priſoners, that the Court would deliver their opinion as to the matter in Law: but the Court refuſed to do that, becauſe it was to no purpoſe; for the priſoners being abſent, they could not be bailed, delivered or remanded.

The evening before, there came a Letter to the Judges of this Court from the King himſelf, informing the Court with the reaſons, wherefore the priſoners were not ſuffered to come at the day appointed for the reſolution of the Judges.

To our Truſty and Well-beloved, our Chief-Juſtice, and the reſt of our Juſtices of our Bench.

C. R.

"TRuſty and Well-beloved, we greet you "well: Whereas by our ſpecial command- "ment we have lately removed Sir Miles Hobart, "Watler Long, and Will. Stroud, from the ſeveral "Priſons where they were formerly committed, "and have now ſent them to our Tower of London; "underſtanding there are various conſtructions "made thereof, according to the ſeveral appre- "henſions of thoſe who diſcourſe of it, as if we had "done it to decline the courſe of Juſtice; we have "therefore thought fit to let you know the true "reaſon and occaſion thereof; as alſo, why we "commanded thoſe and the other priſoners ſhould "not come before you the laſt day. We (having "heard how moſt of them a while ſince did carry "themſelves inſolently and unmannerly both to- "wards us and your Lordſhips) were and are very "ſenſible thereof; and though we hear yourſelves "gave them ſome admonition for that miſcarriage, "yet we could not but reſent our Honour, and the "Honour of ſo great a Court of Juſtice ſo far, as "to let the World know how much we diſlike the "ſame: And having underſtood, that your Lord- "ſhips, and the reſt of our Judges and Barons of "our Court of Common-Pleas and Exchequer "(whoſe advices and judgments we have deſired in "this great buſineſs, ſo much concerning our Go- "vernment) have not yet reſolved the main queſ- "tion; we did not think the preſence of thoſe "priſoners neceſſary; and until we ſhould find "their temper and diſcretions to be ſuch as may "deſerve it, we were not willing to afford them fa- "vour. Nevertheleſs, the reſpect we bear to the "proceedings of that Court, hath cauſed us to "give way, that Selden and Valentine ſhould attend "you to-morrow, they being ſufficient to appear "before you, ſince you cannot as yet give any re- "ſolute opinion in the main point in queſtion. Given under our Signet at our Manor at Greenwich, this 24 Junii, in the fifth year of our Reign.

Within three hours after the receipt of thoſe Letters, other Letters were brought unto the ſaid Judges, as followeth.

To our Truſty and Well-beloved, our Chief-Juſtice, and the reſt of our Juſtices of our Bench.

C. R.

"TRuſty and Well-beloved, We greet you "well. Whereas by our Letters of this day's "date, we gave you to underſtand our pleaſure, "That of thoſe Priſoners which, by our command- "ment, are kept in our Tower of London, Selden "and Valentine ſhould be brought to-morrow be- "fore you; now upon more mature deliberation, "we have reſolved, That all of them ſhall receive "the ſame treatment, and that none ſhall come "before you, until we have cauſe given us to be- "lieve they will make a better demonſtration of "their Modeſty and Civility, both towards Us and "your Lordſhips, than at their laſt appearance they "did."

Given under our Signet at our Manor at Greenwich, this 24 Day of June, in the fifth year of our Reign.

So the Court this Term delivered no opinion, and the impriſoned Gentlemen continued in reſtraint all the long Vacation.

Towards the latter end of this Vacation, all the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, being then in the Country, received every one of them a Letter to be at Serjeants-Inn upon Michaelmas-Day. Theſe Letters were from the Council-Table; and the cauſe expreſſed in them, was, That his Majeſty had preſent and urgent occaſion to uſe their ſervice. The Judges came up accordingly on Tueſday, being Michaelmas-day. The next morning about four a clock, Letters were brought to the Chief-Juſtice from Mr. Trumbal, Clerk of the Council then attending, that he and Judge Whitlocke, one of the Judges of that Court, ſhould attend the King that morning ſo ſoon as conveniently they could: which the Chief-Juſtice and that Judge did at Hampton that morning; where the King taking them apart from the Council, fell upon the buſineſs of the Gentlemen in the Tower, and was contented they ſhould be bailed, notwithſtanding their obſtinacy, in that they would not give the King a Petition, expreſſing, That they were ſorry he was offended with them. He ſhewed his purpoſe to proceed againſt them by the Common-Law in the King's-Bench, and to leave his proceeding in the Star-Chamber. Divers other matters he propoſed to the ſaid Judges by way of advice*, and ſeemed well contented with what they anſwered, though it was not to his mind; which was, That the offences were not capital, and that by the Law the priſoners ought to be bailed, giving ſecurity for their good behaviour. Whereupon the King told them, That he would never be offended with his Judges, ſo they dealt plainly with him, and did not anſwer him by Oracles and Riddles †.

The

* Mr. Whitlocke in his Memorials, page 13. ſays, My Father did often and highly complain againſt this way, of ſending to the Judges for their opinions beforehand; and ſaid, That if Bp Laud went on in his way, he would kindle a Flame in the Nation.

† Mr. Whitlocke, in his Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, p. 14. (Edit. 1732.) The Judges were ſomewhat perplexed about the Habeas Corpus for the Parliament-men, and wrote an humble and ſtout letter to the King, That by their oaths they were to bail the priſoners; but thought fit, before they did it or publiſh'd their opinions therein, to inform his Majeſty thereof, and humbly to adviſe him (as had been done by his noble progenitors, in like caſe) to ſend a direction to his Juſtices of his Bench, to bail the priſoners. But the Lord-

Keeper

The firſt day of Michaelmas-Term it was moved by Mr. Maſon, to have the reſolution of the Judges; and the Court with one voice ſaid, That they are now content that they ſhould be bailed, but that they ought to find Sureties alſo for the good behaviour. And Juſtice Jones ſaid, That ſo it was done in the caſe which had been often remembred to another purpoſe, to wit, Ruſſel's caſe in 9 E. III. To which Mr. Selden anſwered (with whom all the other priſoners agreed in opinion) That they have their Sureties ready for the bail, but not for the good behaviour; and deſire, that the bail might firſt be accepted, and that they be not urged to the other; and that for theſe reaſons:

Firſt, The caſe here hath long depended in Court (and they have been impriſoned for theſe thirty weeks) and it had been oftentimes argued on the one ſide and the other; and thoſe that argued for the King, always demanded that we ſhould be remanded; and thoſe which argued on our ſide, deſired that we might be bailed or diſcharged: but it was never the deſire of the one ſide or the other, that we ſhould be bound to the good behaviour. And in the laſt Term four ſeveral days were appointed for the reſolution of the Court, and the ſole point in queſtion was, If bailable or not. Therefore he now deſires, that the matter of bail and of good behaviour may be ſever'd, and not confounded.

Secondly, Becauſe the finding of Sureties of good behaviour is ſeldom urged upon Returns of Felonies or Treaſons. And it is but an implication upon the Return, that we are culpable of thoſe matters which are objected.

Thirdly, We demand to be bailed in point of Right; and if it be not grantable of Right, we do not demand it: but the finding of Sureties for the good behaviour, is a point of diſcretion merely; and we cannot aſſent to it, without great offence to the Parliament, where theſe matters which are ſurmiſed by Return were acted; and by the Statute of 4 Hen. VIII. all puniſhments of ſuch nature are made void and of none effect: Therefore, &c.

Court. The Return doth not make mention of any thing done in Parliament, and we cannot in a judicial way take notice that theſe things were done in Parliament. And by Whitlocke, The ſurety of good behaviour, is as a preventing medicine of the damage that may fall out to the Commonwealth; and it is an Act of Government and Juriſdiction, and not of Law. And by Croke, it is no inconvenience to the priſoners: for the ſame bail ſufficeth, and all ſhall be written upon one piece of Parchment. And Heath Attorney-General ſaid, That by the command of the King he had an information ready in his hand to deliver in the Court againſt them.

Hyde, Chief-Juſtice. If now you refuſe to find Sureties for the good behaviour, and be for that cauſe remanded; perhaps we afterwards will not grant a Habeas Corpus for you, inaſmuch as we are made acquainted with the cauſe of your impriſonment.

Aſhley the King's Serjeant offered his own bail for Mr. Holles, one of the priſoners (who had married his Daughter and Heir) but the Court refuſed it; for it is contrary to the courſe of the Court, unleſs the priſoner himſelf will become bound alſo*.

And Mr. Long, that had found Sureties in the Chief-Juſtice's Chamber for the good behaviour, refuſed to continue his Sureties any longer, inaſmuch as they were bound in a great ſum of 2000 l. and the good behaviour was a tickliſh point. Therefore he was committed to the cuſtody of the Marſhal, and all the other priſoners were remanded to priſon, becauſe they would not find Sureties for the good behaviour.

Mich. 6 Car. B. R.

John Selden was committed to the Marſhalſea of the King's-Bench, for not putting in ſureties for his good behaviour. There were with him in the ſame priſon, Hobart, Stroud, and Valentine. In the end of Trinity Term, 6 Car. the Sickneſs increaſing in Southwark, the three laſt named made ſuit unto the Judges of the King's-Bench, to be delivered over to the Gatehouſe in Weſtminſter, to avoid the danger. The Judges thought it Charity, and by Writ to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, commanded him to deliver them to the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, and ſent him a Writ to receive them. Mr. Selden never ſent unto them whilſt they were in Town, but when they were all gone, made ſuit to the Lord-Treaſurer to move the King, that to avoid this danger, he might be remov'd to the Gatehouſe; which he did, and ſent a Warrant under his hand to the Marſhal, ſignifying his Majeſty's pleaſure to remove him to the Gatehouſe; accordingly he was removed. Thereupon when the Judges came to Town in Michaelmas Term, they called the Marſhal to account for his priſoner Mr. Selden; and he preſenting unto them the Lord-Treaſurer's Warrant by the King's direction, the Judges told him it would not ſerve, for he could not be removed but by Writ; and upon his Majeſty's pleaſure ſignified, it might ſo have been done. And although the Judges were out of Town, yet the Clerk of the Crown would have made the Writ upon ſo good a Warrant, and it might have been ſubſcribed by the Judges at their return. And to avoid the like error hereafter, the Court ſent Juſtice Whitlocke to the Lord-Treaſurer, to let him know, that Mr. Selden never Keeper would not acknowledge to my father, who was ſent to him from the reſt of his brethren, about this buſineſs, that he had ſhewed the Judges letter to the King, but diſſembled the matter, and told him that he and his brethren muſt attend the King at Greenwich, at a day appointed by him.

Accordingly the Judges attended the King, who was not pleaſed with their determination, but commanded them not to deliver any opinion in this caſe without conſulting with the reſt of the Judges; who delayed the buſineſs, and would hear arguments in the caſe as well as the Judges of the King's-Bench had done; and ſo the buſineſs was put off to the end of the Term. Then the Court of King's-Bench being ready to deliver their opinions, the priſoners were removed to other priſons, and a letter came to the Judges from the King, That this was done becauſe of their inſolent carriage at the Bar. And ſo they did not appear.

The Judges of the King's-Bench were ſent for by the Lord-Keeper to be in London on Michaelmas-day; the Chief-Juſtice Hyde and my Father were ſent for to the King at Hampton-Court, who adviſed with them, about the impriſoned Parliament-men, and both theſe Judges did what good Offices they could, to bring on the King to heal theſe breaches.

* This motion of diſcharging proceeded from the King himſelf, who had conferr'd with the Judges, and had declar'd his content the priſoners ſhould be bail'd, notwithſtanding their obſtinacy, that they would not ſo much as preſent a Petition to him to expreſs, That they were ſorry he was offended with them. But the priſoners began now to value themſelves upon their ſuffering, and had ſo much countenance from ſeveral of their late Fellow-Members, that they would not now accept of a deliverance, but unanimouſly refuſed to find Sureties for their behaviour: nay, Mr. Holles was ſo induſtrious to be continued in cuſtody, That when one offer'd his own bail, he would not yield to the courſe of the Court, to be himſelf bound with him. And even Mr. Long, who had actually found Sureties in the Chief-Juſtice's Chamber, declar'd in Court, that his Sureties ſhould no longer continue. Such a merit did they now place in confinement, as to labour againſt their own Liberty; and by ſuch glorying in Perſecution to raiſe a popularity to themſelves, and caſt an odium on the King. Kennet's Hiſt. of England, Vol. III. pag. 49.

never looked after any of the Court, but sought a new and irregular way to be removed without them. The Lord-Treasurer made a very honourable answer, That he would not move the King for Mr. Selden to be removed by this means, until he sent him word, on his credit, that it was a legal way; and told that Judge, that Mr. Selden was at the Judges dispose, to remove back when they would, for it was not the King's meaning to do any thing contrary to the order of the Court, or their formal proceedings: so Writs were sent this Michaelmas Term to remove the four prisoners back again to the Marshalsea.

The Case of Sir Miles Hobart, and William Stroud Esq;

ON the 23*d* of January, the Attorney-General exhibited two several Informations, the one against William Stroud Esq; the other against Sir Miles Hobart, Knight. The charge against both of them therein, was for several escapes out of the prison of the Gatehouse: they both pleaded not guilty. And their Cases appeared to be as followeth: The said William Stroud, and Sir Miles Hobart, were by the King's command committed to prison, for misdemeanors alledged against them, in their carriage in the House of Commons at the last Parliament. Afterward in Trinity Term, Anno 6 Caroli, both of them being by order of this Court, and by a Warrant from the Attorney-General to be removed unto the Gatehouse; the Warden of the Marshalsea (where they were before imprisoned) sent the said Stroud to the Keeper of the Gatehouse, who received him into his House lately built, and adjoining to the Prison of the Gatehouse, but being no part thereof. After which receipt, the same night, he licensed the said Stroud to go with his Keeper unto his Chamber in Gray's-Inn, and there to reside. Sir Miles Hobart was also by the said Warden of the Marshalsea, delivered to the Keeper of the Gatehouse, but being sick, and abiding at his Chamber in Fleetstreet, he could not be removed to the Prison of the Gatehouse, but there continued with his Keeper also. Afterwards the Sickness increasing in London, they (with the licence of the Keeper of the Gatehouse, as it was proved) retired with their Underkeepers to their several Houses in the Country for the space of six weeks, until Michaelmas Term then next following, when by direction of the said Keeper they returned to his House; but in all that space it could not be proved, that they were in any part of the old Prison of the Gatehouse, but in the new building thereto adjoining; unless when they once withdrew themselves to a Close-stool, which was placed near to the Parlour, and was part of the old Prison of the Gatehouse. This Evidence was given to both the Juries, and both of them returned their Verdicts severally, That they were not Guilty, according to the information exhibited against them. And in this case it was debated at the Bar and Bench, whether by this receipt and continuance in the new house only, it may be said, That they ever had been imprisoned? And the Judges held, That their voluntary retirement to the Close-stool, made them to be prisoners. They resolved also, that in this and all other cases, although a Prisoner depart from Prison with his Keeper's licence, yet it is an offence as well punishable in the Prisoner as in the Keeper. And Calthorpe made this difference between breach of Prison and escape; the first is against the Goaler's will; the other is with his consent, but in both the Prisoner is punishable: whereunto the whole Court agreed. It was also resolved, that the Prison of the King's-Bench is not any local Prison, confined only to one place, and that every place where any Person is restrained of his liberty is a Prison: As, if one take sanctuary and depart thence, he shall be said to break Prison *.

In the next Parliament, which met April 13. 1640. it was referr'd to a Committee, to consider of the breach of privilege by Sir John Finch (the Speaker) 5 Car. I. who refus'd to put the question by command of the House; and the Committee order'd to state matter of fact, and so report.

Monday, April 20. Mr. Treasurer reported, that Sir John Finch late Speaker did not say, He would not put the question; but that, He durst not put it; That he left the Chair not to disobey the House, but to obey his Majesty.

The House thereupon resolv'd, That it was a breach of Privilege of the House, for the Speaker not to obey the commands of the House; and that it appear'd the Speaker did adjourn the House by command of the King, without consent of the House, which is also a breach of Privilege; it was therefore order'd, that this should be humbly represented to his Majesty.

But this Parliament being soon dissolved, viz. May 5. 1640. nothing was done for these Gentlemen; but in the next Parliament, which met Nov. 3. 1640. reparation was order'd them; as will be shewn in the following Proceeding.

* Mr. Whitlock, in his Memorials, p. 16. says, In the Year 1631. some of the imprisoned Parliament-men, upon their Petition, were removed from the Prisons wherein they then were, to other Prisons, to prevent the danger of the Sickness then increasing. Sir Miles Hobart put in sureties for his good behaviour, and so was discharged from his Imprisonment.

Anno 1631. Sir John Walter died, a grave and learned Judge; he fell into the King's displeasure, charged by his Majesty for dealing cautelously, and not plainly with him, in the business concerning the Parliament-men: as if he had given his opinion to the King privately one way, and thereby brought him on the Stage, and there left him, and then was of another Judgment.

His opinion was contrary to all the rest of the Judges, That a Parliament-man for Misdemeanour in the House, criminally, out of his Office and Duty, might be only imprisoned, and not farther proceeded against: which seemed very strange to the other Judges, because it could not appear, whether the Party had committed an offence, unless he might be admitted to his answer.

The King discharged him of his service by message, yet he kept his Place of Chief-Baron, and would not leave it but by legal Proceeding; because his Parent of it was, Quam diu se bene gesserit, and it must be tried whether he did, bene se gessere, or not: He never sat in Court after the King forbad him, yet held his Place till he died.

XVIII. Proceedings againſt Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles Eſq; and Benjamin Valentine Eſq; for ſeditious Speeches in Parliament; in B. R. Mich. 5 Car. I. 1629. *

SIR Robert Heath, the King's Attorney-General, exhibited informations in this Court againſt Sir John Elliot, Knt. Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, Eſqrs; the effect of which was, † That the King that now is, for weighty cauſes, ſuch a day and year, did ſummon a Parliament, and to that purpoſe ſent his Writ to the Sheriff of Cornwall to chuſe two Knights; by virtue whereof Sir John Elliot was choſen and returned Knight for Cornwall. And that in the ſame manner, the other Defendants were elected Burgeſſes of other places, for the ſame Parliament. And ſhewed further, that Sir John Finch was choſen for one of the Citizens of Canterbury, and was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. And that the ſaid Elliot publickly and maliciouſly in the Houſe of Commons, to raiſe ſedition between the King, his Nobles, and People, uttered theſe words, That the Council and Judges had all conſpired to trample under foot the Liberties of the Subjects. He further ſhewed, that the King had power to call, adjourn, and diſſolve Parliaments: and that the King, for divers reaſons, had a purpoſe to have the Houſe of Commons adjourned, and gave direction to Sir John Finch, then the Speaker, to move an adjournment; and if it ſhould not be obeyed, that he ſhould forthwith come from the Houſe to the King. And that the Defendants, by confederacy aforehand, ſpake a long and continued ſpeech, which was recited verbatim, in which were divers malicious and ſeditious words, of dangerous conſequence. And to the intent that they might not be prevented of uttering their premeditate ſpeeches, their intention was, that the Speaker ſhould not go out of the Chair till they had ſpoken them; the Defendants, Holles and Valentine, laid violent hands upon the Speaker, to the great affrightment and diſturbance of the Houſe. And the Speaker being got out of the Chair, they by violence ſet him in the Chair again; ſo that there was a great tumult in the Houſe. And after the ſaid Speeches pronounced by Sir John Elliot, Holles did recapitulate them.

And to this information,

The Defendants put in a plea to the juriſdiction of the Court, becauſe theſe offences are ſuppoſed to be done in Parliament, and ought not to be puniſhed in this Court, or in any other, but in Parliament.

And the Attorney-General moved the Court, to over-rule the plea to the juriſdiction. And that, he ſaid, the Court might do, although he had not demurred upon the Plea.

But the Court would not over-rule the plea, but gave day to join in demurrer this Term. And on the firſt day of the next Term, the record ſhall be read, and within a day after ſhall be argued at bar.

Hyde, Chief-Juſtice, ſaid to the Counſel of the Defendants; So far light we will give you: this is no new queſtion, but all the Judges in England, and Barons of the Exchequer, before now, have oft been aſſembled on this occaſion, and have, with great patience, heard the arguments on both ſides; and it was reſolved by them all with once voice, That an offence committed in Parliament, criminally or contemptuouſly, the Parliament being ended, reſts puniſhable in another Court.

Jones. It is true, that we all reſolved, That an offence committed in Parliament againſt the Crown, is puniſhable after the Parliament, in another Court; and what Court ſhall that be, but the Court of the King's-Bench, in which the King, by intendment, ſitteth?

Whitlocke. The queſtion is now reduced to a narrow room, for all the Judges are agreed, That an offence committed in Parliament againſt the King or his Government, may be puniſhed out of Parliament. So that the ſole doubt which now remains, is, whether this Court can puniſh it.

Croke agreed, That ſo it had been reſolved by all the Judges, becauſe otherwiſe there would be a failure of Juſtice. And by him, if ſuch an offence be puniſhable in another Court, what Court ſhall puniſh it but this Court, which is the higheſt Court in the Realm for criminal offences? and perhaps not only criminal actions committed in Parliament are puniſhable here, but words alſo.

Mr. Maſon of Lincoln's-Inn argued for Sir John Elliot, one of the Defendants. The charges in the information againſt him are three.

1. For Speeches.

2. For Contempts to the King, in reſiſting the Adjournment.

3. For

* The King at firſt intended to proceed againſt the above Gentlemen in the Star-Chamber, to which end an Information was exhibited againſt them in that Court on the 7th of May; but that being dropp'd, they were proceeded againſt in the King's-Bench, and the ſame matters in effect were ſet forth as in the Information in the Star-Chamber.

† See the Information in the King's-Bench, the Defendants Plea, the Attorney General's Demurrer, &c. at large, poſtea.

3. For Conſpiracy with the other Defendants, to detain Mr. Speaker in the Chair.

In the diſcuſſion of theſe matters, he argued much to the ſame intent he had argued before, therefore his argument is reported here very briefly.

1. For his Speeches, they contain matter of accuſation againſt ſome great Peers of the Realm; and as to them, he ſaid, that the King cannot take notice of them. The Parliament is a Council, and the Grand Council of the King; and Councils are ſecret and cloſe, none other have acceſs to thoſe Councils of Parliament, and they themſelves ought not to impart them without the conſent of the whole Houſe. A Jury in a Leet, which is ſworn to inquire of offences within the ſaid juriſdiction, are ſworn to keep their own counſel; ſo the Houſe of Commons enquire of all grievances within the Kingdom, and their Counſels are not to be revealed. And to this purpoſe was a petition, 2 H. IV. numb. 10. That the King ſhall not give credit to any private reports of their proceedings, to which the King aſſents: therefore the King ought not to give credit to the information of theſe offences in this caſe. 2. The words themſelves contain ſeveral accuſations of great men; and the liberty of accuſation hath always been Parliamentary. 50 E. III. Parliament-Roll, numb. 21. the Lord Latimer was impeached in Parliament for ſundry offences. 11 R. II. the Archbiſhop of York, 18 H. VI. numb. 18. the Duke of Suffolk, 1 Mar. Dy. 93. the Duke of Norfolk, 36 H. VI. numb. 60. un Vickar General, 2 & 3 E. VI. c. 18. the Lord Seymour; 18 of King James, the Lord of St. Albans, Chancellor of England; and 21 of King James, Cranfield, Lord-Treaſurer; and 1 Car. the Duke of Buckingham. 3. This is a privilege of Parliament which is determinable in Parliament, and not elſewhere: 11 R. II. numb. 7. the Parliament-Roll, A Petition exhibited in Parliament, and allowed by the King, That the liberties and privileges of Parliament ſhall only be diſcuſſed there, and not in other Courts, nor by the Common, nor Civil Law; (ſee this caſe more at large in Selden's notes upon Forteſcue, f. 42.) 11 R. II. Roll of the proceſs and judgment. An appeal of Treaſon was exhibited againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and others, and there the advice of the ſages of the one Law and the other being required; but becauſe the appeal concerned perſons which are Peers of the Realm, which are not tried elſewhere than in Parliament, and not in an inferior Court. 28 H. VI. numb. 18. There being a queſtion in Parliament concerning precedency, between the Earl of Arundel, and the Earl of Devon, the opinion of the Judges being demanded, they anſwered, That this queſtion ought to be determined by the Parliament, and by no other. 31 H. VI. numb. 25, 26. During the prorogation of the Parliament, Thorp that was the Speaker, was out in execution at the ſuit of the Duke of York; and upon the re-aſſembly of the Parliament, the Commons made ſuit to the King and Lords to have their Speaker delivered. Upon this, the Lords demand the opinion of the Judges; who anſwer, That they ought not to determine the privileges of the High-Court of Parliament. 4. This accuſation in Parliament is in legal courſe of Juſtice, and therefore the accuſer ſhall never be impeached, 13 H. VII. and 11 Eliz. Dy. 285. Forging of falſe Deeds brought againſt a Peer of the Realm, action de ſcandalis magnatum, doth not lie. Coke's Rep. 4. 14. Cutler and Dixy's caſe, where divers caſes are likewiſe put to this purpoſe. 35 H. VI. 15. If upon the view of the body the ſlayer cannot be found, the Coroner ought to enquire, who firſt found the dead body; and if the firſt finder accuſe another of the murder, that is afterward acquit, he ſhall not have an action upon the caſe, for it was done in legal manner. So it is the duty of the Commons to enquire of the grievances of the Subjects, and the cauſes thereof, and doing it in a legal manner, 19 H. VI. 19. 8 H. IV. 6. in conſpiracy it is a good plea, that he was one of the indictors. And 20 H. VI. 5. that he was a grand Jury-man, and informed his Companions. And 21 E. IV. 6, 7. and 35 H. VI. 14. that he was a Juſtice of Peace, and informed the Jury, 27 aſſ. p. 12. is to the ſame purpoſe. And if a Juſtice of Peace, the firſt Finder, a Juror, or Indictor, ſhall not be puniſhed in ſuch caſes; à fortiori, a Member of the Houſe of Commons ſhall not, who, as 1 H. VII. is a Judge. 27 aſſ. p. 44. may be objected, where two were indicted of conſpiracy, becauſe they maintained one another; but the reaſon of the ſaid caſe was, becauſe maintenance is a matter forbidden by the Law; but Parliamentary accuſation, which is our matter, is not forbidden by any Law. Coke's Rep. 9. 56. there was a conſpiracy, in procuring others to be indicted. And it is true, for there it was not his duty to prefer ſuch accuſation. (2) The accuſation was extra-judicial, and out of Court, but it was not ſo in our caſe. (3) Words ſpoken in Parliament, which is a ſuperiour Court, cannot be queſtioned in this Court, which is inferiour. 3 E. III. 19. and Stamford 153. will be objected, where the Biſhop of Wincheſter was arraigned in this Court, becauſe he departed the Parliament without licence; there is but the opinion of Scroop, and the caſe was entred, P. 3 E. 19. And it is to be obſerved, that the plea of the Biſhop there, was never over-ruled. From this I gather, that Scroop was not conſtant to his opinion, which was ſudden, being in the ſame Term in which the plea was entered; or if he were, yet the other Judges agree not with him; and alſo at laſt the Biſhop was diſcharged by the King's Writ. From this I gather, that the opinion of the Court was againſt the King, as in Pl. 20. in Fogaſſa's caſe, where the opinion of the Court was againſt the King, the party was diſcharged by Privy-Seal. 1 and 2 Phil. & Mar. hath been objected, where an information in this Court was preferred againſt Mr. Plowden, and other Members of the Houſe of Commons, for departing from the Houſe without licence. But in that caſe I obſerve theſe matters. (1) That this information depended, during all the life of the Queen, and at laſt was ſine die, by the death of the Queen. (2) In the ſaid caſe, no plea was made to the juriſdiction of the Court, as here it is. (3) Some of them ſubmitted themſelves to the fine, becauſe it was eaſy, for it was but 53 s. 4 d. But this cannot be urged as a precedent, becauſe it never came in judgment, and no opinion of the Court was delivered therein. And it is no argument, that becauſe at that time they would not plead to the juriſdiction, therefore we now cannot if we would. (4) Theſe offences were not done in the Parliament-Houſe, but elſewhere by their abſence, of which the Country may take notice; but not of our matters done in Parliament. And abſence from Parliament, is an offence againſt the King's ſummons to Parliament. 20 R. II. Parliament-Roll 12. Thomas Hackſey was indicted of High-Treaſon in this Court, for preferring a Petition in Parliament; but 1 H. IV. numb. 90. he preferred a Petition to have this judgment voided, and ſo it was, although the King had pardoned him before. And 1 H. IV. numb. 104. all the Commons made petition to the ſame purpoſe, becauſe this tends to the deſtruction of their privileges. And this was likewiſe granted. 4 H. VIII. c. 8. Strode's caſe, That all condemnations impoſed upon one, for preferring of any Bill, ſpeaking, or reaſoning in Parliament, are void. And this hath always been conceived to be a general Act, becauſe the prayers, time, words, and perſons are general, and the anſwer to it is general; for a general Act is always anſwered with, Le Roy voit, and a particular Act with Soit droit fait al partyes. And 33 H. VI. 17, 18. a general Act is alway inrolled, and ſo this is.

Secondly, For the ſecond matter, the contempt to the command of the adjournment, Jac. 18. it was queſtioned in Parliament, whether the King can adjourn the Parliament, (although it be without doubt that the King can prorogue it.) And the Judges reſolve, that the King may adjourn the Houſe by commiſſion; and 27 Eliz. it was reſolved accordingly. But it is to be obſerved, that none was then impeached for moving that queſtion. (2) It is to be obſerved, that they reſolve, that the adjournment may be by commiſſion, but not reſolved that it may be by a verbal command, ſignified by another; and it derogates not from the King's Prerogative, that he cannot ſo do, no more than in the caſe of 26 H. VIII. 8. that he cannot grant one acre of land by parol. The King himſelf may adjourn the Houſe in perſon, or under the Great Seal, but not by verbal Meſſage, for none is bound to give credit to ſuch meſſage; but when it is under the Great Seal, it is Teſte Meipſo. And if there was no command, then there can be no contempt in the diſobedience of that command. (3) In this, no contempt appears by the information; for the information is, That the King had power to adjourn Parliaments. Then put the caſe, the command be, that they ſhould adjourn themſelves; this is no purſuance of the power which he is ſuppoſed to have. The Houſe may be adjourned two ways, to wit, by the King, or by the houſe itſelf; the laſt is their own voluntary act, which the King cannot compel, for, Voluntas non cogitur.

Thirdly, For the third matter, which is the conſpiracy: although this be ſuppoſed to be out of the Houſe, yet the Act is legal; for Members of the Houſe may adviſe of matters out of the Houſe; for the Houſe itſelf is not ſo much for conſultations, as for propoſition of them. And 20 H. VI. 34. is, that inqueſts which are ſworn for the King, may enquire of matters elſewhere. (2) For the conſpiracy to lay violent hands upon the Speaker, to keep him in the chair; the Houſe hath privilege to detain him in the chair, and it was but lightly and ſoftly, and other Speakers have been ſo ſerved. (3) The King cannot prefer an information for treſpaſs, for it is ſaid, the King ought to be informed by a Jury, to wit, by indictment, or preſentment. (4) This cannot be any contempt, becauſe it appears not that the Houſe was adjourned; and if ſo, then the Speaker ought to remain in the chair; for without him, the Houſe cannot be adjourned. But it may be objected, that the information is, That all theſe matters were done maliciouſly and ſeditiouſly. But to this I anſwer, That this is always to be underſtood according to the ſubject matter, 15 E. IV. 4. and 18 H. VIII. 5. A wife that hath title to have Dower, agrees with another to enter, (which hath right) that ſhe againſt him may recover her dower. This ſhall not be called Covin, becauſe both the parties have right and titles. (2) It will be objected, That if theſe matters ſhall not be puniſhable here; they ſhall be unpuniſhed altogether, becauſe the Parliament is determined. To this I ſay, That they may be puniſhed in the ſubſequent Parliament, and ſo there ſhall be no failure of right. And many times matters in one Parliament, have been continued to another, as 4 E. III. numb. 16. the Lord Berkley's caſe, 50 E. III. numb. 185. 21 R. II. c. 16. 6 H. VI. numb. 45, 46. 8 H. IV. numb. 12. offences in the foreſt ought to be puniſhed in Eyre, and Eyres oftentimes were not held, but every third year. C. 9. Epiſtle, and 36 E. III. c. 10. A Parliament may be every year. Error in this Court cannot be reverſed but in Parliament, and yet it was never objected, that therefore there ſhall be a failure of right. 25 E. III. c. 2. If a new caſe of Treaſon happen, which is doubtful, it ſhall not be determined till the next Parliament. So in Weſtm. 2. c. 28. where a new caſe happens, in which there is no Writ, ſtay ſhall be made till the next Parliament. And yet in theſe caſes, there is no failure of right. And ſo the Judges have always done in all difficult caſes; they have referred the determination of them to the next Parliament, as appears by 2 E. III. 6, 7. 1 E. III. 8. 33 H. VI. 18. 5 E. II. Dower 145. the caſe of dower of a rent-charge. And 1 Jac. the Judges refuſe to deliver their opinions concerning the union of the two Kingdoms. The preſent caſe is great, rare, and without precedent, therefore not determinable but in Parliament. And it is of dangerous conſequence; for (1) by the ſame reaſon, all the Members of the Houſe of Commons may be queſtioned. (2) The parties ſhall be diſabled to make their defence, and the Clerk of Parliament is not bound to diſcloſe thoſe particulars. And by this means, the debates of a great Council ſhall be referred to a petty Jury. And the parties cannot make juſtification, for they cannot ſpeak thoſe words here, which were ſpoken in the Parliament, without ſlander. And the Defendants have not means to compel any to be witneſſes for them; for the Members of the Houſe ought not to diſcover the Counſel of the Houſe: ſo that they are debarr'd of juſtification, evidence, and witneſs. Laſtly, by this means, none will adventure to accuſe any offender, in Parliament, but will rather ſubmit himſelf to the common danger; for, for his pains he ſhall be impriſoned, and perhaps greatly fined: and if both theſe be unjuſt, yet the party ſo vexed can have no recompence. Therefore, &c.

The Court. The queſtion is not now, whether theſe matters be offences, and whether true or falſe. But, admitting them to be offences, the ſole queſtion is, whether this Court may puniſh them; ſo that a great part of your argument is nothing to the preſent queſtion.

At another day, being the next, Mr. Calthorpe, (who ſucceeded Mr. Maſon, as Recorder of London,) argued for Mr. Valentine, another of the Defendants.

1. In general, he ſaid, for the nature of the crimes, that they are of four ſorts.
   1. In Matter.
   2. In Words.
   3. By Conſent.
   4. By Letters.

Two

Two of them are laid to the charge of this Defendant, to wit, the crime of the Matter, and of Conſent. And of offences Bracton makes ſome publick, ſome private. The offences here are publick. And of them, ſome are capital, ſome not capital; as aſſault, conſpiracy, and ſuch like, which have not the puniſhment of life and death. Publick crimes capital are ſuch as are againſt the Law of Nature, as Treaſon, Murder; I will agree, that if they be committed in Parliament, they may be queſtioned elſewhere out of Parliament. But in our caſe, the crimes are not capital, for they are aſſault and conſpiracy, which in many caſes may be juſtified, as appears by 22 H. VII. Keilw. 92. 2 aſſ. 3 H. IV. 10. 22 E. IV. 43. Therefore this Court ſhall not have juriſdiction of them, for they are not againſt the Law of Nations, of God, or Nature; and if theſe matters ſhall be examinable here, by conſequence all actions of Parliament-men may be drawn in queſtion in this Court. But it ſeems by theſe reaſons, that this Court ſhall not have juriſdiction, as this caſe is:

1. Becauſe theſe offences are juſtifiable, being but the bringing the Speaker to the Chair, which alſo perhaps was done by the Votes of the Commons; but if theſe matters ſhall be juſtified in this Court, no trial can be, for upon iſſue of his own wrong, he cannot be tried, becauſe acts done in the Houſe of Commons are of record, as it was reſolved in the Parliament, 1 Jac. and 16 H. VII. 3. C. 9. 31. are, that ſuch matters cannot be tried by the Country. And now they cannot be tried by record, becauſe, as 29 H. VIII. Dy. 32. is, an inferior Court cannot write to a ſuperior. And no Certiorari lies out of the Chancery, to ſend this here by Mittimus, for there was never any precedent thereof; and the Book of the Houſe of Commons, which is with their Clerk ought not to be divulged. And C. Little. is, that if a man be indicted in this Court for Piracy committed upon the Sea, he may well plead to the juriſdiction of this Court, becauſe this Court cannot try it.

2. It appears by the old Treatiſe, de modo tenendi Parliamentum, that the Judges are but aſſiſtants in the Parliament; and if any words or acts are made there, they have no power to contradict or controul them. Then it is incongruous, that they, after the Parliament diſſolved, ſhall have power to puniſh ſuch words or acts, which at the time of the ſpeaking or doing, they had not power to contradict. There are ſuperior, middle, and more inferior Magiſtrates; and the ſuperior ſhall not be ſubject to the controul of the inferior. It is a poſition, that in pares eſt nullum imperium, multo minus in eos, qui magis imperium habent. C. Littl. ſays, That the Parliament is the ſupreme Tribunal of the Kingdom, and they are Judges of the ſupreme Tribunal; therefore they ought not to be queſtioned by their inferiors. (3) The offences objected do concern the privileges of Parliament, which privileges are determinable in Parliament, and not elſewhere, as appears by the precedents which have been cited before. (4) The Common Law hath aſſigned proper Courts for matters, in reſpect of the place and perſons: 1. For the place, it appears by 11 E. IV. 3. and old Entries, 101. that in an ejectione firmæ, it is a good plea, that the Land is antient demeſne, and this excludes all other Courts. So it is for Land in Durham, old Entries, 419. for it is queſtionable there, and not out of the County. 2. For perſons, H. 15 H. VII. rol. 93. old Entries, 47. If a Clerk of the Chancery be impleaded in this Court, he may plead his privilege, and ſhall not anſwer. So it is of a Clerk of the Exchequer, old Entries, 473. then much more when offences are done in Parliament, which is exempt in ordinary juriſdiction, they ſhall not be drawn into queſtion in this Court. And if a man be indicted in this Court, he may plead ſanctuary, 22 H. VII. Keilw. 91. & 22. and ſhall be reſtored, 21 E. III. 60. The Abbot of Bury's caſe is to the ſame purpoſe. (5) For any thing that appears, the Houſe of Commons had approved of theſe matters, therefore they ought not to be queſtioned in this Court. And if they be offences, and the ſaid Houſe hath not puniſhed them, this will be a caſting of imputation upon them. (6) It appears by the old Entries, 446, 447. that ſuch an one ought to repreſent the Borough of St. Germains, from whence he was ſent, therefore he is in nature of an Ambaſſador, and he ſhall not be queſtioned for any thing in the execution of his Office, if he do nothing againſt the Law of Nature or Nations, as it is the caſe of an Ambaſſador. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, (Camden's Brit. 449.) the Biſhop of Roſs in Scotland, being Ambaſſador here, attempted divers matters againſt the State; and by the opinion of all the Civilians of the ſaid time, he may be queſtioned for thoſe offences, becauſe they are againſt the Law of Nations and Nature; and, in ſuch matters, he ſhall not enjoy the privileges of an Ambaſſador. But if he commit a civil offence, which is againſt the Municipal Law only, he cannot be queſtioned for it, as Bodin. de Republica, agrees the caſe. Upon the Statute of 28 H. VIII. c. 15. for Trial of Pirates, 13 Jac. the caſe fell out to be thus. A Jew came Ambaſſador to the United Provinces, and in his journey he took ſome Spaniſh Ships, and after was driven upon this coaſt; and agreed upon the ſaid Statute, that he cannot be tried as a Pirate here by commiſſion, but he may be queſtioned civiliter in the Admiralty: for, Legati ſuo Regi ſoli judicium faciunt. So Ambaſſadors of Parliament, ſoli Parliamento, to wit, in ſuch things, which of themſelves are juſtifiable. (7) There was never any precedent, that this Court had puniſhed offences of this nature, committed in Parliament, where any plea was put in, as here it is to the juriſdiction of the Court; and where there is no precedent, non-uſage is a good expoſitor of the Law. Lord Littl. Section 180. Co. Littl. f. 81. ſays, as uſage is a good interpreter of the Laws, ſo non-uſage, where there is no example, is a great intendment, that the Law will not bear it. 6 Eliz. Dy. 229. upon the Statute of 27 H. VIII. of inrolments, that bargain and ſale of a houſe in London ought not to be enrolled; the reaſon there given is, becauſe it is not uſed. 23 Eliz. Dy. 376. no error lies here of a judgment given in the five Ports, becauſe ſuch Writ was never ſeen; yet in the diverſity of Courts it is ſaid, that error lies of a judgment given in the five Ports. 39 H. VI. 39. by Aſhton, that a protection to go to Rome was never ſeen, therefore he diſallowed it. (8) If this Court ſhall have juriſdiction, the Court may give judgment according to Law, and yet contrary to Parliament Law, for the Parliament in divers caſes hath a peculiar Law. Notwithſtanding the Statute of 1 H. V. c. 1. that every Burgeſs ought to be reſident within the Burrough of which he is Burgeſs, yet the conſtant uſage of Parliament is contrary thereunto; and if ſuch matter ſhall be in queſtion before ye, ye ought to adjudge according to the Statute, and not according to their uſage. So the Houſe of Lords hath a ſpecial Law alſo, as appears by 11 R. II. the roll of the proceſs and judgment, (which hath been cited before to another purpoſe) where an appeal was not according to the one Law or the other, yet it was good according to the courſe of Parliament. (9) Becauſe this matter is brought in this Court by way of information, where it ought to be by way of indictment. And it appears by 41 aſſ. p. 12. that if a Bill of Deceit be brought in this Court, where it ought to be by Writ, this matter may be pleaded to the juriſdiction of the Court, becauſe it is vi & armis, and contra pacem. It appears by all our Books, that informations ought not to be grounded upon ſurmiſes, but upon matter of Record, 4 H. VII. 5. 6 E. VI. Dy. 74. Information in the Exchequer, and 11 H. VIII. Keilw. 101. are to this purpoſe. And if the matter be vi & armis, then it ought to be found by Inqueſt. 2 E. III. 1, 2. Appeal ſhall not be granted upon the return of the Sherif, but the King ought to be certified of it by indictment. 1 H. VII. 6. and Stamf. f. 95. a. upon the Statute of 25 E. III. c. 4. that none ſhall be impriſoned but upon indictment or preſentment; and 28 E. III. c. 3. 42 E. III. c. 3. are to the ſame purpoſe. So here, this information ought to have been grounded upon indictment, or other matter of Record, and not upon bare intelligence given to the King. (10) The preſent caſe is great and difficult, and in ſuch caſes, the Judges have always outed themſelves of juriſdiction, as appears by Bracton, Book II. f. 1. Si aliquid novi non uſitatum in Regno acciderit, 2 E. III. 6, 7. and Dower 242.

Now I will remove ſome objections which may be made.

Where the King is Plaintif, it is in his election to bring his action in what Court he pleaſes. This is true in ſome ſenſe, to wit, That the King is not reſtrained by the Statute of Magna Charta, Quod communia placita non ſequantur curiam noſtram; for he may bring his Quare impedit in B. R. And if it concerns Durham, or other County Palatine, yet the King may have his action here; for the ſaid Courts are created by Patent, and the King may not be reſtrained by Parliament, or by his own Patent, to bring his action where he pleaſeth. But the King ſhall not have his action where he pleaſeth againſt a prohibition of the Common Law, as 12 H. VII. Keilw. 6. the King ſhall not have a Formedon in Chancery. And C. 6. 20. Gregory's caſe, if the King will bring an information in an inferiour Court, the party may plead to the juriſdiction. So where the Common Law makes a prohibition, the King hath not election of his Court.

The information is contra formam Statuti, which Statute, as I conceive, is intended the Statute of 5 H. IV. c. 6. and 11 H. VI. c. 11. which gives power to this Court to puniſh an aſſault, made upon the ſervant of a Knight of Parliament. But our caſe is not within thoſe Statutes, nor the intent of them; for it is not intendible, that the Parliament ſhould diſadvantage themſelves, in point of their privilege. And this was a Treſpaſs done within the Houſe, by Parliament-men amongſt themſelves. And Crompton's Juriſdiction of Courts, f. 8. ſaith, That the Parliament may puniſh treſpaſſes done there.

Precedents have been cited of Parliament-men, impriſoned and puniſhed for matters done in Parliament. To this I ſay, That there is Via juris, and Via facti; and Via facti is not always Via juris. C. 4. 93. precedents are no good directions, unleſs they be judicial.

Otherwiſe there will be a failure of Juſtice, wrongs ſhall be unpuniſhed. To this I anſwer, That a miſchief is oft-times rather ſufferable than an inconvenience, to draw in queſtion the privileges of Parliament. By the antient Common Law, as it appears by 21 E. III. 23. and 21 aſſ. if an Infant bring an Appeal, the ſuit ſhall be ſtaid during his infancy; becauſe the party cannot have his Trial by battle againſt the Infant; but the Law is now held otherwiſe in the ſaid caſe. And in ſome caſes, criminal offences ſhall be diſpuniſhed, 29 H. VIII. Dy. 40. Appeal of Murder lies not for Murder done in ſeveral Counties.

This Court of B. R. is coram ipſo Rege; the King himſelf, by intendment, is here in perſon. And, as it is ſaid, C. 9. 118. it is Supremum Regni Tribunal, of ordinary juriſdiction. But to this I ſay, That the Parliament is a tranſcendent Court, and of tranſcendent juriſdiction: it appears by 28 aſſ. p. 52. that the ſtile of other Courts is coram Rege, as well as this is; as coram Rege in Cancellaria, coram Rege in Camera; and though it be coram Rege, yet the Judges give the judgment. And in the time of H. III. in this Court, ſome Entries were coram Rege, others, coram Hugone de Bigod.

The privileges of Parliament are not queſtioned, but the conſpiracies and miſdemeanors of ſome of them. But to this I ſay, that the diſtinction is difficult and narrow in this caſe, where the offences objected are juſtifiable: and if they be offences, this reflects upon the houſe which hath not puniſhed them.

The caſes of 3 E. III. 19. and 1 and 2 Phil. & Mar. have been objected. But for the laſt it is obſervable, That no plea was pleaded to the juriſdiction, as it is in our caſe. And if a Parliament-man or other, which hath privilege, be impleaded in foreign Court, and neglect his plea to the juriſdiction, the Court may well proceed, 9 H. VII. 14. 36 H. VI. 34 H. 13 Jac. In this Court the Lord Norreys, that was a Peer of Parliament, was indicted for the Murder of one Bigod, and pleaded his pardon. And there it was doubted, how the Court ſhould proceed againſt him, (for he, by Law, ought to have his Trial by his Peers.) And it was reſolved, that when he pleads his pardon, or confeſſeth his fault, thereby he gives juriſdiction to the Court, and the Court may give judgment againſt him. So that theſe caſes, where it was not pleaded to the juriſdiction, can be no precedent in our caſe.

The privilege here is not claimed by Preſcription or Charter, therefore it is not good. But I ſay, that notwithſtanding this, it is good; for where the Common Law outs a Court of juriſdiction, there needs no Charter or Preſcription; 10 H. VI. 13. 8 H. VIII. Keilw. 189. Br. n. c. 515. Where ſanctuary of a Church is pleaded, there's no need to make preſcription, becauſe every Church is a ſanctuary by the Common Law. Therefore, &c.

Sir Robert Heath, the King's Attorney, the ſame day argued on the other ſide, but briefly. Firſt, he anſwered the objections which had been made.

Firſt, He ſaid, That informations might well be for matters of this nature, which are not capital; and that there are many precedents of ſuch informations. (But note, that he produced none of them.)

Secondly,

Secondly, It hath been objected, That they are a Council, therefore they ought to ſpeak freely. But ſuch ſpeeches which are here pronounced, prove them not Counſellors of State, but Bedlams; the addition of one word would have made it Treaſon, to wit, proditorie. But it is the pleaſure of the King to proceed in this manner, as now it is. And there is great difference between Bills and Libels, and between their proceedings, as Counſel and as mutinous.

Thirdly, That it would be of dangerous conſequence; for by this means none would adventure to complain of grievances. I anſwer, they may make their complaints in a Parliamentary manner; but they may not move things, which tend to diſtraction of the King and his Government.

Fourthly, Theſe matters may be puniſhed in following Parliaments. But this is impoſſible, for following Parliaments cannot know with what mind theſe matters were done. Alſo the Houſe of Commons is not a Court of Juſtice of itſelf. The two Houſes are but one body, and they cannot proceed criminally to puniſh crimes, but only their Members by way of impriſonment; and alſo they are not a Court of Record. And they have forbid their Clerk to make entry of their ſpeeches, but only of matters of courſe; for many times they ſpeak upon the ſudden, as occaſion is offered. And there is no neceſſity, that the King ſhould expect a new Parliament. The Lords may grant Commiſſions to determine matters, after the Parliament ended; but the Houſe of Commons cannot do ſo. And alſo a new Houſe of Commons conſiſts of new men, which have no cognizance of theſe offences. 1 H. IV. The Biſhop of Carliſle, for words ſpoken in the Parliament, that the King had not right to the Crown, was arraigned in this Court of High-Treaſon; and then he did not plead his privilege of Parliament, but ſaid, That he was Epiſcopus unctus, &c.

Fifthly, 4 H. VIII. Strode's caſe hath been objected. But this is but a particular Act, although it be in print; for Raſtal entitles it by the name of Strode: ſo the title, body, and proviſo of the Act are particular.

Sixthly, That this is an inferiour Court to the Parliament, therefore, &c. To this I ſay, That, even ſitting the Parliament, this Court of B. R. and other Courts, may judge of their privileges, as of a Parliament-man put in execution, &c. and other caſes. It is true that the Judges have oft-times declined to give their judgment upon the privileges of Parliament, ſitting the Court. But from this it follows not, that when the offence is committed there, and not puniſhed, and the ſaid Court diſſolved, that therefore the ſaid matter ſhall not be queſtioned in this Court.

Seventhly, By this means the privileges of Parliament ſhall be in great danger, if this Court may judge of them. But I anſwer, That there is no danger at all; for this Court may judge of Acts of Parliament.

Eighthly, Perhaps theſe matters were done by the Votes of the Houſe; or, if they be offences, it is an imputation to the Houſe to ſay, That they had neglected to puniſh them; but this matter doth not appear. And if the truth were ſo, theſe matters might be given in evidence.

Ninthly, There is no precedent in the caſe, which is a great preſumption of Law. But to this I anſwer, That there was never any precedent of ſuch a fact, therefore there cannot be a precedent of ſuch a judgment. And yet in the time of Queen Elizabeth, it was reſolved by Brown, and many other Juſtices, that offences done in Parliament may be puniſhed out of Parliament, by impriſonment or otherwiſe. And the caſe of 3 E. III. 19. is taken for good Law by Stamf. and Fitzh. And 22 E. III. and 1 Mar. accord directly with it. But it hath been objected, that there was no plea made to the juriſdiction. But it is to be obſerved, that Plowden that was a learned man, was one of the Defendants, and he pleaded not to the juriſdiction, but pleaded licence to depart. And the ſaid information depended during all the Reign of Queen Mary, during which time there were four Parliaments, and they never queſtioned this matter.

But it hath been further objected, That the ſaid caſe differs from our caſe, becauſe that there the offence was done out of the Houſe, and this was done within the Houſe. But in the ſaid caſe, if licence to depart be pleaded, it ought to be tried in Parliament, as well as theſe offences here. Therefore, &c.

The Judges alſo the ſame day ſpake briefly to the caſe, and agreed with one voice, That the Court, as this caſe is, ſhall have juriſdiction, although that theſe offences were committed in Parliament, and that the impriſoned Members ought to anſwer.

Jones began and ſaid, That though this queſtion be now newly moved, yet it is an ancient queſtion with him; for it had been in his thoughts theſe eighteen years. For this information there are three queſtions in it:

1. Whether the matters informed be true or falſe: and this ought to be determined by Jury or Demurrer.

2. When the matters of the Information are found or confeſſed to be true, if the Information be good in ſubſtance.

3. Admit that the offences are truly charged, if this Court hath power to puniſh them: and that is the ſole queſtion of this day.

And it ſeems to me, that of theſe offences, although committed in Parliament, this Court ſhall have juriſdiction to puniſh them. The Plea of the Defendants here to the juriſdiction being concluded with a demurrer, is not peremptory unto them, although it be adjudged againſt them; but if the plea be pleaded to the juriſdiction, which is found againſt the Defendant by Verdict, this is peremptory.

In the diſcuſſion of this point, I decline theſe queſtions.

1. If the matter be voted in Parliament, when it is finiſhed, it can be puniſhed and examined in another Court?

2. If the matter be commenced in Parliament, and that ended, if afterward it may be queſtioned in another Court?

I queſtion not theſe matters, but I hold, that an offence committed criminally in Parliament, may be queſtioned elſewhere, as in this Court; and that for theſe reaſons:

Firſt, Quia intereſt Reipublicæ ut maleficia non maneant impunita: and there ought to be a freſh puniſhment of them. Parliaments are called at the King's pleaſure, and the King is not compellable to call his Parliament; and if before the next Parliament, the party offending, or the witneſſes die, then there will be a failure of Juſtice.

Secondly, The Parliament is no conſtant Court; every Parliament moſtly conſiſts of ſeveral men, and, by conſequence, they cannot take notice of matters done in the foregoing Parliament; and there they do not examine by oath, unleſs it be in Chancery, as it is uſed of late time.

Thirdly, The Parliament cannot ſend Proceſs to make the offenders to appear at the next Parliament; and being at large, if they hear a noiſe of a Parliament, they will fugam facere, and ſo prevent their puniſhment.

Fourthly, Put the caſe, that one of the Defendants be made a Baron of Parliament, now he cannot be puniſhed in the Houſe of Commons, and ſo he ſhall be unpuniſhed.

It hath been objected, That the Parliament is the ſuperiour Court to this, therefore this Court cannot examine their proceedings.

To this I ſay, That this Court of the King's-Bench, is a higher Court than the Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer, or the Juſtices of Aſſize: but if an offence be done where the King's-Bench is, after it is removed, this offence may be examined by the Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer, or by the Juſtices of Aſſize. We cannot queſtion the judgments of Parliaments, but their particular offences.

2 Object. It is a privilege of Parliament, wheerof we are not competent Judges.

To this I ſay, That privilegium eſt privata Lex & privat legem. And this ought to be by grant or preſcription in Parliament; and then it ought to be pleaded for the manner, as is in 33 H. VIII. Dy. as it is not here pleaded. Alſo we are Judges of all Acts of Parliament: as 4 H. VII. Ordinance made by the King and Commons is not good, and we are Judges what ſhall be a Seſſion of Parliament, as it is Plowden, in Partridge's caſe. We are Judges of their lives and lands, therefore of their liberties. And 8 Eliz. (which was cited by Mr. Attorney) it was the opinion of Dyer, Oatlyn, Welſh, Brown, and Southcot, Juſtices, That offences committed in Parliament may be puniſhed out of Parliament. And 3 Ed. V. 19. it is good Law. And it is uſual near the end of Parliaments to ſet down ſome petty puniſhment upon offenders in Parliament, to prevent other Courts. And I have ſeen a Roll in this Court, in 6 H. VI. where judgment was given in a Writ of Annuity in Ireland, and afterward the ſaid judgment was reverſed in Parliament in Ireland; upon which judgment, Writ of Error was brought in this Court, and reverſed.

Hyde Chief-Juſtice, to the ſame intent: No new matter hath been offered to us now by them that argue for the Defendants, but the ſame reaſons and authorities in ſubſtance, which were objected before all the Juſtices of England, and Barons of the Exchequer, at Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-ſtreet, upon an information in the Star-Chamber for the ſame matter. At which time, after great deliberation, it was reſolved by all of them, That no offence committed in Parliament, that being ended, may be puniſhed out of Parliament. And no Court more apt for that purpoſe than this Court in which we are: and it cannot be puniſhed in a future Parliament, becauſe it cannot take notice of matters done in a foregoing Parliament.

As to what was ſaid, That an inferior Court cannot meddle with matters done in a ſuperior; true it is, that an inferior Court cannot meddle with judgments of a ſuperior Court; but if particular Members of a ſuperior Court offend, they are oft-times puniſhable in an inferiour Court: as, if a Judge ſhall commit a capital offence in this Court, he may be arraigned thereof at Newgate. 3 E. III. 19. and 1 Mar. which have been cited, over-rule this caſe. Therefore, &c.

Juſtice Whitlock. 1. I ſay in this caſe, Nihil dictum quod non dictum prius.

2. That all the Judges of England have reſolved this very point.

3. That now we are but upon the brink and skirts of the cauſe: for it is not now in queſtion, if theſe be offences or no; or, if true or falſe; but only if this Court have juriſdiction.

But it hath been objected, That the offence is not capital, therefore it is not examinable in this Court.

But though it be not capital, yet it is criminal, for it is ſowing of ſedition to the deſtruction of the Common-wealth. The queſtion now is not between us that are Judges of this Court, and the Parliament, or between the King and the Parliament; but between ſome private Members of the Houſe of Commons and the King himſelf: for here the King himſelf queſtions them for thoſe offences, as well he may. In every Commonwealth there is one ſupereminent power, which is not ſubject to be queſtioned by any other; and that is the King in this Commonwealth, who, as Bracton ſaith, Solum Deum habet ultorem. But no other within the Realm hath this privilege. It is true, that that which is done in Parliament by conſent of all the Houſe, ſhall not be queſtioned elſewhere; but if any private Members, exeunt perſonas judicum, & induunt malefacientium perſonas, & ſunt ſeditioſi; is there ſuch ſanctimony in the place, that they may not be queſtioned for it elſewhere? The Biſhop of Roſs, as the caſe hath been put, being Ambaſſador here, practiſed matters againſt the State: and it was reſolved, That although Legatus ſit Rex in alieno ſolo, yet when he goes out of the bounds of his office, and complots with Traitors in this Kingdom, that he ſhall be puniſhed as an offender here. A Miniſter hath a great privilege when he is in the Pulpit; but yet, if in the Pulpit he utter ſpeeches which are ſcandalous to the State, he is puniſhable. So in this caſe, when a Burgeſs of Parliament becomes mutinous, he ſhall not have the privilege of Parliament. In my opinion, the Realm cannot conſiſt without Parliaments, but the behaviour of Parliament-men ought to be Parliamentary. No outrageous ſpeeches were ever uſed againſt a great Miniſter of State in Parliament, which have not been puniſhed. If a Judge of this Court utter ſcandalous ſpeeches to the State, he may be queſtioned for them before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, becauſe this is no judicial act of the Court.

But it hath been objected, That we cannot examine Acts done by a higher Power.

To this I put this caſe: when a Peer of the Realm is arraigned of Treaſon, we are not his Judges, but the High Steward, and he ſhall be tried by his Peers: but if error be committed in this proceeding, that ſhall be reverſed by error in this Court; for that which we do is coram ipſo Rege.

It hath been objected, That the Parliament-Law differs from the Law by which we judge in this Court in ſundry caſes. And for the inſtance which hath been made, That by the Statute, none ought to be choſen Burgeſs of a Town in which he doth not inhabit, but that the uſage of Parliament is contrary: But if information be brought upon the ſaid Statute againſt againſt ſuch a Burgeſs, I think that the Statute is a good warrant for us to give judgment againſt him.

And it hath been objected, That there is no precedent in this matter.

But there are ſundry precedents, by which it appears, that the Parliament hath tranſmitted matters to this Court; as 2 R. II. there being a queſtion between a great Peer and a Biſhop, it was tranſmitted to this Court, being for matter of behaviour: and although the Judges of this Court are but inferior men, yet the Court is higher. For it appears by the 11 Eliz. Dy. That the Earl Marſhal of England is an Officer of this Court; and it is always admitted in Parliament, That the Privileges of Parliament hold not in three caſes, to wit, Firſt, in caſe of Treaſon. Secondly, in caſe of Felony. And Thirdly, in ſuit for the Peace. And the laſt is our very caſe. Therefore, &c.

Croke argued to the ſame intent: he ſaid, That theſe offences ought to be puniſhed in the Court, or no where; and all manner of offences which are againſt the Crown, are examinable in this Court.

It hath been objected, That by this means, none will adventure to make complaints in Parliament.

That is not ſo, for he may complain in a Parliamentary courſe, but not falſely and unlawfully, as here is pretended; for that which is unlawfully, cannot be in a Parliamentary courſe.

It hath been objected, That the Parliament is a higher Court than this.

And it is true: But every Member is not a Court; and if he commit offence, he is puniſhable here. Our Court is a Court of high Juriſdiction, it cannot take cognizance of real Pleas; but if a real Plea comes by Error in this Court, it ſhall never be tranſmitted. But this Court may award a Grand Cape, and other Proceſs uſual in real actions: but of all capital and criminal Cauſes, we are originally competent Judges, and by conſequence of this matter. But I am not of the opinion of Mr. Attorney-General, that the word proditorie would have made this Treaſon. And for the other matters, he agreed with the Judges. Therefore by the Court, the Defendants were ruled to plead further: and Mr. Lenthal of Lincolns-Inn was aſſigned of Counſel for them.

But inaſmuch as the Defendants would not put in any other Plea, the laſt day of the Term, Judgment was given againſt them upon a Nihil dicit; which Judgment was pronounced by Jones to this effect:

"The matter of the information now, by the confeſſion of the Defendants, is admitted to be true, and we think their Plea to the juriſdiction inſufficient for the matter and manner of it. And we hereby will not draw the true Liberties of Parliament-men into queſtion; to wit, for ſuch matters which they do or ſpeak in a Parliamentary manner. But in this caſe there was a conſpiracy between the Defendants to ſlander the State, and to raiſe ſedition and diſcord between the King, his Peers, and People; and this was not a Parliamentary courſe. All the Judges of England, except one, have reſolved the Statute of 4 H. VIII. to be a private Act, and to extend to Strode only. But every Member of the Parliament ſhall have ſuch Privileges as are there mentioned; but they have no Privilege to ſpeak at their pleaſure. The Parliament is an high Court, therefore it ought not to be diſorderly, but ought to give good example to other Courts. If a Judge of our Court ſhould rail upon the State, or Clergy, he is puniſhable for it. A Member of the Parliament may charge any great Officer of the State with an particular offence; but this was a malevolous accuyſation in the generality of all the Officers of State, therefore the matter contained within the information is a great offence, and puniſhable in this Court.

2. For the puniſhment, although the offence be great, yet that ſhall be with a light hand, and ſhall be in this manner."

1. That every of the Defendants ſhall be impriſoned during the King's pleaſure: Sir John Elliot to be impriſoned in the Tower of London, and the other Defendants in other priſons.

2. That none of them ſhall be delivered out of priſon until he give ſecurity in this Court for his good behaviour, and have made ſubmiſſion and acknowledgment of his offence.

3. Sir John Elliot, inaſmuch as we think him the greateſt offender, and the Ringleader, ſhall pay to the King a Fine of 2000 l. and Mr. Holles, a Fine of 1000 Marks: and Mr. Valentine, becauſe he is of leſs ability than the reſt, ſhall pay a Fine of 500 l. And to all this, all the other Juſtices with one voice accorded.

Afterwards the Parliament which met the third of November, 1640. upon report made by Mr. Recorder Glyn, of the ſtate of the ſeveral and reſpective caſes of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and the reſt of the impriſoned Members of the Parliament, in Tertio Caroli, touching their extraordinary ſufferings, for their conſtant affections to the Liberties of the Kingdom, expreſſed in that Parliament; and upon arguments made in the Houſe thereupon, did upon the ſixth of July, 1641, paſs theſe enſuing votes; which, in reſpect of the reference they have to theſe laſt mentioned proceedings, we have thought fit, to inſert: viz.

July 6. 1541

1. RESolved upon the queſtion, That the iſſuing out of the Warrants from the Lords and others of the Privy-Council, compelling Mr. Holles, and the reſt of the Members of that Parliament, 3 Car. during the Parliament, to appear before them, is a breach of the Privilege of Parliament by thoſe Privy Counſellors.

2. Reſolved, &c. That the committing of Mr. Holles, and the reſt, by the Lords and others of the Privy-Council, during the Parliament, is a breach of the Privilege of Parliament by thoſe Lords, and others.

3. Reſolved, &c. That the ſearching and ſealing of the Chamber, Study, and Papers of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and Sir John Elliot, being Members of this Houſe, and during the Parliament, and iſſuing of Warrants to that purpoſe, was a breach of the Privilege of Parliament, by thoſe that executed the ſame.

4. Reſolved, &c. That the exhibiting of an information in the Court of Star-chamber, againſt Mr. Holles and the reſt, for matters done by them in Parliament, being Members of Parliament, and the ſame ſo appearing in the information, is a breach of the Privilege of Parliament.

5. Reſolved, &c. That Sir Robert Heath, and Sir Humphry Davenport, Sir Heneage Finch, Mr. Hudſon, and Sir Robert Berkley, that ſubſcribed their names to the information, are guilty thereby of the breach of Privilege of Parliament.

6. Reſolved, &c. That there was delay of Juſtice towards Mr. Holles, and the reſt that appeared upon the Habeas Corpus, in that they were not bailed in Eaſter and Trinity-Term, 5 Car.

7. Reſolved, &c. That Sir Nicholas Hyde, then Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench, is guilty of this delay.

8. Reſolved, &c. That Sir William Jones, being then one of the Juſtices of the Court of King's-Bench, is guilty of this delay.

9. Reſolved, &c. That Sir James Whitlocke Knt. then one of the Juſtices of the Court of King's-Bench, is not guilty of this delay *.

Ordered, That the further debate of this ſhall be taken into conſideration on to-morrow morning.

July 8. 1641.

10. Reſolved upon the Queſtion, That Sir George Croke Knight, then one of the Judges of the King's-Bench, is not guilty of this delay.

11. That the continuance of Mr. Holles, and the reſt of the Members of Parliament, 3 Car. in priſon, by the then Judges of the King's-Bench, for not putting in Sureties for their good behaviour, was without juſt or legal cauſe.

12. That the exhibiting of the information againſt Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, in the King's-Bench, being Members of Parliament, for matters done in Parliament, was a breach of the Privilege of Parliament.

13. That the over-ruling of the Plea, pleaded by Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, upon the information to the juriſdiction of the Court, was againſt the Law, and Privilege of Parliament.

14. That the judgment given upon a Nihil dicit, againſt Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, and Fine thereupon impoſed, and their ſeveral impriſonments thereupon, was againſt the Law and Privilege of Parliament.

15. That the ſeveral proceedings againſt Mr. Holles, and the reſt, by committing them, and proſecuting them in the Star-Chamber, and in the King's-Bench, is a grievance.

16. That Mr. Holles, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Valentine, and Mr. Long, and the Heirs and Executors of Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, and Sir Peter Heyman, reſpectively, ought to have reparation for their reſpective damages and ſufferings, againſt the Lords and others of the Council, by whoſe warrants they were apprehended and committed, and againſt the Council that put their hands to the information in the Star-Chambar, and againſt the Judges of the King's-Bench.

17. That Mr. Laurence Whitaker, being a Member of the Parliament 3 Car. entring into the Chamber of Sir John Elliot, being likewiſe a Member of the Parliament, ſearching of his trunks and papers, and ſealing of them, is guilty of the breach of the Privilege of Parliament, this being done before the diſſolution of Parliament.

18. Reſolved upon the Queſtion, That Mr. Laurence Whitaker being guilty of the breach of the Privileges as aforeſaid, ſhall be ſent forthwith to the Tower, there to remain a priſoner during the pleaſure of the Houſe.

Mr. Whitaker was called down, and kneeling at the Bar, Mr. Speaker pronounced this ſentence againſt him accordingly.

Mr. Whitaker being at the Bar, did not deny, but that he did ſearch and ſeal up the Chamber, and Trunk, and Study of Sir John Elliot, between the ſecond and tenth of March, during which time the Parliament was adjourned: But endeavoured to extenuate it, by the confuſion of the times, at that time; the length of the time ſince that crime was committed, being thirteen years; the command that lay upon him, being commanded by the King and twenty three Privy-Counſellors.

Afterwards Mr. Recorder Glyn made a farther report to the Houſe of Commons, viz.

The warrant, which iſſued and was ſubſcribed by twelve Privy-Counſellors, to ſummon nine of the Members of the Houſe of Commons, in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli, to appear before them during the Parliament, viz. Mr. William Stroud, Mr. Benjamin Valentine, Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. Selden, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Heyman, Mr. Walter Long, and Mr. William Coriton, bearing date Tertio Martii, Quarto Caroli; and the names of the twelve Privy-Counſellors that ſigned this warrant were read: the Parliament being adjourned the ſecond of March, to the tenth of March, and then diſſolved.

The warrants under the hands of ſixteen Privy-Counſellors, for committing of Mr. Denzil Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. John Selden, Mr. Benjamin Valentine, and Mr. William Coriton, cloſe priſoners to the Tower, bearing date, Quarto Martii, Quarto Caroli, during the Parliament, were read. And the names of the Privy-Counſellors that ſubſcribed them, were read. The warrants under the hands of twenty two Privy-Counſellors, directed to William Boſwel Eſq; to repair to the Lodgings of Denzil Holles Eſq; and to Simon Digby Eſq; to repair to the Lodgings of Mr. John Selden, and to Laurence Whitaker Eſq; to repair to the Lodgings of Sir John Elliot, requiring them to ſeal up the trunks, ſtudies, and cabinets, or any other thing that had any papers in them, of the ſaid Mr. Holles, Mr. John Selden, and Sir John Elliot, were read, and likewiſe the names of the Privy-Counſellors that ſubſcribed the ſaid warrants. A Warrant under the hands of thirteen Privy-Counſellors, for the commitment of Mr. William Stroud cloſe Priſoner to the King's-Bench, bearing date 2 April,

* Mr. Whitlocke in his Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, p. 38, 39. ſays, In the Houſe there fell out a Debate touching the Writs of Habeas Corpus, upon which Selden and the reſt of his Fellow-priſoners, demanded to be bailed; and the Judges of the King's-Bench did not bail them, as by Law they ought; but required of them Sureties for their good behaviour. This was ſo far aggravated by ſome, that they moved, The Priſoners might have reparation out of the Eſtates of thoſe Judges who then ſat in the King's-Bench when they were remanded to priſon; which Judges they named to be Hyde, Jones, and my Father: as for Judge Croke, who was one of that Court, they excuſed him, as differing in Opinion from the reſt.

I being a Member of the Houſe, and Son to the Judge, knew this to be miſtaken, as to the fact, and ſpake in the behalf of my Father, to this effect:

" That it was not unknown to divers worthy Members of the Houſe, that Judge Whitlocke had been a faithful, able, and ſtout " Aſſertor of the Rights and Liberties of the free-born Subjects of this Kingdom; for which he had been many ways a Sufferer. " And particularly by a ſtraight and cloſe Impriſonment, for what he ſaid and did, as a Member of this Honourable Houſe in a " former Parliament: and he appeals to thoſe noble Gentlemen, who cannot but remember thoſe paſſages; and ſome, who were " then Sufferers with him. And for his Opinion, and Carriage in the Caſe of the Habeas Corpus, 'tis affirmed to have been the " ſame with that of Judge Croke; and he appeals for this, to the honourable Gentlemen, who were concerned in it; and others, " who were preſent then in Court." Hampden, and divers others ſeconded this Motion; who affirmed very much of the Matter of Fact, and expreſſed themſelves with great Reſpect and Honour to the Memory of the deceaſed Judge, who was thereupon reckoned by the Houſe in the ſame degree with Judge Croke, as to their Cenſure and Proceedings.

April, 1628. was read, and the names of the Privy-Counſellors that ſubſcribed it: The like warrant was for the commitment of Mr. Walter Long cloſe priſoner to the Marſhalſea.

Reſolved, &c. That Mr. Holles ſhall have the ſum of five thouſand pounds, for his damages, loſſes, impriſonments and ſufferings, ſuſtained and undergone by him, for his ſervice done to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That Mr. John Selden ſhall have the ſum of five thouſand pounds, for his damages, loſſes, impriſonments, and ſufferings, ſuſtained and undergone by him, for his ſervice done to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That the ſum of five thouſand pounds be aſſigned for the damages, loſſes, impriſonments and ſufferings, ſuſtained and undergone by Sir John Elliot, for his ſervice done to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli, to be diſpoſed of in ſuch manner as this Houſe ſhall appoint.

Reſolved, &c. That the ſum of two thouſand pounds, part of four thouſand pounds, paid into the late Court of Wards and Liveries, by the Heirs of Sir John Elliot, by reaſon of his Marriage with Sir Daniel Norton's Daughter, ſhall be repaid to Mr. Elliot, out of the arrears of moneys payable into the late Court of Wards and Liveries, before the taking away of the ſaid late Court.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee who brought in this Report, to examine the decree made in the late Court of Wards and Liveries, concerning the Marriage of Sir John Elliot's heir with Sir Daniel Norton's Daughter; and what moneys were paid by reaſon of the ſaid Decree, and by whom; and to report their opinion thereupon to the Houſe.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee to examine after what manner Sir John Elliot came to his death, his uſage in the Tower, and to view the rooms and places where he was impriſoned, and where he died, and to report the ſame to the Houſe.

Reſolved, &c. That the ſum of five thouſand pounds ſhall be paid unto the . . . . . of Sir Peter Heyman, for the damages, loſſes, ſufferings, and impriſonments, ſuſtained and undergone by Sir Peter Heyman, for his ſervice done to the Commonwealth in the Parliament in Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That Mr. Walter Long ſhall have the ſum of five thouſand pounds paid unto him, for the damages, loſſes, ſufferings, and impriſonment, ſuſtained and undergone by him, for his ſervice done to the Commonwealth in the Parliament Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That the ſum of five thouſand pounds ſhall be aſſigned for the damages, loſſes, ſufferings, and impriſonment, ſuſtained and undergone by Mr. Strode (late a Member of this Houſe) deceaſed, for ſervice done by him to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That Mr. Benjamin Valentine ſhall have the ſum of five thouſand pounds paid unto him, for the damages, loſſes, ſufferings, and impriſonments ſuſtained and undergone by him for his ſervice to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli.

Reſolved, &c. That the ſum of five hundred pounds ſhall be beſtowed and diſpoſed of, for the erecting a monument to Sir Miles Hobart, a Member of the Parliament of Tertio Caroli, in memory of his ſufferings for his ſervice to the Commonwealth in the Parliament of Tertio Caroli.

Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee, who brought in this report, to conſider, how the ſeveral ſums of money this day ordered to be paid for damages to the ſeveral Members beforenamed, for their ſufferings in the ſervice of the Commonwealth, may be raiſed.

In the Reign of King Charles II. this Affair was taken into conſideration, and the Houſe of Commons came to ſeveral Reſolutions.

Die Martis 12 Novembris 1667.

Upon a report made by Mr. Vaughan from the Committee concerning freedom of Speech in Parliament.

Reſolved, &c. That the Houſe do agree with the Committee, That the Act of Parliament in 4 Hen. VIII. commonly intitled, an Act concerning Richard Strode, is a general Law, extending to indemnify all and every the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, in all Parliaments, for and touching any bills, ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters in and concerning the Parliament to be communed and treated of, and is a declaratory Law of the antient and neceſſary Rights and Privileges of Parliament.

Die Sabbati 23 Novembris 1667.

Reſolved, &c. That the Judgment given 5 Car. againſt Sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis, and Benj. Valentine in the King's-Bench, is an illegal Judgment, and againſt the Freedom and Privilege of Parliament.

Die Sabbati 7 Decembris 1667.

Reſolved, &c. That the concurrence of the Lords be deſired to the Votes of this Houſe concerning Freedom of Speech in Parliament; and that a conference be on Monday next deſired to be had with the Lords, at which time the Votes may be delivered, and reaſons for them given.

Die Jovis 12 Decembris 1667.

A Meſſage from the Lords by Sir William Child and Sir Thomas Eſtcourt.

Mr. Speaker,

The Lords have commanded us to acquaint you, that they agree with this Houſe in the Votes delivered them at the laſt conference concerning Freedom of Speech in Parliament.

Die Mercurii 11 Decembris 1667.

Next, the Lord-Chamberlain and the Lord Aſhley reported the effect of the conference with the Houſe of Commons yeſterday, which was managed by Mr. Vaughan, who ſaid he was commanded by the Houſe of Commons to acquaint their Lordſhips with ſome Reſolves of their Houſe concerning the freedom of ſpeech in Parliament, and to deſire their Lordſhips concurrence therein.

In order to which, he was to acquaint their Lordſhips with the reaſons that induced the Houſe of Commons to paſs thoſe Reſolves.

He ſaid the Houſe of Commons was accidentally informed of certain Books publiſhed under the name of Sir George Croke's Reports, in one of which there was a caſe publiſhed, which did very much concern this great privilege of Parliament: and which paſſing from hand to hand amongſt the men of the Long Robe, might come in time to be a received opinion as good Law.

The Houſe of Commons conſidering the conſequence, did take care that this caſe might be inquired to, and cauſed the Book to be produced, and read in their Houſe, and he thought it the next and cleareſt way to inform their Lordſhips, is to read the caſe itſelf, which is Quinto Caroli primi Michaelmas Term, which caſe was read as followeth.

The King verſus Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine.

AN information was exhibited againſt them by the Attorney-General, reciting, That a Parliament was ſummoned to be held at Weſtminſter, 17 Martii 3 Caroli Regis ibidem inchoat. And that Sir John Elliot was duly elected and returned Knight for the County of Cornwall, and the other two Burgeſſes of Parliament for other places; and Sir John Finch choſen Speaker. That Sir John Elliot, machinans & intendens omnibus viis & modis ſeminare & excitare diſcord, evil will, murmurings, and ſeditions, as well verſus Regem, magnates, prælatos, proceres & juſticiarios, & reliquos ſubjectos Regis, & totaliter deprivare & ſubvertere regimen & gubernationem Regni Angliæ, tam in domino Rege quam in conciliariis & miniſtris ſuis cujuſcunque generis, & introducere tumultum & confuſionem in all eſtates and parts, & ad intentionem, that all the King's Subjects ſhould withdraw their affections from the King, the 23*d* of Febr. Anno 4 Car. in the Parliament, and hearing of the Commons, falſo, malitioſe, & ſeditioſe uſed theſe words, The King's Privy-Council, his Judges, and his Counſel learned, have conſpired together to trample under their feet the Liberties of the Subjects of this Realm, and the Liberties of this Houſe.

And afterwards upon the ſecond of March, Anno 4. aforeſaid, the King appointed the Parliament to be adjourned until the 10*th* of March next following, and ſo ſignified his pleaſure to the Houſe of Commons; and that the three Defendants the ſaid ſecond day of March, 4 Car. malitioſe agreed, and amongſt themſelves conſpired to diſturb and diſtract the Commons, that they ſhould not adjourn themſelves according to the King's pleaſure before ſignified; and that the ſaid Sir John Elliot, according to the agreement and conſpiracy aforeſaid, had maliciouſly in propoſitum & intentionem prædictam in the Houſe of Commons aforeſaid, ſpoken theſe falſe, pernicious, and ſeditious words precedent, &c. And that the ſaid Denzil Holles, according to the agreement and conſpiracy aforeſaid, between him and the other Defendants, then and there falſo, malitioſe, & ſeditioſe uttered hæc falſa, malitioſa & ſcandaloſa verba præcedentia, &c. And that the ſaid Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine ſecundum agreamentum & conſpirationem pædict. &c. ad intentionem & propoſitum prædict. uttered the ſaid words upon the ſaid 2*d* day of March, after the ſignifying the King's pleaſure to adjourn; and the ſaid Sir John Finch, the Speaker, endeavouring to get out of the chair, according to the King's command, they vi & armis manu forti & illicito aſſaulted, evil intreated, and forcibly detained him in the chair; and afterwards being out of the chair they aſſaulted him in the houſe, and evil entreated him, & violenter manu forti & illicito drew him to the chair, and thruſt him into it. Whereupon there was great tumult and commotion in the houſe, to the great terror of the Commons there aſſembled, againſt their allegiance in maximum contemptum, and to the diſheriſon of the King, his Crown and Dignity, for which &c. To this information the Defendants appearing, pleaded to the juriſdiction of this Court, that the Court ought not to have cognizance thereof, becauſe it is for offences done in Parliament, and ought to be there examined and puniſhed, and not elſewhere. It was thereupon demurred, and after argument adjudged, that they ought to anſwer; for the charge is for conſpiracy, ſeditious acts and practices, to ſtop the adjournment of the Parliament, which may be examined out of Parliament, being ſeditious and unlawful Acts; and this Court may take cognizance and puniſh them: afterwards divers rules being given againſt them, viz. Sir John Eliot, that he ſhould be committed to the Tower, and ſhould pay 2000 l. fine, and upon his enlargement ſhould find ſureties for his good behaviour; and againſt Holles, that he ſhould pay a thouſand Marks, and ſhould be impriſoned, and find ſureties, &c. And againſt Valentine, that he ſhould pay 500 l. fine, be impriſoned and find ſureties.

Then Mr. Vaughan laid much emphaſis upon the word machinans & intendens, &c. and then went on, That the Houſe of Commons had not only read the caſe as it was in the Book, but did look into the record, where in the Information itſelf they found ſome conſiderable differences from the print; as that the crime alledged conſiſting partly of words ſpoken in the Houſe, partly of criminal actions pretended to be committed; the Gentlemen accuſed pleaded ſeverally, namely, ſpecially to the words, and a ſeveral Plea apart to the criminal actions: but the Court dealt ſo craftily, that they over-ruled the whole Plea, mingled together and took it in general, ſo that perhaps whatſoever was criminal in the actions might ſerve for a juſtification of their rule, and might make it ſeem in time to become a precedent, and a ruled caſe againſt the liberty of ſpeech in Parliament, which they durſt not ſingly and bare-fac'd have done.

The Houſe of Commons did take care to enquire what ancient Laws did fortify this the greateſt privilege of both Houſes, and they found in the fourth year of Henry VIII. an Act concerning one Richard Strode, who was a Member of Parliament, and was fined at the Stannary Courts in the Weſt, for condeſcending and agreeing with other Members of the Houſe to paſs certain Acts to the prejudice of the Stannaries; this Act was made occaſionally for him, but did reach to every Member of Parliament that then was, or ſhall be; the very words being, viz.

[And over that, it be enacted by the ſame authority that all Suits, Accuſements, Condemnations, Executions, Fines, Amercements, Puniſhments, Corrections, Grievances, Charges and Impoſitions, put or had, or hereafter to be put or had unto, or upon the ſaid Richard, and to every other perſon or perſons afore-ſpecified that now be of this preſent Parliament, or that of any Parliament hereafter ſhall be, for any bill, ſpeaking, reaſoning or declaring of any matter or matters concerning the Parliament to be commenced and treated of, be utterly void, and of none effect. And over that, be it enacted by the ſaid authority, that if the ſaid Richard Strode, or any of the ſaid other perſon or perſons hereafter be vexed, troubled, or otherwiſe charged for any cauſes as is aforeſaid, that then he or they, and every of them ſo vexed or troubled of, or for the ſame, to have action upon the caſe againſt every ſuch perſon or perſons ſo vexing or troubling any, contrary to this ordinance and proviſion; in the which action the party grieved ſhall recover treble damages and coſts; and that no protection, eſſoyne, nor wager of Law in the ſaid action in any wiſe be admitted nor received.]

He ſaid, 'tis very poſſible the Plea of thoſe worthy perſons, Denzil Holles, Sir John Elliot, and the reſt, was not ſufficient to the Juriſdiction of the Court, if you take in their criminal actions all together; but, as to the words ſpoken in Parliament, the Court could have no Juriſdiction while this Act of 4 Hen. VIII. is in force, which extends to all Members that then were (or ever ſhould be) as well as Strode; and was a publick general Law, though made upon a private and a particular occaſion.

He recommended to their Lordſhips the conſideration of the time when theſe words in the caſe of Sir George Croke's Reports were ſpoken, which was the ſecond of March, 4 Caroli primi, being in that Parliament which began in the precedent March, 3 Car. at which time the Judgment given in the King's-Bench about the Habeas Corpus was newly reverſed, which concerned the freedom of our perſons, the liberty of Speech invaded in this caſe; and not long after the ſame Judges (with ſome others) joined with them in the caſes of Ship-money, invaded the Propriety of our Goods and Eſtates; ſo that their Lordſhips find every part of theſe words for which thoſe worthy perſons were accuſed, juſtified.

If any man ſhould ſpeak againſt any of the great Officers, as the Chancellor or Treaſurer, or any of the reſt recited in thoſe Acts, as by accuſing them of Corruption, ill Counſel, or the like, he might poſſibly juſtify himſelf by proving of it; but in this caſe it was impoſſible to do it, becauſe thoſe Judgments had preceded and concluded him, for he could make none, but by alledging their own Judgments which they themſelves had reſolved, and would not therefore allow to be Crimes, which they had made for Laws.

He did inform their Lordſhips, that the Bill in the Rolls hath another title than that he did mention; this being that, that the Clerks knew it by, rather than the proper Title.

The words in the caſe are charged ea intentione, which ought not to be; for it is clear, and undoubted Law, that whatever is in itſelf lawful, cannot have an unlawful intent annexed to it. Things unlawful may be made a higher crime by the illneſs of the intent; for inſtance, taking away my Horſe is a Treſpaſs only, but intending to ſteal him makes it Felony; borrowing my Horſe, though intending to ſteal him, is not Felony, becauſe borrowing is lawful; and there were no uſe of freedom of Speech otherwiſe, for a depraved intention may be annexed to any the moſt juſtifiable action. If a man eat no fleſh, he may be accuſed for the depraved intention of bringing in the Pythagorean religion, and ſubverting the Chriſtian: If a man drink water, he may be accuſed of the depraved intention of ſubverting the King's Government, by deſtroying his Revenue both of Exciſe and Cuſtom.

No man can make a doubt, but whatſoever is once enacted is lawful; but nothing can come into an Act of Parliament, but it muſt be firſt offered or propounded by ſomebody, ſo that if the Act can wrong no body, no more can the firſt propounding; the Members muſt be as free as the Houſes. An Act of Parliament cannot diſturb the State, therefore the Debate that tends to it cannot, for it muſt be propounded and debated, before it can be enacted.

In the reign of Henry the eighth, when there were ſo many Perſons taken by Act of Parliament out of the Lords Houſe, as the Abbots and Priors, and all the Religious Houſes and Lands taken away; it had been a ſtrange information againſt any Member of Parliament then, for propounding ſo great an alteration in Church and State.

Beſides, Religion itſelf began then to be altered, and was perfected in the beginning of Edward the Sixth's reign, and returned again to Popery in the beginning of Queen Mary's; and the Proteſtant Religion reſtored again in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's.

Should a Member of Parliament, in any of theſe times, have been juſtly informed againſt in the King's-Bench for propounding or debating any of theſe alterations? So that their Lordſhips perceive the reaſons and inducements the Houſe of Commons had to paſs theſe Votes now preſented to their Lordſhips.

Afterwards theſe Votes were read, viz.

Reſolved, &c. That the Act of Parliament 4 Hen. VIII. commonly intitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, is a general Law, extending to indemnify all and every the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, in all Parliaments, for and touching any Bills, ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters in and concerning the Parliament, to be communed and treated of; and is a declaratory Law of the antient and neceſſary Rights and Privileges of Parliament.

Reſolved, &c. That the Judgment given 5 Car. againſt Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine Eſquires, in the King's-Bench, was an illegal Judgment, and againſt the Freedom and Privilege of Parliament.

To both which Votes the Lords agree with the Houſe of Commons.

Upon conſideration had this day of a Judgment given in the Court of King's-Bench in Michaelmas-Term, in the fifth year of King Charles the Firſt, againſt Sir John Elliot Knt. Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine Eſquires, which Judgment is found to be erroneous: It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That the ſaid Denzil Holles Eſq; (now Lord Holles, Baron of Ifeild) be deſired to cauſe the Roll of the Court of King's-Bench wherein the ſaid Judgment is recorded, to be brought before the Lords in Parliament by a Writ of Error, to the end that ſuch further Judgment may be given upon the ſaid caſe, as this Houſe ſhall find meet.

And not only theſe men who are actors themſelves, I mean the Jeſuits, but thoſe that are their great Maſters and Fautors, they have the power of the Law, and dare check Magiſtrates in the Execution of their duties; from them it comes that we ſuffer their guilt, and the fear of puniſhment that may befall them, brings us upon thoſe Rocks. There are among them ſome Prelates of the Church, the great Biſhop of* Wincheſter and his Fellows; it is apparent what they have done to caſt an aſperſion upon the Honour, Piety and Goodneſs of

of the King. Theſe are not all; but it is extended to ſome others, who, I fear, in guilt and conſcience of their own ill deſerts, do join their power with that Biſhop, and the reſt, to draw his Majeſty into a jealouſy of the Parliament; amongſt them I ſhall not fear to name the Great Lord-Treaſurer, in whoſe perſon is, I fear, contracted all that which we ſuffer. If we look into religion and policy, I find him building upon the ground laid by the Duke of Bucks, his great Maſter; from him, I fear, came thoſe ill Counſels which contracted that unhappy concluſion of the laſt Seſſion of Parliament. And whoſoever ſhall go about to break Parliaments, Parliaments will break him! I find that not only in the affections of his Heart, but alſo in relation to him, he is the head of the Papiſts. They and their Prieſts and Jeſuits have all relation to him, and I doubt not to fix it indubitably upon him; and ſo from the greatneſs and power of him comes the danger of our Religion. For policy in that great Queſtion of Tonnage and Poundage; that intereſt that is pretended to be the King's, is but the intereſt of that Perſon to undermine the policy of this Government, and thereby to weaken the Kingdom. It was the Counſel of Hoſpitales Chancellor to Charles the Ninth, King of France, that the way to weaken this Kingdom was to impeach the Trade of it, and ſo to lay our walls waſte and open. And I doubt not, but by the diſquiſition of a few days to prove that his labours are to undermine us; That he invites Strangers to come in to drive our Trade, or at leaſt our Merchants to trade in ſtrange bottoms, which is as dangerous; and this is that which imprints this fear in his perſon, and make him to miſinterpret our proceedings to his Majeſty. Now therefore it will be fit for true Engliſhmen to perform their duties, and to ſhew their deſire of the ſafety both of the King and Kingdom, and to reſolve to defend the ſincerity of our Religion, and to declare our reſolutions alſo for the defence of the right of the Subject, whereby we may declare ourſelves to be Freemen, and ſo the more wealthy and able to ſupply his Majeſty upon all occaſions. And that we ſhould declare all that we have ſuffered, to be the effect of new Counſels to the ruin of the Government of this State, and to make a proteſtation againſt all thoſe men, whether greater or ſubordinate, that they ſhall all be declared as capital enemies to the King and Kingdom, that will perſuade the King to take Tonnage and Poundage without Grant of Parliament. And that if any Merchants ſhall willingly pay thoſe Duties without conſent of Parliament, they ſhall be declared as Acceſſaries to the reſt. Quodque pred. D. [Written by John Lilburn.]

UPON Tueſday the 11th or 12th of December, 1637, I was treacherouſly and Judaſly betrayed (by one that I ſuppoſed to be my friend) into the hands of the Purſuivant, with four of his aſſiſtants, as I was walking in Soper-lane, with one John Chilburne, ſervant to old Mr. John Wharton, in Bow-lane, a Hot-preſſer.

And about twelve of the Clock the next day, I was committed to the Gatehouſe, by Sir John Lamb, the Prelate of Canterbury's Chancellor, with others, without any examination at all, for ſending of factious and ſcandalous Books out of Holland into England. And having not been at the foreſaid priſon above three days, I was removed, by a warrant from the Lords of the Council to the Fleet, where I now remain. And after my being there ſome time, I drew a Petition to the Lords of the Council for my liberty: and their anſwer to it was, that I ſhould be examined before Sir John Banks, the King's Attorney: The copy of which examination, thus follows.

Upon Tueſday the 14th of January, 1637. I was had to Sir John Banks the Attorney-General's Chamber, (now Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Court of Pleas) and was referred to be examined by Mr. Cockſhey his chief Clerk; and at our firſt coming together, he did kindly intreat me, and made me ſit down by him, and put on my hat, and began with me after this manner: Mr. Lilburn, what is your Chriſtian name? I ſaid John. Did you live in London before you went into Holland? Yes, that I did. Where? Near London-ſtone? With whom there? With Mr. Thomas Hewſon. What Trade is he? A dealer in Cloth, I told him. How long did you ſerve him? About five years. How came you to part? After this manner: I perceiving my Maſter had an intention to leave off his Trade, I often moved him that I might have my liberty, to provide for myſelf, and at the laſt he condeſcended unto it; and ſo I went into the Country, to have the conſent of my friends; and after that went into Holland. Where were you there? At Rotterdam. And from thence you went to Amſterdam? Yes, I was at Amſterdam. What Books did you ſee in Holland? Great ſtore of Books, for in every Bookſeller's ſhop as I came in, there were great ſtore of Books. I know that, but I ask you, if you did ſee Dr. Baſtwick's Anſwer to my Maſter's Information, and a Book called his Litany? Yes, I ſaw them there; and if you pleaſe to go thither, you may buy an hundred of them at the Bookſellers, if you have a mind to them. Have you ſeen the Unbiſhoping of Timothy and Titus, the Looking-glaſs, and a Breviate of the Biſhops late Proceedings? Yes, I have, and thoſe alſo you may have there, if you pleaſe to ſend for them. Who printed all thoſe Books? I do not know. Who was at the charges of printing them? Of that I am ignorant. But did you not ſend over ſome of theſe Books?

Lilburn. I ſent not any of them over. Do you know one Harguſt there? Yes, I did ſee ſuch a man. Where did you ſee him? I met with him one day accidentally at Amſterdam. How oft did you ſee him there? Twice upon one day. But did not he ſend over Books? If he did, it is nothing to me, for his doings are unknown to me. But he wrote a Letter, by your directions, did he not? What he writ over I know no more than you. But did you ſee him no where elſe there? Yes, I ſaw him at Rotterdam. What conference had you with him? Very little. But why do you ask me all theſe queſtions? theſe are beſide the matter of my impriſonment; I pray come to the thing for which I am accuſed, and impriſoned. No, theſe are not beſide the buſineſs, but do belong to the thing for which you are impriſoned. But do you know of any that ſent over any Books?

Lilburn. What other men did, doth not belong to me to know or ſearch into; ſufficient it is for me to look well to my own occaſions. Well, here is the examination of one Edmund Chillington, do you know ſuch a one? Yes. How long have you been acquainted with him? A little before I went away, but how long, I do not certainly know. Do you know one John Wharton? No? Do you not? He is a Hot-preſſer. I know him, but I do not well remember his other name. How long have you been acquainted with him, him, and how came you acquainted? I cannot well tell you. How long do you think? I do not know. What ſpeeches had you with Chillington ſince you came to town? I am not bound to tell you: but Sir (as I ſaid before) why do you ask me all theſe queſtions; theſe are nothing pertinent to my impriſonment, for I am not impriſoned for knowing and talking with ſuch and ſuch men, but for ſending over Books; and therefore I am not willing to anſwer you to any more of theſe queſtions, becauſe I ſee you go about by this examination to inſnare me: for ſeeing the things for which I am impriſoned cannot be proved againſt me, you would get other matter out of my examination; and therefore if you will not ask me about the thing laid to my charge, I ſhall anſwer no more. But if you will ask of that, I ſhall then anſwer you, and do anſwer, that for the thing for which I am impriſoned, which is for ſending over Books, I am clear, for I ſent none: and of any other matter that you have to accuſe me of, I know it is warrantable by the Law of God, and I think by the Law of the Land, that I may ſtand upon my juſt defence, and not anſwer to your interrogatories; and that my accuſers ought to be brought face to face, to juſtify what they accuſe me of. And this is all the anſwer that for the preſent I am willing to make: and if you ask me of any more things, I ſhall anſwer you with ſilence. At this he was exceeding angry, and ſaid, there would be a courſe taken with me to make me anſwer. I told him, I did not regard what courſe they would take with me; only this I deſire you to take notice of, that I do not refuſe to anſwer out of any contempt, but only becauſe I am ignorant of what belongs to an examination, (for this is the firſt time that ever I was examined;) and therefore I am unwilling to anſwer to any impertinent queſtions, for fear that with my anſwer, I may do myſelf hurt.

This is not the way to get liberty: I had thought you would have anſwered punctually, that ſo you might have been diſpatched as ſhortly as might be.

Lilburn. I have anſwered punctually to the thing for which I am impriſoned, and more I am not bound to anſwer, and for my liberty I muſt wait God's time.

You had better anſwer, for I have two examinations wherein you are accuſed. Lilburn. Of what am I accuſed? Chillington hath accuſed you for printing, ten or twelve thouſand of Books in Holland, and that they ſtand you in about eighty pound, and that you had a Chamber at Mr. John Foot's, at Delft, where he thinks the Books were kept, and that you would have printed the Unmasking of the Myſtery of Iniquity, if you could have got a true Copy of it. I do not believe that Chillington ſaid any ſuch things; and if he did, I know, and am ſure, that they are all of them lyes. You received money of Mr. Wharton ſince you came to Town, did you not? What if I did? It was for Books? I do not ſay ſo. For what ſort of Books was it? I do not ſay it was for any, and I have already anſwered you all, that for the preſent I have to anſwer; and if that will give you content, well and good; if not, do what you pleaſe. If you will not anſwer no more (here I told him, if I had thought he would have inſiſted upon ſuch impertinent queſtions, I would not have given him ſo many anſwers) we have power to ſend you to the place from whence you came. You may do your pleaſure, ſaid I. So he called in anger for my Keeper, and gave him a ſtrict charge to look well to me. I ſaid, they ſhould not fear my running away. And ſo I was ſent down to Sir John Banks himſelf. And after he had read over what his man had writ, he called me in, and ſaid, I perceive you are unwilling to confeſs the truth.

Lilburn. No, Sir, I have ſpoken the truth. Sir John Banks. This is your examination, is it not? What your man hath writ, I do not know. Come near, and ſee that I read it right. Sir, I do not own it for my examination, for your man hath writ what it pleaſed him, and hath not writ my anſwer; for my anſwer was to him, and ſo it is to you, that for the thing for which I am impriſoned (which is for ſending over Books) I am clear, for I did not ſend any, and for any other matter that is laid to my charge, I know it is warrantable by the Law of God, and I think by the Law of the Land, for me to ſtand upon my juſt defence, and that my accuſers ought to be brought face to face, to juſtify what they accuſe me of: and this is all that I have to ſay for the preſent. You muſt ſet your hand to this your examination. I beſeech you, Sir, pardon me, I will ſet my hand to nothing but what I have now ſaid. So he took the pen and writ, "The examined "is unwilling to anſwer to any thing but that for "which he is impriſoned." Now you will ſet your hand to it? I am not willing, in regard I do not own that which your man hath writ; but if it pleaſe you to lend me the pen, I will write my anſwer, and ſet my hand to it. So he gave me the pen, and I begun to write thus: "The anſwer of me John Lilburn "is," and here he took the pen from me, and ſaid he could not ſtay, that was ſufficient. Then one of my Keepers asked him if they might have me back again? and he ſaid yea: for he had no order for my inlargement.

And about ten or twelve days after, I was had forth to Grays-Inn again; and when I came there, I was had to the Star-Chamber office; and being there, as the order is, I muſt enter my appearance, they told me? I ſaid, to what? For I was never ſerved with any Subpœna; neither was there any Bill preferred againſt me, that I did hear of. One of the Clerks told me, I muſt firſt be examined, and then Sir John would make the Bill. It ſeems they had no grounded matter againſt me for to write a Bill, and therefore they went about to make me betray my own innocency, that ſo they might ground the Bill upon my own words: and at the entrance of my appearance, the Clerk and I had a deal of diſcourſe, (the particulars whereof for brevity ſake I now omit;) but in the concluſion he demanded money of me, for entring of my appearance: and I told him I was but a young man, and a priſoner, and money was not very plentiful with me, and therefore I would not part with any money upon ſuch terms. Well (ſaid he) if you will not pay your fee, I will daſh out your name again. Do what you pleaſe (ſaid I) I care not if you do; ſo he made complaint to Mr. Goad, the Maſter of the Office, that I refuſed to enter my appearance. And then I was brought before him, and he demanded of me what my buſineſs was? I told him, I had no buſineſs with him, but I was a priſoner in the Fleet, and was ſent for, but to whom and to what end I do not know, and therefore if he had nothing to ſay to me, I had no buſineſs with him. And then one of the Clerks ſaid, I was to be examined. Then Mr. Goad ſaid, Tender him the Book: ſo I looked another way, as though I did not give ear to what he ſaid; and then he bid me pull off my Glove, and lay my hand upon the Book. What to do, Sir? Said I. You muſt ſwear, ſaid he. To what? That you ſhall make true anſwer to all things that are asked you. Muſt I ſo, Sir? but before I ſwear, I will know to what I muſt ſwear. As ſoon as you have ſworn, you ſhall, but not before. To that I anſwered, Sir, I am but a young man, and do not well know what belongs to the nature of an Oath, and therefore before I ſwear, I will be better adviſed. Saith he, how old are you? About twenty years old, I told him. You have received the Sacrament, have you not? Yes, that I have. And you have heard the Miniſters deliver God's word, have you not? Yes, I have heard Sermons. Well then, you know the holy Evangeliſts? Yes, that I do. But Sir, though I have received the Sacrament, and have heard Sermons, yet it doth not therefore follow that I am bound to take an Oath, which I doubt of the lawfulneſs of. Look you here, ſaid he, (and with that, he opened the Book,) we deſire you to ſwear by no foreign thing, but to ſwear by the holy Evangeliſts. Sir, I do not doubt or queſtion that; I queſtion how lawful it is for me to ſwear to I do not know what. So ſome of the Clerks began to reaſon with me, and told me every one took that Oath; and would I be wiſer than all other men? I told them, it made no matter to me what other men do; but before I ſwear, I will know better grounds and reaſons than other mens practices, to convince me of the lawfulneſs of ſuch an Oath, to ſwear I do not know to what. So Mr. Goad bid them hold their peace, he was not to convince any man's Conſcience of the lawfulneſs of it, but only to offer and tender it. Will you take it or no, ſaith he? Sir, I will be better adviſed firſt; Whereupon there was a Meſſenger ſent to Sir John Banks, to certify him, that I would not take the Star-Chamber Oath. And alſo to know of him what ſhould be done with me. So I looked I ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner, or worſe. And about an hour after came Mr. Cockſhey, Sir John's chief Clerk: What (ſaid he) Mr. Lilburn, it ſeems you will not take your Oath, to make true anſwer? I told him, I would be better adviſed before I took ſuch an Oath. Well then (ſaith he) you muſt go from whence you came.

Upon Friday the 9th of February, in the morning, one of the Officers of the Fleet came to my Chamber, and bid me get up and make me ready to go to the Star Chamber-Bar forthwith. I having no time to fit myſelf, made me ready in all haſte to go. And being at the bar, Sir John Banks laid a verbal accuſation againſt me; which was, that I refuſed to anſwer, and alſo to enter my appearance, and that I refuſed to take the Star-Chamber Oath: and then was read the Affidavit of one Edmond Chillington, Button-ſeller, made againſt Mr. John Wharton and myſelf; the ſum of which was, that he and I had printed at Rotterdam in Holland, Dr. Baſtwick's Anſwer, and his Litany, and divers other ſcandalous Books. And then after I had obtained leave to ſpeak, I ſaid, My noble Lords, as for that Affidavit, it is a moſt falſe lye and untruth.

Lord-Keeper. Why will you not anſwer? Lilburn. My honourable Lord, I have anſwered fully before Sir John Banks to all things that belong to me to anſwer unto; and for other things, which concern other men, I have nothing to do with them. But why do you refuſe to take the Star-Chamber Oath? Moſt noble Lord, I refuſed upon this ground, becauſe that when I was examined, though I had fully anſwered all things that belonged to me to anſwer unto, and had cleared myſelf of the thing for which I am impriſoned, which was for ſending Books out of Holland, yet that would not ſatisfy and give content, but other things were put unto me, concerning other men, to inſnare me, and get further matter againſt me; which I perceiving, refuſed, being not bound to anſwer to ſuch things as do not belong unto me. And withal I perceived the Oath to be an Oath of inquiry; and for the lawfulneſs of which Oath, I have no warrant, and upon theſe grounds I did, and do ſtill refuſe the Oath. Upon this ſome of the King's Counſel, and ſome of the Lords ſpoke: Would I condemn and contradict the laws of the land, and be wiſer than all other men, to refuſe that, which is the Oath of the Court, adminiſtred unto all that come there? Lord-Keeper. Well; tender him the Book. I ſtanding againſt the Prelate of Canterbury's back, he looked over his ſhoulder at me, and bid me pull off my glove, and lay my hand upon the Book. Unto whom I replied, Sir, I will not ſwear; and then directing my ſpeech unto the Lords, I ſaid, Moſt honourable and noble Lords, with all reverence and ſubmiſſion unto your Honours, ſubmitting my body unto your Lordſhips pleaſure, and whatſoever you pleaſe to inflict upon it, yet muſt I refuſe the Oath. My Lords, ſaid the Arch-Prelate (in a deriding manner) do you hear him, he ſaith, with all reverence and ſubmiſſion he refuſeth the Oath. Well come, come (ſaid my Lord-Keeper) ſubmit yourſelf unto the Court.

Lilburn. Moſt noble Lords, with all willingneſs I ſubmit my body unto your Honours pleaſure; but for any other ſubmiſſion, moſt Honourable Lords, I am conſcious unto myſelf, that I have done nothing that doth deſerve a convention before this illuſtrious Aſſembly; and therefore for me to ſubmit, is to ſubmit I do not know wherefore.

Earl of Dorſet. My Lords, this is one of their private ſpirits; do you hear him, how he ſtands in his own juſtification? Well, my Lords, ſaid the great Prelate, this fellow (meaning me) hath been one of the notorioufeſt diſperſer of libellous Books that is in the Kingdom; and that is the Father of them all, (pointing to old Mr. Wharton.)

Lilburn. Sir, I know you are not able to prove, and to make that good which you have ſaid. I have teſtimony of it, ſaid he. Then ſaid I, produce them in the face of the open Court, that we may ſee what they have to accuſe me of; and I am ready here to anſwer for myſelf, and to make my juſt defence. With this he was ſilent, and ſaid not one word more to me: and then they asked my Fellow Soldier, old Mr. Wharton, whether he would take the Oath, which he refuſed, and began to tell them of the Biſhops cruelty towards him; and that they had had him in five ſeveral Priſons within theſe two years, for refuſing the Oath. And then there was ſilence, after which was read how the Court had proceeded againſt ſome that had harboured Jeſuits and Seminary-Prieſts (thoſe Traitors) who refuſed to be examined upon Oath; and in regard that we refuſed likewiſe to be examined upon Oath, it was fit, they ſaid, that we ſhould be proceeded againſt, as they were. So they were the precedent by which we were cenſured, though their cauſe and ours be much unlike, in regard theirs were little better than Treaſon; but our crime was ſo far from Treaſon, that it was neither againſt the glory of God, the honour of the King, the laws of the Land, nor the good of the Commonwealth: but rather for the maintaining of the honour of them all, as all thoſe that read the Books without partial affections and prejudicate hearts hearts, can witneſs and declare; and if the Books had had any Treaſon, or any thing againſt the Law of the Land in them, yet we were but ſuppoſedly guilty, for the things were never fully proved againſt us. Indeed there were two Oaths read in Court, which they ſaid were ſworn againſt us by one man, but he was never brought face to face, and in both his Oaths he hath forſworn himſelf, as in many particulars thereof we are both able to make good. In the concluſion, my Lord-Keeper ſtood up, and ſaid, My Lords, I hold it fit, that they ſhould be both for their contempt committed cloſe Priſoners till Tueſday next; and if they do not conform themſelves betwixt this and then to take the Oath, and yield to be examined before Mr. Goad, then that they ſhall be brought hither again, and cenſured, and made an example. Unto which they all agreed; and ſo we were commited cloſe Priſoners, and no Friends admitted to come unto us.

'UPon Information this day to this Honourable Court, by Sir John Banks Knight, his Majeſty's Attorney-General, That John Lilburn and John Wharton, who are now at the Bar of this Court, were the 24*th* of January laſt ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories touching their unlawful printing, publiſhing, and diſperſing of libellous and ſeditious Books, contrary to the Decree of this Court, which was verified by Affidavit: and being brought up to the Office to appear and be examined accordingly, the ſaid Lilburn refuſed to appear, and both of them denied to take an Oath to make anſwer to Interrogatories, as appears by Certificate of Mr. Goad: it was humbly prayed that their appearance may be recorded, they being now preſent in Court, and that they may now have their Oaths tendred unto them; which if they ſhall refuſe to take, that then this Court will proceed to a cenſure againſt them for their high contempt therein, as hath been uſed in like caſes, which the Court held fit: And hath therefore ordered, That their appearance ſhall be recorded, as is deſired. And for that the ſaid Delinquents do now again moſt contemptuouſly refuſe to take their Oaths now tendred to them in open Court, their Lordſhips have further ordered, That the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton ſhall be remanded to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain cloſe Priſoners until they conform themſelves in obedience to take their Oaths, and be examined; and that unleſs they do take their Oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday-night next, their Lordſhips will, on the laſt ſitting of this Term, proceed to cenſure againſt them for their contempts therein, as is deſired.'

And upon Monday after we were had to Gray's-Inn, and I being the firſt there, Mr. Goad ſaid to me, according to the Lords order upon Friday laſt, I have ſent for you to tender the Oath unto you. Sir, I beſeech you, let me hear the Lord's order. So he cauſed it to be read unto me, and then tendered me the Book. Well Sir, ſaid I, I am of the ſame mind I was; and withal I underſtand, that this Oath is one and the ſame with the High Commiſſion Oath, which Oath I know to be both againſt the Law of God, and the Law of the Land; and therefore in brief I dare not take the Oath, though I ſuffer death for the refuſal of it. Well, ſaid he, I did not ſend for you to diſpute with you about the lawfulneſs of it, but only according to my place to tender it unto you. Sir, I dare not take it, though I loſe my life for the refuſal of it. So he ſaid, he had no more to ſay to me; and I took my leave of him, and came away. And after that, came the old man, Mr. Wharton, and it was tendered unto him, which he refuſed to take: and (as he hath told me) he declared unto him how the Biſhops had him eight times in priſon for the refuſal of it, and he had ſuffered the Biſhops mercileſs cruelty for many years together, and he would now never take it as long as he lived; and withal told him, that if there were a Cart ready at the door to carry him to Tyburn, he would be hanged, before ever he would take it. And this was that day's buſineſs.

Upon the next morning, Feb. 13. about ſeven a-clock, we were had to the Star-Chamber Bar again, to receive our cenſure; and ſtood at the Bar about two hours before Sir John Banks came: but at laſt he began his accuſation againſt us, that we did ſtill continue in our former ſtubbornneſs. And alſo there was another Affidavit of the foreſaid Edmund Chillington's read againſt us; the ſum of which was, that I had confeſſed to him, that I had printed Dr. Baſtwick's Anſwer to Sir John Banks's Information, and his Litany; and another Book, An Anſwer unto certain Objections; and another Book of his called, The Vanity and Impiety of the old Litany; and that I had divers other Books of Dr. Baſtwick's a printing. And that Mr. John Wharton had been at the charges of Printing a Book called, A Breviate of the Biſhops late Proceedings; and another Book, called Sixteen new Queries, and divers other factious Books: and that one James Ouldam, a Turner in Weſtminſter-hall, had diſperſed divers of theſe Books. Then I ſaid after this manner: Moſt noble Lords, I beſeech your Honours, that you would be pleaſed to give me leave to ſpeak for myſelf, and to make my juſt defence; and I ſhall labour ſo to order my ſpeeches, that I ſhall not give your Honours any juſt diſtaſte; and withal ſhall do it with as much brevity as I can. So having obtained my deſire, I began and ſaid, My Lords, it ſeems there were divers Books ſent out of Holland, which came to the hands of one Edmund Chillington, who made this Affidavit againſt us: and, as I underſtand, he delivered divers of theſe Books unto one John Chilburne, ſervant to this old man Mr. Wharton; and his maſter being in priſon, he diſperſed divers of them for the foreſaid Chillington's uſe; whereupon the Books were taken in his cuſtody: he being found diſperſing of them, goes to one Smith, a Taylor in Bridewell, (as I am informed) and deſires him to get his peace made with the Biſhops. Whereupon he covenants with ſome of the Biſhops creatures, to betray me into their hands, being newly come out of Holland, which (as he ſaid) did ſend over theſe Books. So, my Lords, he having purchaſed his own liberty, lays the plot for betraying me, and I was taken by a Purſuivant and four others of his aſſiſtants, walking in the ſtreets with the foreſaid John Chilburne, who had laid and contrived the plot before, (as I am able to make good;) and the next morning I was committed by Sir John Lamb to the Gate-houſe. Now, my Lords, I do proteſt before your Honours on the word of a Chriſtian, that I did not ſend over theſe Books, neither did I know the Ship that brought them, nor any that belongs to the Ship, nor to my knowledge did never ſee with my eyes, either the Ship, or any that belongs unto it.

And being at the Gate-houſe, I was removed (by ſix of your Honours) to the Fleet, at which time the ſaid Chillington was removed from Bridewell to Newgate; and being kept cloſe there, he, by their threats and perſuaſions, and the procuring of his own liberty, goes and accuſes me for printing ten or twelve thouſand Books in Holland. And at my examination before Sir John Banks, I cleared myſelf of that; and upon Friday laſt he made an Affidavit againſt me, in which he hath moſt falſly forſworn himſelf, and to-day he hath made another, which is alſo a moſt falſe untruth: and withal, my Lords, he is known to be a notorious lying fellow, and hath accuſed me for the purchaſing of his own liberty, which he hath got. And therefore, I beſeech your Honours, to take it into your ſerious conſideration, whether I am to be cenſured upon ſuch a fellow's Affidavit or no. Then ſaid the Lord-Keeper, thou art a mad fellow, ſeeing things are thus, that thou wilt not take thine Oath, and anſwer truly.

My honourable Lord, I have declared unto you the real truth; but for the Oath, it is an Oath of Inquiry, and of the ſame nature as the High-Commiſſion Oath; which Oath I know to be unlawful; and withal I find no warrant in the word of God, for an Oath of Inquiry, and it ought to be the director of me in all things that I do: and therefore, my Lords at no hand, I dare not take the Oath. (When I named the word of God, the Court began to laugh, as though they had had nothing to do with it.) My Lords (ſaid Mr. Goad) he told me yeſterday, he durſt not take the Oath, though he ſuffered death for the refuſal of it. And with that my Lord Privy-Seal ſpoke: Will you (ſaid he) take your Oath, that that which you have ſaid is true? My Lord (ſaid I) I am but a young man, and do not well know what belongs to the nature of an Oath, (but that which I have ſaid, is a real truth) but thus much; by God's appointment, I know an Oath ought to be the end of all controverſy and ſtrife, Heb. vi. 16. and if it might be ſo in this my preſent cauſe, I would ſafely take my Oath, that what I have ſaid is true. So they ſpoke to the old man my fellow partner, and asked him whether he would take the Oath. So he deſired them to give him leave to ſpeak; and he begun to thunder it out againſt the Biſhops, and told them, they required three Oaths of the King's Subjects; namely, the Oath of Churchwardenſhip, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience, and the Oath ex Officio; which (ſaid he) are all againſt the Law of the Land, and by which they deceive and perjure thouſands of the King's Subjects in a year. And withal, my Lords, (ſaid he) there is a maxim in Divinity, that we ſhould prefer the glory of God, and the good of our King and Country, before our own lives. But the Lords wondring to hear the old man begin to talk after this manner, commanded him to hold his peace, and to anſwer them, whether he would take the Oath or no? To which he replied, and deſired them to let him talk a little, and he would tell them by and by. At which all the Court burſt out a laughing; but they would not let him go on, but commanded ſilence, (which if they would have let him proceed, he would have ſo pepper'd the Biſhops, as they were never in their lives in an open Court of Judicature.) So they asked us again, whether we would take the Oath? which we both again refuſed; and withal I told them, that for the reaſons before I durſt not take it. Then they ſaid, they would proceed to cenſure. I bid them do as they pleaſed, for I knew myſelf innocent of the thing for which I was impriſoned and accuſed; but yet notwithſtanding did ſubmit my body to their Honours pleaſure. So they cenſured us 500 l. apiece; and then ſtood up Judge Jones, and ſaid, it was fit, that I being a young man, for example ſake, ſhould have ſome corporal puniſhment inflicted upon me. So my cenſure was to be whipt, but neither time nor place allotted. And for the old man, in regard of his age, being eighty-five years old, they would ſpare his corporal puniſhment, though (ſaid they) he deſerves it as well as the other (meaning me) yet he ſhould ſtand upon the Pillory: but I could not underſtand or perceive by my cenſure, that I was to ſtand upon the Pillory. And when I came from the Bar, I ſpoke in an audible voice, and ſaid, My Lords, I beſeech God to bleſs your Honours, and to diſcover and make known unto you the wickedneſs and cruelty of the Prelates.

'WHereas, upon Information to this Court 'the ninth of this inſtant February, by Sir 'John Banks Knight, his Majeſty's Attorney-Gene- 'ral, that John Lilburn and John Wharton (then 'preſent at the Bar) were the 24th of January laſt 'ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories 'touching their unlawful printing, importing, 'publiſhing, and diſperſing of libellous and ſedi- 'tious Books, contrary to the Decree of this Court, 'which was verified by Affidavit; and being 'brought up to the Office to appear and be exa- 'mined, the ſaid Lilburn refuſed to appear, and 'both of them denied to take an Oath to make 'ſome anſwer to Interrogatories, as appeared by 'the certificate of Mr. Goad, Deputy-Clerk of this 'Court: the Court did on that day order, that 'their appearances ſhould be recorded, they being 'preſent in Court as aforeſaid; and that in reſpect 'the ſaid Delinquents did then again contemptuouſly 'refuſe to take their Oaths tendred to them in open 'Court, they ſhould be remanded to the priſon of 'the Fleet, there to remain cloſe priſoners, until 'they conformed themſelves in obedience to take 'their Oaths and be examined; and that unleſs 'they did take their Oaths, and yield to be exami- 'ned by Monday-night next then next following, 'and now laſt paſt, their Lordſhips would on this 'ſitting-day proceed to a cenſure againſt them for 'their contempts therein. Now this day the ſaid 'Lilburn and Wharton being again brought to the 'Bar, his Majeſty's ſaid Attorney informed this 'honourable Court, that they ſtill continued in 'their former obſtinacy, and contemptuouſly re- 'fuſed to take their Oaths, to make true anſwer to 'the Interrogatories, although they had been ſent 'for, and their Oaths aſſented to be given unto them 'by Mr. Goad, Deputy-Clerk of this Court, who 'now certified the ſame in Court: and therefore 'his Majeſty's ſaid Attorney humbly pleaded on his 'Majeſty's behalf, that their Lordſhips would now 'proceed to cenſure againſt the ſaid Delinquents, 'for their great contempts and diſobedience there- 'in. Whereupon their Lordſhips endeavoured, by 'fair perſuaſions, to draw them to conformity and 'obedience, and withal offered, that if they yet 'would ſubmit and take their Oaths, their Lordſhips

'would

'would accept thereof, and not proceed to cenſure 'againſt them. But ſuch was the inſufferable diſ-'obedience and contempt of the ſaid Delinquents, 'that they ſtill perſiſted in their former obſtinacy, 'and wilfully refuſed to take their Oaths. In re-'ſpect whereof the whole Court did with an unani-'mous conſent, declare and adjudge the ſaid Lil-'burn and Wharton guilty of a very high contempt 'and offence, of dangerous conſequence and evil ex-'ample, and worthy to undergo very ſharp, ſevere, 'and exemplary cenſure, which might deter others 'from the like preſumptuous boldneſs in refuſing 'to take a legal Oath; without which, many 'great and exorbitant offences, to the prejudice 'and danger of his Majeſty, his Kingdoms, and 'loving Subjects, might go away undiſcovered, and 'unpuniſhed. And therefore their Lordſhips have 'now ordered, adjudged and decreed, That the 'ſaid Lilburn and Wharton ſhall be remanded to 'the Fleet, there to remain until they conform 'themſelves in obedience to the orders of this 'Court, and that they ſhall pay five hundred 'pounds a-piece for their ſeveral fines to his Ma-'jeſty's uſe; and before their enlargements out of 'the Fleet, become bound with good ſureties for their 'good behaviour. And to the end that others may 'be the more deterred from daring to offend in the 'like kind hereafter, the Court hath further orde-'red and decreed, That the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall 'be whipt through the Streets, from the priſon of 'the Fleet unto the * Pillory, to be erected in ſuch 'time, and place, as this Court ſhall hold fit and 'direct; and that both he and the ſaid Wharton 'ſhall be both of them ſet in the ſaid Pillory, and 'from thence be returned to the Fleet, there to re-'main according to this Decree.'

After our cenſure, we had the liberty of the priſon for a few days; but the old man, my fellow-partner, went to the Warden of the Fleet, and told him the ſum of that which he intended in the Star-Chamber, to have ſpoken againſt the Biſhops, if the Lords would have let him. He told the Warden, how the Biſhops were the greateſt Tyrants that ever were ſince Adam's creation; and that they were more cruel than the Cannibals, thoſe Men-eaters; for (ſaid he) they preſently devour men, and put an end to their pain, but the Biſhops do it by degrees, and are many years in exerciſing their cruelty and tyranny upon thoſe that ſtand out againſt them; and therefore are worſe than the very Cannibals, &c.

This came to the Lords of the Council's ears, whereupon we were the next Monday after brought both together and locked up cloſe priſoners in one Chamber, without any order or warrant at all, but only Warden Ingram's bare command and pleaſure. But the old man, about three weeks after, made a Petition to the Lords of the Council, that he might have ſome liberty; and being very weak, more likely to die than to live, he had his liberty granted till the Term: but I do ſtill remain cloſe priſoner.

Upon Wedneſday the 18*th* of April, 1638, I was cruelly whipp'd through the Streets to Weſtminſter †, and at the laſt came to the Pillory, where I was unlooſed from the Cart, and having put on ſome of my clothes, went to the Tavern, where I ſtaid a pretty while waiting for my Surgeon, who was not yet come to dreſs me; where were many of my friends, who exceedingly rejoiced to ſee my courage, that the Lord had enabled me to undergo my puniſhment ſo willingly.

I having a deſire to retire into a private room from the multitude of people that were about me, which made me like to faint; I had not been there long, but Mr. Lightborne, the Tipſtaff of the Star-Chamber, came unto me, ſaying, the Lords ſent him to me, to know if I would acknowledge myſelf to be in a fault, and then he knew what to ſay unto me. To whom I replied, Have their Honours cauſed me to be whipt from the Fleet to Weſtminſter, and do they now ſend to know if I will acknowledge a fault? They ſhould have done this before I had been whipt; for now, ſeeing I have undergone the greateſt part of my puniſhment, I hope the Lord will aſſiſt me to go through it all: and beſide, if I would have done this at the firſt, I needed not to have come to this: But as I told the Lords when I was before them at the Bar, ſo I deſire you to tell them again, that I am not conſcious to myſelf of doing any thing that deſerves a ſubmiſſion, but yet I do willingly ſubmit to their Lodſhips pleaſures in my cenſure. He told me, if I would confeſs my fault, it would ſave me a ſtanding in the Pillory; otherwiſe, I muſt undergo the burthen of it.

Well (ſaid I) I regard not a little outward diſgrace for the cauſe of my God; I have found already that ſweetneſs in him, in whom I have believed, that through his ſtrength, I am able to undergo any thing that ſhall be inflicted on me: but methinks that I had very hard meaſure, that I ſhould be condemned and thus puniſhed upon two Oaths, in which the party has moſt falſly forſworn himſelf; and becauſe I would not take an Oath to betray mine own innocence. Why, Paul found more mercy from the Heathen Roman Governours, for they would not put him to an Oath to accuſe himſelf, but ſuffered him to make the beſt defence he could for himſelf; neither would they condemn him, before his accuſers and he were brought face to face, to juſtify, and fully to prove their accuſation: but the Lords have not dealt ſo with me, for my accuſers and I were never brought face to face, to juſtify their accuſation againſt me. It is true, two falſe Oaths were ſworn againſt me, and I was thereupon condemned; and becauſe I would not accuſe myſelf. And ſo he went away, and I prepared myſelf for the Pillory, to which I went with a joyful courage; and when I was upon it, I made obeiſance to the Lords, ſome of them (as I ſuppoſe) looking out at the Star-Chamber window towards me. And ſo I put my neck into the hole, which being a great deal too low for me, it was very painful to me, in regard of continuance of the time that I ſtood on the Pillory, which was about two hours; my back being alſo very ſore, and the Sun ſhining ſo exceeding hot, and the Tipſtaff-man not ſuffering me to keep on my hat to defend my head from the heat of the Sun, ſo that I ſtood there in great pain: yet through the ſtrength of my God I underwent it with courage, to the very laſt minute; and lifting up my heart and ſpirit unto my God, I began to ſpeak after this manner.

My

* The Pillory was placed between Weſtminſter-Hall-Gate and the Star-Chamber.

† And as the Cart drew him along, he repeated ſeveral Texts of Scripture, and talk'd Enthuſiaſtically to the People, which for brevity ſake is here omitted.

My Chriſtian Brethren,

TO all you that love the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and deſire that he ſhould reign and rule in your hearts and lives, to you eſpecially, and to as many as hear me this day, I direct my Speech.

I ſtand here in the place of ignominy and ſhame; yet to me it is not ſo, but I own and embrace it, as the Welcome Croſs of Chriſt, and as a badge of my Chriſtian Profeſſion: I have been already whipt from the Fleet to this place, by virtue of a cenſure, from the honourable Lords of the Star-chamber; the cauſe of my cenſure I ſhall declare unto you as briefly as I can.

The Lord, by his ſpecial hand of Providence, ſo ordered it, that not long ago I was in Holland, where I was like to have ſettled myſelf in the courſe of Trading, that might have brought me in a pretty large portion of earthly things, (after which, my heart did too much run:) but the Lord having a better portion in ſtore for me, and more durable riches to beſtow upon my Soul, by the ſame hand of providence, brought me back again, and caſt me into eaſy affliction, that thereby I might be weaned from the World, and ſee the vanity and emptineſs of all things therein. And he hath now pitched my ſoul upon ſuch an object of beauty, amiableneſs, and excellency, as is as permanent and endurable, as eternity itſelf; namely, the perſonal excellency of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the ſweetneſs of whoſe preſence, no affliction can ever be able to wreſt out of my Soul.

Now, while I was in Holland, it ſeems there were divers Books, of that noble and renowned Doctor John Baſtwick ſent into England, which came into the hands of one Edmond Chillington; for the ſending over of which, I was taken and apprehended, the plot being before laid, by one John Chilliburn (whom I ſuppoſed, and took to be my Friend) ſervant to my old fellow-ſoldier, Mr. John Wharton, living in Bow-lane, after this manner.

I walking in the ſtreet with the ſaid John Chilliburne, was taken by the Purſuivant and his men; the ſaid John, as I verily believe, having given direction to them where to ſtand, and he himſelf was the third man that laid hands on me to hold me.

Now, at my cenſure before the Lords, I there declared upon the word of a Chriſtian, that I ſent not over thoſe Books, neither did I know the Ship that brought them, nor any of the men that belonged to the Ship, nor to my knowledge did I ever ſee either Ship, or any appertaining to it in all my days.

Beſides this, I was accuſed at my examination before the King's Attorney, at his chamber, by the ſaid Edmond Chillington, Button-ſeller, living in Cannon-ſtreet, near Abchurch-lane, and late priſoner in Bridewell and Newgate, for printing ten or twelve thouſand Books in Holland; and that I would have printed the Unmasking the Myſtery of Iniquity, if I could have gotten a true copy of it; and that I had a Chamber in Mr. John Foot's houſe at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept.

Now, here I declare before you all, upon the word of a ſuffering Chriſtian, that he might as well have accuſed me of printing a hundred thouſand books, and the one been as true as the other. And for the printing the Unmasking the Myſtery of Iniquity, upon the word of an honeſt man, I never ſaw, nor to my knowledge heard of the book, till I came back again, into England. And for my having a Chamber at Mr. John Foot's houſe at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept; I was ſo far from having a Chamber there, as I never lay in his houſe but twice or thrice at the moſt: and upon the laſt Friday of the laſt Term, I was brought to the Star-chamber-Bar, where before me was read the ſaid Edmond Chillington's Affidavit, upon oath againſt Mr. John Wharton and myſelf; the ſum of which oath was, That he and I had printed (at Rotterdam in Holland) Dr. Baſtwick's Anſwer, and his Litany, with divers other ſcandalous books.

Now, here again I ſpeak it in the preſence of God, and all you that hear me, that Mr. Wharton and I never joined together in printing either theſe, or any other books whatſoever; neither did I receive any money from him toward the printing any.

Withal, in his firſt Oath, he peremptorily ſwore, that we had printed them at Rotterdam, unto which I likewiſe ſay, That he hath in this particular forſworn himſelf: for mine own part, I never in all my days either printed, or cauſed to be printed, either for myſelf, or for Mr. Wharton, any books at Rotterdam; neither did I come into any Printing-houſe there, all the time I was in the City.

And then upon the Tueſday after, he ſwore againſt both of us again. The ſum of which oaths was, that I had confeſſed to him (which is moſt falſe) that I had printed Dr. Baſtwick's Anſwer to Sir John Banks's Information, and his Litany; and another Book, called, Certain Anſwers to certain Objections: and another Book, called, The Vanity and Impiety of the old Litany. And that I had divers other Books of the ſaid Dr. Baſtwick's in printing, and that Mr. Wharton had been at the charges of printing a Book, called, A Breviate of the Biſhops late proceedings; and an other Book called ſixteen New Queries; and in this his oath hath ſworn they were printed at Rotterdam, or ſomewhere elſe in Holland; and that one James Oldham, a Turner, keeping Shop at Weſtminſter-Hall Gate, diſperſed divers of theſe Books. Now, in this oath he hath again forſworn himſelf in a high degree; for whereas he took his oath that I had printed the Book, called, The Vanity and Impiety of the old Litany; I here ſpeak it before you all, that I never in all my days did ſee one of them in print: but I muſt confeſs, I have ſeen and read it in written hand, before the Doctor was cenſured. And as for other Books, for which he ſaith I have divers in printing; to that I anſwer, that for my own particular, I never read nor ſaw any of the Doctor's Books, but the forenamed four in Engliſh; and one little thing more of about two ſheets of paper, which is annexed to the Vanity of the old Litany. And as for his Latin Books, I never ſaw any but two; namely, his Flagellum, for which he was firſt cenſured in the High-Commiſſion-Court, and his Apologeticus, which were both in print long before I knew the Doctor. But it is true, there is a ſecond edition of his Flagellum, but that was at the preſs above two years ago: namely, Anno 1634. and ſome of this impreſſion was in England before I came out of Holland.

And theſe are the main things for which I was cenſured and condemned, being two oaths in which the ſaid Chillington hath palpably forſworn himſelf; and if he had not forſworn himſelf, yet by the Law (as I am given to underſtand) I might have excepted againſt him, being a guilty perſon himſelf, and a pripriſoner, and did that which he did againſt me for purchaſing his own Liberty, which he hath by ſuch Judaſly means got and obtained; who is alſo known to be a lying fellow, as I told the Lords I was able to prove and make good.

But beſides all this, there was an inquiſition-oath tendred unto me (which I refuſed to take) on four ſeveral days; the Sum of which oath is thus much: 'You ſhall ſwear that you ſhall make true anſwer to 'all things that ſhall be aſked of you: ſo help you 'God.' Now this oath I refuſed as a ſinful and unlawful oath: it being the High-Commiſſion-oath, with which the Prelates ever have, and ſtill do, ſo butcherly torment, afflict and undo, the dear Saints and Servants of God. It is an oath againſt the Law of the Land (as Mr. Nicholas Fuller in his Argument doth prove:) And alſo it is expreſsly againſt the Petition of Right, an Act of Parliament enacted in the 3 and 4 year of our King. Again, it is abſolutely againſt the Law of God; for that Law requires no man to accuſe himſelf, but if any thing be laid to his charge, there muſt come two or three witneſſes at leaſt to prove it. It is alſo againſt the practice of Chriſt himſelf, who in all his examinations before the High Prieſt, would not accuſe himſelf, but upon their demands, returned this anſwer, Why ask you me? go to them that heard me.

Withal, this oath is againſt the very Law of Nature; for Nature is always a preſerver of itſelf, and not a deſtroyer: But if a man takes this wicked oath, he deſtroys and undoes himſelf, as daily Experience doth witneſs. Nay, it is worſe than the Law of the Heathen Romans, as we may read, Acts 25. 16. For, when Paul ſtood before the Pagan Governours, and the Jews required Judgment againſt him, the Governor replyed, it is not the manner of the Romans to condemn any man, before he and his accuſers be brought face to face to juſtify their accuſation. But for my own part, if I had been proceeded againſt by a Bill, I would have anſwered and juſtified all that they could have proved againſt me; and by the ſtrength of my God, would have ſealed whatſoever I have done with my blood: for I am privy to mine own actions, and my conſcience bears me witneſs, that I have laboured ever ſince the Lord in mercy made the riches of his grace known to my Soul, to keep a good conſcience, and to walk inoffenſively both towards God and man. But as for that Oath that was put upon me, I did refuſe to take it, as a ſinful and unlawful Oath, and by the ſtrength of my God enabling me, I will never take it, though I be pull'd in pieces by wild Horſes, as the ancient Chriſtians were, by the bloody Tyrants in the Primitive Church; neither ſhall I think that man a faithful ſubject of Chriſt's Kingdom, that ſhall at any time hereafter take it, ſeeing the wickedneſs of it hath been ſo apparently laid open by ſo many, for the refuſal whereof many do ſuffer cruel perſecution to this day.

Thus have I, as briefly as I could, declared unto you, the whole cauſe of my ſtanding here this day; I being upon theſe grounds cenſured by the Lords at the Star-Chamber on the laſt Court day of the laſt Term, to pay 500 l. to the King, and to receive the puniſhment, which with rejoicing I have undergone, unto whoſe cenſure I do with willingneſs and cheerfulneſs ſubmit myſelf.

But ſeeing I now ſtand here at this preſent, I intend, the Lord aſſiſting me with his power, and guiding me by his Spirit, to declare my mind unto you.

I have nothing to ſay to any man's perſon, and therefore will not meddle with that; only the things that I have to ſay, in the firſt place are concerning the Biſhops and their calling: They challenge their callings to be Jure Divino; and for the oppugning of which, thoſe three renowned living martyrs of the Lord, Dr. Baſtwick, Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynne, did ſuffer in this place, and they have ſufficiently proved, that their calling is not from God: which men I love and honour, and do perſuade myſelf, that their ſouls are dear and precious in the ſight of God, though they were ſo cruelly and butcherly dealt with by the Prelates. And as for Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynne, they are worthy and learned men, but yet did not in many things write ſo fully as the Doctor did, who hath ſufficiently and plentifully ſet forth the wickedneſs, both of the Prelates themſelves, and of their callings (as you may read in his Books) that they are not Jure Divino, which noble and reverend Doctor I love with all my ſoul: and as he is a man that ſtands for the truth and glory of God, my very life and heart-blood, I will lay down for his honour, and the maintaining of his cauſe for which he ſuffered, it being God's cauſe. As for the Biſhops, they uſed in former times to challenge their juriſdiction, callings and power from the King; but they have now openly in the High-Commiſſion Court renounced that, as was heard by many, at the cenſure of that noble Doctor: and as you may fully read in his Apologeticus; and in his Anſwer to Sir John Banks's Information. Now I will here maintain it before them all, that their calling is ſo far from being Jure Divino, (as they ſay they are) that they are rather Jure Diabolico; which if I am not able to prove, let me be hanged up at the Hall-gate. But, my Brethren, for your better ſatisfaction, read the 9th and 13th Chapters of the Revelation, and there you ſhall ſee, that there came Locuſts out of the Bottomleſs Pit, part of whom they are, and they are there lively deſcribed. Alſo you ſhall there find, that the Beaſt (which is the Pope, or Roman State and Government) hath given to him by the Dragon (the Devil) his power, ſeat, and great authority. So that the Pope's authority comes from the Devil; and the Prelates, and their Creatures in their printed Books, do challenge their authority, juriſdiction and power, (that they exerciſe over all ſorts of people) is from Rome.

And for proving the Church of England to be a true Church, their beſt and ſtrongeſt argument is, that the Biſhops are lineally deſcended from his Holineſs (or Impiouſneſs) of Rome, as you may read in Pocklington's Book, called Sunday no Sabbath. So that by their own confeſſion they ſtand by that ſame power and authority, that they have received from the Pope. So that their calling is not from God, but from the Devil. For the Pope cannot give a better authority or calling to them than he himſelf hath; but his authority and calling is from the Devil, therefore the Prelates calling and authority is from the Devil alſo. Revel. 9. 3. And there came out of the ſmoke, Locuſts upon the earth, and unto them was given power, as the Scorpions of the earth have power to hurt and undo men, as the Prelates daily do: and alſo, Revel. 13. 2. And the Beaſt which I ſaw (ſaith St. John) was like unto a Leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a Bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a Lion; and the Dragon (that is to ſay, the Devil) gave him his power, his ſeat and great authority: and verſe 15, 16, 17. And whether the Prelates as well as the Pope, do not daily the ſame things, let every man that hath but common reaſon judge.

For do not their daily practices and cruel burthens impoſed on all ſorts of people, high and low, rich and poor, witneſs that their deſcent is from the Beaſt, part of his ſtate and kingdom? ſo alſo Revel. 16. 13, 14. all which places do declare, that their power and authority being from the Pope, (as they themſelves confeſs) therefore it muſt originally come from the Devil. For their power and callings muſt of neceſſity proceed either from God, or elſe from the Devil; but it proceeds not from God, as the Scriptures ſufficiently declare; therefore their calling and power proceeds from the Devil, as both Scripture and their own daily Practices do demonſtrate and prove. And as for that laſt place cited, Rev. 16. 13, 14. if you pleaſe to read the ſecond and third parts of Dr. Baſtwick's Litany, you ſhall find, he there proves, that the Prelates practices do every way ſuit with, and make good that portion of Scripture to the utmoſt. For in their Sermons that they preach before his Majeſty, how do they incenſe the King and Nobles againſt the people of God, labouring to make them odious in his ſight, and ſtirring him up to execute vengeance upon them, though they be the moſt harmleſs generation of all others?

And as for all theſe officers that are under them, and made by them, for mine own particular, I cannot ſee but that their callings are as unlawful as the Biſhops themſelves; and in particular, for the callings of the Miniſters, I do not, nor will not ſpeak againſt their perſons, for I know ſome of them to be very able men, and men of excellent gifts and qualifications; and I perſuade myſelf, their ſouls are very dear and precious in the ſight of God.

Yet notwithſtanding, this proves not their callings to be ever the better, as it is in civil government: If the King (whom God hath made a lawful Magiſtrate) make a wicked man an officer, he is as true an officer, and as well to be obeyed, coming in the King's name, as the beſt man in the world coming with the ſame authority; for in ſuch a caſe, he that is a wicked man, hath his calling from as good authority as the godlieſt man hath; and therefore his calling is as good as the other's.

But on the other ſide, if he that hath no authority make officers, though the men themſelves be ever ſo good and holy, yet their holineſs makes their calling never a whit the truer; but ſtill is a falſe calling, in regard his authority was not good nor lawful that made them. And even ſo the Miniſters, be they ever ſo holy men, yet they have one and the ſame calling with the wickedeſt that is amongſt them; their holineſs proves not their callings to be ever the truer, ſeeing their authority that made them Miniſters is falſe: and therefore they have more to anſwer for than any of the reſt, by how much the more God hath beſtowed greater gifts upon them than upon others, and yet they detain the truth in unrighteouſneſs from God's people, and do not make known to them, as they ought, the whole will and counſel of God.

And again, the greater is their ſin, if their callings be unlawful, (as I verily believe they are) in that they ſtill hold them, and do not willingly lay down and renounce them; or they do but deceive the people, and highly diſhonour God, and ſin againſt their own ſouls, while they preach unto the people by virtue of an Antichriſtian and unlawful calling. And the more godly and able the Miniſter is, that ſtill preaches by virtue of this calling, the more hurt he doth; for the people that have ſuch a Miniſter will not be perſuaded of the truth of things, though one ſpeak, and inform them in the name of the Lord; but will be ready to reply, our Miniſter that preaches ſtill by virtue of this calling, is ſo holy a man, that were not his calling right and good, I do aſſure myſelf he would no longer preach by virtue thereof. And thus the holineſs of the Miniſter is a cloak to cover the unlawfulneſs of his calling, and make the people continue rebels againſt Chriſt, his Scepter and Kingdom, which is an aggravation of his ſin: for by this means the people are kept off from receiving the whole truth into their ſouls, and reſt in being but almoſt Chriſtians, or but Chriſtians in part. But, O my Brethren, it behoves all you that fear God, and tender the ſalvation of your own ſouls, to look about you, and to ſhake off that long ſecurity and formality in Religion, that you have lain in: for God of all things cannot endure Lukewarmneſs, Rev. 3. 16. and ſearch out diligently the truth of things, and try them in the ballance of the Sanctuary. I beſeech you take things no more upon truſt, as hitherto you have done, but take pains to ſearch and find out thoſe ſpiritual and hidden truths that God hath enwrapped in his ſacred Book, and find out a bottom for your own ſouls: for if you will have the comforts of them, you muſt beſtow ſome labour for the getting of them, and you muſt ſearch diligently before you find them, Prov. 2. Labour alſo to withdraw your necks from under that ſpiritual and Antichriſtian bondage (unto which you have for a long time ſubjected your ſouls) leſt the Lord cauſe his plagues, and the fierceneſs of his wrath to ſeize both upon your bodies and ſouls; ſeeing you are now warned of the danger of theſe things.

For he himſelf hath ſaid, Rev. 14. 9, 10, 11. That if any man worſhip the Beaſt and his Image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand; the ſame ſhall drink of the wine of his wrath, which is poured out without mixture, into the cup of his indignation, and he ſhall be tormented with fire and brimſtone, in the preſence of the holy Angels, and in the preſence of the Lamb; and the ſmoke of their torment aſcended up for ever and ever, and they have no reſt, day nor night, who worſhip the Beaſt and his Image, and whoſoever receiveth the mark of his name. Therefore as you love your own ſouls, and look for that immortal Crown of happineſs in the world to come, look that you withdraw yourſelves from that Antichriſtian power and ſlavery that you are now under, even as God himſelf hath commanded and enjoined you, in Rev. 18. 4. Come out of her, my people, that you be not partakers of her ſins, and that you receive not of her plagues; for, her ſins have reached unto Heaven, and God hath remembred her iniquities. Here is the voice of God himſelf, commanding all his choſen ones, though they have lived under this Antichriſtian ſlaviſh power and eſtate a long time, yet at laſt to withdraw their obedience and ſubjection from it. My brethren, we are all at this preſent, in a very dangerous and fearful condition, under the idolatrous and ſpiritual bondage of the Prelates, in regard we have turned traytors unto our God, in ſeeing his Almighty great name, and his heavenly truth trodden under foot, and ſo highly diſhonoured by them; and yet we not only let them alone in holding our peace, but moſt ſlaviſhly and wickedly ſubject ourſelves unto them, fearing the face of a piece of dirt, more than the Almighty great God of heaven and earth, who is able to caſt both body and ſoul into everlaſting damnation.

Oh

Oh repent, I beſeech you therefore repent, for that great diſhonour you have ſuffered to be done unto God by your fearfulneſs and cowardlineſs; and for the time to come, put on couragious reſolutions like valiant ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, and fight manfully in this his ſpiritual battle, in which battle ſome of his ſoldiers have already loſt part of their blood; and withal, ſtudy this Book of the Revelation, and there you ſhall find the myſtery of iniquity fully unfolded and explained; and alſo you ſhall ſee what great ſpiritual battles have been fought betwixt the Lamb and his Servants, and the Dragon (the Devil) and his vaſſals, and ſome are to fight.

Therefore gird on your ſpiritual armour, ſpoken of, Epheſ. 6. that you may quit yourſelves like good and faithful ſoldiers, and fear no colours, the victory and conqueſt is ours already; for we are ſure to have it (I do not ſpeak of any bodily and temporal battle, but only of a ſpiritual one) and be not diſcouraged and knock'd off from the ſtudy of it, becauſe of the obſcurity and darkneſs of it; for the Lord hath promiſed his enlightening Spirit unto all his people that are laborious and ſtudious to know him a-right, and alſo he hath promiſed a bleſſing, and pronounced a bleſſedneſs unto all that read and labour to keep the things contained in this Book, Rev. 1. 3. My Chriſtian Brethren, in the bowels of Jeſus Chriſt, I beſeech you do not contemn the things that are delivered to you, in regard of the meanneſs and weakneſs of me the inſtrument, being but one of the meaneſt and unworthieſt of the ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, for the Lord many times doth great things by weak means, that his power may be more ſeen; for we are too ready to caſt our eye upon the means and inſtrument, not looking up unto that Almighty power that is in God, who is able to do the greateſt things by the weakeſt means, and therefore out of the mouths of Babes and Sucklings he hath ordained ſtrength, Pſal. 8. 2. And he hath choſen the fooliſh things of the world to confound the wiſe, and God hath choſen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and baſe things of the world, and things which are deſpiſed hath God choſen, yea, things which are not, to bring to nought the things that are, 1 Cor. 1. 27, 28. And he gives the reaſon wherefore he is pleaſed ſo to do; That no fleſh ſhould glory in his preſence.

So you ſee God is not tyed to any inſtrument and means to effect his own glory, but he by the leaſt inſtrument is able to bring to paſs the greateſt things.

It is true, I am a young man, and no Scholar, according to that which the world counts Scholarſhip, yet I have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and he by a divine providence, hath brought me hither this day; and I ſpeak to you in the name of the Lord, being aſſiſted with the ſpirit and power of the God of Heaven and Earth: and I ſpeak not the words of raſhneſs or inconſiderateneſs, but the words of ſoberneſs, and mature deliberation; for I did conſult with my God, before I came hither, and deſired him that he would direct and enable me to ſpeak that, which might be for his glory, and the good of his people. And as I am a ſoldier, fighting under the banner of the great and mighty Captain, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and as I look for that crown of immortality, which one day I know ſhall be ſet upon my temples, being in the condition that I am in, I dare not hold my peace, but ſpeak unto you with boldneſs in the might and ſtrength of my God, the things which the Lord in mercy hath made known unto my ſoul, come life, come death.

[When I was hereabout, there came a fat Lawyer, I do not know his name, and commanded me to hold my peace, and leave my preaching. To whom I replied and ſaid, Sir, I will not hold my peace, but ſpeak my mind freely, though I be hanged at Tyburn for my pains. It ſeems he himſelf was galled and touched as the Lawyers were in Chriſt's time, when he ſpake againſt the Scribes and Phariſees, which made them ſay, Maſter, in ſaying thus, thou revileſt us alſo. So he went his way, and (I think) complained to the Lords, but I went on with my ſpeech, and ſaid:]

My Brethren, be not diſcouraged at the ways of God, for the affliction and croſs that doth accompany them, for it is ſweet and comfortable drawing in the yoke of Chriſt for all that, and I have found it ſo by experience; for my ſoul is fill'd ſo full of ſpiritual and heavenly joy, that with my tongue I am not able to expreſs it, neither are any capable (I think) to partake of ſo great a degree of conſolation, but only thoſe upon whom the Lord's gracious afflicting hand is.

And for mine own part, I ſtand this day in the place of an evil doer, but my conſcience witneſſeth that I am not ſo. [And hereabout I put my hand into my pocket, and pull'd out three of worthy Dr. Baſtwick's Books, and threw them among the people, and ſaid,] there is part of the Books for which I ſuffer, take them among you, and read them, and ſee if you find any thing in them againſt the Law of God, the Law of the Land, the Glory of God, the Honour of the King or State.

I am the ſon of a Gentleman, and my friends are of rank and quality in the Country where they live, which is two hundred miles from this place, and I am in my preſent condition deſerted of them all; for I know, not one of them dare meddle with me in my preſent eſtate, being I am ſtung by the Scorpions (the Prelates) and for any thing that I know, it may be, I ſhall never have a favourable countenance from any of them again: and withal, I am a young man, and likely to have lived well, and in plenty, according to the faſhion of the world; yet notwithſtanding for the cauſe of Chriſt, and to do him ſervice, I have and do bid adieu to father, friends, riches, pleaſures, eaſe, contented life and blood, and lay all down at the foot-ſtool of Jeſus Chriſt, being willing to part with all, rather than I will diſhonour him, or in the leaſt meaſure part with the peace of a good conſcience, and that ſweetneſs and joy which I have found in him. For in naked Chriſt is the quinteſſence of ſweetneſs, and I am ſo far from thinking my affliction and puniſhment, which I have this day endured, and ſtill do endure and groan under, a diſgrace, that I receive it as the welcome Croſs of Chriſt, and do think myſelf this day more honoured by my ſufferings, than if a crown of gold had been ſet upon my head: for I have in ſome part been made conformable to my Lord and Maſter, and have in ſome meaſure drank of the ſame Cup, which he himſelf drank of, while he was in this ſinful world. For he ſhed his moſt precious blood for the ſalvation of my poor ſoul, that ſo I might be reconciled to his father; therefore am I willing to undergo any thing for his ſake, and that inward joy and conſolation within me that carries me high above all my pains and torments. And you (my Brethren) if you be willing to have Chriſt, you muſt own him, and take him upon his own terms, and know that Chriſt and the Croſs is inſeparable; for he that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, muſt ſuffer perſecution and affliction, it is the lot and portion of all his choſen ones, through many afflictions and trials we muſt enter into glory; and the Apoſtle ſaith, That if we be without afflictions, whereof all are partakers, then are ye baſtards, and not ſons. And therefore, if you will have Chriſt, ſit down and reckon before ever you make profeſſion of him, what he will coſt you; leſt when you come to the trial, you diſhonour him: and if you be not willing and contented withal, and let all go for his ſake, you are not worthy of him.

If parents, husband, wife or children, lands or livings, riches or honours, pleaſure or eaſe, life or blood, ſtand in the way, you muſt be willing to part with all theſe, and to entertain Chriſt naked and alone, though you have nothing but the Croſs, or elſe you are not worthy of him; Math. 10.37, 38.

Oh, my Brethren, there is ſuch ſweetneſs and contentedneſs in enjoying the Lord Jeſus alone, that it is able, where it is felt, to make a man go thro' all difficulties, and endure all hardſhips that may poſſibly come upon him. Therefore, if he call you to it, do not deny him, nor his truth in the leaſt manner; for he hath ſaid, He that denies him before men, him will he deny before his Father which is in Heaven. And now is the time that we muſt ſhew ourſelves good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, for his truth, his cauſe and glory lies at ſtake in a high degree; therefore put on couragious reſolutions, and withdraw your necks and ſouls from all falſe power and worſhip, and fight with courage and boldneſs in this ſpirtual battle, in which battle, the Lord before your eyes hath raiſed up ſome valiant Champions that fought up to the ears in blood: therefore be couragious ſoldiers, and fight it out bravely, that your God may be glorified by you, and let him only have the ſervice, both of your inward and outward man, and ſtand to his cauſe and love your own ſouls, and fear not the face of any mortal man; for God hath promiſed to be with you, and uphold you, that they ſhall not prevail againſt you, Iſa. 41. 10, 11. But alas, how few are there that dare ſhew any courage for God and his cauſe, though his glory lies at the ſtake, but think themſelves happy and well, and count themſelves wiſe men, if they can ſleep in a whole skin; when Chriſt hath ſaid, He that will ſave his life, ſhall loſe it; and he that will loſe his life for his ſake, ſhall find it. What ſhall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul?

Therefore it is better for a man to be willing and contented to let all go for the enjoying of Chriſt, and doing him ſervice, than to ſit down and ſleep in a whole skin, though in ſo doing he gain all the world, and ſee him diſhonoured, his glory and truth trodden under foot, and the blood of his ſervants ſhed and ſpilt?

Yes, without doubt it is: but many are in theſe times, ſo far from ſuffering valiantly for Chriſt, that they rather diſſuade men from it, and count it a point of ſingularity and pride, and ſelf-ends for a man to put himſelf forward to do God ſervice; asking, what calling and warrant any private man hath thereunto, ſeeing it belongs to the Miniſters to ſpeak of theſe things. Yes, ſo it doth, but alas, they are ſo cowardly and fearful, that they dare not ſpeak.

And therefore it belongs alſo to thee, or me, or any other man, if thou be'ſt a ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt, whatſoever by place or calling thy rank or degree be, be it higher or lower, yet if he call for thy ſervice, thou art bound, though others ſtand ſtill, to maintain his power and glory to the utmoſt of thy power and ſtrength, yea, to the ſhedding the laſt drop of thy blood; for he hath not loved his life unto the death for thy ſake, but ſhed his precious blood for the redemption of thy ſoul. Hath he done this for thee; and dareſt thou ſee him diſhonoured, and his glory lie at the ſtake, and not ſpeak in his behalf, or do him the beſt ſervice thou canſt?

If out of a baſe and cowardly ſpirit thus thou doſt, let me tell thee here, and that truly to thy face, thou haſt a Dalilah in thy heart, which thou loveſt more than God, and that thou ſhalt one day certainly find by woful experience. Alas, if men ſhould hold their peace in ſuch times as theſe, the Lord would cauſe the very ſtones to ſpeak, to convince man of his cowardly baſeneſs.

Having proceeded in a manner thus far by the ſtrength of my God, with boldneſs and courage in my ſpeech, the Warden of the Fleet came with the fat Lawyer, and commanded me to hold my peace. To whom I replied, I would ſpeak and declare my cauſe and mind, though I were to be hanged at the gate for my ſpeaking. And he cauſed proclamation to be made upon the Pillory, for bringing to him the Books: ſo then he commanded me to be gagged, and if I ſpake any more, that then I ſhould be whipt again upon the Pillory.

So I remained about an hour and a half gagged, being intercepted of much matter, which by God's aſſiſtance I intended to have ſpoken; but yet with their cruelty I was nothing at all daunted, for I was full of comfort and courage, being mightily ſtrengthned with the power of the Almighty, which made me with chearfulneſs triumph over all my ſufferings, not ſhewing one ſad countenance or diſcontented heart.

And when I was to come down, having taken out my head out of the Pillory, I looked about me upon the people, and ſaid, I am more than a conqueror through him that hath loved me. Vivat Rex, Let the King live for ever; and ſo I came down, and was had back again to the Tavern, where I, together with Mr. Wharton, ſtaid a while, till one went to the Warden to know what ſhould be done with me, who gave order we ſhould be carried back again to the Fleet.

After I came back to the priſon, none were ſuffered to come to me, but the Surgeon to dreſs me.

[Here Lilburn gives an account of his cruel Whipping, &c. but as it is afterwards mentioned in the depoſitions before the Lords, is here omitted.]

The reſt that I intended by the ſtrength of my God to have ſpoken (if I had not been prevented by the Gag) I now forbear to ſet down, in regard I hear I am to come into the Field again to fight a ſecond Battle, unto which time I reſerve it: if the Lord ſo order it that I may have liberty to ſpeak, I doubt not but by the might and power of my God, in whom I reſt and truſt, valiantly to diſplay the weapons of a good Soldier of Jeſus Chriſt; come life, come death: and in the mean time, to what I have here ſaid and written, I ſet to my name, by me John Lilburn, being written with part of mine own blood.

John Lilburn.

At the Inner Star-Chamber the 18th of April, Anno Dom. 1638.

PRESENT,

Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Lord-Keeper.
Lord Treaſurer.
Lord Privy-Seal.
Earl Marſhal.
Earl of Salisbury.
Lord Cottington.
Lord Newburgh.
Mr. Secretary Cooke.
Mr. Secretary Windebank.

WHereas John Lilburn, Priſoner in the Fleet, by ſentence in the Star-chamber, did this day ſuffer condign puniſhment for his ſeveral offences, by whipping at a cart, and ſtanding in the pillory; and as their Lordſhips were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the ſaid execution, audaciouſly and wickedly did not only utter ſundry ſcandalous ſpeeches, but likewiſe ſcattered divers copies of ſeditious books among the people, that beheld the ſaid execution; for which very thing, among other offences of like nature, he hath been cenſured in the ſaid Court by the aforeſaid Sentence: It is therefore, by their Lordſhips ordered, that the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould be laid alone, with irons on his hands and legs in the Wards of the Fleet, where the baſeſt and meaneſt ſort of priſoners are uſed to be put; and that the Warden of the Fleet take ſpecial care to hinder the reſort of any Perſons whatſoever unto him. And particularly, that he be not ſupplied with money from any friend, and that he take ſpecial notice of all letters, writings, and books brought unto him, and ſeize and deliver the ſame unto their Lordſhips; and take notice from time to time, who they be that reſort unto the ſaid priſon to viſit the ſaid Lilburn, or to ſpeak with him, and inform the Board thereof. And it was laſtly ordered, that all perſons that ſhall be hereafter produced to receive corporal puniſhment according to ſentence of that Court, or by order of the Board, ſhall have their garments ſearched before they be brought forth, and neither writing, nor other thing ſuffered to be about them; and their hands likewiſe to be bound, during the time they are under puniſhment. Whereof, together with the other premiſſes, the ſaid Warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have ſpecial care, that this their Lordſhips order be accordingly obſerved.

Examined per Dudley Carleton.

And on the ſaid 18th of April, it was further ordered by the ſaid Court of Star-Chamber,

'That his Majeſty's Attorney and Sollicitor-'General ſhould be hereby prayed and required, to 'take ſtrict examination of John Lilburn Priſoner 'in the Fleet, touching the Demeanour and Speeches 'of him the ſaid Lilburn, during the time of his 'whipping and ſtanding in the Pillory this day, ac-'cording to the Sentence of his Majeſty's Court of 'Star-Chamber; particularly, whether the ſaid Lilburn 'did at that time utter any ſpeeches tending to Sedition, 'or to the diſhonour of the ſaid Court of Star-Chamber, 'or any Member of the ſaid Court? and whether 'he did throw about and diſperſe at the ſame time 'any ſeditious Pamphlets and Books, either of that 'ſort for which he was formerly cenſured, or any 'other of like nature? What the Speeches were, 'and who heard them? what the ſaid Books were, 'and whence and of whom the ſaid Lilburn had 'them? and what other material Circumſtances 'they ſhould think fit to examine, either the ſaid 'Lilburn upon, or any other Perſon by whom 'they ſhall think good to inform themſelves for 'the better finding out the truth: and thereupon 'to make certificate to the Board what they find, 'together with their opinions.'

The third of November, 1640, being the firſt day the late diſſolved Parliament ſate, I according to Law and Juſtice preferred my Petition and Complaint to them; who upon the reading of my Petition, immediately ordered me my Liberty [being, as I remember, the firſt priſoner in England ſet at liberty by them] to follow my Petition, and according to the legal cuſtom of Parliaments make it good by proof, before a ſelect Committee appointed by them to that purpoſe, Mr. Francis Rouſe having the Chair; before whom many particular days one after another I appeared with my Counſel and my Witneſſes, and fully proved all my Petition. Upon the report of all which by Mr. Rouſe the Chairman, the Houſe of Commons upon the fourth of May, 1641, [being the very ſame day that the King himſelf cauſed me to be arraigned for High Treaſon at the Bar of the Houſe of Peers] voted and reſolved upon the queſtion,

That the Sentence of the Star-Chamber given againſt John Lilburn is illegal, and againſt the Liberty of the Subject; and alſo bloody, cruel, wicked, barbarous, and tyrannical.

Reſolved upon the Queſtion, That reparation ought to be given to Mr. Lilburn for his impriſonment, ſufferings, and loſſes ſuſtained by that illegal Sentence.

Ordered, That the Committee ſhall prepare this caſe of Mr. Lilburn's to be tranſmitted to the Lords, with thoſe other of Dr. Baſtwick, Dr. Leighton, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Prynne.

H. Elſinge, Cler. Parl. Dom. Com.

After which Votes (being in a full, free, unraviſh'd, or unforc'd, legal, and unqueſtionable Parliament, after a full, open, free*, and fair hearing, and examining of all my aforeſaid ſufferings and

* Where, (I very well remember,) Sir Arthur Haſlerig was one of my zealous and forward Judges; and when Warden James Ingram came to the Bar of the Court of Wards, and brought Mr. Herne the Counſellour to plead for the Lords, and in excuſe of himſelf, who ſtiffly inſiſted in a high manner upon the orders and decrees of Star-Chamber, upon which I very well remember Sir Arthur, with a great deal of indignation ſaid unto Herne, I value not a Decree of the Lords in Star-Chamber a ruſh, if it be not expreſſly according to the tenor of their Commiſſion, the Law: and I further tell you, it is a ridiculous thing, Sir, to ſummon Parliaments to meet together to make Laws, if the Lords Decrees in Star-Chamber againſt Law ſhould be binding. And therefore, although you have proved for your Client Mr. Ingram, that the Lords in open Court (the Court ſitting) commanded him on the Pillory to gag Mr. Lilburn, for ſpeaking againſt them, yet I tell you by Law that order ought to have been in writing according to the cuſtom of the Court, which you confeſs it was not, and therefore Mr. Ingram muſt ſmart for his executing of orders on Mr. Lilburn made illegally.

and complaints) troubles and the wars came on, and being in my own conſcience fully ſatisfied of the juſtneſs of the Parliament's then cauſe, in the height of zeal, accompanied with judgment and conſcience, " upon the principles I have largely " laid down in the 26, 27, 75, 76th pages of my " Book of the 8th of June, 1649, intitled England's " legal, fundamental, &c." I took up arms for them, and fought heartily and faithfully in their quarrel, (for maintaining of which I had like to have been hang'd at Oxford, while during my impriſonment there, I loſt 5 or 600 l. out of my eſtate at London,) till the preſent Earl of Mancheſter had like to have hanged me, for being a little too quick in taking in Tickell Caſtle, which ſpoiled a ſoldier of me ever ſince. After which in the year 1645, I followed the Houſe of Commons cloſe, to tranſmit my foreſaid Votes to the Lords, as appears by the following Petition,

To the Honourable the Houſe of Commons now aſſembled in the High-Court of Parliament;

The humble Petition of John Lilburn, Lieut. Col.

In all humility ſheweth,

THAT your petitioner having ſuffered abundance of inhuman, barbarous cruelty, by virtue of an illegal decree made againſt him, in the Star-Chamber, 1637. as by the copy of his petition hereunto annexed, formerly preſented to this honourable Houſe, and by your own Votes made the 4th of May, 1641. (upon the examination of the petition) will appear: Which Votes are as followeth; Firſt, that the ſentence of the Star-Chamber given againſt him is illegal, againſt the liberty of the Subject, and alſo Bloody, Wicked, Cruel, Barbarous, and Tyrannical. Secondly, that reparation ought to be given to him for his impriſonment, ſufferings and loſſes, ſuſtained by that illegal ſentence. And then alſo it was ordered, that care ſhould be taken to draw up his caſe, and tranſmit it to the Lords: but by reaſon of multitude of buſineſs in this honourable Houſe, there hath been no further proceedings in it ſince. And theſe diſtractions coming on, your petitioner took command under the Right Honourable Robert Lord Brook, with whoſe Regiment he adventured his life freely and reſolutely, both at Kenton field, and Brentford, where he was taken priſoner, and carried away to Oxford: where, within a ſhort time after his coming, the King ſent to the caſtle to your petitioner, the now Earl of Kingſton, the Lord Dunſmore, the Lord Matrevers, and the Lord Andover, to woo your petitioner with large proffers of the honour and glory of Court-preferment, to forſake the Parliament's party, and to ingage on his party. Upon the ſlighting and contemning of which, your petitioner was within few days after laid in irons, and kept an exceeding cloſe priſoner, and forced ſeveral times to march into Oxford in irons, to Judge Heath, before whom he was arraigned for High-Treaſon, for drawing his ſword in the cauſe of the Commonwealth, and ſuffered multitude of miſeries, in his almoſt twelve-months captivity there: in which time he loſt above 600 l. in his eſtate that he left behind him at London, (as he is clearly able to make appear.) And immediately after his coming from thence, he took command in the Earl of Mancheſter's army, his commiſſion as Major of foot, bearing date the 7th of October, 1643. which laſted till the 16th of May, 1644. at which time he was authoriſed by Commiſſion as Lieut. Col. to command a Regiment of Dragoons; in which ſervices having been in many engagements, he hopes it will eaſily appear, that he hath not only behaved himſelf honeſtly and faithfully, but alſo valiantly and ſtoutly, in the midſt of many diſcouragements, God crowning ſome of his endeavours with ſucceſs; eſpecially at the taking of Tickel-Caſtle, and Sir Francis Worthley's garriſon, at which place your petitioner was ſhot through his arm. The premiſes conſidered, he humbly beſeecheth this Honourable Aſſembly to perfect that Juſtice, which you ſo happily began for your petitioner, and to give him reparation for his large and tedious impriſonment, and heavy ſufferings by the Star-Chamber decree; he having waited four years with patience for that end, though he loſt by his impriſonment all that he had, and was deprived of a profitable calling, being then in the way of a Factor in the Low-Countries; and alſo to take off the King's fine, and to conſider his ſervice with the Earl of Mancheſter, wherein he faithfully adventured his life, ſpent a great deal of his own money, and loſt at Newark, when Prince Rupert raiſed the ſiege, almoſt 100 l. being ſtripp'd from the crown of the head, to the ſole of the foot, beſides his former loſſes at Kenton and Brentford: And that you will be pleaſed for his preſent ſubſiſtence, to appoint the payment of ſo much of his preſent arrears, as you in your great wiſdoms ſhall think fit to ſupply his urgent and preſſing neceſſities, there being now due to him 600 l. and upwards. And that Col. King may be commanded to account with the petitioner, which formerly he hath refuſed to do (though commanded by his General) and to give him debentures for what is due by the State in his ſervice, and to pay him what he hath received for the petitioner, and detained from him.

And he ſhall pray, &c.
JOHN LILBURN.

The annex'd Petition thus followeth.

To the Houſe of Commons now aſſembled in the High-Court of Parliament;

The humble Petition of John Lilburn priſoner in the Fleet;

In all humility ſheweth,

THAT in December next will be three years, your petitioner upon ſuppoſal of ſending over certain Books of Dr. Baſtwick's, from Holland into England, was by Dr. Lamb's warrant (without any examination at all) ſent to the Gatehouſe priſon, and from thence within three days removed to the Fleet, where he abiding priſoner, in Candlemas-Term following, was proceeded againſt in the Honourable Court of Star-Chamber: where your petitioner appearing (and entring of his name, for want of money, his name was ſtruck out again) and he refuſing to take an Oath to anſwer to all things that ſhould be demanded of him (for that your petitioner conceived that Oath to be dangerous and illegal) without any interrogatory tendred him, for his refuſing the ſaid Oath, he was proſecuted and cenſured in the ſaid Court moſt heavily, being fined 500 l. to the King, and ſent priſoner to the Fleet. And in Eaſter-Term following, was whipped from the

the Fleet to Weſtminſter, with a three-fold knotted cord, receiving at leaſt 200 ſtripes; and then at Weſtminſter, he was ſet on the Pillory the ſpace of two hours, and (over and above the cenſure of the Court) at the Warden of the Fleet's command, was gagged about an hour and a half; after which moſt cruel ſufferings, was again returned to the Fleet cloſe priſoner. When through his ſaid ſufferings, the next morning he being ſick of an extream fever, could not have admittance for his Surgeon to let him blood, or dreſs his ſores till the afternoon of the ſaid day; tho' the Surgeon, in pity to the priſoner, went to Weſtminſter to the Warden himſelf, and your petitioner hath been cloſe priſoner in the Fleet ever ſince, where in a moſt cruel manner he hath been put into iron fetters, both hands and legs, which cauſed a moſt dangerous ſickneſs that continued ſix months; and after ſome ſmall recovery, was again laid in irons, which cauſed at leaſt five months ſickneſs, more dangerous than the former. During which time of ſickneſs, they moſt inhumanly denied his friends to come and ſee him, until they would give them money for their admittance, and they have denied many to come at all; and have beaten and kicked, and otherwiſe moſt ſhamefully abuſed ſuch his friends as came to ſee him in his great diſtreſs, and to bring him food and neceſſaries to ſuſtain his life, and alſo have kept his ſervant from him, and his food. So that if he had not been relieved by ſtealth of his fellow-priſoners, he had been kept from any food at all, for above the ſpace of 10 days together: and the priſoners that out of pity have relieved him, have been moſt cruelly puniſhed, and the Keepers have not forborn to confeſs themſelves, that they ſhould have ſtarved him long ago, had not the priſoners relieved him. And beſides all this, they have moſt cruelly beaten and wounded him, to the hazard of his limbs, and danger of his life, had he not been reſcued and ſaved by the priſoners of the ſame houſe. In which moſt miſerable condition, your poor petitioner hath continued a priſoner for the ſpace of above two years and a half, and is like ſtill to continue in the ſame, under the mercileſs hands of the Warden of the Fleet, who hath denied lawful liberty to his priſoner, for that he hath ſaid, he muſt obſerve the man that hath ſo great a ſway in the Kingdom, intimating the Archbiſhop.

All which his deplored condition, and lamentable miſeries, he moſt humbly preſenteth to this moſt Honourable Aſſembly, beſeeching them to be pleaſed to caſt an eye of compaſſion towards him, and to afford him ſuch relief from his cenſure and hard impriſonment, as may ſeem good to your wiſdoms, who otherwiſe is like to periſh under the hands of mercileſs men.

And your Petitioner ſhall ever pray (as in duty he is bound) to the Lord to bleſs and proſper this Honourable Aſſembly.

JOHN LILBURN.

At the debate of which, there was not a little oppoſition by ſome, who (as I conceive) thought I was not capable of enjoying juſtice, although to my knowledge I never did an act in all my life that put me out of the protection of the law, or that tended to the diſfranchiſing me of being a Denizen and Freeman of England; and therefore ought to enjoy as great a privilege in the enjoyment of the benefit of the Law of England, as any free Denizen of England whatſoever, by what name or title ſoever he be called. The iſſue of which debate, ſo much as I have under the Clerk's hand, thus followeth.

Die Lunæ, 10 Nov. 1645.

Ordered, &c. That the Vote formerly paſſed in this Houſe, concerning the proceedings againſt Lieut. Col. Lilburn in the Star-Chamber, be forthwith tranſmited to the Lords.

Ordered, &c. That it be referred to the Committee of accounts to caſt up and ſtate the accounts of Lieut. Col. Lilburn, and to certify what is due to him, to this Houſe.

H. Elſynge, Cler. Parl. D. Com.

After paſſing theſe Votes, I found quick diſpatch to the Lords; and upon the firſt of December 1645, by ſpecial decree, they took off the fine ſet upon me by the Star-Chamber; and afterwards at their open Bar judicially, upon the 13th of February 1645, appointed me a ſolemn hearing de novo of the whole matter; and aſſigned Mr. John Bradſhaw and Mr. John Cook for my Counſel.

Lieut. Col. John Lilburn's Sufferings, as they were repreſented and proved before the Right Honourable the Houſe of Peers, in Parliament aſſembled, the 13*th day of* February, 1645.

MR. Bradſhaw, and Mr. Cook being aſſigned for Counſel with the ſaid Mr. Lilburn; Mr. Bradſhaw having ſuccinctly, and ſo truly opened the caſe, as if he had been an eye-witneſs of his Client's ſufferings; acquainted their Lordſhips, that the ſame had received a full and ſolemn hearing before a Committee of the honourable Houſe of Commons: upon whoſe report it was by that honourable Houſe, May 4. 1641, reſolved upon the queſtion, That the ſentence of the Star-Chamber given againſt John Lilburn, is illegal, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject; and alſo, Bloody, Wicked, Cruel, Barbarous, and Tyrannical; and likewiſe further reſolved upon the queſtion, That reparation ought to be given to Mr. Lilburn, for his impriſonment, ſufferings and loſſes, ſuſtained by that illegal ſentence. And now, my Lords, they have tranſmitted them to your Lordſhips, by whoſe noble favour and juſtice we are now before your Honours, to lay open the illegality of that ſentence, and all the proceedings thereupon, and to crave your Lordſhips juſtice for reparations, proportionable to our Client's ſufferings.

And in the firſt place he preſented an Order, whereby Mr. Lilburn was firſt illegally attached, and committed to the priſon of the Gatehouſe, which was read in theſe words.

Sexto Decemb. Anno Dom. 1637.

The Engliſh of which, thus followeth:

The

The 6th of Decemb. 1637.

There iſſued an attachment directed to Wragge and Flamſteed, for the taking of the body of John Lilburn, of the City of London, and to bring immediately, &c. Signed by Lambe, Gwyn, and Aylett. By direction of the Court, Baker, Clerk Chaplain.

Examined by Edward Latham,
Deputy of the Regiſter.

Which order being read, Mr. Bradſhaw obſerved that the original impriſonment itſelf was illegal, becauſe they never convented Mr. Lilburn to ſpeak for himſelf, nor examined him upon any crime. But, my Lords, it is no marvel that ſuch kind of injuſtice as this, proceeded from thoſe High Commiſſioners, becauſe it was their uſual practice to be attachers, judges, goalers, and executioners themſelves, without regard of any legal way of proceedings. He then deſired their Lordſhips, that the ſentence againſt Mr. Lilburn in the Star-Chamber might alſo be read, which was accordingly done; viz.

In Cam. Stel. coram Conc. ibidem 13 Die Febr. Anno Decimo tertio Car. Reg.

WHereas upon information to this Court, the 9th of February, by Sir John Banks Knt. his Majeſty's Attorney-General, that John Lilburn and John Wharton, then preſent at the Bar, were the 24th of Jan. laſt, ordered to be examined upon interrogatories, touching their unlawful printing, importing, publiſhing, and diſperſing of libellous and ſeditious Books, contrary to the decree of this Court, which was verified by Affidavit, and being brought up to the office to appear and be examined, the ſaid Lilburn refuſed to * appear; and both of them denied to take an Oath to make true anſwer to interrogatories, as appeared by the certificate of Mr. Goad, Deputy-Clerk of this Court: The Court did on that day order that their appearances ſhould then be recorded, they being preſent in Court as aforeſaid; and that in reſpect the ſaid delinquents did then again contemptuouſly refuſe to take their Oaths, tendered unto them in open Court, they ſhould be remanded to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain cloſe priſoners, until they conform themſelves in obedience to take their Oaths, and be examined; and that unleſs they did take their Oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday night then next following, and now laſt paſt, their Lordſhips would on this ſitting day, proceed to a cenſure againſt them for their contempts therein.

Now this day the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton, being again brought unto the Bar, his Majeſty's ſaid Attorney informed this Honourable Court, that they ſtill continued in their former obſtinacy, and contemptuouſly refuſed to take their Oaths, to make true anſwer to the † interrogatories, although they had been ſent for, and their Oaths offered to be given unto them, by Mr. Goad, Deputy-Clerk of this Court; who now certified the ſame in Court. And therefore his Majeſty's ſaid Attorney humbly prayed on his Majeſty's behalf, that their Lordſhips would now proceed to cenſure againſt the ſaid delinquents, for their great contempts and diſobedience therein. Whereupon their Lordſhips endeavoured by fair perſuaſions to draw them to conformity and obedience; and withal offered, that if yet they would ſubmit and take their Oaths, their Lordſhips would accept thereof, and not proceed to cenſure againſt them. But ſuch was the inſufferable diſobedience and contempt of the ſaid delinquents, that they ſtill perſiſted in their former obſtinacy, and wilfully refuſed to take their Oaths. In reſpect whereof, the whole Court did with an unanimous conſent declare and adjudge the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton guilty of a very high contempt, and offence of dangerous conſequence, and evil example, and worthy to undergo a very ſharp, exemplary and ſevere cenſure, which may deter others from the like preſumptuous boldneſs, in refuſing to take a legal  Oath; without which, many great and exorbitant offences to the prejudice and danger of his Majeſty, his Kingdoms, and loving Subjects might go away undiſcovered, and unpuniſhed. And therefore their Lordſhips have now ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton, ſhall be remanded to the Fleet, there to remain until they conform themſelves in obedience to the orders of this Court, and that they ſhall pay 500 l. a-piece for their ſeveral fines to his Majeſty's uſe; and before their enlargements out of the Fleet, become bound with good ſureties for their good behaviour. And to the end that others may be more deterred from daring to offend in the like kind hereafter, the Court hath further ordered and decreed, That the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall be whipp'd through the ſtreet, from the Priſon of the Fleet unto the Pillory, to be erected at ſuch time, and in ſuch place as this Court ſhall hold fit and direct; and that both he and the ſaid Wharton, ſhall be both then ſet in the ſaid Pillory, and from thence be returned to the Fleet, there to remain according to this Decree.

John Arthur Dep.

At the concluding of which, Mr. Bradſhaw obſerved, that this ſentence was felo de ſe, guilty of its own death; the ground whereof being, becauſe Mr. Lilburn refuſed to take an Oath, to anſwer to all ſuch queſtions as ſhould be demanded of him, it being contrary to the laws of God, Nature, and the Kingdom, for any man to be his own accuſer: the execution of which cruel and bloody ſentence, was proved by ſeveral witneſſes of quality and good repute upon Oath at their Lordſhips bar, the ſubſtance of whoſe teſtimony was;

In the firſt place,

Mr. Thomas Smith Merchant, upon his Oath declared to their Lordſhips, that he ſaw Mr. Lilburn tyed to a Cart at Fleet-bridge, being ſtripp'd from the waiſt upward, and whipp'd from thence to Weſtminſter; and that ſo near as he was able to judge, every two, three or four ſteps he had a laſh, with a whip that he was ſure had two or three cords tied full of knots, and for the number he did not judge them ſo few as 500, and he thought that if he ſhould ſay 500 and 500; he ſhould not ſay amiſs: but 500 he was confident was the leaſt. And that he ſaw him ſet upon the Pillory, &c. the Officers being very cruel towards him, or any that ſpoke unto him.

The next witneſs was Mrs. Mary Dorman; the ſubſtance of whoſe teſtimony upon Oath was, that ſhe ſaw Mr. Lilburn whipp'd from Fleet-bridge to Weſtminſter, in ſuch a barbarous and cruel manner, that

* Lilburn did enter his Name, but refuſing to give them Money, they put out his Name again.

† They never ſhewed the Interrogatories to Lilburn, though he deſired the ſight of them, that ſo he might know what he did ſwear to.

 The ſum of which was, you ſhall ſwear to make true anſwer to all things that are asked you, ſo help you God.

that ſhe was not able to expreſs it, and that ſhe did believe that both his ſhoulders were ſwelled almoſt as big as a penny-loaf, with the bruiſes of the knotted cords; and that ſhe did ſee him ſet upon the Pillory immediately, above the ſpace of two hours bare-headed, the ſun ſhining very hot, and he took occaſion to declare the unjuſtneſs of his ſentence, upon which the Warden of the Fleet cauſed him to be gagged, above an hour, and did it with ſuch cruelty, that he made his mouth to bleed.

Mr. Higgs his Surgeon teſtified upon Oath, to this effect; that he did not ſee his patient Mr. Lilburn whipp'd, but being deſired to perform the office of a Surgeon to him, he that day dreſt his back, which was one of the miſerableſt that ever he did ſee; for the wails in his back, made by his cruel whipping, were bigger than Tobacco-pipes, and that he ſaw him ſet in the Pillory, and gagged.

And Mr. Thomas Hawes upon Oath teſtified to this effect; that he did ſee Mr. Lilburn ſet upon the Pillory, above (as he judged) the ſpace of two hours, the Sun ſhining very hot, and they would not ſuffer him to have any cover upon his head: and he taking occaſion to ſpeak of the Biſhops cruelty towards him, and how unjuſtly they had cauſed him to be dealt with, the Warden of the Fleet cauſed him to be gagged in ſuch a cruel manner, as if he would have torn his jaws in pieces, inſomuch that the blood came out of his mouth.

In the next place, A ſecond ſentence made in the Inner Star-Chamber was read, which thus followeth.

At the Inner Star-Chamber, the 18th of April, Anno Dom. 1638.
Preſent Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treaſurer, &c.

WHereas John Lilburn priſoner in the Fleet, by ſentence in the Star-Chamber, did this day ſuffer condign puniſhment for his ſeveral offences, by whipping at a Cart, and ſtanding in the Pillory; and as their Lordſhips were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the ſaid execution, audaciouſly and wickedly did not only utter ſundry ſcandalous ſpeeches, but likewiſe ſcattered divers copies of ſeditious Books amongſt the people, that beheld the ſaid execution; for which very thing, amongſt other offences of like nature, he hath been cenſured in the ſaid Court, by the aforeſaid ſentence: it is therefore by their Lordſhips ordered, that the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould be laid alone with irons on his hands and legs, in the Wards of the Fleet; where the baſeſt and meaneſt ſort of priſoners are uſed to be put: and that the Warden of the Fleet, take ſpecial care to hinder the reſort of any perſons whatſoever unto him; and particularly, that he be not ſupplied with money from any friend: and that he take ſpecial notice of all Letters, Writings, and Books brought unto him, and ſeize and deliver the ſame unto their Lordſhips: and take notice from time to time who they be that reſort unto the ſaid priſon, to viſit the ſaid Lilburn, or to ſpeak with him, and inform the Board thereof. And it was laſtly ordered that all perſons that ſhall be hereafter produced to receive corporal puniſhment, according to ſentence of that Court, or by order of the Board, ſhall have their garments ſearched before they be brought forth, and neither writing nor other thing ſuffered to be about them; and their hands likewiſe to be bound, during the time they are under puniſhment. Whereof, together with the other premiſes, the ſaid Warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have eſpecial care, that this their Lordſhips order be accordingly obſerved.

Examined per Dudley Carleton.

And the execution of this latter ſentence in a moſt barbarous and inhuman manner, was punctually proved by ſufficient witneſſes, as followeth; viz. Mr. Higgs his Surgeon again teſtified, that that night Mr. Lilburn ſuffered, he was had back to the Fleet, and he repairing to Dr. Grant, to crave his advice, he adviſed him to let his patient blood, to prevent a fever; and he accordingly came the next morning to the Fleet to let his patient blood, and dreſs his ſores, but he found him locked up cloſe in a room, and was by the Officers of the Fleet, denied acceſs unto him. Whereupon he immediately went to the Warden, being then at Weſtminſter, who denied him acceſs to the ſaid Mr. Lilburn, till the afternoon that he came home; which was a great act of cruelty, and much to the danger of Mr. Lilburn's health, and welfare: and the next day they removed him down to the Common Goal, where they laid him in irons, and ſeveral times wounded him, to the extream hazard of his life, and ſeveral times denied me acceſs to him in his extremity.

Dr. Hubbard, Juſtice of the Peace, made Oath to this effect; that when Mr. Lilburn was priſoner in the Fleet, he was deſired as a Phyſician to viſit him: and going ſo to do, he was again and again denied acceſs to him: but upon much importunity to the Warden, he was admitted to him, whom he found in an extream violent fever, lying in Irons upon both hands and legs, to the extream hazard of his life.

Mrs. Mary Dorman further declared, that after Mr. Lilburn had ſuffered, ſhe went often to viſit him, who was laid in irons, and his friends denied acceſs to him; and that the officers of the Fleet ſtrongly endeavoured to ſtarve him: ſo that many times his friends were forced to bring his meat to the poor mens bag, and give them money to convey it to him through a hole in a wall betwixt them and him. Mr. Thomas Hawes further declared, that after Mr. Lilburn ſuffered, he often went to viſit him, and was beat by the Goalers, and was in danger to have loſt his life for ſo doing; and that they ſo ſtrongly laboured to ſtarve Mr. Lilburn, that they were forced to convey his diet to him by the poor men that begged at the grate: but the Goalers finding out that Mr. Lilburn got his diet that way, they dealt ſo cruelly with the poor men, that Mr. Lilburn was deprived of that way of relief, and then his friends got the ſon of one Archer that was priſoner in the next room to him, for accuſing the Deputy of Ireland for murdering one Eſmond, to convey his victuals to him: which was done by ſtealth, through a hole where a board was pull'd up in his floor, when the reſt of the priſoners were at the Chapel at ſervice; and, my Lords, divers times the conveying of his meat to him, coſt him and his friends, upon the priſoners, &c. more than the meat itſelf.

Robert Ellis ſometime a fellow priſoner with Mr. Lilburn in the Fleet, upon Oath declared before their Lordſhips, that the Officers of the Fleet after they brought Mr. Lilburn into the Common Wards, uſed him very barbarouſly and cruelly, laying him for a long time in irons, keeping his friends from him, and his victuals; and ſeveral times had like to have ſlain and murdered him, and he verily believes had effected it, if he had not help'd him; for which they took his bed from him, and put him off the charity, and kept him five weeks in a dungeon, and had like to have murdered him, and afterwards removed him to the King's-Bench, that ſo they might the more eaſily have their wills of Mr. Lilburn, &c.

Their Lordſhips being ſatisfied of the Injuſtice and Illegality of the proceedings, Mr. Bradſhaw ſaid, that he conceived no man's ſufferings in the Kingdom had been ſo great as his Client's were: for a Gentleman to be ſo cruelly tortured and whipped, pillory'd, gagged, cloſe impriſoned, ironed, beat and wounded, and that contrary to Law, is a cruelty unheard of, and therefore hoped that for ſuch unparallelled ſufferings, and oppreſſions, the fair hand of their Lordſhips honourable Juſtice would give and reach him forth unparallelled damages, and though many of his Judges that did him injuſtice be dead, yet he hoped the hand of Juſtice of their Honours, joined with the honourable Houſe of Commons will be ſo long, as to reach their living and ſurviving eſtates, and out of them, &c. make him ſpeedy, large and unparallelled reparations.

Mr. Cook then ſpoke in the behalf of Mr. Lilburn (and afterwards printed his argument) and ſaid the puniſhment inflicted upon him may be reduced to four heads.

(1.) Impriſonment, whereby a man is buried alive, loſes the comfort and benefit of his five ſenſes, and is made Corpus immobile legis, the unmoveable ſubject of the law, or as a dead carcaſe. 'Tis true, that in itſelf it is the eaſieſt of all corporal puniſhments: but the continuance of it, makes it ſuch a lingring conſumption, that it is better to be upon the rack an hour, than to be impriſoned a year: as it is better to be once wet to the ſkin, than to be ſubject to a perpetual dropping, eſpecially for an active ſpirit: there is no ſuch torment as to deprive him of liberty; for active Theſeus was condemned only to ſit ſtill: there is no end of ſuch a miſery, as the Heathen perſecuting Tyrant ſaid, Nondum tibi redii in gratiam; to put a man out of his pain, was always counted a favour. But Mr. Lilburn's impriſonment was aggravated by three ſteps or gradations.

1. A cloſe impriſonment, not the deareſt friend to come to him; we do not find that any of the primitive Chriſtians were uſed ſo by the Tyrants, for then that heavy charge might be anſwered in the Scripture, I was in priſon, and ye viſited me not; extraordinary matters of ſtate and high concernments always excepted: but the Surgeon was not permitted ſome time to come to Mr. Lilburn to dreſs him, nor the Phyſician when he was in a fever; a cruelty unheard of amongſt the Turks: for they are careful of their ſlaves in their ſickneſs, and fatten them, that they may indure their blows; but it is too probable that thoſe which were Mr. Lilburn's malicious enemies, did too much thirſt after his blood.

2. The Keepers were ordered to take care that no money be conveyed to him, which argues that they had a deſire to ſtarve him: the Prophet ſaith, it is better to die by the ſword, than famine, which is the greateſt of all torments; for all puniſhments may be undergone by patience, but only hunger: which the more any man thinks by patience to overcome, the more violent it is. Undoubtedly had it not been for the pity of ſome poor reſolute fellow-priſoners, Mr. Lilburn had been ſtarved to death: far worſe than any of the four Roman puniſhments, which were lapidatio, combuſtio, decollatio, ſtrangulatio, ſtoning, burning, beheading, and ſtrangling. How ſeverely, yet moſt juſtly, did the ſame Judges ſeveral times puniſh the intent to poiſon or deſtroy another man? The going about to murder, nay the giving of the lye, becauſe it is preparatory to murder, by provoking quarrels, was cenſurable in that Court, à multo fortiori, much more from the ſtronger, then in this caſe uſed, where there was ſo much cruelty inflicted, that death might probably have enſued, had not God by his extraordinary mercy ſupported him, in thoſe ſad afflictions, thoſe unjuſt Judges for tranſgreſſing not only the bounds of humanity, but all the rules of their own ordinary Juſtice, ought to make Mr. Lilburn anſwerable ſatisfaction.

3. This impriſonment was for about three years, until he petitioned the Parliament. Many times the firſt motions of anger are not in a man's own power; becauſe he would not accuſe himſelf as they deſired, they might have in a paſſion committed him, and the Sun might have gone down upon their wrath; nay, the Moon might have made her peragration, or the ſummer ſeaſon might have melted their frozen conſciences, or the winter cold have allayed the heat of their malice, or the Sun might have made his revolution, but their malice continued three years; and had not he been delivered by the Juſtice of the Parliament, in probability might have continued for ever.

(2.) Whipping, a moſt painful and ſhameful puniſhment; Flagellations and Scourgings being for ſlaves and incorrigible rogues, and hedge-robbers. In undecimo Elizab. one Cartwright brought a ſlave from Ruſſia, and would ſcourge him cruelly, for which he was queſtioned; and it was reſolved, that England was too pure an air for ſlaves to breathe in, and it was often reſolved in the Star-Chamber, that no Gentleman was to be whipp'd for any offence whatſoever: it being well known that John Lilburn's anceſtors have been ancient Gentlemen, and that which theſe Judges could not be ignorant of, eſpecially the Earl-Marſhal, who is preſumed to know all the ancient Gentry in the Kingdom. But the like whipping was never read of, amongſt the Aſſyrians, Perſians, Grecians, or Romans. For,

1. It was from the Fleet to Weſtminſter (above a mile diſtance) a great concourſe and confluence of people looking upon him, as if he had been ſome miſerable ſlave.

2. He received every two or three ſteps a blow, 500 ſtrokes at the leaſt; for one Mr. Smith, a Merchant that went along with him, teſtified that ſo far as he was able to judge, he received 500 or 1000, but of the firſt he was moſt certain; and this was with a treble-corded whip, with at leaſt twenty knots upon it.

Amongſt the Romans no malefactor had ever above forty ſtripes, and every ſtroke ſtood for three ſtripes, for the whip was of three thongs; and but one knot at the end of every thong, St. Paul received thirty-nine ſtripes, which was but thirteen blows. Not long ſince in Orleans, a Prieſt was ſentenced to be whipp'd for fornication, having abuſed a poor maid, telling her that their popiſh St. Francis would come and lie with her ſuch a night, at which time he perſonated and feigned himſelf to be St. Francis, and was taken in bed with her; and it was earneſtly preſſed by the King's Advocates, that he might receive fourteen blows with a three-corded whip, which is conſtantly uſed for ſuch caſtigations, tions, becauſe it was an abominable wickedneſs: but the Judges would not ſuffer him to have above thirteen blows, becauſe ampliandi ſunt favores, favours are to be inlarged. And in doubtful matters it muſt always be preſumed for clemency and gentleneſs; according to which account, Mr. Lilburn received 10000 ſtripes: for in every blow there was twenty ſtripes, by reaſon of the twenty knots, which being multiplied is 10000, and in every ſtripe there was ſhame and pain, compreſſion of the fleſh, bruiſings and effuſion of blood.

(3.) The Pillory, a puniſhment ſomething painful, but exceeding ſhameful, and moſt terrible to a generous nature, to ſtand two hours in the open view of all men, as if he had been unworthy to tread upon the earth, the ſun ſhining very hot upon him, and not ſuffered to keep on his hat; and this immediately after his cruel whipping, that ſo they might put him to all the torture and pain that they could, argues abundance of wrath and malice.

This puniſhment of ſtanding upon the Pillory, was firſt invented for Mountebanks and Cheats, that having gotten upon banks and forms, to wrong and abuſe the people, were exalted in the ſame kind, to ſtand conſpicuous to the view and open ſhame of the people; but for a Gentleman to be ſo ſerved, was never heard of, unleſs by that cruel Court.

(4.) Gagging, an unmanly and barbarous cruelty, to be exerciſed upon beaſts, not men, for man differs from brutes, both ratione & oratione, in reaſon and ſpeech; a puniſhment never heard of in any age: cutting out of tongues, and perforation in caſes of blaſphemy have been heard of, but never in a matter of ſuch a nature; and this to continue for above an hour, till the blood guſh'd out of his mouth, as if they would have pluck'd his jaws in pieces, and all this for nothing; O inſufferable torments!

So that by his impriſonment he was made a ſtock, a dead trunk, or picture of a man, that hath eyes, and ſees not, hands, and handles not, &c. By whipping they endeavoured to make him a rogue, or a ſlave; by the third puniſhment of the pillory, to make him a cheater, guilty of forgery and perjury; and by gagging, to make him a beaſt, and ſo upon the whole matter to deprive him of his reaſonable ſoul, ſuch cruelties that were never invented but by Tygers and Wolves, in human ſhapes, feritas Luporum, in humana figura. But then the perſons that were ſo cruel and tyrannical aggravates the offence.

1. This cruelty was commanded to be executed by an eminent Court of Juſtice, profeſſing Chriſtianity, peſſima eſt injuſtitia quæ fit ſub colore juſtitiæ: 'tis the greateſt injuſtice to oppreſs and do injury, under a pretence of Juſtice. How often was it reſolved in that Court, that for a Juſtice of Peace or Conſtable to commit a riot, was ten times more ſeverely puniſhable than in a common perſon, becauſe it is to uſe, or rather abuſe that ſword of authority, to commit or countenance an unlawful action, which was ordained and put into their hands to ſuppreſs it.

2. The Eminency of the perſons augments the offence, qualitas perſonæ auget peccatum; for a Gentleman to act againſt the rule of the Law and Gentility, is more reprehenſible than in vulgar perſons. It was called the Court of Star-Chamber, from the eminency of the perſons, which were Judges: Stars of the greater magnitudes, as being the higheſt Court of ordinary Juſtice; but Mr. Lilburn's Judges, inſtead of putting on the garment of Juſtice, were cloathed from head to feet, and their conſcience oiled and moiſtned, with cruelty and injuſtice, mixed with the moſt poiſoned malice that ever entered into the hearts of any Judges.

And though ſome of them be dead, yet Juſtice lives though the party be dead; whatſoever becomes of them, their eſtates ought to make ſatisfaction according to their own rules, qui non luet in corpore, ſalvit in burſa; he that ſuffers not in his body, muſt ſuffer in his purſe.

A principal actor in this bloody tragedy, was the Lord-Keeper Coventry, not leſs eminent in cruelty than in place, Judge of the higheſt ſeat of mercy, the Chancery, which abated the edge of the Law, when it is too keen; for the chief Judge of mercy to degenerate into a ſavage cruelty, not heard of amongſt the Barbarians, how heinous is it? Not to ſpeak any thing of the decapitated Archbiſhop, that monſter of cruelty, and ſubtlety, whoſe eſtate we fear is dead with him, and therefore little can be expected from it.

The Biſhop of London, then Lord-Treaſurer, was a principal ſentencer of Mr. Lilburn; by their own Canons, no Biſhop ought to have a hand in blood, becauſe they pretend to be mild ſhepherds, but cruelty was their genius.

The Earl of Arundel was of an imbittered ſpirit againſt Mr. Lilburn, nothing but corporal puniſhment would allay the heat of his malice; who being Earl-Marſhal, could not be ignorant that John Lilburn was a Gentleman: for him that by his place was to protect all Gentlemen from injuries, and ſhould ſcorn to be active in the inflicting ſuch corporal ignominious cruel puniſhments upon a Gentleman, is a tranſcendent tranſgreſſion againſt the laws of ſtate and honour. It hath been cenſurable in that Court, to ſpeak contemptuous words of a Gentleman; and how often had he ordered ſatisfaction, for ſaying ſuch a one is no Gentleman? And yet the ſame court and perſons not only to ſay a Gentleman is a rogue, but ſo to uſe him, as Mr. Lilburn was, is the greateſt ſcandal to the publick Juſtice of the Kingdom, that hath been heard of.

The Judges aſſiſtants, that are called the Fathers of the Law, and are ſaid to carry Law in their breaſts, for them to begin and promote ſuch an unjuſt and illegal ſentence, for them that are ſet as Centinels to watch over and preſerve the peoples liberties, to betray a poor Gentleman into the hands of mercileſs men, was an offence of an exceeding high nature: for had they declared the illegality of thoſe proceedings, and proteſted againſt it, as by virtue of their places (in duty) they ought to have done, it might have prevented the ſentence. If the proceeding had been regular by informations, and examinations, or ore tenus, as it was not, unleſs there had been ſome direct proof or ſpeaking circumſtance or very probable preſumption, that Mr. Lilburn had been guilty of ſome high crime; it had been a grievous thing in them to have aſſiſted in ſo cruel puniſhments. But when the pretence was no other, but concerning ſome of Dr. Baſtwick's, Mr. Burton's, or Mr. Prynne's Books, which they knew could not be any breach of the peace, and that in the Star-Chamber, where there was no information, as in Mr. Lilburn's caſe, to adminiſter an Oath, was all one with the High-Commiſſion, and directly contrary to the petition of right, in 3 Car. and Juſtice Jones had no reaſon for inflicting the corporal puniſhment.

But becauſe Mr. Lilburn was a young man, therefore it was fit he ſhould be puniſhed: is not this to turn Juſtice into Wormwood? Such Judges have ever been the moſt dangerous peſts to a State and Kingdom, and in former times for leſs offence, moſt ſeverely puniſhed in their perſons and eſtates. The Lord Cottington thirſted exceedingly after the blood of this poor Gentleman, and the High-Commiſſioners had their hands as deep as any of the reſt, in regard that by their warrant he was firſt committed: the moſt unjuſt and tyrannical that ever was heard of, to command a poor Gentleman to be ſent to priſon, without conventing him before them, or asking him whether he was guilty of any miſdemeanor; a meer uſurpation of authority, taking the ſword of Juſtice into their own hands, not caring to deſtroy a poor Gentleman, ſo as they might curry favour with the Prelates their grand Patrons; thoſe High-Commiſſioners making themſelves Judges, Goalers, and Executioners, and what not, to deſtroy the innocent.

It is conſiderable what puniſhment the Goalers and Executioners of this cruel ſentence have deſerved: for however if a writ be directed to a Sheriff, commanding him to take the body of one who is a Peer of the Realm, or a privileged perſon, the Officer is excuſed by his warrant; yet when puniſhments are clearly againſt the Law of God, Nature, and Nations, which prohibit all ſuch cruelties and inhumanities; to make them bleed for the blood of Mr. Lilburn, would be an honourable piece of Juſtice, and a precedent of much ſafety to the ſubjects in after-times, and Officers would not dare to be ſo unmercifully cruel; as the Sheriffs ſmarted for the Ship-money, though they had proceſs from the Exchequer.

Mr. Lilburn's ſufferings are beyond expreſſion, and no honeſt heart but is feelingly ſenſible of every blow that was given him; in his Impriſonment, Whipping, Pillory, Gagging, Beatings, Hungerbitings, and the Irons laid upon him, every true-hearted Engliſhman, that ſtands for the laws and liberties of the ſubject, was ſo uſed, and abuſed; for it might have been any ſuch man's caſe, as well as his. His eſtate quite exhauſted by their cruelties, his trade loſt, whereby he gained his livelihood, being before that time in a hopeful way of a Merchant, and well known to be very induſtrious in his calling; a man active for the Publick, and by his merits hath procured the title of Lieutenant-Colonel, in the preſent wars. What damages the Parliament will be pleaſed to adjudge and order him, he humbly ſubmits to their great Wiſdoms and honourable Juſtice: certainly not any of them would have ſuffered ſo much for ten thouſand pounds.

It is the Lord's great mercy that he is yet alive, having conflicted with, and gone through ſuch a ſea of puniſhments and miſeries. True it is, that in point of reparations, there is no proportion between money and ſuch corporal puniſhments, to a generous ſpirit: yet as there was never more indignity and a greater diſhonour to the Juſtice of the Kingdom, than by this wicked ſentence, and the cruel execution thereof; thereby proclaiming it to all the world that an Engliſh Gentleman muſt be made a ſlave, to ſatisfy the malicious and virulent humours of a tyrannical Court of Juſtice:

So it will be a very great honour and reparation to the publick Juſtice of this Land, to give and adjudge Mr. Lilburn exemplary and proportionable damages, to be levied out of the eſtates of his unjuſt and malicious Judges, through whoſe injuſtice he not only ſuffered ſuch cruelties for three years, that not one of them would have ſuffered the like, nor received one of his ſtripes for many thouſands; but loſt his trade and livelihood.

The judicial law was blood for blood, an eye for an eye, tooth for tooth, &c. Daniel's accuſers were caſt into the den of Lions, with their wives and children, though Daniel had no hurt by a miracle of mercy; by the equity and morality whereof, Mr. Lilburn ought to have good and proportionable reparation out of the eſtates of his unjuſt Judges and Tormentors, who ſought for his blood: but that God preſerved him by his extraordinary love and favour.

That all drooping ſpirits may chear up and be incouraged, that Juſtice will run down like a mighty ſtream, when it ſhall be executed upon the greateſt offenders: as now there is good hopes that Mr. Lilburn ſhall by ordinance of Parliament have ſpeedily good damages, anſwerable to his great ſufferings, ordered and adjudged him, to be raiſed out of the eſtates of his unjuſt Judges, that may be paid unto him without further expence, who hath been at ſuch extraordinary charges about the ſame, that ſo his reparation may be not only juſt, but ſeaſonable, by which he ſhall be obliged to venture his life, and all that is dear to him as formerly he hath done, for his honourable Judges in Parliament aſſembled.

Whereupon the Lords made the following Order.

Die Veneris, 13 Feb. 1645.

" Whereas the cauſe of John Lilburn, Gent. came " this day to a hearing at the Bar by his Counſel, " being tranſmitted from the Houſe of Commons, " concerning a ſentence pronounced againſt him " in the Star-Chamber, 13 Feb. Anno 13. Car. " Reg. and after an examination of the whole pro- " ceedings, and a due conſideration of the ſaid " ſentence; it is this day adjudged, ordered, and " determined by the Lords in Parliament aſſem- " bled, that the ſaid ſentence, and all proceed- " ings thereupon, ſhall forthwith be for ever to- " tally vacated, obliterated, and taken off the " file in all Courts where they are yet remaining, " as illegal, and moſt unjuſt, againſt the liberty " of the ſubject, and law of the land, and Magna " Charta, and unfit to continue upon record: And " that the ſaid Lilburn ſhall be for ever abſolutely " freed, and totally diſcharged from the ſaid ſen- " tence, and all proceedings thereupon, as fully " and amply, as though never any ſuch thing had " been. And that all eſtreat and proceſs in the Court " of Exchequer, for levying of any fine, (if any " ſuch be) ſhall be wholly cancelled and made " void, any thing to the contrary in any wiſe not- " withſtanding."

Joh. Browne, Cleric. Parliamentor.

But not aſſigning me any reparations in that Decree (the doing of which the Houſe of Commons left unto them, and the Lords according to former cuſtom looked upon to be their right in law to do,) I prayed their aſſigning me particular reparations according to Law and Juſtice, out of the eſtates of my unjuſt Judges, that had done me ſo much wrong; upon which new addreſs to them, they did upon the 5th of March, 1645, order and decree, and aſſigned to be paid unto the ſaid John Lilburn, the ſum of 2000 l. for his reparations, which for many reaſons (as their being aiding in the wars to the King, &c.) they fixed upon the Eſtates real and perſonal perſonal of Francis Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet; and afterwards by another decree for the preſent levying thereof, out of their lands, at eight years purchaſe (as they were before the wars,) with the allowance of Intereſt at 8 l. per centum, per annum, in caſe of obſtruction; for all or any part of it: and to this purchaſe cauſed an ordinance to be drawn up, which fully paſſed their Houſe the 15, 20, and 27th of April 1646. and afterwards tranſmitted it to the Houſe of Commons, where by reaſon of my bloody adverſary old Sir Henry Vane's Intereſts, and of my impriſonment by Mancheſter's means in the Tower of London, it lay aſleep till the 1ſt of Auguſt 1648. at which time 7 or 8000 of my true friends in London, ſigned and cauſed to be delivered a Petition to the Houſe of Commons for my liberty, and the paſſing of the ſaid Ordinance. Whereupon the Houſe made this Order.

Die Martis, 1 Auguſti 1648.

Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Lord Carre, Col. Boſwel, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Holland, Mr. Copley.

" It is referred to this Committee, or any five " of them, to conſider how Colonel John Lil- " burn may have ſuch ſatisfaction and allowance " for his ſufferings and loſſes, as was formerly in- " tended him by this Houſe."

Henry Elſynge, Cler. Parl. Dom. Com.

Upon which Order, I got the Committee to meet, and preferred a petition to them. Upon which petition, the Parliament having diſpoſed of all that part of the Lord Cottington's eſtate that I ſhould have had, unto the Lord Say, and alſo compounded with Sir Francis Windebank's heir; the ſaid Committee were pleaſed to fix it entirely upon the Lord-Keeper's eſtate, as the principal guilty man: of which, when the young Lord Coventry, his ſon and heir, heard thereof in France, he came poſting to England as in amaze, fearing what ſuch a precedent might bring upon him, if his Father's eſtate [then dead] ſhould be compell'd to make me ſatisfaction; he being ſo capital in Injuſtice, that if that courſe ſhould be taken, his eſtate left him by his Father [if it were trebled] would not ſatisfy for his Father's palpable Injuſtice committed in his lifetime. And Mancheſter being in the ſaid bryers with his Father, being as unjuſt as the other, and having a Brother (viz. George Montague) and other conſiderable Intereſts in the Houſe of Commons, ſo plied their friends there, that they put a ſtop to the ſecond reading of the aforeſaid Ordinance. Which I firſt fully underſtood by the Speaker's means, then my great pretended friend, who one day began to reaſon with a Member of the Houſe [and my ſpecial Friend] about the unreaſonableneſs to fix my reparations upon the eſtate of the deceaſed Lord Coventry; nay, or to give me any reparations at all out of the eſtates of thoſe perſons that did me wrong, for fear the precedent in time might reach to themſelves: " For Sir, ſaid the Speaker, [as " the Member told me] if my ſon and heir ſhould " be liable in law, to make ſatisfaction to all thoſe " men [out of that eſtate I ſhould leave him] that " I have in the eye of the law wronged, [by ſign- " ing warrants, orders and decrees by the command " of my ſuperiors] he would ſoon be a beggar, al- " though I ſhould leave him 5 or 6000 l. per " annum; and therefore deſired the ſaid Member's " concurrence with him. And for the clamorous " importunity [as they called it] of me and my " friends, to give me reparations; but yet to do " it in ſuch a way, that the precedent might not " in future make themſelves ſmart for their In- " juſtice to particular men." Of which, when the ſaid Member told me, he ſaid they were reſolved to make the Commonwealth my Pay-maſter out of the publick Treaſury, and colour over the juſtneſs of it with this pretence, " That Cottington's eſtate, &c. " formerly aſſigned me, they had ſince diſpoſed of " for the Commonwealth's uſe, to the Lord Say; " and therefore now it would be no Injuſtice to the " Commonwealth [although in the Star-Chamber " it never wronged me] to pay me my reparation." And ſo finding I was like to be baffled, I delivered the under-written to every individual Member of the honourable Houſe of Commons.

The Humble Remembrance of Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, Septemb. 4. 1648.

Honoured Sir,

VOuchſafe to take notice and ſeriouſly to conſider, That the firſt week this preſent Parliament ſat, which is now almoſt full eight years ago, I preſented an humble petition to the Houſe of Commons, for juſtice and right againſt the cruel Judges of the High-Commiſſion Court, and the Star-Chamber; and I had the honour [the ſame day it was preſented] to be one of the firſt priſoners in England that was ſet at liberty by this Parliament, and alſo received a ſpeedy, full, fair, and candid proceeding, in the hearing and examining my tyrannical ſufferings: but by reaſon of multiplicity of publick buſineſs, and other great obſtructions, I have not as yet been able to attain to the full end of my legal and juſt expectation and right, viz. reparations for my long, ſad and tormenting ſufferings by the foreſaid unjuſt and unrighteous Judges.

Be pleaſed alſo favourably to take notice, That upon the firſt of Auguſt laſt, there was an humble Petition preſented to the honourable Houſe of Commons, ſubſcribed by many thouſands of honeſt Citizens, &c. humbly to deſire you to put me in full poſſeſſion of all your by-paſt juſt votes about my foreſaid ſufferings: upon reading and debating of which petition, as in anſwer to that particular of it, your Houſe were pleaſed to make this enſuing Order.

Die Martis, 1 Auguſti 1648.

Lord Carre, Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Col. Boſwel, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Copley, Mr. Holland.

" It is referred to this Committee, or any five " of them, to conſider how Col. John Lilburn, " may have ſuch ſatisfaction and allowance for his " ſufferings and loſſes, as was formerly intended " him by this Houſe."

Henry Elſinge, Cler. Dom. Com.

Unto which ſaid Committee at their firſt ſitting, I preſented a Petition; the copy of which thus followeth.

To

To the Honourable the Committee of the Houſe of Commons, appointed to conſider of Lieut. Col. Lilburn's buſineſs, in reference to the Star-Chamber;

The Humble Petition of Lieut. Col. John Lilburn;

Sheweth,

THAT beſides your Petitioner's ſufferings by reaſon of his baniſhment into the Low-Countries, he was firſt committed by Dr. Lamb, Gwyn, Aylet, 1637. and afterwards had three years impriſonment in the common Goal of the Fleet, being whipp'd from Fleet-bridge to Weſtminſter, and enduring the cruel torment of above five hundred ſtripes with knotted cords. Afterwards being ſet in the Pillory for the ſpace of two hours, and by James Ingram Deputy-Warden of the Fleet gagged, tearing his jaws almoſt in pieces, without order; which ſentence was given by Lord-Keeper Coventry, Earl of Mancheſter, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Newburgh, Sir Henry Vane, ſen. Lord Chief-Juſtice Brampſton, and Judge Jones. And after the barbarous execution of this ſentence, being April 18. 1638. the ſaid Lord Coventry, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Biſhop of London, Earl of Mancheſter, Earl of Arundel, Earl of Salisbury, Lord Cottington, Lord Newburgh, Secretary Cook, and Windebank, paſſed another ſentence, in effect for the ſtarving of your Petitioner, and for the tormenting of him with irons upon hands and legs both night and day; and by keeping him cloſe in the common Goal of the Fleet, from the ſpeech of any of his friends: all which was executed with the greateſt cruelty that could be, for the ſpace of almoſt three years together, to the apparent hazard of his life, both by ſtarving him [which was with all art and induſtry ſeveral ways attempted;] and alſo by ſeveral aſſaults made upon him by the ſaid Warden's men [inſtigated thereunto by the ſaid Deputy-Warden, to the maiming and wounding him, whereby to this day he is totally deprived of the uſe of two of his fingers:] all which, with much more, too tedious to be here inſerted, was fully proved by ſufficient witneſſes, before a Committee of your Houſe, whereof Mr. Francis Rouſe had the chair; upon whoſe report made May 4. 1641, your Houſe voted, "That the ſentence in the "Star-Chamber given againſt the ſaid John Lilburn, "and all the proceedings thereupon was illegal, "and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and alſo "bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyranni-"cal; and that he ought to have good reparations "therefore." Which Votes (by reaſon of multiplicity of buſineſs in your Houſe) coſt your Petitioner ſome years of importunate and chargeable attendance to get them tranſmitted to the Lords; which was obtained in February 1645. the 13th day of which month, your Petitioner's whole cauſe was effectually opened at the Lords Bar, by his learned Counſel Mr. John Bradſhaw, and Mr. John Cook; and there every particular again proved upon Oath, by teſtimony of people of very good quality. Whereupon they concurred in all things with the Houſe of Commons, ſaving in the matter of reparation; but upon the delivery of a true narrative, (which your Petitioner with his own hands in the ſame month delivered unto every individual Lord) they made a further decree, that your Petitioner ſhould have 2000 l. reparations out of the eſtates of the ſaid Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, for the reaſons alledged in an ordinance which they paſſed in April 1646, and tranſmitted to your Houſe; where it hath lain dormant ever ſince, and is now referred to the conſideration of this honourable Committee.

Now, foraſmuch as by the judicial laws of God (which are the pure laws of right reaſon) he that wilfully hurteth his neighbour, is bound to the performance of theſe five things: Firſt, "If it be a "blemiſh or wound, like for like, or to redeem it "with money, thereby to ſatisfy him for his "wound. Secondly, For his pain and tor-"ment. Thirdly, For the healing. Fourthly, For "his loſs of time in his calling. Fifthly, For the "ſhame and diſgrace:" All which are to be conſidered according to the quality of the perſon damnified: which reparations are to be paid out of the beſt of the goods of him that damnified him, and that without delay.

And as the law of God, ſo the laws of this Nation do abhor, and have ſeverely puniſhed (above all perſons) Judges many times with the loſs of their lives and eſtates, who under colour of law, have violated their Oaths, and deſtroyed the lives, liberties and properties of the people, whom by law they ſhould have preſerved: as may be inſtanced by the forty-four Judges and Juſtices hanged in one year by King Alfred; divers of them for leſs crimes than hath been done in the caſe of your Petitioner; as may be read in the Law-book, called The Mirrour of Juſtice, pag. 239, 240, 241, &c. tranſlated and re-printed this very Parliament: and by Juſtice Thorp in Edw. III's time, who was condemned to death for the violation of his Oath, for taking ſmall ſums of money in cauſes depending before him; as appears in the third part of Coke's Inſtitutes, fol. 155, 156.

And by the Lord Chief-Juſtice Treſilian, &c. who in full Parliament in Rich. II's time was attached as a Traitor in the forenoon, and had his throat cut at Tyburn in the afternoon, becauſe he had given it under his hand, that the King might create unto himſelf at his pleaſure, another rule to walk by, than the law of the land preſcribes him; as appears by the Parliament-Records in the Tower, by many of your own Declarations, and alſo by the Chronicles of England.

Now foraſmuch as your Petitioner's ſufferings have been unparallelled, and his prejudice ſuſtained thereby altogether unrepairable; having loſt his limbs, &c. And foraſmuch as by the law of God, Nature and Nations, reparations for hurts and damages received, ought to be ſatisfied as far as may be in all perſons, though done by accident, and not intentionally, and though through ignorance: much more when the perſons offending did it knowingly, and on purpoſe, in the face, nay, in ſpight of the fundamental laws of the land, which they were ſworn to preſerve: and for that the reparations in the ſaid ordinance aſſigned do ſcarce amount to what your Petitioner ſpent in his three years ſad captivity, and his now almoſt eight years chargeable attendance, in ſuing for it, beſides the loſs of a rich and profitable trade for eleven years together, and his wounds, torments, ſmart and diſgrace, ſuſtained by his ſaid tyrannical ſentences:

He therefore humbly prayeth the favour and juſtice of this honourable Committee for ſome conſiderable augmentation of his ſaid reparations; and the rather, rather becauſe his fellow-ſufferer Dr. Ballwick had 4000*l.* reparations allotted him, whoſe ſufferings (he ſubmiſſively conceiveth) was nothing nigh ſo great, in torment, pain and ſhame, as your Petitioner's. And foraſmuch as the now Lord Coventry, ſon and heir to the foreſaid Lord Coventry, hath walked in his Father's ſteps, in enmity to the laws, liberties, and freedom of the Nation; by being in arms at the beginning of the Wars againſt the Parliament, and made his peace with the Earl of Eſſex for a ſmall matter, and hath ſince deſerted the Kingdom, living in France privately, receiving the profits of a vaſt eſtate which his Father left him: And foraſmuch as his ſaid Father (the late Lord Coventry) was the activeſt man in infringing the laws and liberties of the Nation; although a Lawyer and Judge, ſitting on the ſupream ſeat of Juſtice; and a perſon (as is groundedly conceived) who got a great eſtate by corruption, and particularly a man that principally paſſed as chief Judge of the Court, both the aforeſaid ſentences againſt your Petitioner: and in regard the eſtates of the ſaid Lord Cottington, and Sir Francis Windebank, by ſubſequent orders of both Houſes upon urgent occaſions, are much intangled and altered from the condition they were in, in 1646, when the Lords ordered your Petitioner 2000 Marks out of them; and for that the eſtate of James Ingram cannot be found, nor at preſent come by: Your Petitioner therefore moſt humbly prayeth, that the greateſt part, if not all your Petitioner's reparations may be fixed upon the ſaid now Lord Coventry's eſtate, to be immediately paid your Petitioner; or elſe that his rents, and the profit of his woods and goods, may be ſeized in the reſpective Counties where they lie, for the ſatisfying thereof; that your Petitioner may no longer run the hazard of ruin to him and his, by tedious delays, having already contracted the debts of many hundred pounds, occaſioned by the chargeable proſecution hereof. And that if you ſhall think fit to conjoin any other with him, that it may be principally the Judges of the Law; who ought to have been pilots and guides unto the reſt of the Judges of that Court, who were Lords, and perſons not knowing the Law.

And your Petitioner ſhall ever pray, &c.

JOHN LILBURN.

After the reading of which, they entred into a ſerious debate of the whole buſineſs, and thereupon paſſed ſeveral Votes to be heads of an Ordinance, to be drawn up and reported to the Houſe, by the Right Honourable the Lord Carr Chairman to the ſaid Committee; who accordingly reported the Proceedings and Votes of the ſaid Committee to your Houſe, who approved of the ſaid Votes, and ordered an ordinance to be preſented to the Houſe conſonant thereunto, which was accordingly done by the Lord Carr; which ordinance hath been once read in your Houſe: The Copy of which thus follows:

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament, for the raiſing of three thouſand pounds, out of the real Eſtate of the late Thomas Lord Coventry, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, for and towards the reparation and damages of John Lilburn, Gent. which he ſuſtained by virtue and colour of two Sentences given and made againſt him, in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13th of Febr. 1637. the other the 18th of April, 1638.

WHereas the cauſe of John Lilburn Gent. concerning two ſentences pronounced againſt him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, 13th of February, 13 Car. Regis, and 18th of April, 14 Car. Regis, were voted the 4th of May 1641, by the Houſe of Commons to be illegal, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and alſo bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical, which were tranſmitted from the ſaid Houſe of Commons unto the Houſe of Lords; who thereupon, by an order or decree by them made, 13th of February 1645, adjudged and declared the ſaid proceedings of the ſaid Star-Chamber, againſt the ſaid John Lilburn, to be illegal and moſt unjuſt, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. And by another order or decree, made by them the ſaid Lords, the 5th of March 1645, they aſſigned to be paid unto the ſaid John Lilburn, the ſum of two thouſand pounds for his reparations; and the ſaid Houſe of Peers then fixed that ſum upon the eſtates real and perſonal of Francis Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, * late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet: and afterwards for the preſent levying thereof, with allowance of Intereſt, in caſe of obſtructions, while the ſame ſhould be in levying, and of ſuch part as ſhould not be forthwith levied; the ſaid Houſe of Peers did cauſe an ordinance to be drawn up, and paſſed the ſame in their Houſe, the 27th of April 1646, and afterwards tranſmitted the ſame to the Houſe of Commons for their concurrence; with whom it yet dependeth. And foraſmuch as ſince that tranſmiſſion, all, or the greateſt, of the eſtates of the ſaid Lord Cottington, and Sir Francis Windebank, is ſince by both Houſes diſpoſed of to other uſes; and the eſtate of the ſaid James Ingram is ſo ſmall and weak, and ſo entangled with former incumbrances, that it can afford little or no part unto the ſaid John Lilburn, of the ſaid reparations: And for that the ſaid late Lord Coventry, was the principal Judge, and chief Actor, in giving of both the ſaid illegal ſentences in the ſaid Court of Star-Chamber; and for the barbarous inflicting of puniſhments thereupon:

Therefore, and for ſatisfaction of the ſaid 2000*l.* and for the increaſe of reparation unto the ſaid John Lilburn for his extraordinary wrongs, ſufferings and loſſes thereby ſuſtained, and the long time hitherto elapſed without any ſatisfaction; the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament do ordain, and be it hereby ordained by the ſaid Lords and Commons and by authority of the ſame; That the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall receive the ſum of 3000*l.* out of all, or any the Manors, Meſſuages, Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, whereof he, the ſaid late Thomas Lord Coventry, or any other perſon or perſons to or for his uſe, or in truſt for him, was or were ſeized in fee-ſimple, or fee-tail, or otherwiſe, at the time of the ſaid ſentences or decrees, or of either of them, in the ſaid late Court of Star-Chamber,

* 'But the Lord Roberts, the Lord Wharton, &c. told me ſeveral times, if their eſtates had not been under ſequeſtration by Ordi'nance of Parliament, they would never have gone about to fix my reparations by Ordinance, (which they muſt needs then do,
'to take off the Sequeſtration) but have iſſued out a decree and extent under the Great Seal, immediately to have put me in pre-
'ſent poſſeſſion of my 2000*l.* which they ſaid was their right by Law to do.'

ber, or ſince within the Kingdom of England, or Dominion of Wales, any order or ordinance heretofore made by either or both Houſes of Parliament, for the employment of the eſtate of the ſaid late Thomas Lord Coventry to the contrary hereof, in any wiſe notwithſtanding. And for the more ſpeedy levying of the ſaid ſum of three thouſand pounds, it is further ordered and ordained, that the ſeveral and reſpective Sheriffs, of the ſeveral and reſpective Counties, within England and Wales, wherein any of the ſaid Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments do lie, ſhall forthwith upon ſight, and by virtue of this ordinance, cauſe an inquiſition to be made, and taken by the Oaths of twelve or more lawful men, where the ſame lands do lie, and what the ſame are and do contain, and of the clear yearly value thereof, over and above all charges and repriſes: and after ſuch inquiſition ſo made and taken, the ſeveral and reſpective Sheriffs ſhall deliver unto the ſaid John Lilburn true copies in Parchment of the ſame inquiſitions by them taken, and ſhall then alſo deliver unto the ſaid John Lilburn the ſaid Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, which ſhall be ſo compriſed or mentioned in the ſaid inquiſitions, to have and to hold, to him the ſaid John Lilburn, and his aſſigns, without impeachment of waſte; and until he ſhall have received out of the iſſues and profits thereof (to be eſtimated according to the yearly values contained in the ſaid inquiſitions) the ſaid ſum of three thouſand pounds; together with all reaſonable charges and expences to be ſuſtained from henceforth for obtaining the ſaid ſum of three thouſand pounds. And all and every the ſaid ſeveral and reſpective Sheriffs, and all other perſon and perſons whatſoever, that ſhall any ways act or aſſiſt in obedience to this ordinance, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, ſhall be therefore defended and kept harmleſs, by the authority of both Houſes of Parliament.

Be pleaſed to take further notice, that after the foreſaid ordinance was once read, it came to a debate in your Houſe for to be read the ſecond time, which was carried in the negative by a majority of voices; and I cannot but apprehend that there were divers in the Houſe unſatisfied in the ordinance itſelf, in regard the Houſe was divided upon the Debate and Vote, which I cannot but apprehend muſt flow from one of theſe two conſiderations.

Firſt, Either becauſe that the whole reparations is fixed upon the Lord Coventry's eſtate ſingly, who had many co-partners in the ſentences, and who alſo it may be ſuppoſed hath expiated his crime by his death. Or elſe, ſecondly, becauſe in ſome mens thoughts, ſome of my late actions are, or have been ſo evil in themſelves, that they may ſeem to them to over-ballance the merits of all my ancient ſufferings.

However, on my preſenting my reaſons to the Houſe for reading it, my Ordinance was called for to be read the ſecond time, which Elſynge the Clerk pretended he had laid ready upon the table before him; but what betwixt his knavery, old Henry Vane's, the Speaker's, and young Montague's, my Ordinance was ſtol'n, and could never after be found: ſo that I was ſent to out of the Houſe to get another fair copy writ over preſently, which being long in doing, my friends went away, not expecting it would any more be meddled with that day; ſo that when moſt of them were gone, my adverſaries took the advantage to call for it, and in a thin Houſe read it the ſecond time, and upon debate threw it out of doors; and at preſent to ſtop my mouth, voted me 300 l. ready-money (as they pretended) out of Sir Charles Kemiſs's compoſition, to enable me for preſent ſubſiſtence, and to follow my buſineſs, and alſo made this further order.

Die Martis, Septemb. 5. 1648.

ORdered by the Commons aſſembled in Parliament, that the ſum of three thouſand pounds be allowed and paid unto Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn, for reparation of his damages ſuſtained by colour of the ſentences given againſt him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, where Lord Carr had the Chair, with the addition of Sir John Danvers, and Colonel Rigby, to conſider of, and preſent to this Houſe an Ordinance for ſettling of lands to him and his heirs, to the value of 3000 l. at twelve years purchaſe, out of the eſtates of new Delinquents in the Inſurrections, not yet ſequeſtred.

H. Elſynge, Cler. Parl. Com. Dom.

Of which when I fully underſtood, I was troubled, but knew not how to help myſelf; and having already met with ſo many difficulties, and received ſo many baffles, as I had done, I thought it was better (being almoſt wearied out with ſtruggling) to take half a loaf, than to go away without any bread at all. So after many Petitions and Letters to the Sequeſtrators, &c. the Committee cauſed an Ordinance to be drawn up.

But when my Ordinance came to the Lords, they diſabled me to cut down any more timber-trees, than what were already fell'd, which I judged fitter for me to content myſelf with, than to ſtruggle any longer to get it paſs, as the Houſe of Commons had ſent it up. So the Lords in two or three days diſpatched it, and ſent it down to the Houſe of Commons for their concurrence, according to thoſe abridgements they had made in it; and taking my opportunity to ſpeak to thoſe in the Houſe of Commons I had intereſt in, I intreated them to diſpute it no more, but paſs it as the Lords had gelded it; and accordingly they did, the copy of which thus followeth:

Die Jovis, 21 Decemb. 1648.

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament, for raiſing of three thouſand pounds, out of the ſequeſtred eſtates and compoſitions of Sir Henry Gibb, Knight; and Sir Henry Bellingham, Knight and Baronet; and Thomas Bowes, Eſquire; lying and being within the County of Durham; to be paid unto Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, by the Committee of Sequeſtrations of the ſaid County, for and towards the reparation and damages of the ſaid John Lilburn, which he ſuſtained by virtue and colour of two unjuſt Sentences, or Decrees; given and made againſt him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13*th of* February, 1637; the other the 18*th of* April, 1638.

WHereas the cauſe of Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, concerning two ſentences pronounced againſt him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the 13th of February, decimo tertio Caroli Regis, and the 18th of April, decimo quarto Caroli Regis, (which were voted the 4th of May, 1641. by the Houſe of Commons to be illegal, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and alſo bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous and tyrannical) were tranſmitted from the ſaid Houſe of Commons unto the Houſe of Lords; in which the Houſe of Peers concurred in judgment; and the 13th of February 1645, declared the ſaid proceedings of the ſaid Star-Chamber, againſt the ſaid John Lilburn, to be illegal, moſt unjuſt, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and law of the land, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. The ſaid Lords and Commons taking into their ſerious conſideration, the extraordinary ſufferings and barbarous tyranny, that by colour of the ſaid unjuſt decrees, were inflicted upon the ſaid Lieut. Col. John Lilburn; and the long time hitherto elapſed without any ſatisfaction, do conceive it moſt juſt, equitable and reaſonable, to repair him in ſome conſiderable manner; and therefore in purſuance of two orders of the Houſe of Commons, one of the 22d of Auguſt 1648, and the other of the 5th of September 1648, have ordained; and be it hereby ordained by the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament, and by the authority of the ſame; That the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall have, and receive the ſum of 3000 l. to be paid unto him or his aſſigns, by the Committee of Sequeſtrations for the County of Durham; out of the firſt profits of the ſequeſtred eſtates, both lands and goods of Sir Henry Gibb, Knight; Sir Henry Bellingham, Knight and Baronet; and Thomas Bowes Eſquire; lying and being in the County of Durham, having all been active in the late Northern Inſurrections, and aiding and aſſiſting to the moſt wicked invaſion of Duke Hamilton. And the ſaid Committee are hereby authoriſed to fell all ſuch woods (except timber-trees now ſtanding) as may conveniently be ſpared, and now ſtanding upon the ſaid lands (or already felled) or any of them. And if the ſaid Sir Henry Gibb, Sir Henry Bellingham, and Thomas Bowes, or any of them ſhall compound for their eſtate, ſo much of the ſaid three thouſand pounds as then ſhall remain unſatisfied, ſhall be paid unto the ſaid John Lilburn, or his aſſignees, out of their, or the firſt of their compoſitions. And this Ordinance or Copy thereof atteſted under the hand or hands of the Clerk, or Clerks, of one or both Houſes of Parliament, ſhall be a ſufficient Warrant to the ſaid Committee of Sequeſtrations in the ſaid County of Durham, to pay the ſaid 3000 l. as is before expreſſed, unto the ſaid John Lilburn or his aſſigns; and likewiſe to indemnify and ſave harmleſs, all, and every perſon or perſons, that ſhall any way act in the performance of the true intent and meaning of this Ordinance.

JAMES Lord Uchiltrie delaitit of the making of Leaſings, Calumnies and ſlanderous Speeches againſt James Marquis of Hamilton; the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Buccleugh; tending to the ſowing of ſedition betwixt his Majeſty and the ſaid Noblemen, his Majeſty's loyal Subjects; in form and manner ſpecify'd and ſet down in his Dittay.

Purſuer, Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, Knight and Baronet, Advocate to our ſovereign Lord for his Highneſs's entries.

My Lord Advocate produced an Act of ſecret Council, commanding him to purſue James Lord Uchiltrie, now entred upon pannel for the Crimes contained in his Dittay, of the which Act of Council the tenor follows. Apud Halyrudhouſe Viceſimo 2do die menſis Novembris Anno Dom. Milleſimo, Sexenteſimo, Trigeſimo primo. Forſamekill as the King's Majeſty,

[* This Trial ſhould have been inſerted, in point of Time, before Lilburn's. But as we did not procure the MS. till part of that Trial was printed off, it is placed immediately after it.]

Majeſty, by his Letter directed to the Lords of his Privy-Council, having ſignified his royal pleaſure and direction, that James Lord Uchiltrie, whom his Majeſty has ſent home to be kept in cloſe ward, ſhall be try'd and cenſur'd according to the Laws of this Kingdom, for ſome Informations given by him, reflecting upon ſome Noblemen and Counſellors of the ſame, before what Judicatory and Judges, the ſaid Lords ſhould think fit and competent for that purpoſe: and his Majeſty having, to that end, ſent down to the ſaid Lords ſome depoſitions under the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie's own hand; and the authentick copies of others, whereof the principals are retained by his Majeſty, becauſe they likewiſe concern other perſons. And the ſaid Lords having read and conſidered the ſame depoſitions, and having taken into their conſideration, which is the moſt proper judgment for trying and cenſuring of matters of this kind; they have all with one voice found, and by the tenor of this Act, finds and declares, that the Trial and Cenſuring of the ſaid Lord upon the particular aforeſaid, is moſt proper and competent to be followed out before his Majeſty's Juſtice: and therefore ordains Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, Knt. his Majeſty's Advocate, to form and draw up the ſaid Lord Uchiltri's dittay; and to purſue him criminally thereupon, before his Majeſty's Juſtice, upon the laſt day of November inſtant; and ordains his Majeſty's ſaid Advocate to give a juſt copy of the dittay to the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie, betwixt and the 24th of November at night; to the intent he may have time to be adviſed therewith, and to conſult his Advocates, anent his lawful defences, competent to him againſt the ſame. Anent the doing whereof, the extract of this Act, ſhall be unto his Majeſty's ſaid Advocate a Warrant, extractum de Libris actorum ſecreti Concilii S. D. N. Regis, per me Jacobum Prymrois Clericum ejuſdem ſub meis ſigno & ſubſcriptione manualibus, ſic ſubſcribitur James Prymrois. After production and reading of the which Act of Council, my Lord Advocate alſo produced his Majeſty's Letter, directed to the Lords of his Majeſty's Privy-Council of this Kingdom, dated the 24th of September 1631. together with two depoſitions of the Lord Uchiltrie's, the one dated the 20th of June 1631, the other upon the 24th of June 1631. Then three ſeveral depoſitions made by Donald Lord Rea, whereof two thereof dated upon the 21ſt of June 1631, and the third upon the 24th of June 1631. all true copies thereof under the hands and ſubſcription of the Committee of the Council of England. Of the which depoſitions and Letter above-written, directed by his Majeſty to the Council, the tenor follows. In the firſt, the depoſition made by James Lord Uchiltrie upon the 20th of June 1631.

Copia Vera. The Examination of James Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 20*th of* June 1631.

THE ſaid Examinant ſaith, That on or about the 6th or 7th of May laſt, at the ſign of the Bear near the Bridge-foot, the Lord Rea told this Examinant, that ſoldiers and travellers did often hear thoſe things, whereof thoſe that ſtaid at home had no notice; and ſaid, he did believe there was a plot againſt this Land. This Examinant wiſh'd him, if he had any good grounds ſo to think, that he ſhould not fail to diſcover it. The Lord Rea ſaid, he had no certain ground, but if he had ſtay'd but five weeks longer in the Low-Countries, he would have known the certainty; and that he would have hazarded his life but he would have had the certainty. The 13th of May, the Lord Rea came to this Examinant's Chamber, and there putting this Examinant in mind of the former ſpeech between them; he told this Examinant, that he had learned more certainty than e'er he had before, ſince the time of their laſt ſpeech; whereupon divers paſſages were between his Lordſhip and this Examinant about the diſcovery of it, and the manner. In the end his Lordſhip told this Examinant, that the purpoſe of the Marquis of Hamilton's levies (as divers of his Commanders and Followers had inform'd him the ſaid Lord Rea) was, that either they ſhould not go out of England and Scotland, or if they did, they ſhould return to England or Scotland; and ſurprize the King's houſes in Scotland, viz. the Caſtles of Edinburgh, Striveling and Dunbarton; and fortify themſelves in Leith, under pretence of training; and ſhould take Berwick, and ſo march forward into England. And this Examinant asking what could be their intention ſo to do; the Lord Rea ſaid, that he was inform'd they meaned to take the King's perſon and to immurat him, to ſend the Queen into a Cloyſter, and to captivate the young Prince with his Father, and to ſtrike off the heads of all the principal men about the King, both Engliſh and Scots: and in particular the Lord-Treaſurer of England, the Earl of Monteith, Sir William Alexander, and Sir Thomas Hope. And this Examinant ſaith, that before the Lord Rea diſcovered the particularities aforeſaid to this Examinant, this Examinant uſing perſuaſions to him to reveal it, ask'd the Lord Rea what it might be, ſaying it was either a French or a Spaniſh faction. To which the Lord Rea ſaid, it was neither, but told this Examinant what it was, and ſo revealed the particulars above-mentioned. Whereupon the Lord Rea being fully reſolved to proceed to a further diſcovery, and thinking it fitter to be done by this Examinant, than by himſelf, leſt thoſe whom it concern'd might ſooner ſuſpect it, deſired this Examinant to acquaint his Majeſty or the Lord-Treaſurer therewith.

On the morrow, being Saturday the 14th of May at night, this Examinant came to have ſpoken with the Lord Treaſurer; but his Lordſhip being going to bed, by his appointment this Examinant came the next morning, and told him he had ſomewhat to reveal that concern'd his Majeſty and all his Kingdoms and Poſterity. The Lord-Treaſurer thereupon went inſtantly up to the King, and after, the ſame day, told this Examinant, that his Majeſty had given him commiſſion to hear this Examinant's relation. This Examinant further ſaith, that the Lord Rea told this Examinant, that he had much of this beyond ſea from Robert Meldrum and David Ramſay. But ſince his coming into England (as he ſaid) he had ſpoken with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, and Capt. Douglas, and had gotten ſomewhat out of every one of them: he alſo ſaid, he had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, and underſtood ſomewhat from him.

On Monday the 16th of May, this Examinant attended the Lord-Treaſurer at Whitehall; and entring into a relation, in the very beginning diſcover'd that the matter which he was to relate concerned the Lord Marquis Hamilton and his actions: which ſo ſoon as he had named, the Lord-Treaſurer commanded him to ſay no more, until he had acquainted the King again; but wiſh'd this Examinant that he and the Lord Rea ſhould go preſently to Greenwich, where the Lord-Treaſurer would meet them. But the King being come towards Whitehall, hall, this Examinant and the Lord Rea came back again, and were then appointed by the Lord-Treaſurer to attend his Majeſty, on Thurſday at ten o'clock, which they did. The Examinant further ſaith, that on Monday the 16th of May, this Examinant deliver'd to the Lord-Treaſurer a liſt of Names, to repreſent to his Majeſty the ſtrength of the Lord Hamilton's party and adherents in Scotland. At this Examinant's coming to his Majeſty, this Examinant told the King that the buſineſs was a Treaſon intended againſt his Majeſty, and the party was the Marquis of Hamilton, as this Examinant was inform'd; and that it was the filthieſt Treaſon that ever was intended, and was ſorry that any Scottiſh man ſhould have a hand in it, for it was a ſhame to the whole Nation. And then the Lord Rea himſelf coming in, made relation to his Majeſty, who remitted him to the Lord-Treaſurer; whereupon this Examinant coming to the Lord-Treaſurer, and telling him the King had remitted the Lord Rea unto him; the Lord-Treaſurer wiſh'd that the Lord Rea would put his relation in writing. Whereupon the Lord Rea and this Examinant went together, and ſat up all night; and the Lord Rea firſt putting it into writing, this Examinant wrote it out of the Lord Rea's papers, who on the morrow brought the ſame to the Lord-Treaſurer: but this Examinant was not then preſent, but the next time that he came to the Lord-Treaſurer's, being asked by him whoſe the hand-writing was, this Examinant ſaid it was his own hand; and the Lord-Treaſurer telling him that the Lord Rea had not ſubſcribed it, this Examinant ſaid, he would without doubt ſubſcribe it. And about two days after he brought the Lord Rea to the Lord-Treaſurer, who read over the whole writing, and ſubſcribed his name to it, ſaying he would ſeal it with his blood.

This Examinant further confeſſeth, that he told the Lord-Treaſurer that the Lord Rea told him he had yet more, and would ſay ſo much, that the Marquis ſhould not have the face to deny it; which the Lord Rea then preſent affirm'd: inſomuch as the Lord-Treaſurer ſaid, then is the buſineſs at an end, there needs no writing.

This Examinant further ſaith, that on the Sunday morning when the Marquis of Hamilton came out of Scotland, the Lord Rea told this Examinant that he had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, who aſſured him their purpoſe was to take the King, the Queen, and the Prince; and this Examinant aſking how they ſhould effect it, the Lord Rea replied, the Lord Seaforth had told him, they were great with the Earl of Dorſet, who had the cuſtody of the Prince. And this Examinant further ſaith, that the Lord Rea told him, that he was aſſur'd by my Lord of Roxburgh, that the Marquis and his company would haſten their purpoſe; and the Lord Rea ſaid, that ſurely the Hamiltons had taken ſome vent of the buſineſs, and that Sir James Ramſay had told him, he had 1500 men in readineſs upon an hour's warning, but they ſhould not come about London till their buſineſs was ready withal; which this Examinant the ſame morning acquaint ed the Lord-Treaſurer, to the intent that his Majeſty might know thereof.

And further ſaith, that ſhortly after the Lord Rea told him, he had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, who told him that the matter, which he had formerly told him, concerning the Earl of Dorſet, was but a diſguiſed thing.

This Examinant further ſaith, that on that Sunday morning he wiſhed the Lord-Treaſurer to adviſe the King, that he ſhould go to London for more ſafety; and underſtanding the King had ſent for the Lord Rea, this Examinant wiſh'd the Lord Rea were not ſent for, becauſe the Lord Rea was gone to the Lord Seaforth's to learn more: and further ſaith, that the ſame time being in the end of the King's dinner, this Examinant told the King in theſe words, Sir, now we know the buſineſs, but know not the time; and therefore, Sir, either do or die.

Copia Vera. My Lord Rea's firſt Examination, 21ſt of June 1631 †.

IN the Examination of Donald Lord Rea, taken the 21ſt of June 1631, the ſaid Examinant ſaith, that having heard in Sweden from David Ramſay, ſuch things as are contained in the written relation which hath been delivered to his Majeſty; and before having heard in Pomerland, thoſe paſſages from Robert Meldrum, which are in the ſame relation, this Examinant having a reſolution to come for England about December laſt, was ſtay'd in Denmark by reaſon of the Ice, ſo as he came not to Holland till about March laſt; where he had conference with David Ramſay, and heard from him ſuch other paſſages as are contained in the ſame relation. And after coming into England, becauſe David Ramſay had told this Examinant, that he would write to the Marquis of Hamilton, how far forth the ſaid David Ramſay had treated with this Examinant, this Examinant expected that the Marquis would have ſpoken thereof unto him; he did therefore forbear to ſay any thing thereof: yet about two or three days before the Lord Marquiſs went into Scotland, this Examinant did ſpeak to the Lord Uchiltrie to this purpoſe, That his Lordſhip was better acquainted than this Examinant, with the faſhions and laws of this land; and deſired to know what danger it was, if any man hearing beyond ſea of things that might be dangerous to the King or State, ſhould not ſpeak of it. To which the Lord Uchiltrie anſwered, no leſs than your head and eſtate. And this was all that paſſed between them at that time, being the firſt time they ſpake thereof; and the place was (as he thinketh) at the Lord Uchiltrie's own lodgings.

He further ſaith, that about eight or ten days after, this Examinant coming to the Lord Uchiltrie's lodgings to talk of ſome other buſineſs, after ſpeech thereof, ſpake to this effect: My Lord, you remember I ask'd you a queſtion a while ſince, what the danger might be, not to ſpeak of matters dangerous to the King or State, which he had heard beyond the ſeas, and I would now again have your advice therein: and the Lord Uchiltrie promiſing his readineſs to adviſe him, ſo as he might be acquainted with the particular; this Examinant told him he would acquaint him with the particular, if he would ſwear not to diſcover it, but as he ſhould direct. Adding, that if he did otherwiſe, this Examinant would pay him. The Lord Uchiltrie then ſaid, and proteſted, that he would not diſcover any thing but as this Examinant ſhould appoint, whereupon this Examinant declared the particular to him; who hearing it, told this Examinant it was neceſſary to be revealed, and doubted leſt this Examinant had kept it too long already: but then this Examinant ſaid, conſidering it concerned one ſo near the King as the Marquis of Hamilton, he thought it not fit that this Examinant ſhould himſelf break it to the King, † See the Trial of Rea and Ramſay by Combat, in Ruſhworth's Collections, Vol. II. page 113. which method of Trial being now diſus'd, is not inſerted in this work.

King, leſt the King ſhould at firſt reject it, but it would be fitter for ſome other to do it, and therefore deſired his opinion how to diſcover it. The Lord Uchiltrie adviſing a while, ſaid, he thought it beſt it were diſcovered to ſome of the Privy-Council: whereupon this Examinant ſaid, that he would not diſcover it to any Scotſman, but thought it beſt to reveal it to the Lord-Treaſurer, becauſe he thought the Lord-Treaſurer was no way in the plot.

According to which reſolution the Lord Uchiltrie (as he after told this Examinant) did according as was agreed between him and this Examinant, repair to the Lord-Treaſurer the ſame night; but failing then to ſpeak with him, he went the next morning, before this Examinant ſaw him, and returning, told this Examinant he had been with the Lord-Treaſurer, and in general imparted to him, that he had a matter to diſcover which nearly concerned his Majeſty: and ſaid further, it was no Engliſh buſineſs, but it was (to his own ſhame he ſpake it) a Scottiſh buſineſs, neither was it any Popiſh Plot: and the Lord-Treaſurer then refus'd to hear it, till he had warrant from the King.

After the Lord Uchiltrie and this Examinant were appointed to wait on the King at Greenwich; whither this Examinant coming, found the Lord Uchiltrie within with his Majeſty, and then this Examinant coming in, made a full relation to his Majeſty; who asking this Examinant wherefore he had not himſelf told his Majeſty ſooner of it, this Examinant anſwered, that conſidering the nearneſs of the Marquis of Hamilton to his Majeſty, this Examinant was afraid leſt his Majeſty would have been impatient towards this Examinant; and beſought his Majeſty to forgive this Examinant, if he had thought he had done amiſs therein. His Majeſty thereupon referr'd this Examinant to the Lord-Teaſurer, and bid this Examinant put the relation in writing. Whereupon that night this Examinant and the Lord Uchiltrie ſat up all night, and this Examinant writing it firſt down, the Lord Uchiltrie wrote it ſheet after ſheet, out of this Examinant's paper. And this Examinant brought the ſame written relation to the Lord-Treaſurer, and read it unto him, and left it with him. And a day or two after, this Examinant and the Lord Uchiltrie came again together to the Lord-Treaſurer; the Lord Uchiltrie having told him, that this Examinant had forgotten to ſign it; and then this Examinant ſign'd it, ſaying he would make it good with his blood.

At which time, this Examinant remembers the Lord Uchiltrie told the Lord-Treaſurer, that this Examinant had more to ſay yet, which this Examinant did then alſo affirm; and the cauſe wherefore he did affirm it, was, becauſe this Examinant had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, and had ſome particulars from him, which he did not particularly tell to the Lord Uchiltrie, but affirm'd to him in the general that he cou'd ſay more; but a day or two after, this Examinant went again to the Lord Seaforth, and ſpake with him, and then he told the ſame, firſt to the Lord Uchiltrie.

He further ſaith, that the Lord Uchiltrie, on Sunday morning, told this Examinant, that he had been with the Lord-Treaſurer, and had told him of the paſſages with the Lord Seaforth, and of the Marquis's return, and that he conceived it might be dangerous at that time for his Majeſty. But this Examinant told him, he had done evil therein, for there was no ſuch ſuddenneſs to be fear'd: and on the ſame Sunday in the afternoon, this Examinant coming to his Majeſty, and hearing from him, that he had been advertis'd of ſomewhat importing matter of preſent danger; this Examinant ſaid, he had been with the Lord Seaforth, but had not the certainty of things, but pray'd his Majeſty to give him leave to go again to the Lord Seaforth's, and then he would learn all. And at the ſame time his Majeſty telling what danger had been ſuggeſted to him, now upon the Marquis's return; this Examinant proteſted he knew nothing againſt the perſon of the Marquis; but that he was, for aught this Examinant knew, as good a ſubject as any the King had.

Copia Vera. My Lord Rea's ſecond Examination, the 21ſt of June 1631.

THE Examination of Donald Lord Rea, taken the 21ſt of June 1631. The ſaid Lord Rea having deliberately heard read the Examination of James Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 20th of this inſtant month, doth acknowledge the ſame to be true in all points, ſo far as the ſame concerneth the knowledge, words or acts of this Examinant, ſaving the explanations hereafter following. He ſaith, that as touching the conference between the Lord Uchiltrie and this Examinant the 13th of May laſt, where it is therein mentioned that this Examinant told him, that ſince the time of their laſt ſpeech, he had learned more certainty than ever he had before; this Examinant did not ſay, that he had learned more certainty ſince their laſt ſpeech, for in truth he had not learned any thing within that time. But thinks he might ſay, that he had learned more certainty ſince he came to England, than he had before; and therefore takes it, that the Lord Uchiltrie did miſtake in that point.

And whereas in the ſame conference it is ſet down, that this Examinant ſhould ſay that he was inform'd, that they meant to ſtrike off the heads of all the principal men about the King; this Examinant ſaid, that he was inform'd they would ſtrike off the heads of the Spaniſh faction; and that he named the Lord-Treaſurer, the two Biſhops, the Earl-Marſhal, the Earl of Carliſle, Sir Francis Cottington, the Lord Monteith, Sir William Alexander, and Sir Thomas Hope, and likewiſe Sir Kenelm Digby, and ſpake of none other, neither in general nor particular; and ſaith, that he was ſo inform'd touching the Spaniſh faction by Mr. Meldrum, and David Ramſay; and touching the Scots by the Earl of Seaforth. And ſaith, that Meldrum and David Ramſay did name the aforeſaid Engliſhmen to be of the Spaniſh faction. And whereas it is ſaid, that this Examinant deſired the Lord Uchiltrie to acquaint his Majeſty or the Lord-Treaſurer with the matter; this Examinant did deſire him to acquaint the Lord-Treaſurer, but did not mention his Majeſty, but that it ſhould come by the Lord-Treaſurer to his Majeſty.

He confeſſed, he ſaid, that ſince his coming into England, he had ſpoken with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, and Capt. Douglas, and gotten ſomewhat out of every one of them; but did not ſay he had ſpoken with Alexander Hamilton, or gotten any thing out of him ſince this Examinant's coming into England,

This Examinant denieth, that he either ſaid himſelf, or affirm'd its being ſaid by the Lord Uchiltrie, that he could ſay ſo much as the Marquis ſhould not have the face to deny it; but ſaid, he could could bring as honeſt a man as this Examinant, that would tell to the Marquis's face more than this Examinant would do: and thus he meant by the Lord Seaforth.

He confeſſeth that he ſaid, Sir James Ramſay told him he had fifteen hundred men in readineſs, but would not bring them together, till the parties in Scotland were firſt ready; and ſaith, Sir James told him as much, and that there were good officers, and the Earl of Eſſex, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury were ſureties for ſome of them; and other than this, he ſpake not touching the 1500 men.

He ſaith, he was not acquainted with the liſt of the Names, delivered by the Lord Uchiltrie to the Lord-Treaſurer, nor had any thing to do therein.

Copia Vera. The ſecond Examination of James Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 24*th of* June 1631.

THE ſaid Examinant confeſſeth that the underſtanding which he had of the buſineſs, concerning the Marquis of Hamilton, whereof he hath been ſo often examined, came to him from the Lord Rea.

He confeſſeth further, that the paper of Names which he did deliver to the Lord-Treaſurer, was made by this Examinant himſelf, and the Lord Rea was not privy to the making of it, or to the delivery thereof to the Lord-Treaſurer, till after it was done.

He ſaith, that the cauſe wherefore he did in that paper mention the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent, was, for that the Lord Rea had told him, the Lord Marquis's followers had ſaid, the intent of the Marquis's levies was to invade Scotland. Being told, that the Lord Rea hath been ſo far from charging the Marquis, that he hath affirm'd before his Majeſty, that for ought he knows, the Marquis is as good a ſubject as any the King hath; he anſwereth, if in tenderneſs and care of the King's ſafety, and upon ground of the Lord Rea's relation, for the Lord Marquis's followers, he have gone any thing too far, he truſteth his Majeſty will impute it to his duty.

Being ask'd, why in the aforeſaid paper, he makes the Earl of Melros, the Earl of Roxburgh, and the Earl of Buccleugh to be plotters, ſaith, that the Lord Rea told him, the Lord Seaforth had affirm'd it to him, that the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and ſecrets of the buſineſs. And further ſaith, the Lord Rea had told him, he could not gueſs who elſe ſhould be in the plot, unleſs it were the Lord Buccleugh; of whom the Lord Rea ſaid, he heard him ſpeak terrible and preſumptuous words againſt the King, at his own table in Holland.

He ſaith, the Lord Rea did affirm to this Examinant, that he had the aforeſaid report of the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh from the Lord Seaforth, before he this Examinant made or delivered the ſaid paper to the Lord-Treaſurer: the ſaid Examinant doth avow, that on the 13th of May, the Lord Rea had affirm'd to him, that ſince their former ſpeech, (which was the 6th or 7th of May) he had learned more certainty than ever he had before.

He confeſſeth, that whereas in his former Examination, he ſaid, the Lord Rea told him, he was inform'd, that they meant to ſtrike off the heads of all the principal men about the King; he was miſtaken in mentioning all, and did not well mark himſelf when he ſo expreſſed it; his purpoſe being to have ſaid, they would ſtrike off the heads of many; for ſo, he takes it, was the ſcope of the Lord Rea's ſpeech.

Being told that the Lord Rea denieth that he ſpake with Col. Alexander Hamilton, ſince his coming into England, he ſaith, it is poſſible that this Examinant might miſtake in adding that name to the reſt, and therefore will not conteſt about that. He doth avow, that in the preſence of the Lord Rea, before the Lord-Treaſurer, this Examinant ſaid, the Lord Rea could ſay ſo much as the Marquis ſhould not have the face to deny it; and what this Examinant ſaid, the Lord Rea being then preſent and hearing it, did not gainſay.

He ſaith, the Lord Rea told him, Sir James Ramſay ſaid to him, that he had 1500 men in readineſs, and the firſt time ſaid, upon an hour's warning. But at a ſecond time, the Lord Rea ſpoke of eight days warning; and further, that he would not bring them to London, till their buſineſs was ready.

Being acquainted with what John Macky, ſon to the Lord Rea, had confeſſed to have been told him by this Examinant, he doth acknowledge it, and that he ſaid it to John Macky, after the Lord Rea and this Examinant had attended his Majeſty about the ſame buſineſs, but did not think his ſpeech thereof to John Macky ſhould have done any hurt to the buſineſs.

Copia Vera. The third Examination of Donald Lord Rea, taken the 24*th of* June 1631.

HE ſaith, that the firſt time that the Lord Seaforth had any ſpeech with this Examinant, touching the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh, being privy to the particulars and ſecrets of the Lord Hamilton's buſineſs, was on Monday after the Marquis's coming out of Scotland, and not before.

He further ſaith, that the Lord Uchiltrie having ſome ſpeech with this Examinant, who might be like in Scotland to take arms, if the Marquis of Hamilton ſhould take up arms; the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie and not this Examinant named the Lord Buccleugh: whereupon this Examinant told him, that at the ſiege of the Buſſe; this Examinant heard the Lord Buccleugh uſe ſome words, whereby this Examinant took him to come male-content out of England.

The Tenor of the Lord Uchiltrie*'s Dittay or Indictment.*

James Lord Uchiltrie,

YE are indicted and accuſed forſamekill as by divers Acts, Statutes and Conſtitutions of Parliament, made and publiſhed in the days of our ſovereign Lord's moſt royal Progenitors, ſpecially by the 43d Act of the ſecond Parliament of King James I. of worthy memory, it is enacted, ſtatute and ordained, That all Leaſing-makers and tellers of them, whilk may engender diſcord betwixt the King and his People, wherever they may be gotten, ſhall be challenged by them that power has, and tyne life and goods to the King. And likewiſe by the 83d Act of the ſixth Parliament of King James I. of eternal memory, bearing touching the article of Leaſing-makers to the King's Grace, of his Barons, great Men and Lieges, and for puniſhment to be put to them; therefore it is thereby declared, that the King's Grace, with advice of his three Eſtates, ratifies and approves the Acts and Statutes made thereupon of before, and ordains the ſame to be put to due execution in all points; whilks Acts of Parliament, in the 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of our ſovereign Lord's deareſt Father King James the VI. of happy and never-dying memory, are with advice of his Highneſs's Eſtates in that Parliament ratify'd, approven, and confirm'd, and ordain'd to be put in execution in all time thereafter following, as in the ſaid Laws and Acts of Parliament, at length is contain'd. Notwithſtanding whereof, it is of verity, that he the ſaid James Lord Uchiltrie, having in the month of May, the year of God 1631, laſt paſt, heard by relation of Donald Lord Rea, that certain ſpeeches, ſurmiſes and informations were made to him, by David Ramſay, with the head Mr. Robert Meldrum, and certain other perſons beyond ſea, in Sweden, Pomerland and Holland reſpectively; and by the ſaid David Ramſay and certain other perſons within the Kingdom of England, anent ſome plot and dangerous purpoſe intended againſt the ſacred perſon of our gracious Lord and Sovereign, the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, his gracious Queen, and their deareſt ſon the Prince, and againſt the Land, by ſurprizing the King's Majeſty's Houſes and Caſtles of Edinburgh, Striveling and Dumbarton, and for ſeizing of the Town of Leith. Ye not being content to retain yourſelf within the bounds of a faithful ſubject, by revealing of that, whereof ye had received information from the ſaid Lord Rea, out of a malicious policy and deſign, tending to the ſowing of diſcord and ſedition betwixt his Majeſty and his moſt loyal ſubjects; the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Roxburgh, and the Earl of Buccleugh; did at your firſt meeting with his Majeſty, which was upon the 17th of May laſt paſt, ſignify to his Highneſs, that the buſineſs was a Treaſon intended againſt his Majeſty; and that the party was the Marquis of Hamilton, as ye was inform'd. And to the effect his

Majeſty

Majeſty might be put in better aſſurance of the truth of your ſaid ſpeeches, ye upon the 16th of May preceding, delivered to the Lord-Treaſurer of England a Liſt of Names, to repreſent to his Majeſty, the ſtrength of the ſaid Marquis of Hamilton's Party and Adherents in Scotland. Whilk is all written with your own hand, and intitled, Repreſentation for my Lord-Treaſurer. Wherein ye name the Marquis of Hamilton to be the prime Agent, and names the Earl of Melros, now Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Roxburgh, and the Earl of Buccleugh, to be plotters. Likewiſe upon Sunday, being the 22d of May laſt paſt, at which day the Marquis of Hamilton, (having come poſt from Scotland in three days) was to preſent himſelf to his Majeſty: And ye thinking that ye had poſſeſs'd his Majeſty ſufficiently with your malicious Leaſings and Calumnies againſt the ſaid Lord Marquis; and that his Majeſty being ſo inſtigate and irritate againſt him, would follow your cruel and malicious Counſel; ye came to his Majeſty about the end of his dinner, and moſt boldly and male-pertly ſpake to his Majeſty theſe words, Sir, now ye know the buſineſs, but knows not the time, and therefore, Sir, either do or die. By the whilk malicious Counſel (if God by his Grace had not rul'd and directed the heart of our gracious Sovereign to proceed in the buſineſs with greater wiſdom, calmneſs and moderation, ye by your former wicked Counſel intended) ye thereby did what in you lay, to move and cauſe his Majeſty, to put in practice ſome ſudden and violent courſe, for ſubverſion of the life and honour of the ſaid Lord Marquis, his Majeſty's moſt loyal ſubject. Like as all the preſent articles and paſſages in your proceeding, in the premiſes, were maliciouſly forged, invented and practiſed by yourſelf; without any warrant ariſing to you from the relation of the ſaid Lord Rea's; whilk is manifeſt by your own depoſition, made in the preſence of a number of the Council of England, deputed by his Majeſty for your examination, upon the 20th and 24th of June laſt paſt. By the which ye have granted and confeſſed the premiſes laid to your charge to be of verity: and alſo does grant, that the paper of Names which ye did deliver to my Lord-Treaſurer, as ſaid is, was made by yourſelf. And that the Lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof, nor to the delivery of the ſame, to the ſaid Lord-Treaſurer. And ſic-like in your examination, ye being inquired for what cauſe, ye did name the ſaid Lord Marquis to be prime Agent, ye could aſſign no true reaſon, nor cauſe, by any warrant of the Lord Rea againſt the Marquis. But by the contrary, the ſaid Lord Rea being examined upon the 21ſt of June, in preſence of his Majeſty's Council, declared that he knew nothing againſt the perſon of the Lord Marquis. But that the ſaid Lord Marquis was as good a Subject as any the King's Majeſty had; and likewiſe ye being ask'd by what warrant ye did call the Earls of Melros, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh to be plotters; ye anſwered thereto, that the Lord Rea had told you, that the Lord Seaforth had affirm'd to him, that the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and ſecrets of that buſineſs, declaring thereby that the Lord Rea had affirm'd that to you, before you gave in, and delivered your paper of repreſentation to the Lord-Treaſurer. And further, ye declar'd, that the Lord Rea had told you, that he could not gueſs who elſe ſhould have been upon the plot, unleſs it were the Lord Buccleugh. Albeit the Lord Rea being examined in preſence of his Majeſty's Council upon the 24th of June laſt paſt, declar'd, that the firſt time the Lord Seaforth had any ſpeech with him, anent the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh, and their being privy to the Marquis of Hamilton's buſineſs; was upon the Monday after the Marquis of Hamilton's coming out of Scotland, and not before: and the Marquis having come to Court from Scotland upon Saturday the 21ſt of May, and the repreſentation given by you to the Lord-Treaſurer, containing the liſt of the plotters and actors, being given in by you to the ſaid Lord-Treaſurer, upon the 16th of May before; ye could never truly affirm, that ye had named the ſaid Earls to be plotters, upon pretence of any information received from my Lord Rea, who did not ſpeak to you anent them, at the time of the giving of the ſaid repreſentation; but eight days thereafter, and ſuch like. The ſaid Lord Rea depon'd upon the ſaid 24th of June, that ye, and not he, did name the Earl of Buccleugh, as one who would take arms in Scotland to aſſiſt the Marquis; by the whilk Leaſings, Calumnies and ſlanderous Speeches, untruly plotted, deviſed and vented by you, againſt the ſaid Marquis of Hamilton, the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Buccleugh in manner foreſaid; all of them being his Majeſty's faithful Counſellors and loyal Subjects; ye have manifeſtly contraverted the tenor of the ſaid Laws, and Acts of Parliament, and incurr'd the pains and puniſhment mention'd therein, viz. the deſerv'd puniſhment of death, which ought and ſhould be execute upon you with all rigour, to the terror and example of others.

JAMES Lord Uchiltrie, delated of the Crimes foreſaids, contained in his Indictment preceding.

Purſuer.

Sir Thomas Hope of Craigball, Knight and Baronet; his Majeſty's Advocate for his Highneſs's Entries.

Prolocutors in Defence.

Mr. Robert Nairne,
Mr. Alexander Pierſon,
Gilbert Neilſon,
} Advocates.

The Prolocutors for the impanell'd, produced an Act of the Lords of ſecret Council; ordaining and commanding them to compeir and aſſiſt him, by proponing of all lawful defence, competent to him on his Trial, and deſired the ſame might be inſert and remain on proceſs, whereof the tenor follows: Apud Halyrudhouſe Vigeſimo quinto die menſis Novembris 1631. Whereas James Lord Uchiltrie has made choice of Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierſon, and Gilbert Neilſon, Advocates, to concur and join with him, for proponing of his lawful defences, competent to him againſt the Dittay, whereupon he is to be accus'd before his Majeſty's Juſtice, upon the 1ſt of December next: therefore the Lords of ſecret Council ordains and commands the ſaid three Advocates, to confer and meet with the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie to receive his informations; to accompany and aſſiſt him at the Bar; and to do their duty and office in all and every thing lying to their charge, concerning the proponing of all lawful defences, competent to the ſaid Lord in his Trial. Where anent the extract of this Act ſhall be to them, a Warrant extractum de libris Actorum ſecreti Concilii S. D. N. Regis per me Magiſtrum Gilbertum Prymroſe Clericum ejuſdem, ſub meis ſigno & ſubſcriptione manualibus, ſic ſubſcribitur M. Prymroſe. After reading of the whilk Act of Council, the ſaid Prolocutors proteſted becauſe the preſent matter of diſputation eſt res ardua, anent Treaſon and Relations thereof, from party to party; that whatever the exigence of the cauſe requires from them, as proofs to ſpeak herein, for clearing of the Nobleman impanelled, his innocence, and of the warrants of his information; that it is not with any thought of wronging, or tasking of any parties, Noblemen or others; but to do that whilk their duty as Prolocutors craves of them to be done, being commanded hereto by the Lords of his Majeſty's ſecret Council: and that the purpoſe and ſpeeches that ſhall by God's aſſiſtance be uttered and delivered by them in this matter, may be ſo accepted of my Lord Juſtice.

Thereafter the Indictment of the Lord Uchiltrie, being read judicially, and he accuſed of the Crimes therein contained; my Lord Advocate asked Inſtruments of the reading thereof, and of the Acts of Parliament ſet down in the propoſition of the ſaid Indictment. And becauſe the ſubſumption of the ſaid Indictment is founded upon certain depoſitions made in England, in preſence of five of his Majeſty's Counſellors, deputed by his Majeſty to that effect; he therefore repeats the Examinations of the Lord Uchiltrie produced yeſterday in proceſs, dated the 20th and 24th of June laſt; with the three Examinations of my Lord Rea's, whereof two are dated the 21ſt of June, and the third upon the 24th of June: And declared that he uſed theſe depoſitions under the hands and ſubſcriptions of the five Counſellors of England, as authentick copies, whilk ſhould make as good faith, as if the principal were produc'd.

It is alledged by Mr. Alexander Pierſon, as Prolocutor for the Pannel, that it cannot, nor ſhould not be proceeded againſt the Impannel'd here in Scotland, but conform to the Laws and Statutes of England; the place of the Pannel, his offence (if any be) and not conform to the municipal Laws of Scotland. Quia de jure Judex originis vel domicilii non poteſt punire ſubditum dilinquentem extra territorium, niſi ſecundum pœnam impoſitam à jure communi, vel ſecundum ſtatuta Loci in quo deliquit non; autem ſecundum ſtatuta ipſius Loci originis, vel domicilii. Julius Clarus, Quæſt. 85. Numb. quarto.

It is anſwered by my Lord Advocate, that the Alledgente is no ways relevant, except the Pannel will condeſcend to the relevance of the dittay; and of his own conſent be content, that the ſame paſs to the knowledge of an Aſſize. Next, it is anſwered by his Majeſty's Advocates; that he oppones his Majeſty's Letter direct to the Council, bearing that the Impann·l'd ſhall be try'd according to the Laws of this Kingdom. And in the one place it ſhall be juſtified, that his Majeſty's Letter ſhall be grounded upon the Civil and Common Law.

It is anſwered thereto by the Lord Uchiltrie and his Prolocutors; that the King's Majeſty's Letter, is, and muſt be underſtood without prejudice of the Pannel's lawful defences.

Item, That the alledged Crimes contained in the dittay, are, or perchance may be lawful in England, and yet criminal in Scotland; and it carries no reaſon that the Pannel ſhould be puniſhed here in Scotland, for any fact committed in England, not puniſhable by the Laws of England, where the Pannel is tutus ratione Loci.

Secundo, It is alledg'd by the Pannel, that the ſubſumption of the Indictment, has no dependance upon the propoſition thereof; becauſe the particulars contained in the ſubſumption, are no ways the Leaſings mentioned in the ſaid Acts of Parliament, whereupon the propoſition is founded, eſpecially ſeeing the Leaſings mentioned in the ſaid Acts, are Leaſings tending to diſcord betwixt the King and his people: and the telling whereof is unlawful and prohibit. But the particulars of the dittay or Indictment are no ways ſuch. But by the contrary, the matter thereof being an heinous Treaſon againſt the King's Majeſty and Eſtate; in favour of both, propter publicam utilitatem, it is incumbent to every every ſubject that ſhall hear ſpeeches of ſuch matter, though the matter itſelf be a lye and untruth, whilk is alike to the hearer, neither does it belong to him, to judge or diſcern therein; it is incumbent, I ſay, to every ſubject incontinently to tell the ſame; the telling whereof tends not to diſcord between the King and his People: but to ſuppreſs and prevent the ſame, and the chief cauſe thereof, which is Treaſon; and the not telling and revealing whereof is puniſhable by the Law of all Nations, by our municipal Laws and Acts of Parliament; yea, by the ſame Acts, whereupon the dittay is founded, viz. James VI. Parliament 14. cap. 205. And therefore the telling thereof, is nowayes prohibited, and puniſhable by the ſaid Acts; neither are theſe particulars in the Indictment, the Leaſings mentioned in the ſaid Acts, whilk is medium concludendi in the dittay. And whilk laſt Act being the laſt in time, as it ratifies, ſo it explains the true ſenſe of the former.

And further, it is alledged by Gilbert Neilſon, Prolocutor for the Pannel, that not only by the foreſaid Act, of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. whereupon the dittay is founded, is there a neceſſity laid upon the Impannell'd, and all his Majeſty's Lieges to reveal what they hear, concerning his Majeſty's prejudice; but likewiſe by the 134th Act of James VI's 8th Parliament, it is ſpecially ſtatute, that whoſoever hears any ſpeeches to the harm or prejudice of the King's Majeſty or Eſtate, ſhall with all diligence reveal the ſame to his Majeſty, or to ſome other, the King's Majeſty's Officers, that may make the ſame manifeſt to his Majeſty, with this ſpecial addition, that in caſe the ſame be not done, the perſon concealer, and not teller or revealer, ſhall incur the like puniſhment, contained in the ſaid Acts, ſet down againſt the principal Leaſing-makers. And ſo the impannell'd was neceſſitate, upon no leſs pain than his life and eſtate, to reveal the ſame. It is anſwered by his Majeſty's Advocate, that this preceding defence can elude no part of the dittay: becauſe the firſt part thereof anent the lawfulneſs or neceſſity of revealing of Treaſon, is granted in the Dittay or Indictment. And if the Pannel had contained himſelf within the duty of revealing, albeit the Plot and Treaſon reveal'd had been falſe, yet he would have deſerved commendation, and reward from his Maſter. But the Indictment is founded upon three particulars, to the whilk no anſwer is made; and whilks three particulars agrees and quadrates with the natural quality of the Leaſings, contained in the Act of Parliament, whereupon the dittay is founded. Becauſe they are ſuch, as might have engendered diſcord betwixt his Majeſty and his loyal ſubjects; in ſo far as it is qualified in the dittay, that the Impannell'd having only had his relations from the Lord Rea, and whilk relations had no warrant againſt the Marquis of Hamilton's perſon, as author or actor of the Treaſon; nor againſt the three Noblemen as Plotters, but depended ex auditu auditus, vel relatione relati ab altero; that is, from David Ramſay, and Mr. Robert Meldrum, of whom neither of them did relate any thing that could prove againſt the Marquis; but ſimply upon the ſpeeches and report of ſome, whom they call his followers, or upon their imagination, or poſſibly fooliſh and perverſe wiſhes, that the Nobleman who was imploy'd for the levying of an army for aiding the King of Sweden, ſhould employ his forces to the deſtruction of the King, his Queen, the Prince their deareſt Son, and Kingdom. Yet the impannell'd, whenas he might have ſufficiently expreſt his loyal duty to his Maſter, by bringing the Lord Rea to his Majeſty, to make his own relation, did at the firſt appearance before his Majeſty, turn the incertain report and relation, to a poſitive ſpeech: ſhewing that the buſineſs was a Treaſon, and the party the Marquis of Hamilton. Next, the Pannel by his repreſentation all written with his own hand, and delivered to my Lord-Treaſurer of England, to be ſhewn to his Majeſty, he has expreſſed the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent; and the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh to be plotters; and hath added to the number of twenty or thirty Noblemen, as adherents to them. And laſt, when his Majeſty had received this poſitive information, and was poſſeſſed with appearance of the truth thereof; to add a ſpark to the fewel, the Motto was given, Sir, now either do or die: whilk words could not contain any other intention or event (if his Majeſty had not been graciouſly and wiſely diſpoſed) but either to have uſed ſome violent courſe againſt the Marquis's perſon and life, or to commit him to priſon, and to cauſe him to make anſwer as to Treaſon, ex Vinculis; whilk is the condition of Traytors both by the Common Law, and by the Act of Parliament made by King James II. Parliament 12. cap. 49. whereby it is ordained, that perſons ſlandered of Treaſon, ſhall be taken and remain in firmance, while they thole an Aſſize. And all their proceedings are directly contrary to the Act of Parliament, whereupon the dittay is founded, eſpecially ſeeing the Pannel by his depoſition made the 20th of June, Articulo primo, in relating the Lord Rea's firſt ſpeeches, declared that the Lord Rea granted that he had no certain ground for the Treaſon alledged by him; and it is an heinous and odious fact, puniſhable by all laws, to turn relation into delation, and to be an author or adviſer to a ſovereign Prince, to begin at execution before Trial. And all the particular points of the dittay are clear, and evident by the depoſition of the Impannel'd, made upon the 20th and 24th days of June; whilk are the true copies of the original and authentick depoſitions, made in the preſence of five of his Majeſty's Council in England; like as the copies produced and read in preſence of the Pannel, and his Prolocutors, are ſubſcribed by the ſaid five Counſellors; and alſo are declared by his Majeſty's Letter, directed to his Council the 24th of September, to be true copies of the ſaid depoſitions; whereof the principals are retained by his Majeſty, for the cauſes mentioned in the ſaid Letter. And therefore ought to have full faith, as if the principals were produc'd; like as the Pannel by his Acts de calumnia will not refuſe, but that the repreſentation containing the liſt of the names was given in by him, without the privity of the Lord Rea, and alſo that he ſpake theſe words to his Majeſty, upon the Sunday after dinner, being the 22d of May; which was the ſelf-ſame day that the Marquis came from Scotland to England, and was to preſent himſelf to his Majeſty, viz. the purpoſe is known, the time not known; Sir, either do or die; in reſpect whereof the alledgente ought to be repell'd.

'Tis duplyed for the Pannel by his Prolocutors, as to the particulars contain'd in my Lord Advocate's anſwer, they ceaſe to anſwer him now in the general, ſeeing they are upon the relevancy of the Dittay and Indictment, and ſhall anſwer every one, ſingulatim, as they lie in the Indictment, ſuo loco.

Tertio, It is alledged for the Pannel, that the particulars contained in the Indictment are not Leasings, quoad referentem neque id genus referens mentitur, quoniam quantum in ipso est non fallit, sed fallitur, & quicquid falsitatis vel mendacii in relatis inest, id ad suos authores referendum, cap. Is autem 22. Quest. 2. & cap. 55. Beatus Paulus ibidem, ubi dicitur non mentiri eum qui animum fallendi non habet quod est essentiale & formale mendacii, impostura scilicet & intentio fallendi. And the telling and revealing of the whilks matters aforesaid, nullum habet in se delictum, sed est de natura boni; being commanded, and therefore in the hearer and relater, presumitur omnis dolus abesse, quia parere necesse habet. And specially in such a business as this, whilk so highly concerns the King's Majesty and Estate. Whereof there was so great appearance, by the relation made by the Lord Rea, whilk the Pannel craves may be read to the Judge.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, that if the defence means of the Treason related by the Lord Rea, the Pannel cannot be quarrelled for it, nor for telling thereof, albeit it were a lye. But the Leasings and Calumnies assumed upon in the dittay, arises upon the contradiction, betwixt that which was related by the Lord Rea, and that whilk was spoken and affirmed positive to his Majesty. And where it is alledged, that mendacium est semper cum animo fallendi, that is, in discrepantia inter intellectum & vocem ejusdem personæ; where he thinks one thing, and speaks another, whilk is not our case. But mendacium vel falsitas, whereupon we dispute, is the discrepance and the contrariety betwixt the relation made by the Lord Rea, and that which is related by the Pannel: wherein the Pannel was obliged as a faithful subject, to make a simple or true relation, sine Paraphrasi, vel Periphrasi, sine Interpretatione, vel Circumlocutione, & ut in Apographa vel exemplari committitur falsitas, si transcriptio differt ab exemplari, ita committitur falsitas ubi relatio positive refertur; whilk is the Leasings, whereupon the dittay subsumes. And where it is desired that the Lord Rea's relation may be produc'd, and read to the Judge, if it be meant of that relation whilk is subscrib'd by the five Counsellors of England; and if the Pannel will acknowledge it, to make faith as the principal, together with the remanent depositions of the Pannel, and the Lord Rea, whilk are all subscribed by the said five Counsellors, and already produc'd and read to the Judge; the Pannel shall receive satisfaction of his desires, otherways not.

It's duply'd for the Pannel, that the foresaid alledgance is to answer that part of the dittay, bearing the heads thereof to be forg'd and vented by the Pannel.

Quarto, It is alledg'd by the Pannel, that as to the subsumption of the dittay, bearing, that all the articles and passages of proceeding therein mention'd, were maliciously invented, and practis'd by the Pannel, whilk is qualify'd by the Pannel's own deposition, and alledg'd confession against himself, and by the Pannel's deposition freeing the Lord Rea, and the Lord Rea's deposition freeing himself thereof; the qualification inforces not the Pannel in the particulars to be a Leasing-maker, and to have forged lyes.

First, For the Pannel's own deposition, it inforces the just contrary, to wit, that the Lord Rea was the Pannel's informer in all. As for the Lord Rea's deposition against the Pannel, proported in the dittay; that inforces not forging of lyes against the Pannel, neither can the Lord Rea's deposition have any force against him; first, because the Lord Rea is party, and the Pannel is a witness against him for the King, and whose deposition cannot be respected against the testimony, made against himself, for the King's Majesty: And in effect is but a denial, whilk can neither liberate himself, nor weaken the Pannel's deposition. Et omnibus in re propria dicendi testimonii facultatem jura submoverunt, lege 10. Cod. de testibus. Item, The Lord Rea's deposition made by him, not being sworn, and so is null of the Law; Quia testis injuratus examinatus non probat nec fidem facit, Lege Juris-jurandi; nona Cod. de testibus & Lege testium xviii^a. Cod. eodem.

Item, The Lord Rea's deposition not made in the presence of the Pannel, and so non valet authentica, Sed etsi, Cod. de testibus. Item, Although the Lord Rea were not party, he is but testis singularis & nihil probat. Item, The Lord Rea's depositions produced cannot be respected, because they are not the principal subscribed by my Lord Rea, but relations, and doubtless from the Council. Et in criminalibus aliorum Judicum relationibus credere non oportet, Lege singul. xiv. Cod. de accusationibus & inscriptionibus.

It is declared by the Lord Uchiltrie himself, now upon Pannel, that the depositions whilk he made in England, and subscribed with his hand, are true in themselves, as he there depon'd, according to the relations and grounds of Information, which he received from the Lord Rea. The reconciliations which are ingrossed in the several depositions, being allowed and admitted for reconciling of any apparent contrariety without prejudice of what explanation of the same depositions, he may justly make further; he declares, that the alledged copies of the Pannel's own depositions, under the hand of the five Counsellors, so far as his memory can serve him, are not different in the substance of them, from the original. But that there is no more in his depositions, nor that whilk the subscribed copies contain, that he cannot say. And this his Lordship does according to his memory, and in reverence of his Majesty's Letter, and Noblemens hands thereat.

My Lord Advocate takes Instruments of the Impannell'd's declaration in that part, whereby he grants that the copies of his depositions made by him, under the hand of the five Counsellors, is not different in substance according to the Pannel's memory.

Thereafter, my Lord Uchiltrie and his Prolocutors craved that the Lord Rea's relation, made upon the 18th of May, whilk is under the hand of the five Counsellors, might be read to him, because he minds to found exceptions thereupon.

To the whilk, it is answered by his Majesty's Advocate, that he cannot be compelled to produce the said relation, in respect no part of the qualification of the Dittay is founded thereupon. And yet according to his former answer, says, if the Pannel will acknowledge the same, as it is under the hands of the five Counsellors, to make as great faith as the principal, he is content, that the said relation be read; of the whilk relation the tenor follows.

The true Relation of such passages, as I Donald Lord Rea have heard or learned, which may concern my most dread Sovereign, or his Estate, beyond Seas and elsé-where, as I will be ready to take my Oath upon, and seal with my blood against all opponents. Written this 18*th of* May 1631.

IN

IN the month of April 1630, or thereby, at my coming from Stockholm, I found Colonel Alexander Hamilton, Brother to the Earl of Haddington, Sir James Hamilton Son to the ſaid Earl, Sir James Hamilton of Reidhall, Nephew to the ſaid Earl, and one Hamilton the Lord of . . . . . ; who were all Officers under the King of Sweden then. But before my coming there, they had all caſhier'd themſelves, not having ſerved one year.

At this time the Laird of Benſho, Lyndeſay, my Lieutenant-Colonel, being Bed-fellow and Comrade to Sir James Hamilton, Son to the Earl of Haddington, keeping a chamber in James Mackleane's a Scotſman's Houſe in Stockholm, Lyndeſay did inform me, that the reaſon why the Hamiltons had caſhier'd themſelves, was becauſe their Chief, the Marquis of Hamilton, was to be a Soldier, and that they would follow his fortunes. I asked Lyndeſay who had told him ſo much; he told me, Sir James Hamilton of Prieſtfield, Haddington's Son: and Lyndeſay told me withal, that all theſe Hvmiltons, and Sir John Hamilton, another Son of Haddington's, had denuded themſelves of their Fortunes and Eſtates, ſome of them to their friends; but the Earl of Haddington's children to their father.

Moreover, Lyndeſay told me, that Sir James Hamilton, Haddington's ſecond Son, had told him, that Sir James Spence, now Lord Spence, had directed Mr. Robert Meldrum with Letters into England; and that thereafter they did expect David Ramſay with the head Couſin to the Lord Spence, as Ambaſſador from the Marquis of Hamilton: And all the Hamiltons did expect David Ramſay's coming.

Alſo Lyndeſay did inform me, that Sir James Hamilton did deſire him to join with them, and that they would give him a Regiment; which he did accept, and did deſire my conſent, which I did yield unto.

Alſo ten or twelve days after we heard from Denmark, that there was an Ambaſſador coming from England, who proves to be David Ramſay; who did give himſelf out, all the way as he came, to be an Ambaſſador: which to prove, he did ſtand in competition with his Majeſty, our dread Sovereign's extraordinary Ambaſſador Sir Thomas Roe; both the ſaid Sir Thomas and David Ramſay encountring in the Town of ..... in Denmark: yet David Ramſay would never do ſo much as viſit the other Ambaſſador. Upon which overſight I did queſtion David Ramſay, whoſe anſwer was, he did not deſire to be ſeen of any man that would diſcover him; affirming to his Couſin Sir Robert Anſtruther (as David Ramſay told me) that no honeſt man could live at home. David Ramſay, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, and Sir James Hamilton, attending their diſpatch from the King of Sweden at Elſmeby, were forc'd to reſide with me in my ſhip, for at this time we were all on ſhip-board.

And one night drinking ſome healths, amongſt the reſt, the Marquis's health coming by courſe, I ask'd Col. Alexander Hamilton, the Marquis's Chriſtian name; he anſwer'd me, James, by the Grace of God, Sir James added, King of Scotland; therefore his health paſſed under that name, till I did take exceptions, and did deſire them to alter their title. Sir James Hamilton anſwered nolens, volens, it ſhould be ſo, and did laugh. I did deſire them to drink it more covertly, thus, To the happy event of all Good Intentions; ſo David Ramſay ſaid it ſhould be ſo.

That night, after the two Colonels Hamiltons went to bed, David Ramſay and I being alone on the hatches above, David Ramſay and I drinking and ſmoaking a Pipe of Tobacco, told me many abuſes in the Court of England; laying the whole blame upon the Lord-Treaſurer. He told me, that the Marquis had ſent him with a Challenge to the Treaſurer, and that Popery and Armini-aniſm had ever come the moſt part from the Biſhops; and that there was nothing look'd for but deſolation and change of Religion, and that the poor ſoul the King was blinded to his ruin; and that he had been plain with the King, till he did give him no ear; therefore he ſaid, he had retir'd himſelf from thence, ſince no honeſt man could live there, and with many ſuch diſcourſes he labour'd to poſſeſs me. My anſwer was, the Lord amend thoſe evils, and no remedy but patience. By God, Donald (ſaid he) I will uſe your own phraſe, we muſt help God to amend it. He told me, he had brought as much Gold with him, as would maintain him at the rate of ſix pound a day for three years, and did aſſure me that before that time would expire, that God would raiſe up ſome men to defend his Church, and liberate honeſt men from ſlavery. Withal he told me, that his Majeſty at his parting with him, told him, that he would do with him, as King Henry IV. ſaid to Colvil, I will think on thee in abſence as preſent.

Thereafter I did deſire one favour of him, that he would tell me if the Marquis of Hamilton would come over; he ſaid, he would tell me to-morrow. The next night after, I did renew my former queſtion of the Marquis's coming over, and he ſaid he would. I ask'd him what content my Lord Marquis had at home? He ſaid none, for the King had forced him to marry a Wife, and to acknowledge her, who he ſaid was a very beaſt.

I ask'd him of what Religion my Lord Marquis was; he ſaid, a good Proteſtant, and before it were long, he would let the World ſee his aim was the defence of his Religion. I told him, it did avail us little to make the Goſpel a fair paſſage in Germany, if we loſt it at home. He ſaid, there were many honeſt men in our land, and that the Marquis would uſe his army to protect them, which was his only aim. I deſir'd him to go no further on with me; for I would not deſire more truſt of it, but that I would ſpend my blood in my Lord Marquis's quarrel. Well, my Lord, I will go no further, for my Maſter's ſecret no man ſhall get.

The third night, on land in an Iſle, he told me, that Alexander Hamilton and Sir James were to go for England, and he to Holland; yet if I had any thing to do in England, that he would be willing to do me ſervice. I told him I had a mind to ſeek the reverſion of Orkney from the King my Maſter, if the Marquis would mediate with my Maſter; for it were good for my Lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. He ſaid, by God it was to be thought upon; and he did deſire me to give him leave to think upon it that night. On the morrow, he and Alexander Hamilton did deſire me to write a general Letter to the Marquis, with the two Colonel Hamiltons, with great aſſurances of true friendſhip from their Maſter, if I would continue conſtant in reſolution; I did give them my Letter, and ſo we parted.

In the month of July, a day or two after the taking of Stetin, I did encounter Mr. Meldrum who came from England: after Salutations, I did ask him what news; he anſwered me, matters are worſe and worſe; the King giveth greater way to Papiſts and Arminians than before; that Cottington was gone to beg peace with Spain; that Pembroke was dead; that the Marquis govern'd all, and was made Keeper of Windſor, and was made Knight of the Garter, and was to be Admiral of England. He did ask me where his Couſin David Ramſay was, I told him he was gone for Holland; he did ask me, what he had done, I did anſwer, that all was ended to his mind, and that Alexander Hamilton was to get Powder, Arms and Munition with him from Sweden, to the Marquis. At theſe news, he did throw his Cap to the ground, and cut a caper, calling aloud, Good news, good news, I am a happy man, I am happy and made for ever! I thank God my five years pains is not for nothing; good my Lord Rea, is this trûe? Yes ſaid I, for I have one double of the Contract, I am ingaged in the buſineſs to David Ramſay, and Alexander Hamilton, and Sir James Hamilton, and by Writ to my Lord Hamilton. O my Lord, (ſaith he) that was the work of God and not man, to inſpire your Lordſhip to go with us.

At that time I caſt Lyndeſay looſe, to find more of Meldrum; who told Lyndeſay that ſix thouſand trained Soldiers would do the turn with their own faction in the Country.

The next day at Colonel Leſlie's Tent, I encountered Meldrum, whom I did call out, and he told me that King Charles was good and created for nothing, but for deſolations and undoing of Kingdoms, Religion and People. There was no way but to immurate him within a Wall or Dungeon for ever. I asked what way we might do that; he ſaid the way was eaſy: firſt, after the men were liſted in Scotland, that they might take one month's time to learn to handle their arms at Leith, without any ſuſpicion: then they might ſeize on the Caſtle of Edinburgh, Sterling, and Dumbarton in one night, and upon Berwick; and having the Caſtle of Edinburgh, the Town durſt not ſtir; then to fortify Leith; thereafter into England per force. I anſwered, the Plot was good if it held.

He told me further, that he was writing a declaration of the juſtneſs of the Marquis's quarrel, with the tyrannical uſing and ſuffering of the Church, under King James in his laſt days, and now worſe groaning under his Son; with the Hamiltons clear title to the Crown. I allowed of all. But I did demand who I thought would take our parts; he ſaid, he did know nine of the beſt Earls in Scotland that would live and die with us. As alſo that the body of England was with us, and ſome of the Nobility for evil will of the Treaſurer. The next day there came news of the birth of the Prince; I did ask Meldrum if that would cool the Marquis's intentions: he ſigh'd and ſaid, not if the King and Queen of Bohemia will give their Daughter to the Marquis, as they had promiſed? Is that true, ſaid I. He anſwer'd I ſhould ſee e'er it were long. That night I did deſire Lyndeſay to drink with Meldrum, which he did, and Harry Muſchampe an Engliſh Gentleman was with them. Lyndeſay told me on the morrow, he did think Meldrum to be the worſt Secretary in the world, for he did reveal this laſt night all he did think. I do not remember the night's diſcourſe: but do remit to Muſchampe's relation.

A week after, I did ſpeak with Meldrum again in Leſlie's tent; ſo he did deſire me to walk forth, and told me he had been with Secretary Sadeler, to whom Meldrum did deliver a private packet of Letters, and did require anſwer. But the Secretary told him, that the King of Sweden would write none, till he heard from the Marquis of his laſt Letters, ſent with David Ramſay.

Meldrum went further with the Secretary of Sweden, telling him, that it was greatly for the advantage of the King of Sweden, whoſe ambition was without limits, that the Marquis did raiſe war in Britain; for if the King of Sweden had a mind to take Denmark, the King of Britain ſhould not be able to help his Uncle. The Secretary of Sweden did anſwer, that we care not for, neither do we fear your King; for he that would not help his own Siſter, will never help his Uncle.

I did ask Meldrum, what they did intend to do with the Prince and Queen of Britain; he anſwered, the Child ſhould be caſt in with his Father, and the Queen ſent home to her Mother to be put in a Monaſtery.

I did ask him, what charge he would have in thoſe employments; he ſaid, he ſhould be Secretary of State, and have a Horſe-Troop.

Meldrum did ſhew me alſo, that all who would not take our part, of Scotſmen in Scotland, ſhould be put in the Baſs, or ſome other Priſon, till all were ours; and that the Marquis would take pledges of all who in Scotland did lie by as neutrals at the firſt.

At my coming to Holland in March laſt, David Ramſay did leave word at Amſterdam, when I did come, to ſend him word; which I did: he came from the Hague to Amſterdam, and ſtayed with me eight days, where he did deliver me a Letter from the Marquis only of complement and thanks. He told me all went right with the Marquis; that he had gotten from his Majeſty 10000*l.* in England, and the Wine-Cuſtoms of Scotland for ſixteen years; which the Marquis would ſell, and that all things went on without any obſtacle; and that the only ſtay was for want of Arms and Munition, and eſpecially Powder; and deſir'd me to put on hard for this, with the Swediſh Ambaſſador, which I did. Thereafter he told me, he had evil news to tell me, that the Marquis's wife was brought to bed of a child.

I did ask him, where our forces ſhould meet; he ſaid upon the Sea, and thereafter land in Scotland or England, he would tell me no more: but that for my buſineſs of Orkney, I might have it better cheap than to pay the duties of it; and he told me, that when I ſhould meet with the Marquis, he would infuſe in me that which he durſt not; ſince he would have the Marquis to take the thanks to himſelf. And withal he did deſire me, that I ſhould not tell the Marquis what had paſt between him and me.

I did ask him, what part of England, we ſhould beſt land at; he ſaid at Yarmouth or Harwich, or thereby. He told me that England had made a peace with Spain very prejudicial to Holland; and that the Treaſurer and ſuch of the Spaniſh faction, as Carliſle, and Cottington, and Kenelm Digby had muffled the King to bar the Hollander from the fiſhing; which he ſaid might fall out happily for them, and he did deſire me to aſſiſt them at the Prince of Orange's hand, as a ſpecial ſervice to the Marquis, to make the States contribute with the Marquis: and I did ſpeak to the Prince of Orange, and his Excellency told me, that he would do his beſt therein.

He

He told me, that Spain and France were ſtriving who ſhould firſt drink up England in their ambition; but he hoped the Marquis ſhould prevent them both. He did ask my advice, whether it were beſt to croſs the Seas once, or to go on bravely. I anſwered, delays were not good, which he did ſubſcribe to; and ſo we concluded, and I came for England.

At my coming to England, my Lord Hamilton did give me many thanks, aſſuring me, that he would not want me; and that I ſhould have what conditions I would deſire, for he ſaid, that ſhould not ſeparate us.

I did deſire his Lordſhip to go on with me really, if he meant to have my ſervice, he ſhould have it without conditions; he did anſwer, My Lord, I will not want you, for I have written to the King of Sweden, with Elphingſton and Meldrum, that I will detain you with me, and aſſure your Lordſhip, that he that will hazard with me now in this buſineſs, it ſhall be a tye to me, and my poſterity to hazard my fortune and eſtate, with him and his. The ſame word the next day he ſent to me, with Sir James Hamilton, the Earl of Haddington's ſon.

The ſaid Sir James Hamilton and I being together, I did much commend a ſuit of apparel which Sir James had; his anſwer was, I have them on, pay them who will, I have taken them up, it may be a Merchant of London will pay for them, e'er it be long; my Lord, take one alſo on luck's head.

The firſt day, my Lord Marquis went down to Greenwich in a barge accompany'd with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, Sir Robert Ballenden, Capt. Douglas, and (I do think) Ludowick Leſlie, the King our maſter having gone before the diſcourſe was moved, if they were to make an inſurrection, where would they begin? The Marquis anſwered, he would march to London directly; and one of them (I think Capt. Douglas) ſaid, that he knew a houſe in London ſhould make them up for ever.

That day my Lord Marquis told me, he would ſell the Wine Cuſtoms, for he expected no more from England.

Capt. Douglas told me, that they would have from the King an hundred barrels of Powder, and that they would make ſhift for arms.

Sir James Ramſay told me, on Sunday laſt at Greenwich, that he had 1500 men in readineſs on a week or leſs advertiſement; and that his ſtay only was here, till he heard the men in Scotland were ready, and that his rendezvous would be at Norwich, and meet the reſt. Sir James Hamilton told me, that the Engliſh rendezvous ſhould ſhip at Harwich, for he ſaid, the Devil have his part of the river of Thames, he did not like it.

The Earl of Roxburgh told me, that he and others the Marquis's friends, were at firſt againſt the Marquis's courſes; but now ſince they ſaw his Lordſhip ſo far engag'd, and that he only aim'd at the glory of God, that he and all others his friends would put to their helping hand.

On Thurſday laſt, the Earl of Roxburgh told me, that the Marquis would haſten his reſolution, and ſaid, that he would aſſure me, my Lord Marquis thinks himſelf for ever bound to me, and ſo do all his friends for his Lordſhip's cauſe; and I will aſſure your Lordſhip he truſts you, and that you never took a more faſt and real friend by the hand.

My Lord Roxburgh, Sir James Ramſay, and Capt Douglas queſtioned me, what was the reaſon, that I had taken on Sir Pierce Croſby, ſince the Marquis had caſt him off. This day ſeverally, I told them, I was forc'd in honour and conſcience, to keep my promiſe to the King of Sweden; ſo that I did take on Sir Pierce Croſby, to ſend him thither with Iriſh and Engliſh, and that myſelf was minded with all the Scots that I could get, to follow the Marquis's fortunes; the which anſwer ſeverally given, gave them all content.

In witneſs of the truth of theſe, I have ſign'd it with my hand, day and year aforeſaid.

Sic ſubſcribitur D. Rea.

After reading of the whilk relation judicially, the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie declared, that ſo far as his memory ſerves him, there is no difference betwixt the foreſaid copy of relation, ſubſcrib'd by the five Counſellors, and the principal, or original, ſet down and ſubſcrib'd by the ſaid Donald Lord Rea: upon the making of the whilk declaration, his Majeſty's Advocate ask'd inſtruments.

Thereafter his Majeſty's Advocate anſwering to the former alledgances proponed by the Pannel, and to the firſt part thereof, he opponed the Pannel's own depoſitions, made upon the 20th and 24th of June, ſubſcribed by the five Counſellors; and whilk are granted by the Pannel to be true copies, together with the repreſentation ſubſcrib'd and written with the Pannel's own hand, whilk verifies the firſt and laſt points of the particulars concerning the Pannel's poſitive affirmation of the Treaſon. And that the Marquis was prime Agent thereof, together with the ſpeeches ſpoken to his Majeſty, upon the Sunday after dinner; and as to the 3d particular point of the Dittay, anent the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, who are called Plotters; that is verified by the relations made by the Lord Rea the 18th of May, acknowledg'd alſo by the Pannel, and by the Lord Rea's depoſitions, whilks are uſed conjunctly, for verifying the ſecond particular point of the Judgment, anent the three Noblemen who are call'd Plotters, the one thereof, viz. the relation to prove the negative part of the Dittay, and that the Pannel had no warrant from the Lord Rea. And for verifying the affirmative, that the Lord Rea diſclaimed the ſame uſes, the ſaid Lord Rea's depoſitions. And where it is alledged, that the Dittay, ſo far as it is founded upon the Lord Rea's depoſition, is not relevant againſt the Pannel, becauſe he is the Pannel's party, and becauſe he was not ſworn, and not in preſence of parties, quod eſt teſtis ſingularis, and not ſubſcribed by him; it is anſwered, firſt, that the negative point per ſe is ſufficient, to infer the relevancy of the Dittay in this point; that he gave them up as Plotters, without any warrant of the relation from the Lord Rea, whilk is clear, by conferring the liſt of repreſentation, given in by the Pannel (wherein they are called Plotters) with the ſaid Lord Rea's relation. Whereby it is evident that the repreſentation, given in upon the 16th of May, could have no warrant of the relation, whilk in the Pannel's depoſitions is affirmed to have begun upon the 13th of May, and cloſed the 18th of May, and deliver'd to the Lord-Treaſurer to be given in to his Majeſty. Within the whilk relation there is not a word of the ſaid 3 Earls, neither can the Pannel pretend ignorance hereof, in reſpect he in his own depoſition grants and confeſſeth, that the Lord-Treaſurer, to whom they were remitted by his Majeſty, deſired to give in the relation in writing, conform to the whilk the Pannel and the Lord Rea went together and conſumed the whole night in drawing the ſaid relation; whilk whilk night was the night or evening of the ſaid 17th of May, whereupon firſt they appeared before his Majeſty. And the Pannel having given in the repreſentation of the prime Agent and the Plotters upon the 16th day preceding, he could not have omitted ſuch a ſubſtantial point of the relation, which ſo nearly touch'd the Marquis and the three Noblemen aforeſaid, and the Pannel's own exoneration. Like as the Pannel himſelf with his own hand wrote up and drew off the ſaid Lord Rea's Papers the ſaid relation of the 18th of May. So that the Pannel can never affirm, that he had any Warrant from the ſaid relation for branding the Marquis as prime Agent, and the ſaid three Noblemen as Plotters. And as to the Arguments made againſt the Lord Rea's depoſition;

Firſt, the ſame is not uſed per ſe, but jointly with the other, Et juncta plena faciunt fidem. Next the Lord Rea is not the Pannel his party, ſed eſt author & mandator quam tenebatur edere, otherways he would have been himſelf culpable of Treaſon, or a delator of Treaſon againſt the ſaid Noblemen, pœna talionis vel tautopatheias by Act of Parliament, made by King James VI. Par. 11. Cap. 49. Next, nulla neceſſitas jurisjurandi quia non teſtis ſed author a reo nuncupatus. And the ſingularity cannot be objected, becauſe he uſed him tanquam ſingularem & ſolum to warrant his declaration; and for preſent he could not be, if the Lord Rea had been examined tanquam teſtis, as the Pannel alledges: and as to the authentickneſs of the Copy of the Relation, it is approven by the Pannel, and he cannot be heard to object againſt the authentickneſs thereof, nor of the other Copies; becauſe they are ſubſcribed by the ſaid five Counſellors, and have the Warrant of his Majeſty's miſſive Letter directed to the Council: which the Pannel for reverence of his Majeſty's Letter, and of the Counſellors ſubſcribers of the ſaid Copies, has acknowledged as true. And therefore cannot be heard to object againſt the remanent, whilk has the like ſolemnity of his Majeſty's Letter, and conſequently the fourth Alledgance ought to be repelled.

Quinto, It is alledged for the Pannel by his Prolocutors, That as to the particulars of his Dittay, the Pannel purges every one of them in manner following; viz. The firſt particular point is not relevant, becauſe that the Pannel at his firſt meeting with his Majeſty upon the 17th of May did ſignify to his Majeſty, that the Buſineſs was a Treaſon againſt his Majeſty, and that the Party was the Marquis of Hamilton as he was inform'd. This Article enforces not againſt the Pannel, that he is a Leaſing-maker and Forger, but clearly frees him thereof, bearing as he was informed. Whilk Article being the Sum and Subſtance of the whole Dittay, having the aforeſaid Clauſule (as he was inform'd) annex'd thereto, inforces of neceſſity the ſame Clauſule to all the particulars of the Dittay comprehended under the ſaid General quia ſemper ſpecialia generalibus inſunt. And that the Pannel ſpake it by Information, it is clear by the Pannel's Depoſitions upon the 20 and 24 Days of June, and by the Lord Rea's Depoſition the 21 of June, acknowledging the Pannel's Examination to be true in all Points, in ſo far as the ſame concerns the Knowledge, Words and Acts of the Lord Rea, and by the Relations made by the Lord Rea and ſubſcrib'd by him, and other Relations made by the ſaid Lord Rea to the Pannel by Word, as the Pannel's own Depoſition bears. Neither was it ever heard or practis'd, that any Subject being neceſſitated by the Law to reveal what may concern the King's Majeſty or the State, and revealing the ſame with his informer therein, and conſtantly abiding thereat, and willing to maintain the ſame upon any Torture or Trial whatſomever; that the Revealer, upon the Party's denial, ſhould be call'd in queſtion of his Life, as the Deviſer and Forger, or the ſame to work any ways againſt the Revealer; and which if it ſhould now take place, and begin to be a preparative againſt the Pannel; it were to give way and occaſion to all treaſonable Exploits, and that ſecurely, becauſe none would or durſt reveal the ſame.

Next, as for the Liſt of Names of the principal Agent and Plotters repreſented to the Lord-Treaſurer the 16th of May, affirmed to be forged and invented by the Pannel himſelf without any Warrant from my Lord Rea, conform to the Pannel's depoſition upon the 20th and 24th days of June laſt, none of the Pannel's depoſitions foreſaid, to the whilk the Dittay remits, bear any ſuch Confeſſion or Forging by the Pannel; but bears expreſsly the Lord Rea's relation to him in both the Pannel's depoſitions, which is ſufficient for an Informer.

It is aſked by the Pannel, That whereas it is alledged by my Lord Advocate, that the Pannel could never aſcribe any true Cauſe or Knowledge in the Liſt or Repreſentation where the Lord Marquis is named prime Agent, and the ſaid Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, Plotters; becauſe the Lord Advocate affirms, that the relation was given in upon the 18th day, and the Liſt preſented to the Treaſurer the 16th day; and ſo the Pannel could have no juſt reaſon why theſe contain'd in the Liſt were not contain'd in the relation, which was poſterior. The Pannel affirms, that howſoever the Liſt was given in before, the reaſon thereof is thus: The Lord Advocate making mention of his relation, diſtinguiſhes not betwixt a relation by Word, and another by Writ; but ſo it is, that my Lord Rea made relation to the Pannel upon the 13th of May of the whole Things contain'd in the Relation upon the 18th of May, as appears evidently by the Pannel's 1ſt and 2d Depoſitions, and upon the 14th and 15th days my Lord Rea renewed the diſcourſe concerning my Lord Seaforth, and explains himſelf in theſe particulars concerning the Earls of Haddington and Roxburgh anent their being upon the Secret and Counſel of the Marquis's courſes; That it was repreſented upon the 14th and 15th days, the Lord Rea and the Pannel being both at Greenwich, return'd upon Monday Morning, being the 16th day, to London; at which time the Pannel went unto the Lord-Treaſurer, and there fell in diſcourſe with the Treaſurer on the Buſineſs concerning the Marquis's Power in Scotland, and Friendſhip with the Pannel, and to ſhew his Lordſhip he would let him know was very great; and ſo came forward to the Pannel's own Houſe, and wrote the Repreſentation and delivered the ſame to the Lord-Treaſurer, which was done upon the 16th day, being Monday. And where my Lord-Advocate alledges, that there could be no ground for this repreſentation before the giving in thereof from my Lord Rea's written relation, becauſe the repreſentation preceded it in time, and the Plotters were not nam'd in the relation, whilk thereafter followed upon the 18th of May, anſwers the verbal relations concerning the Plotters made by the Lord Rea to the Pannel preceded the ſcriptural ſcriptural relations given in to the Treaſurer; yea and the Repreſentation both, becauſe done upon the 14th and 15th days of May, the repreſentation being upon the 16th, and the written relation upon the 18th. Neither was it needful to the Lord Rea to make that relation in this paper, which he had made to the Pannel before by word, like as there are ſundry other things in the Pannel's depoſitions, whilk are not ſet down in that written relation. Firſt, becauſe in all the written relation, no mention is made of my Lord Seaforth, or any thing proceeding from him; if of nothing from him, why then of the Grounds of the Pannel's repreſentation, whilk was had from my Lord of Seaforth?

The Juſtice continues all farther diſputation and reaſoning in this matter (by reaſon of the lateneſs of the Night) to the Morn the 2d of this Month of December, and ordains the Pannel to be return'd to Ward, to remain therein in the mean time; the Perſons alſo warn'd apud Acta to the morn, all Perſons under the pain of a thouſand Marks.

} Advocates.

The ſaid James Lord Uchiltrie by himſelf repeats the former firſt alledgance, word by word, as it ſtands, and eikis thereto, That he can no ways be in mala fide, That the Grounds of his repreſentation preceded not his written repreſentation hoc Argumento, as it is alledged, becauſe the Lord Rea had omitted in his relation to make mention thereof; whereas my Lord Rea's facts cannot make the Pannel guilty ſimply. Neither can his omiſſions take away the ſtrength of the Pannel's Arguments of his innocency: for it was the Pannel's part to follow him, and not to lead him; to reveal aſſertions, and not to indite aſſertions to him. Neither was the Pannel under any juſt cauſe of fear that his omiſſion could endanger him in the point; becauſe he was conſcious to himſelf, that my Lord Rea had told him the Grounds of his repreſentation of before, viz. upon the 14th and 15th days of May, by verbal relations thereof upon the ſaid days. The Pannel likewiſe knew that there was a ſecond relation wrote of ſundry other particulars to be made by my Lord Rea ſubſequent; among the whilk he knew the Grounds of his preceding verbal relations of his repreſentation was to be juſtified and cleared. So by theſe reaſons the Lord Rea's omiſſion of the grounds of the Pannel's repreſentation out of his ſcriptural relation eo tempore can give no juſt ground to invalid or infringe the truth of the Pannel's aſſertion, That my Lord Rea by verbal relation preceding both the repreſentation and that written relation had told him, that the Earls of Haddington and Roxburgh were upon the counſel and ſecret of the buſineſs informed againſt the Lord Marquis. The ſame laſt Argument holds good likewiſe for my Lord Buccleugh; and as to the repreſentation in general, the Pannel declares, That it was written and given in upon a Diſcourſe of my Lord Treaſurer's inquiry for the Friendſhip of the Marquis in Scotland by Blood or Intereſt; whereby conjecture might be made of his power ſuppoſitive, if his Friends had joined to him. And this is clear by the very Writ itſelf, in naming it a repreſentation, and not an information, accuſation, nor relation. The general ſtrain of the Writ likewiſe, evidences, that there was no intent by that Writ to reflect in any thing concerning the Lord Marquis or thoſe three Noblemen. Becauſe the repreſentation containing one ſide and a half of paper, that whilk concerns theſe Noblemen originally will ſcarce take up two long lines. Whereby it is manifeſt, that the intent of the Pannel was more to illuſtrate other things, viz. The alliance and intereſt in blood of the Noblemen to theſe firſt four, than any intent of either delating or inſerting any crime or fact againſt theſe firſt four: but to diſtinguiſh by way of narration betwixt the one and the other. And altho' this be ſaid, the Pannel atteſts, that the mentioning of theſe Noblemen ſucceeding the firſt four, be taken in no evil part, for he atteſts no meaning to that effect, whilk the Pannel thinks Chriſtian Charity will not preſume; his Wife's Son his Children's Brother, the prop of his providence under God, and of his Wife and Children, the Earl of Caſſils being one; and the Marquis of Huntley his Chief by his Mother, his good Dame, Brother's Son, who ſaved the Pannel's life, and for whom the Pannel has ventur'd his life, or any of his; can it be preſumed that the impannelled would have intended malice to that Maſs, wherein theſe two helped to make up the conſtruction? Neither doth it appear by any intent, that any thing was meant by the repreſentation, but an explanation of Noblemens power in Scotland. Neither let this be thought any new invention or new explanation; becauſe it is mentioned before that alledged by my Lord Advocate in the Dittay and acknowledged thereby; neither can it be preſumed, that theſe words, prime Agent and Plotters, can import an information of any thing, becauſe all direct affirmations muſt be enunciation, and muſt have ſuum vinculum to join the Subject and the Attribute together. Which Vinculum and connection of it want no enunciation; if no enunciation, no affirmation, nor lye. But ſo it is, the Words prime Agent have no vinculum, nor the word Plotters ſimply has no vinculum betwixt them as Attributes, and the perſons named as the Subject, and therefore no enunciation, nor affirmation, nor lye. And where my Lord Advocate in his Dittay affirms, that it is manifeſt by the Pannel's own deſpoſition, the truth of the Dittay; and in the diſpute yeſterday, produces a particular, that the Pannel ſhould have deponed, that the Lord Rea ſaid, that he had no certainty of the buſineſs; this can no ways fortify the aſſumption of the Dittay. Becauſe the Pannel's depoſition ſays not that the Lord Rea had certainty, but whether he had certainty or no, the words whilk the Pannel alledges was told to him by the Lord Rea; for the Pannel's depoſition depends not upon a ſcientia certa, but relatio certa, that he ſpake it to the Pannel as he has deponed. As to the third Article of the Dittay, anent the Pannel's proceeding and ſpeeches to his Majeſty the 22d of May, to wit, Sir, ye know the buſineſs, but know not the time; Sir, either do or die; this Article inforces not upon the Pannel lying to his Majeſty. For the Lord Rea, and the Pannel upon his information, both had acquainted his Majeſty with the buſineſs, ſo that the Pannel might truly ſay, Sir, ye know the buſineſs; and it is as true, that the Pannel knew not the time. As to the words do or die, that is a uſual phraſe of ſpeech and imports, Sir, ſee to your ſafety, till theſe informations had been clear'd, and is of itſelf a faithful advice to his Majeſty, and not a malicious Counſel; and advice for to prevent the King's Majeſty his harm, and not to draw harm upon any other: like as the words themſelves inforces not againſt the Pannel, as the dittay bears; but does very well admit a harmleſs ſenſe, and ſhould be interpret to the beſt meaning the words may admit. Quia de jure etiam in dubiis & obſcuris quod minimum & benignius ſequimur. Lege nona & 56. de Regulis juris; & in ambiguis orationibus maxima ſententia ſpectanda eſt ejus qui eas protulit. Lege 96. ibidem; & quoties idem ſermo duas ſententias exprimit, ea potiſſimum accipienda eſt, qua rei gerendi aptior eſt; dabit autem operam exprimi reus dicta verba at cui licito; to wit, the revealing of purpoſes, he heard againſt the King and State. Denique in pœnalibus cauſis ſemper benignius interpretandum eſt. And therefore the Pannel's ſpeaking and inſiſting with the King's Majeſty to ſee to his own ſafety, ſhould be referred to its own cauſe; to wit, the Pannel's moſt bounden duty and tender love to the King's Majeſty, his welfare, and to the State of the Kingdom, fearing their faith, upon that relation that had been made to him. And alſo fearing his own faith, if that he ſhould have been found any ways remiſs, or ſlack in not inſiſting with his Majeſty to prevent thoſe evils and treaſonable plots, ſo often related and repeated to him; and whilk the Pannel then feared to have been Treaſon, and to have come beyond Sea. And ſhould not be attributed, as the Dittay bears, to any malicious Counſel, or Purpoſe of the Pannel, for inſtigating, or ſtirring up of his Majeſty, to any ſudden and violent courſe againſt the Marquis's life and honour; as the Pannel atteſteth before God, to have been his true meaning. Like as he in his Examination in June, upon the 21ſt thereof, depones, that upon Sunday Morning, whilk was that day he adviſed the King's Majeſty with theſe former words, was that he ſhould go to London for more ſafety, and that the Pannel had no other end of ſpeaking of the words foreſaid.

Item, The words do or die, can be no Leaſing, becauſe they are not words of affirmation, but of counſel or advice.

As to the Paper of names, whilk the Dittay affirms; the Pannel has confeſſed to be made by himſelf, and that the Lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof, nor delivery of the ſame to the Lord-Treaſurer; it is anſwered, theſe words made by yourſelf, is written with your own hand, ſo purported to be by the Dittay itſelf, in that article anent the liſt of names delivered to the Treaſurer. To the writing of the whilk paper with Pen and Ink, and to the inſtant delivery thereof, by the Pannel to the ſaid Lord-Treaſurer, the Lord Rea was not privy, he not being preſent with the Pannel at that time; but does no ways enforce, that the names and matter of that written paper was forged and deviſed by the Pannel. But by the contrary, the Pannel by his depoſition, made the 20th of June, whilk bears, that after the Lord Rea had revealed to him the particulars, he deſired the Pannel to acquaint his Majeſty, or the Lord-Treaſurer therewith; leaving to the Pannel his own free-will, whether he ſhould acquaint him therewith, by word or writ. Et hic maxime ſpectanda eſt ſententia proferentis, who is no ways contrary to himſelf in his depoſitions; but whilks both ſubſiſts in their own true ſenſe.

As to the Article bearing the Pannel in his Examination, being inquired for what cauſe he did name the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent; and that the Pannel affirmed, that he could aſſign no true reaſon nor warrant from the Lord Rea: it is anſwered, that the Pannel is not obliged to give any true cauſe. But that the Lord Rea's relation to him qualis qualis is a ſufficient Warrant.

Secundo, The Pannel's depoſition upon the 24th of June bears the contrary of the ſaid Article, and aſſigns the cauſe to be, that the Lord Rea had told him, that the Lord Marquis's followers, had ſaid the intent of the Marquis's Levies was to invade Scotland or England. As alſo the Pannel's Examination upon the 20th of June purports, that upon the 13th of May, the Lord Rea came to the Pannel's chamber, and there putting the Pannel in mind of their former ſpeeches, told the Pannel that the purpoſe of the Marquis of Hamilton's Levies, as divers of his Commanders and Followers had inform'd him, was, that either they ſhould not go out of England or Scotland, or if they did, they ſhould return to England or Scotland, and ſurprize the King's houſes in Scotland, viz. the Caſtles of Edinburgh, Striveling and Dumbarton, and fortify themſelves in Leith, under the pretence of training, and ſhould take Berwick, and ſo march forward into England: and that the intention ſo to do, was, as the Lord Rea ſaid, that he was ſo informed, and as the depoſition in itſelf bears.

Tertio, The Lord Rea's written relations of divers perſons diſcourſes to the ſame purpoſe, of the whilk he was informed by themſelves; whilks written relations, although they be written on the 18th of May laſt, yet are of matters and purpoſes that paſſed long before, and related of before to the Pannel by word, by the ſaid Lord Rea.

Quarto, The Lord Rea at his firſt coming to his Majeſty in this buſineſs, in the Pannel's hearing, being aſked of the King's Majeſty, why he had not told his Majeſty ſooner of it, the ſaid Lord Rea anſwered, becauſe it concerned ſo near the Marquis of Hamilton, who was ſo near to his Majeſty; he was afraid to communicate the ſame to his Majeſty immediately, as the ſaid Lord Rea's depoſition taken upon the 21ſt of June purports.

Item, The Lord Rea's depoſition made upon the 21ſt of June, wherein he depones that he ſaid he ſhould bring as honeſt a man as himſelf, that would tell to the Lord Marquis's face more nor the Lord

Lord Rea would do; ſo all that the Pannel ſpake herein, was by Information, and ſo therein is no forger, nor maker of Leaſings.

Item, The Pannel's depoſition, taken upon the 20th of June, bearing that the Pannel told the Lord-Treaſurer, That the Lord Rea told him, he had yet more, and would ſay ſo much, as the Lord Marquis would not have a face to deny it; whilk the Lord Rea then preſent affirmed, in ſo much as the Lord-Treaſurer ſaid, then is the buſineſs at an end, there needs no more writing. And this Article before repeated, the Pannel affirms, that the Lord-Treaſurer of England heard theſe words, and did affirm the ſame before the King's Majeſty, and Council of England, upon the peril of the Pannel's head.

Item, As to the Article bearing the Lord Rea's declaration upon the 21ſt of June, that he knows nothing againſt the perſon of the Lord Marquis, but that the Marquis was as good a Subject as any the King had: it is anſwered thereto by the Pannel, that his depoſition and repreſentation depends not upon the Lord Rea's knowledge, but upon his relation made to the Pannel. And that declaration of the Lord Rea's takes not away the relation made by him to the Pannel, and doth not infer making and forging of Leaſings in the Pannel, without warrant from him; this ſpecially being conſidered, for weakning and infringing of the Lord Rea's oppoſitions to the Pannel's depoſitions, that my Lord Rea having ſaid theſe words in preſence of the Treaſurer of England, and juſtified by the Lord-Treaſurer of England, in preſence of his Majeſty and Council of England, that the Lord Rea would ſay ſo much, as the Marquis ſhould not have the face to deny it; and now he ſays that he knows nothing anent the Marquis's perſon: whilk are contradictory to himſelf, and renders himſelf not ſufficient to improve the Pannel's depoſitions.

Item, Here the Pannel, in this place, repeats the objections of the nullities, made againſt the Lord Rea's depoſitions, ſo far as the ſame may be prejudicial to the Pannel.

Item, As to the Article bearing that the Pannel being ask'd, by what warrant, he call'd the three Earls Plotters; and that he anſwer'd, that the Lord Rea had told him, that the Lord Seaforth had affirm'd to him, that the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and ſecrets of that buſineſs; declaring therewith, that the Lord Rea had affirm'd the ſame to him, before he gave in the paper of repreſentation to my Lord-Treaſurer. Albeit the Lord Rea by his depoſition the 24th of June, declar'd, that the firſt time the Lord Seaforth had ſpeech with him, anent the ſaid two Earls, and their being privy to the Marquis's buſineſs, was upon the Monday after the Marquis's coming out of Scotland, and not before; and ſo after the repreſentation given in to the Treaſurer upon the 16th of May, containing the names of the Plotters and Actors; at whilk time the Pannel could not truly affirm any information from my Lord Rea: to the whilk it is anſwer'd by the Pannel, that he by his depoſition made the 24th of June, has declar'd, that all the underſtanding the Pannel had in the buſineſs, came to him from the Lord Rea, alſo by his depoſition the 20th of June.

Item, The Lord Rea's granting of the ſpeech himſelf, anent the two Earls, makes preſumption againſt the ſaid Lord Rea, likewiſe for the time, Quia dicta facta preſupponunt & trahunt ſe cum ſuis circumſtantiis: neither is it probable nor ordinary, that there ſhould be that ſagacity of ſpirit in the Pannel, as to preſs what the Lord Rea ſhould make to him ſo long before, Quod non præſumitur, ſed præſumptio, pro eo eſt, quod maxime eſt, ſecundum naturam toto; titulo de preſumptionibus. And ſo this article enforces not againſt the Pannel, that he is maker and forger, becauſe the Lord Rea denies not ſimply, but the time of the Pannel's depoſition thereanent, whilk is no Leaſing.

Item, The Pannel in his Examination upon the 20th of June, in the courſe and order of the depoſitions thereof, whilk is the order of time, before the article anent the repreſentation of the liſt of names to the Lord-Treaſurer; he depones, that the Lord Rea had told him, that he had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, and had underſtood that from him; whilk general has no other meaning but that whilk is particulariz'd, by the ſaid Lord Rea's Examination upon the 24th of June; in that article thereof, bearing, that the Lord Rea did affirm to the Pannel, that he heard the aforeſaid report of the two Earls, before the Pannel made or deliver'd the paper of repreſentation.

Item, The Lord Rea's depoſition upon the 24th of June, bears not the Lord Rea to deny, that he did affirm to the Pannel, that he heard the report of the ſaid two Earls from the Lord Seaforth, before the Pannel made, or deliver'd the paper of repreſentation to the Treaſurer. But purports, that the firſt time that the Lord Seaforth had any ſpeech with the Lord Rea, touching the two Earls, their being privy to the particulars, and ſecrets of the Lord Hamilton's buſineſs, was upon Monday after the Marquis's coming from Scotland. And ſo that the Lord Seaforth had not ſpoken with the Lord Rea thereanent at that time; whilk is nothing to the Pannel, whether the Lord Seaforth had ſpoken with the Lord Rea or not. But denies not the foreſaid report of the two Earls made by the Lord Rea to the Pannel, whilk the Lord Rea did then affirm, that he had the ſame by information of the Lord Seaforth; neither is the Pannel obliged to make good the Lord Rea's warrant herein, that the Lord Rea had the ſame by information of the Lord Seaforth; but the queſtion is, if the Pannel heard the ſame from the Lord Rea, before the giving in of the repreſentation to the Treaſurer. Whilk the Pannel affirms and abides at, conform to his depoſitions, made upon the 20th and 24th of June, as ſaid is.

Item, The Pannel here alſo repeats all the objections againſt the Lord Rea's depoſitions, ut ſupra:

Item, Anent the Article, bearing, the Lord Rea to have told the Pannel, that he could not gueſs who elſe ſhould have been in the plot, unleſs it were the Lord Buccleugh; and that the Lord Rea, who by his depoſition upon the 24th of June depones, that the Pannel, and not he, did name the Earl of Buccleugh, as one would take arms in Scotland to aſſiſt the Marquis: It is anſwered thereto ut ſupra, that the Pannel by his depoſition has declared, that all the underſtanding he had in the buſineſs, came to him from the Lord Rea; as the Pannel's Examination bears, and whilk he abides at, as moſt true.

Item, The Pannel's depoſition upon the 24th of June, bearing the Lord Rea told him, anent the Earl of Buccleugh, is not ſimply, but cum cauſa, bearing bearing the Lord Rea's reaſon, wherefore he named him: and whilk reaſon in ſubſtance is granted by the Lord Rea, although with ſome diverſity of words, at the leaſt not denied in his Examination upon the 24th of June. And therefore, the ſaid Lord Rea's depoſition affirming the reaſon, but denying the naming the ſaid Lord Buccleugh, ought not to be credited in his denial; but the Lord Rea's affirming of the reaſon, inforces upon him the naming of the ſaid Earl. Quia ratio confeſſa dicti præponderat & præſumit contra proferentem.

Item, The Lord Rea's ſpeeches to the Pannel, anent the Lord Buccleugh, though conjectural, neceſſitate the Pannel to the repreſentation, and revealing of the ſame to his Majeſty; eſpecially ſeeing the Lord Rea ſtrengtheneth the ſame with reaſon, wherefore he ſo ſpake, to wit, that he heard the Lord Buccleugh ſpeak terrible and preſumptuous words againſt the King's Majeſty, at his own table in Holland; as the Pannel's depoſition upon the 24th of June purports, and whilk is granted by the Lord Rea himſelf in ſubſtance, at the leaſt not denied.

Item, The Pannel repeats here again all his objections againſt the Lord Rea's depoſitions; and alledges that it was never heard nor practis'd, that a ſubject being neceſſitate by the Law, to reveal what may concern the King or State, and revealing the ſame with his informer therein, and conſtantly abiding thereat, and willing to maintain the ſame by any trial or torture, that the revealer, upon the party's denial, ſhould be called in queſtion of his life, or the ſame any ways work againſt the revealer. And whilk if it ſhould now take place, and begin a preparative againſt the Pannel, the ſame were to give way and occaſion to all treaſonable exploits; and that ſecurely, becauſe none would or durſt reveal the ſame.

And further, where it is affirm'd by the Dittay, that in the liſt preſented by the Pannel to the Lord-Treaſurer, there is deſign'd the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Buccleugh to be plotters; the Pannel had ground to make the relation, no ways affirming any thing poſitive; becauſe if the Pannel's depoſition made the 24th of June, being examined and asked why in the foreſaid paper, he makes the ſaid Earls plotters;

It is anſwered in the depoſition, that the Lord Rea had told the Pannel, he could not gueſs who elſe ſhould be in the plot, unleſs it were the Earl of Buccleugh; whilk word plot, having had relation to the Earl's buſineſs, muſt alſo have relation to the other two Earls, ſeeing they were ſpoken of all at one time.

It is anſwered by his Majeſty's Advocate, firſt, to the firſt Article of the fifth exception, anent the purging of the Pannel's ſpeech to his Majeſty, upon the 17th of May: By this word that is ſubjoined, as the Pannel is informed, whilk the proponer for the Pannel will have to be repeated in all the ſubſequent paſſages concerning the buſineſs; firſt, that this word, as he is informed, cannot purge him, becauſe he received no poſitive information from the Lord Rea, againſt the Marquis, nor no warrant to call him party, prime Agent, and to affirm to his Majeſty the buſineſs was known; to whilk laſt he ſubjoins his Counſel, very dangerous for the life and eſtate of the Marquis; whilks three are conjoin'd to infer againſt the Pannel, an exceeding of the relation made to him by the Lord Rea, and the exceeding of it, with the Peril of the Noble-man, his life and eſtate; there being neither word nor paſſage in the Lord Rea's written relation, whilk may either warrant their ſpeeches, or infer them by conſequence. And in matters of this high ſtrain, as of Treaſon, no illation by conſequence is permiſſable, but upon the peril of him that infers. For in all the written relation there is not a direct word ſpoken againſt the Marquis, neither by David Ramſay, nor by Mr. Robert Meldrum; but allanerlie ſome mad and frantick ſpeeches utter'd by Meldrum upon his own imagination, or wiſh to have it ſo, for diſturbance of the eſtate, by expreſſing the manner how ſuch an enterprize, according to his fooliſh opinion, might be performed; but not one word or ſyllable, that Meldrum heard it from the Lord Marquis, or from any, who declar'd they heard the Marquis ſpeak it. And as to David Ramſay, the worſt word that is in his relation, is anent the Marquis's miſcontentment, and all the Marquis's aim was to uſe his Levy for the protection of Religion; whilk aim and intention the Lord Rea, after his coming to England, clearly underſtood by the Lord Marquis himſelf; who employ'd him to be a Colonel in his company, and gave him this aſſurance, that he, that would hazard with him in that glorious buſineſs for aſſiſtance of the King of Sweden, ſhould make uſe of him, with the hazard of his fortune and eſtate: and none of theſe paſſages will quadrate with thoſe ſpeeches ſpoken by the Pannel to his Majeſty; That it was a Treaſon, an odious Treaſon, and the Lord Marquis party, as the Pannel was inform'd; and that it was the filthieſt Treaſon that ever was intended, and that the Pannel was ſorry that any Scotchman ſhould have fallen into it, it being a ſhame to the whole Nation: whilk is a poſitive affirmation, not as the Pannel was informed, but as he himſelf did infer, upon the relation made to him by my Lord Rea, who would give the Pannel no aſſurance, he had any certain ground, whilk is manifeſt by the Pannel's depoſition upon the 20th of June laſt. And as to the relation, albeit it avow'd with theſe words (as he is inform'd) could give the Pannel no warrant to expreſs theſe poſitive ſpeeches to his Majeſty, upon the 17th of May; ſo far leſs to the other of prime Agent, and known buſineſs, with the ſubſequent counſel. Firſt, becauſe they are poſitively ſpoken without adjection, (as he is inform'd) and where the proponer for the Pannel urges that theſe words, as he is informed, muſt be repeal'd in all ſubſequent paſſages; that has ſome probability, in unico continuo actu, vel unica ſcriptura. But here the Acts are diverſe, the days diverſe, the expreſſion of writing diverſe, the liſt being upon the 16th of May; the ſpeech with the King, as he is inform'd, upon the 17th of May; and the ſpeech of the known buſineſs with the Counſel being upon the 22d of May: and theſe three taken conjunctim, evidently charges the Pannel with the exceſs of his duty. For he did all his duty that was required of him, as a faithful ſubject, when upon the 15th of May, whilk preceeded all the expreſſions, he came to the Lord-Treaſurer and told him, that he had a buſineſs to reveal concerning his Majeſty, and whilk (as he ſaid) concern'd the Marquis of Hamilton's actions, and that he had the ſame of the Lord Rea; after the whilk, he had no neceſſity as a loyal ſubject to go further. And yet he goes on to the expreſſion of all theſe ſpeeches, and adds thereto his dangerous Counſel to his Majeſty; whilk can have no reſpect to the Lord Rea's relation, nor to the the Pannel's duty in revealing of it. And where the Pannel would purge his giving in of the liſts firſt, becauſe it is not an enunciative ſpeech, quia caret vinculo; this is contrary to the repreſentation, bearing the vinculum is the Marquis of Hamilton as prime Agent; and this word is muſt be repeated in the ſubſequent word plotters; the ſentence being, the Earls of Melros, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh plotters. Whilk is a ſentence that has a clear ſignification, affirming the attribute plotters upon them three, in as evident and clear ſignification, as the clauſe ſubſequent, whilk names the whole Noblemen adherents by blood.

And where it is alledg'd, that albeit the Pannel named the Lord Marquis prime Agent, he did allanerly upon intention to diſtinguiſh the Marquis, and the other three Earls from theſe of their Adherents in blood; and urges that this intention ſhould be charitably expounded:

It is anſwered, that crimen vel delictum non poteſt purgari bona intentione. And if the points contained in the Dittay, whereupon the Pannel is accuſed, be in their own nature criminal, they cannot be purged by a good intention, nor yet by a proteſtation adjected, the time of the doing it. But the intention, with the fact and deed, are both alike judged odious and puniſhable. Et nunquam præſumitur bona intentio niſi probetur, ad eluendum crimen; as it is inſtanced, by Jul. Clarus de injuriis, tu mentiris ſalva reverentia. This inſtance being adduced, whilk by the opinions of all the Doctors cannot excuſe the committers of the injury, and much leſs in this Dittay; whilk contains Injuriam capitalem, ſtriking upon the life and fame of the Noblemen. Nam qui defamat, jugulat pluſquam maledicto, quam in manu injuria eſt qui ſic incidiatur, ut nota etiam ad poſteros tranſeat, quod eſt ſæpe eundem occidere: and charity can have no place here, without the offence of Juſtice, whilk craves the due puniſhment from the offender. And where it is alledged, that the Pannel had no warrant, both to name the Marquis prime Agent, and the Earls plotters, by a verbal relation from the Lord Rea; there can be no reſpect had to a verbal relation, except it were proven to the Judge, eſpecially in a matter tanti atrocitatis. Neither can the Pannel alledge to a verbal relation, to colour his behaviour therewith; becauſe the Pannel affirms, that their verbal relations were made upon the 14th and 15th of May; whilk precedes the relation exhibited in Writ, upon the 18th of May. In the whilk relation there is not a ſyllable of the three Earls as plottets; albeit in the relation there is mention made of the ſpeeches ſpoken by the Earl of Roxburgh to the Lord Rea. And the Pannel having given in his liſt upon the 16th of May, and knowing the peril of adding or payring to that, whilk was related to him in a matter of this importance; whilk ſhould have been as tenderly handled, as the life, honour and ſafety of our gracious Sovereign upon the one ſide; and the care to eſchew the branding of Noblemen with the odious aſperſion of his Treaſon, did require of him, on the other part: And cannot pretend a colour of excuſe by the omiſſion of the names of the ſaid three Earls in the relation given in upon the 18th of May thereafter; ſpecially ſeeing the relation in effect was his own deed; becauſe he brought the Lord Rea to his Majeſty, to make the relation. And the Lord Rea, in his relation to his Majeſty ſpake never a word of the three Earls; nor yet the Pannel in his relation to the King's Majeſty, and the Lord-Treaſurer, ſpake not a ſyllable thereof: whilk is clear by the Pannel's depoſitions upon the 20th of June, which bears his relation, made in preſence of the Counſellors his Examinators; wherein is no word of the three Earls. And likewiſe by the Examination of the Lord Rea upon the 21ſt of June, which is ſuch like; and when his Majeſty had remitted the Pannel and the Lord Rea to the Treaſurer, who directed them to draw up the Lord Rea's relation in Writ; the Pannel confeſſeth, that he and the Lord Rea went home, and ſate up all night; and that the Pannel, after the Lord Rea had put the relation in writ, did write the ſame over with his own hand, out of the Lord Rea's papers: And yet not a word of the relation of the three Earls; which would not have been omitted, if it had been truly done. And where the Pannel pretends, that the omiſſion thereof was in reſpect that the relation contains allanerly that which was related by the Lord Rea upon the 13th of May; but not that which was upon the 14th and 15th of May, which was learned of the Lord Seaforth; that alledgance hath no warrant of the relation, nor yet any appearance at all; becauſe in the Pannel's Examition upon the 20th of June, the Pannel doth condeſcend of that which was done upon the 14th and 15th of May; but not one word of the Earls, albeit in that ſame Examination, he makes mention that the Lord Rea had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth. And ſic-like in the Examination of Donald Lord Rea, upon the 21ſt of June 1631, and alſo the Pannel's own depoſition foreſaid; that the Pannel two days after the relation which behoved to be upon the 20th of May (relation being upon the 18th) the Pannel brought the Lord Rea to the Treaſurer, and cauſed him ſubſcribe his relation; at which time the Pannel told the Lord-Treaſurer, that the Lord Rea had more to ſay: whereupon the Lord Rea being ask'd what it was, and wherefore detained, the Lord Rea anſwered, that he had ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, and had ſundry particulars from him, which he did not tell to the Lord Uchiltrie in particular, but generally affirmed to him he would ſay more. But one or two days after, the Lord Rea went to the Earl of Seaforth, and then told the ſame, firſt to the Pannel. And that the Pannel, upon the Sunday of the Morning (which was the day of the Marquis's returning from Scotland) he had told the Lord-Treaſurer theſe particulars, ſpoken by the Lord Seaforth, and therewith alſo of the Marquis's return: whereby it is clear, that as nothing is contained in the relation touching the three Earls, neither in the verbal relation to his Majeſty and Lord-Treaſurer, nor in the ſubſcribed relation; ſo the ſpeeches there anent ſpoken by the Lord Rea to the Pannel was not till eight days after giving in of the liſt.

And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that as the Lord Rea's fact cannot burden him, far leſs his omiſſion; it is anſwered, firſt, it muſt bind him, becauſe he has named him to be his Author: and wherein he is not his Author, the Pannel himſelf muſt needs be the forger. And next, becauſe the relation in effect is the Pannel's own deed, as ſaid is; and as to the purgation of the ſpeeches, that the buſineſs is known, Sir, either do or die; that the ſame muſt be interpret ſecundum communem uſum loquendi; and to mean as mickel as to ſee your own ſafety: it is anſwered, that they muſt be taken properly, and not improperly, and muſt be ruled by the preceding ſpeeches of the party and prime Agent; as if the Pannel had ſaid to any perſon, this man ſlew your father, father, do or die. In the which caſe, the words would not be exponed ſafety, but revenge: and where it is alledg'd quod in dubiis begnignior fieri debet interpretatio; this rule of law has only place in contractibus, ſed non in criminibus, præcipue atrocioribus, as this is. But it is urged hic ſumus in facto licito; but it is anſwered, hic in maxime illicito. Becauſe there was nothing required of the Pannel, but to reveal (whilk was done of before) and whatever was done after the revealing, that might tend to the hurt of the reputation of the Noblemen, or touch them in their life and eſtate, was altogether unlawful and capital; and the unlawfulneſs is manifeſt, by the ſubjoining of that pernicious Counſel, to do or die: whilk is not of the nature of a relation, but of the nature of the inſtigation, of a ſovereign Prince to a dangerous act, tending to the deſtruction of the life and honour of them, againſt whom the Counſel is given; and by their anſwers, the whole objections made againſt the particulars of the libel are ſolved. To the which is added, the Lord Rea's declaration by Oath, freeing the Marquis: his Majeſty's Letter of the 29th of June, ſent down to the Council, declaring the Lord Marquis, and the ſaid three Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, (to be as his Majeſty knows them to be) as good and faithful Subjects, as any within his Majeſty's Kingdoms; and declaring his Majeſty's reſolution, to have thoſe who have given falſe information againſt them, to be puniſhed. After the which, did follow his Majeſty's Letter of the date of the 24th of September; for trying and cenſuring the Pannel, upon the particulars given forth by him againſt the Noblemen: wherein the Pannel notwithſtanding of all his purgations, can have no juſt warrant againſt the Marquis, ſpecially in the two laſt points of prime Agent, and known buſineſs, nor pretext againſt the Earls of Haddington and Roxburgh; but (by the Pannel's confeſſion) leaſt of all againſt the Earl of Buccleugh, againſt whom he had nothing but a gueſs by his own confeſſion, and yet he makes him Plotter.
